MR. STANSFELD said, in reply, that a Bill dealing with the subject had been long in type, and waiting only for a convenient opportunity for introduction into that House. It proposed to repeal absolutely all exemptions from rating, including Government property. He was sanguine at one time that he would have been able to have introduced it at an early period; but his views had lately considerably changed on that point. The decision which the House came to a short time since on the Motion of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had much enlarged the scope and complicated the question of local rating, and the Government had come to the conclusion that it was inadvisable to deal with the simple subject of certain total exemptions from rating, as they had hoped to do, and that it would be better to defer the whole subject until they had an opportunity of dealing with it on the broader basis contained in the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon.

IRELAND—THE ARRAN ISLANDS—LIGHTHOUSE ON STRAW ISLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he can state to the House the cause of the delay in erecting a light on Straw Island, in the Arran Islands, and, whether he has had any communication with the Board of Irish Lights on the subject?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, much delay had arisen in Dublin as to the erection of this light. The legal sanction for the necessary works had, however, been given some months ago, and the delay since then had been caused simply by the inquiry into the title of the site which was requisite, but which had now, however, almost come to an end.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—UNION RATING.
QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, What course he proposes to take with regard to Union Rating?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that he was as anxious as the hon. and learned Gentleman could be that this question should be settled; but, looking at the state of Public Business, and the 52 Orders of the Day which were on the Paper for that evening, he did not think there would be any prospect whatever of passing in the present Session a measure on this subject, which was sure to cause a great deal of discussion.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—COM-PULSORY ATTENDANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. HERMON asked the Vice-President of the Council, Whether in boroughs and other places where it has been ascertained that ample school accommodation exists it is the intention of the Government to give power to some other authority to compel the attendance of children, without the necessity of forming a School Board?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that if the hon. Gentleman would refer to the Elementary Education Act, he would see that the Government had no power to authorize any local body except the school board to compel the attendance of children. Even if the Government were of opinion that any local body should be so empowered—and he could not state that such was their opinion—the Act did not confer on them any authority of this nature.

ST. GEORGE'S CHANNEL—LIGHTHOUSE ON THE TUSKAR ROCKS.—QUESTION.

MR. REDMOND asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, having regard to the frequent loss on the Tuskar Rocks of vessels sailing to and from English ports, and the importance of immediate assistance being afforded in such cases, the Government have it in contemplation to establish telegraphic communication between Tuskar Lighthouse and the Irish Coast?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, if the lighthouse on the Tuskar Rocks were to be connected by telegraphic communication with the mainland, the expense would have to be borne by the shipping interest or the telegraphic authorities, and even then serious difficulties would arise, because, from the limited area of the rock on which the lighthouse stood, it would be almost impossible to find accommodation there for a telegraphic clerk and the necessary apparatus. At any rate, the Board of Trade had no power to apply the Mercantile Marine Fund for the purpose of establishing such a telegraphic communication.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Public Health Bill, relating to a subject which the Government pressed on the diligent attention of a Commission three years ago, and have twice advised Her Majesty to recommend to Parliament for immediate legislation, and which is now being postponed to other Government measures, might not have a morning devoted to its consideration in Committee?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can so far comfort the mind of my right hon. Friend, with whom we are quite agreed as to the importance of this measure, as to assure him that it would be a mistake to suppose that the Public Health Bill is postponed to the other principal measures of the Government. That is by no means the case; and we are very anxious to arrive at the time when we may deal with the Public Health Bill in the same way as with other principal measures of the Ministry—by devoting to it the whole available time of the House, so far as that time is under our direction and control. We hope to-night to dispose finally of one of the chief Government measures. We shall then proceed with the Scotch Education Bill in the same manner as with the Ballot Bill—that is, by inviting the House to give to it the whole of its available time. In our opinion that is the best way of disposing of all these measures, and we should not confer any real advantage on the Public Health Bill by devoting to it a mere fragment of time. It is for the sake of getting forward with that Bill that we wish to get rid of the measures which at present obstruct its progress.

CHANCERY FUNDS.—QUESTION.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN asked Mr. Solicitor General, Whether he, having stated that the Act 29 Vic., c. 5, enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to convert only £5,000,000 into Terminable Annuities, is not of opinion that the cancelling of £7,000,000 in exchange for the annuity of £553,887 per Act 29 Vic., c. 5, sec. 4, is illegal?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: It is very inconvenient, Sir, to preface a Question by a statement which is altogether inaccurate. In the first place, I never made the statement in question. On looking into a printed report of the debate to see what I did say, I find the matter a great deal worse than it is put in the Question, because my argument being, on the occasion referred to, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not convert one single farthing of the Chancery Funds into Terminable Annuities, I find I am made to say that he could convert £5,000,000 of them, and that was a very small proportion of £60,000,000. What

Sir Charles Adderley

I did state was that the Act in question related merely to the Savings Banks Funds, and did not apply to the subject of Chancery Funds at all. Then, again, it is not quite accurate to say that £7,000,000 have been converted under the 29 Vic., section 4. The conversion has been made to the extent of £5,000,000 under section 1, and to the extent of the balance converted, being a portion of the fund which arose only from the operations of the Post Office Savings Banks under section 4. After this I need hardly say that what has been done is in my opinion legal.

METROPOLITAN POLICE—CASE OF CONSTABLE GEORGE CARTER.

QUESTION.

MR. STRAIGHT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is cognizant of the circumstances under which George Carter, late constable 25 of the E Reserve of eight years' service in the Metropolitan Police, after being complimented and rewarded by Sir Thomas Henry for his courage at a fire in Gray's Inn Road last October, was dismissed from the force in March of the present year; whether he is aware that Carter was compelled to hand over to the Superintendent of his Division a sum of £21 10s. 2d., received by him from the Editor of "The Daily Telegraph," which had been subscribed for him by the public in recognition of his bravery upon the occasion before-mentioned; whether it is a fact that such sum of £21 10s. 2d. has, since Carter's dismissal, been replaced in the hands of the Editor of "The Daily Telegraph" by the Superintendent in question; and, whether, upon a review of all the circumstances of the case, he will direct that Carter shall be reinstated?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, Constable George Carter was dismissed from the Metropolitan force on March 25 for an act of misconduct; and, in fact, at his own request. This dismissal had nothing whatever to do with the fire in Gray's Inn Road. With respect to that fire, a sum of money was subscribed by a number of persons under what, upon a careful investigation, was believed to be a misapprehension on their part, and therefore the Chief Commissioner of Police returned the money to the editor of The Daily Telegraph, from whom it was received. At the request of the Chief Commissioner I have directed all the Papers and Correspondence to be referred to Sir Thomas Henry, who has kindly undertaken to investigate the matter, and by his decision I shall be happy to abide so far as the payment of the money is concerned.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.—PROFESSOR BERNARD'S LECTURE.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government a Question with respect to a Lecture recently delivered at Oxford on the Treaty of Washington by one of the High Commissioners. I have read the report of that Lecture with equal amazement and alarm, and wish to know, Whether that Lecture was delivered with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman, by giving me private Notice of this Question, has enabled me to communicate respecting it with my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office. Having done so, I have now to say that the lecture to which the right hon. Gentleman refers was not delivered with the sanction or in any manner with the participation of Her Majesty's Government. Of course, I do not wish to be understood as passing any opinion upon the delivery of that lecture. I merely wish to say that in the delivery of it the right hon. and learned Gentleman from whom it proceeded acted on his own responsibility.

PARLIAMENT.—GALWAY ELECTION INQUIRY.—JUDGMENT OF MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.—QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he regretted that he had not had the opportunity of giving Notice to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government of a Question he wished to put on the subject of the first Order of the Day. It was, Whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been called to the manly, straightforward, and outspoken judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh, and in under the circumstances he will postpone the Order for the Third Reading of the Ballot Bill, to give the House an opportunity of having before it the proceedings of the Galway Commission before handing over the electors of Ireland to such taskmasters as therein described?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I must tell the hon. and gallant Gentleman at once that we cannot adjourn the first Order of the Day. As to the proceedings of the Galway Commission, I am sensible of their importance, but they are proceedings which are held under statute. That statute provides for a certain regular course of procedure, and it is expedient we should wait until that course is adopted before we adopt any ulterior measures.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE INDIRECT CLAIMS. THE NEGOTIATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE: I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether it would be convenient for him to state what is the present condition of the negotiations respecting the Treaty of Washington? There is great anxiety on the part of the House to have such a statement, and the right hon. Gentleman may, perhaps, feel that it would be even expedient for him to make it.

MR. GLADSTONE: I certainly wish, Sir, I had received some prior intimation of a Question of such great importance. At the same time, I am very sensible of the truth of what my right hon. Friend says—namely, that this is not only a matter of very great importance, but that it would be very desirable to make a statement to the House respecting it if I could do so with propriety. The moment has not arrived for making such a statement, though I am in hopes it will shortly arrive; and my right hon. Friend may rely that it will not be postponed for one moment longer than in our opinion is deemed necessary.

MR. OSBORNE: I do not wish to repeat the Question put to the First Minister by my right hon. Friend, but I think the House would like to know, whether there is any truth in the Despatch which has been printed in The Times this morning from New York relating to the Treaty?

MR. GLADSTONE: There has been a variety of despatches relating to the Treaty.

MR. OSBORNE: The right hon. Gentleman must have seen this despatch?

MR. GLADSTONE: If my right. hon. Friend refers to a telegraph despatch which is stated to have come not in the regular course, and which is printed to-day in The Times and Daily Telegraph—I do not remember the precise terms of the despatch, but the general effect of it is that negotiations between the two Governments are actually or virtually at an end—that telegram is incorrect.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL—[BILL 160.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce, The Marquess of Hartington.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read the third time.”—(Mr. W. E. Forster).

MR. MAGUIRE moved that the Bill be re-committed in respect of Rule 26, which, he considered, was antagonistic to the principle of the measure, and would, if it became law, lead to most dangerous consequences. In doing so he had not the slightest intention of opposing the progress of the measure, for he had always been a consistent supporter of the Ballot, not from any admiration of secret voting—indeed, he believed if that House were polled not one hon. Member would be found to be in favour of secret voting in the abstract—but because he regarded the Ballot as having become an absolute necessity for the purpose of doing away with those giant evils which seemed to be inseparable from open voting—corruption and intimidation. Now, the question which he was about to raise was not a party question, for it was evident that such a Bill as that before the House would, if not this year, at all events very shortly, become the law of the land, and that being so, it was the interest of all parties alike that it should be rendered as free from blemish and as little hurtful to the community at large as it was possible to make it. Corruption and intimidation, there was abundant evidence to show, were not the special vices of any political section, and so long as a seat continued to be an object of ambition, wealthy and powerful persons would be found who would exercise their influence to prevent freedom of election. It was to protect the poor and dependent voter that the Bill was intended, and if there was one class more than another liable to be tyrannized over by power and corrupted by wealth, it was that illiterate class who could neither read nor write. He was not one of those who would deprive a man of his vote, because he happened, probably through no fault of his own, to be in that position; but the House ought not, he maintained, to accept a Bill which would inflict enormous injustice on that very class. What had been done with respect to the case of these illiterate voters? There were two classes of illiterate voters—the honest man, who might be poor and dependent, and the dishonest man, who might be anxious to sell his vote. How did the Bill deal with the former? He would be compelled to go before a magistrate and make a declaration that he was unable to read. That declaration he was bound to present to the presiding officer in the polling-booth; and he was then required to direct that officer, in the presence of the agents of the candidates, how his voting paper was to be filled up; or, in other words, to say openly for whom he recorded his vote. So that the House was about to force a voter, whom it ought to protect in the exercise of the franchise, to record his vote in the presence of all the agents of the several candidates, and thus to expose himself to the vengeance of those who might be unscrupulous in the exercise of power—to all the consequences, in fact, which were likely to result from open voting. The dishonest voter who did not know, or pretended not to know, how to read would also have to take his declaration to the Returning Officer, and would have to give his vote probably in the presence of the very agent by whom he had been bribed, who would thus have the most perfect security that the foul compact into which he had entered would be carried out. He regarded that provision as a great blot on the Bill in a moral point of view. He freely admitted that there was much difficulty in dealing with this matter. The presiding officer might not be trustworthy in every particular, and he might get the post mainly to support the interests of a party; and so it had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) that coloured papers should be used in order that the most illiterate voter could understand for whom he recorded his vote; and the suggestion was one which he thought might meet the difficulty. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) was anxious to carry his Bill at any cost, though conscious of the grievous nature of this blot; but it was the duty of the Government to confess that they had made a blunder, and to call upon the House to repair it. The right hon. Gentleman had submitted to many blows which had been given to the measure, and which had, more or less, injured its character and impaired its efficiency; but if he assented to the change which the 26th Rule had undergone, he would assent to that which diminished the value of the Bill in the eyes of all men who desired to throw a shield over the most humble and helpless of the community. The Bill was sure to become law, in spite of any resistance from the Opposition benches, and it was, therefore, desirable to make it as perfect and as little injurious as possible, and, above all, to prevent the polling-place from becoming the very spot where the foul bargain of the corrupter might be completed. He knew the right hon. Gentleman and many other hon. Gentlemen had expressed their dislike of the alteration made in the 26th Rule, but thought it better to offer no obstruction to the passing of the Bill on that account. That was not real statesmanship, and every man who adopted that policy of expediency must hold himself responsible for the evils which would ensue. With no opposition to the Ballot and with no admiration for it, but as a supporter of it on the ground of necessity, and desiring to protect the poor from tyranny and corruption, he moved that the Bill be now re-committed in respect to Rule 26.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "re-committed, in respect of Schedule I., Rule 26," — (Mr. Maguire,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. W. E. FORSTER regretted that his hon. Friend did not give the House the benefit of his eloquence at the time the clause was under discussion; for when the Government were compelled reluctantly to yield to what appeared to be the feeling of the majority, his hon. Friend manifested less interest in this matter than he did now, and omitted to vote in a critical division on the question now before the House.

MR. MAGUIRE rose to Order. He never once shrank from voting on the Ballot Bill, and on the occasion referred to by the right hon. Gentleman he either directly voted or paired.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had no doubt the hon. Gentleman was right; but he could only say he should have been glad of the hon. Member's advocacy on previous occasions. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would not now press his Motion on the House, because there was inconvenience in going back to a matter which had already been discussed several times, and on which the House had come to a determination by a decisive majority. The Motion of the hon. Member went further than his speech, for the 26th Rule provided for assistance being given to the blind as well as to the illiterate, while the hon. Gentleman's observations only related to the assistance to the illiterate. His hon. Friend exaggerated when he said the Bill had received many blows. The change he had mentioned was the only one of real importance that had been made in the whole measure since its introduction. The Bill had been searchingly discussed 12 nights in Committee and two on Report; and of the five alterations of any moment which had been made in it, this in Rule 26 was the only one of great importance. Of the other four, one had reference to penalties, under Clause 3, for offences as to voting papers and nomination papers, the punishment having been decreased from two years' hard labour to six months; another referred to penalties, under Clause 4, for the infringement of secrecy, three months' hard labour having been altered to six months; personation had been declared felony instead of misdemeanour; and what was, no doubt, an important change—the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), after defeating the attempt of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) to bring in his Amendment, having suggested certain words which the Government gladly adopted—after altering them, the effect of which was, that six months' hard labour could be given to any person who, either in the booth or out of the booth, attempted, directly or indirectly, to induce a voter to display his voting paper. The most important alteration in the Bill, however, was that now under consideration; and he must demur to the assertion of his hon. Friend that this was but one of many important changes. His hon. Friend asked why the Government did not accept his proposal before the measure left the House. All he need say in reply was that it would be perfectly fruitless if they did accept it, as they would be unable to carry it. There was no doubt of the difficulty of the question as regards the voter unable to read. The Government thought this a matter of such importance that they sent out to the different Australian Colonies to ask how they treated the voters in this case; and it would be some comfort to his hon. Friend to learn that, although the Ballot did work well in all the Australian Colonies and in New Zealand, there was only one of them—South Australia—in which this assistance was not given to the voter who was unable to read; the presiding officer being, in all the other colonies, empowered to give the assistance required by the illiterate voter, or rather to mark the voting paper for him. He had seen many depositions of working men on the subject, and he had put the question to them as one of the most difficult in the Bill; but he had not found any strong opinion in favour of no assistance being given to the illiterate voter. The Government, after much consideration, thought the best way of avoiding the difficulty would be to frame the voting paper so that the voter who was unable to read might with average skill be able to fill it up; but after the discussions in the Committee—first on the Motion of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) for the omission of the word “physical,” when he had a most difficult task to perform, and afterwards, on the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley)—he saw clearly that there was a strong feeling in favour of some additional assistance being given, and they were compelled to assent to it on condition of a declaration being signed. Was it now advisable to re-open the question? He thought it would be very unadvisable, because it would merely delay the Bill without altering the result. But he had another reason. He believed the Bill, as brought in, would have afforded sufficient assistance to the voter who was unable to read; but there might be many persons in the country who thought sufficient assistance was not given, and a feeling might be raised against the working of the Ballot. In the interest of the Ballot, therefore, which he had strongly at heart, he thought it best to put up with the inconvenience of the Amendment rather than contend against it. At the same time, there ought to be a strong inducement to the voter unable to read to do his best to make use of the voting paper as it stood, and that inducement, he believed, the declaration would supply. He thought the number of persons making use of this Rule would be very small, for three reasons—first, because of the unwillingness to take the trouble of making a declaration; secondly, because it would diminish secrecy, though it must be remembered that there would be a strong penalty for giving information; and, lastly, because there would be a natural reluctance in the minds of illiterate voters to acknowledge that they were unable to read. His hon. Friend referred to two classes of voters—the independent voter and the corrupt voter; but he was at a loss to discover how either of them would be placed in a worse position than at present. The independent voter, if he loved independence, would rely on his own good sense in the matter and vote on the voting paper without troubling himself with any declaration. With regard to the corrupt voter, it was possible there might be a conspiracy; an agent might discover how he voted, and the result might possibly be, as at present, bribery or intimidation. But if it should be discovered that this provision was abused—magistrates conniving with intimidators, and declarations being obtained for the purpose of intimidation or bribery—the Bill, of course, ought to be amended, and this provision would be taken away. But, in the meantime, in the interest of the Bill, and with a view to its speedy operation in the country, he asked his hon. Friend to be content with having made his speech and not put the House to the trouble of a division.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. MONK said, he thought it might have been as well if his right hon. Friend had waited to hear what objections might be urged by independent Members to the Bill as it now stood before he rose to reply. He had watched with considerable—he might say painful—interest the course of the Ballot Bill ever since the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Marquess of Hartington) had taken the question out of the hands of his hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), and now at the eleventh hour he must join with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) in entering his protest against sending a Permissive Ballot Bill up to “another place.” If secret voting was a right thing to adopt, it should be enacted there should be no permissive secret voting. There was no intention to exclude the blind or illiterate from seeking or obtaining the assistance of the presiding officer; but he objected to some half-dozen agents of as many candidates taking their place in the polling-booths to observe the presiding officer marking the voting papers of those who claimed his assistance. That would open the door very widely to the worst forms of bribery and intimidation. He trusted that if the Bill were sent up to the other House in its present state it would meet with the same reception as it did last year, on the ground that it was an incomplete measure. In that case he should unite his voice to the voices of hon. Members opposite, in desiring that another opportunity might be afforded to the country of expressing its opinion as to the adoption of the Ballot, and as to the nature of the Ballot which it desires. He had not the slightest doubt that in that case the country would declare itself in favour of secret voting.

MR. NEWDEGATE*: Mr. Speaker, the speech which we have just heard from the hon. Member for Cork demonstrates the real position of this question. The hon. Member has uttered the fervent wish that the country may have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the subject. That, Sir, is a wish in which we all participate; but that is an object which Her Majesty's Government are intent upon defeating. Let me advert for a moment to the speeches of the hon. Member and the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill; and I ask, was it possible to have a command conveyed in terms more distinct than by the speech of the hon. Member for Cork? The hon. Member took Her Majesty's Government to task because they ventured to accede to the wish of this House, to partially invalidate the sacred principle of secret voting. Then up rose the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill, and humbly apologized for the conduct of this House, because, out of consideration for those voters who happen to be illiterate, we have ventured to invest the presiding officer with the function of taking down the vote of the illiterate voter, as it is the duty of the election officer to record the votes under the present system. The hon. Member for Cork was eloquent against corruption, and against the use of money; but he said not one word upon the subject of another species of influence—that of intimidation. The hon. Member commenced his speech by declaring that, in the abstract, he was not in favour of secret voting, and yet the whole tenor of his speech was to condemn Her Majesty's Government and condemn the House because, in one particular, we have invaded the sacred principle which he represents. An hon. Member put a question before this discussion began which was very pertinent. We have lately had delivered by a Judge, acting by our appointment, one of the most remarkable charges that have ever issued from the judicial bench. It describes not the effect of corruption, for Judge Keogh has declared that in the Galway Election Inquiry there was not a shadow of reliable evidence of the slightest corruption having been practised; but he has described in the most graphic terms the system of priestly intimidation which has lately convulsed that county; and he has added words which I will quote to the House, because it is necessary that they should be known to Parliament—to both Houses of Parliament—before this Bill passes through its present stage. If this Bill passes, I say that it will pass, not by the deliberate judgment of the House of Commons, but by the coercion exercised upon the Liberal party by those whom the hon. Member for Cork represents. I will show their object. They represent the priesthood whose interference in the Galway election has just been exposed before a judicial tribunal; and then we have a Roman Catholic Judge, be it spoken to his honour, discharging his judicial functions in a manner that goes far to vindicate the Roman Catholic body from the imputation of being the slaves of the priests, for he has shown that there are Roman Catholics in Ireland who are still freemen. Now, Judge Keogh has given us a warning, and that a warning which the Legislature ought to respect touching this very measure. We have two several reports of the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh, and I will read an extract from each that the House may test its accuracy. In The Times' report the words are these—

“ Father Cohen had said from the altar, while in his vestments celebrating mass, that his parishioners were bound to vote for Captain Nolan, and that even if they had previously promised to vote with their landlords, they were bound to break their promise. This was sworn, and like the rest was not denied. Every word of that statement would be sufficient to unseat 100 Members. It had been reluctantly admitted by Mr. Bernard O’Flaherty, who was taken out of his bed to give the evidence, that Father Cohen had said that priests would use the Confessional under the Ballot Bill, if necessary; but the Ballot Bill was not yet law, and Parliament was still sitting, and the Ministers and the Legislature ought to know this avowal of Father Cohen.”

That is the version of The Times; and here is the version given in The Standard, which has a different report of the same passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh—

“ Priests had announced that they should use, under the Ballot, the Confessional, which it was an article of Catholic faith was closed from the public, as much as the Delphic oracle or the Holy of Holies. The Ballot Bill was not yet the law of the land. Parliament was still sitting. He had lived a public life, but he should do his duty, and the Ministry and the Legislature should know the Catholic clergy represented by the Rev. Mr. Cohen meant to use the Confessional for the purposes of election intimidation, in case the Ballot became the law of the land.”

This is The Standard report; but it will be seen that the two reports are the same in substance. Therefore, let the House remember that they have first the testimony of Mr. Fitzgibbon, a Master in Chancery, which I have quoted to the House on a previous occasion, that it is the policy of the Roman Catholic priesthood to obtain the Ballot because, under its operation, their means of intimidation will not be controlled, although it may, perhaps, afford some check upon the use of bribery and corruption at elections, which, however, is contrary to the experience of the United States.

Mr. Newdegate

But, besides the evidence of a Master in Chancery, Mr. Fitzgibbon, we have now the declaration of Mr. Justice Keogh in his judgment that the measure which you are engaged in forcing through this House will not check the priestly intimidation which disgraces Ireland, but that it will have this effect—it will render the detection of it impossible, or so difficult that it will defeat the law by which you are to save the freedom of election and the rights of the electors in the county of Galway. I say, then, that you are passing this measure at the dictation of the Roman Catholic priesthood, and, in the interest of some Members of this House, like the hon. Member for Huddersfield, who has been detected in the grossest practices of corruption—[“No!”]—as proved before a Committee of this House. [“Order!”]—

MR. LEATHAM: I rise to Order. The hon. Gentleman is surely not justified in speaking of me as having been detected in the grossest practices of corruption. It is really too bad.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would see the propriety of withdrawing the expression.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I am quite willing to withdraw anything but the evidence which is before this House; and I say that there is a Report of a Commission in which the name of that hon. Member appears, and that that document is to be found in the Library. [“No!”]—

SIR JOHN GRAY: I rise to Order. The hon. Member is now repeating his statement in another form instead of withdrawing it.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I have to apologize to the hon. Member, Sir. I find that I ought to have said the brother of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, and that is a fact. I say that the inducements for passing this Bill are not such as are creditable to the House. I speak plainly, because I look on the measure as one not passed by the freewill of Parliament. I look upon it as a measure that is calculated to effect a revolution in our electoral system, to be followed by further measures of a revolutionary character. I speak plainly, and if in speaking plainly I unfairly accused the hon. Member for Huddersfield, I apologize; but I point to documents which are before the House, and if they apply to his brother and not to himself, still I appeal to the fact that those who are most urgent for the passing of this Bill are connected with those who have suffered for corrupt practices. I will now call the attention of the House to another subject. We have a new system to deal with in the Roman Catholic Church, particularly among the priesthood; and we have that system repudiated by Roman Catholics in Ireland, and we have it condemned by a Roman Catholic Judge. I will describe that system, and that there may be no mistake upon the subject, I will not use my own unlearned language. Now, this is the system with which we have to deal, as described by Dr. Döllinger in his letter to the Archbishop of Munich. Dr. Döllinger says—

“It is known that the Jesuits, when they determined to elevate to a dogma of faith Papal absolutism in Church and State, invented the so-called sacrificio dell' intelletto—the sacrifice of the intellect—and assured their partizans and disciples, and really convinced many—among whom are even some Bishops, that the most beautiful homage to be offered to God, and the noblest Christian heroism, consisted in this—that man, renouncing his own intelligence, his acquired knowledge, and his discernment, should throw himself with blind faith into the arms of the infallible Pontifical ruler, as the only sure foundation of religious knowledge. To this monastic Order is due in great part the success of raising in the eyes of very many indolence of spirit to the dignity of a sacrifice religiously meritorious.”

That is the doctrine of obedience upon which the Roman Catholic hierarchy and priesthood have acted in Galway. That is the system which is condemned by Mr. Justice Keogh. And here I have an American authority to the same effect. Here I have an Ultramontane publication declaring that this sacrifice of the intellect, and the will is hereafter, under the new dogma of the Papacy, to be the test of religious virtue. Well, we have an example of its action in the election of Members to this House, and yet the House, under the influence of Her Majesty's Government, will not pause before it passes this Bill until the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh is before it. There is evidence of the most important kind as to the exercise of this power. You are warned that the measure which you are asked to pass will in no way interfere with the exercise of that system of priestly intimidation; yet, with their eyes open to the existence of this new system of tyrannical control, Her Majesty's Government are as obedient as ever to the dictation of the hon. Member for Cork, whilst the majority of this House are apparently so helplessly committed to the system of secret voting—secret, that is, as against everyone except the priest—that they are about to pass this measure for Ireland as well as England; and I have heard many Irish Members say in private that had they known the revelations which the Galway Election Inquiry was going to produce, they would never have supported this Bill at all, but voted against it. It is now, however, of no use. The majority are committed to the measure. This Bill, we are told, must pass, and must go to the House of Lords. But I am determined that it should not leave this House before I remind the House that a court which the House has appointed, in supersession of its own Committees, has through its Judge warned you that, although you may hope to avoid exposure or to correct bribery, this measure will afford no protection against the priestly intimidation which has disgraced the election for Galway.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, who had on the Paper a Motion to amend the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), by adding the words—

“And also for the purpose of amending the second schedule by inserting a provision for printing the names of the several candidates on the ballot paper in different colours, to be determined by the Returning Officer,” said, he desired to bring the House back to the Amendment before it. He regretted that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) should have brought a charge which he had very inadequately proved against his hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham). For his own part he certainly intended to vote for the third reading of the Bill; but he should not do so under the influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood, nor because it could be proved by documents in the Library that he or even his brother had been guilty of corruption. As the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had asserted that only those two classes of persons would support the Bill, he begged to assure him that he did not belong to either. Passing to the 26th Rule, which his hon. Friend the Member for Cork proposed to strike out, he expressed his regret that the Vice President of the Council could not support the proposal, especially as his right hon. Friend disapproved the Rule altogether.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he disapproved of assistance being given to the illiterate voters; but the Rule went a great deal further.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, that substantially the hon. Member for Cork only wished to get rid of that part of the Rule. He believed that the majority of the House disapproved of the Rule, and the question of delaying the Bill for 24 hours for such an object was really too insignificant to be considered, and ought not to stand in the way of the opinion of the House being taken on it. He knew that he had been accused of being hostile to the principle of secret voting; but he denied that there was any truth in the charge. The fact was that this provision did not protect the secrecy of those who desired protection; and when his right hon. Friend argued that after all the provision would be very little made use of, that only went to prove that it was in the nature of a sham. In truth, it would be made use of by those chiefly whom it was not desired should benefit by it—namely, those that, having bargained to be paid for their vote, would be under the necessity of letting it be known how their vote was given. He could not help thinking the House had got into the present difficulty because they had devoted their attention not so much to perfecting the machinery of the Bill as to devising penalties which could never be enforced. It might be argued that if they got rid of Rule 26 they would disfranchise illiterate voters; and it was to meet that objection that he had placed his Amendment on the Paper. He knew that it had been raised before, but only under circumstances that prevented its being properly discussed; and he hoped, therefore, that the Government would consent to the opinion of a full House being again taken on it.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought the measure had been converted into a Permissive Ballot Bill, not by the adoption of this clause, but by the rejection of the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), the result of that rejection being that every elector might, while in the compartment, allow his ballot paper to be seen by the candidates' agent. If, in the first instance, Her Majesty's Government had adopted the principle of printing the names of the candidates in colours, as was now suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) would not have been made, because it would not have been necessary. As far as that Motion was concerned, he could not support it, unless the Government adopted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. It rested, therefore, with Her Majesty's Government to afford Parliament an opportunity of further considering the question which was involved in the proposal immediately before the House, and that with reference to printing the names of the candidates in different colours.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished it to be understood that he only desired to expunge from the Bill so much of the Rule now under consideration as referred to illiterate voters.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 279; Noes 61: Majority 218.

MR. W. H. SMITH entered his protest against a measure which was sure to injure and endanger the character of a deliberative Assembly which had long been the admiration of the civilized world. That House, which had always been pointed to as a model for all other kindred institutions to copy, was now about to take a step which would deprive the electors of the power of expressing their views and opinions, and of acting in public as they hitherto had been accustomed to do, and deprive hon. Members of that invigorating influence of public opinion and public responsibility on which they had always laid such enormous stress. If it had been proposed to deprive the public of the knowledge of the transactions of that House—if it had been proposed that the voting in the House of Commons should be taken in secret—it would have been no greater change than the one contemplated by the Bill which required that the electors should poll in secret. He had no doubt that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) who said that in the abstract secrecy was injurious to the individual who practised it, and also to the influence and power of the House, merely expressed the general feeling; but the hon. Member justified the course he was about to adopt in voting for the third reading on the ground that it was absolutely necessary. But if there ever was any real necessity for the Ballot the evidence submitted to Committees of that House showed that that time had completely passed away. He had had the honour of sitting upon the Ballot Committee appointed in 1869, and in no point was that evidence more conclusive than in this, for it showed that bribery, intimidation, and other electioneering practices of a similar character were gradually disappearing. The impression left on the minds of the majority of the Committee was, that there had been a decidedly progressive improvement in public morals, in the sense of public duty with regard to the exercise of the franchise. Since the Act passed by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) there had been a change in the feeling of both candidates and agents. Formerly it was considered a skilful and clever thing to procure a seat in that House either by bribery or intimidation, or any other undue influence, it being held that the end justified the means. But such conduct was now stamped by public opinion as disgraceful in the extreme. If they desired a healthy House of Commons they must have a healthy publicity brought to bear upon those who constituted that body. It was of supreme importance that public opinion should guide, influence, and control the action of the electors, upon whose course the full light of day should be let in. When they looked to see how the Ballot worked they naturally turned to America; but there they found the Ballot acknowledged to be an instrument of tremendous and enormous corruption. In Australia they found a new and very sparsely populated country, between which and England no satisfactory comparison could be instituted; because there was scarcely anything in common between the constituencies of Australia and the constituencies of Yorkshire, Middlesex, or any of the large boroughs, such, for instance, as those into which London was divided. He objected most strongly to the argument that the rich, powerful, and independent should record their votes in secret.

MR. MAGUIRE explained that he had argued upon the assumption that society was composed only of the rich and independent.

MR. W. H. SMITH was glad to be corrected. His hon. Friend admitted it would be a shame to require the rich and independent to vote in secret if there were none poor and dependent; why, then, should the independent be brought down to the level of the poor and ignorant, simply because the poor and ignorant existed? If it was an insult to be required to record one's vote in secret that insult should not be offered in any case, and Parliament should apply itself to the punishment of those who interfered with the free exercise of the franchise. The object of all reform was to obtain a full expression of the views of the people; he consequently objected to this Bill because he did not believe it would add to the completeness of the representation. The popular dislike to secrecy would exhibit itself in positive disgust at being obliged to vote in secret, and instead of 75 per cent of a constituency only 25 per cent would be found going to the poll. And this 25 per cent would be made up of the least informed and least influential part of the community, in whose hands would reside the power of controlling the policy of the country. People generally took no pleasure in doing a public act unless they had the full credit of it. Most people liked to show that they had voted for the man of their opinions, and unless they could do this thousands would refrain altogether from voting. Thus, the indifference to the discharge of public duties which was becoming common would increase, and the character of the House itself would suffer. He objected to the Bill also because it would promote corruption in the small constituencies, which would be quite within the powers of an election manager. Of course, the bribery would be dispensed on the principle of payment by results, a system much favoured by the Education Department, and a candidate with an elastic conscience would no doubt find his account in making an arrangement with a local club upon the basis of results. This would be followed by a cry for the disfranchisement of the smaller boroughs as a matter of course, and a demand for equal electoral districts. He was not prepared for that, because the very inequalities which existed tended to represent more fully and freely the wants, interests, and policy of England than any scheme that might be carefully contrived on the most nicely-balanced number principle. He did not believe that if they could split up the constituencies of the country into 5,000, each returning a single Member, they would secure such a varied representation as they had at present. There was also a danger of corruption peculiar to this Bill. The ballot box would remain in the possession of the Returning Officer and two partizans; the public would not be represented either personally or by the Press, and what could be easier than for an arrangement to be made between these three? Hitherto the votes were recorded and the elector could check the record; but under this Bill all would be done in the dark, and so easy would it be to tamper with the voting papers by substituting fictitious papers for the real, that although he himself believed it would never be done, it would often be suspected and many unfounded charges would be made against the officers employed, because tampering would be the only explanation which would suggest itself in the case of unexpected results. There was nothing to identify the vote—even the voter himself could not say that a particular voting paper was his; and there was, under the system of ballot papers, absolutely no provision, nor any possibility of making one, to prevent a man who was so minded, and who had the opportunity, from changing the voting papers after they had been placed in the ballot box. He believed there was an amount of honesty among men charged with public duties in this country, even although they were taken almost out of the street for the occasion, which would prevent incidents of that kind from becoming frequent, or influencing to any large extent the result of elections. But, with the unexpected results which he was sure would come from the adoption of the Ballot, the belief would exist that all sorts of abuses had crept in and every conceivable kind of fraud been practised in respect to the ballot boxes. If there were no other mode of securing peace, quietness, and order at elections than the Ballot, a good deal might be said in its favour, however un-English it was, however opposed to the sentiments of the great majority of the people. But he was satisfied that the evils against which the Ballot was directed could easily be repressed by other means. The excitement and other ill effects produced by the publication of the state of the poll at intervals during the election might, for instance, be prevented by prohibiting such publication. Another argument against that Bill was that it did not even satisfy the supporters of the Ballot themselves. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham)—one of the most earnest and able advocates of the Ballot—had spoken of that Bill as maimed and unsatisfactory in almost every respect, although he regarded it as one which ought to be accepted as a basis for future legislation. Now, as he (Mr. Smith) did not wish to have a measure which was thus looked upon as a starting point for further agitation, he said if they were to have a Ballot Bill let it be one which the friends of the Ballot would declare to be satisfactory as far as they were concerned. But he accepted the challenge thrown out by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). He believed the feeling and opinion of the country to be entirely and distinctly opposed to the Ballot, and he had no doubt that an appeal to the country would result in the return to that House of a large majority of Members who would vote against any Ballot Bill. That feeling had grown in consequence of the conviction that there was not now that necessity for such a measure which might have existed many years ago. Therefore, he desired to say “No” to the third reading of that Bill, and he hoped the House would refuse to pass it, that the feeling of the country might be taken on the question in order to find out clearly whether it was not, as he firmly believed, in favour of the open, manly, and straightforward discharge of the public duty with which every voter was intrusted, not for his own individual advantage, but for the benefit of the State.

Mr. W. H. Smith

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, he had also served, like the hon. Member who had just sat down, on the Committee which inquired into that subject, and had come, like him, to a conclusion against the Ballot. The evils connected with elections could be better remedied by other means than the Ballot. The history of that Bill was a curious one. Adopted as one of the Articles of the Charter more than 20 years ago, and then scouted by all reasonable men, the Ballot was afterwards taken up by a Member of that House (Mr. Berkeley), who, however highly esteemed, was not much thought of for his wisdom, and it was long laughed at and rejected by every responsible politician. All at once, however, it was suddenly discovered to be an important Cabinet measure, and it was subsequently adopted by the House. The Ministry, thinking it necessary to get a case for the Ballot, appointed a Committee, some of the evidence taken before which had had a remarkable light thrown upon it by the circumstances of the last few days. Many of the Members of that Committee thought the measure would be good for England and Scotland, but doubted whether it would be equally applicable to Ireland. Now, the inquiry which had just closed in Ireland had shown that the votes given could not be concealed from the Roman Catholic priesthood. A great deal of evidence had been adduced before the Committee to show that it was impossible to ascertain how the votes would be given, and it was said that if the Roman Catholic priesthood interfered at all, they would only do so by words of counsel. One of the questions asked of the Rev. Mr. M'Dermott was—

“Of your own knowledge, have you ever known a priest address an audience in reference to a coming election?”

The reply was—“Yes.” He was then asked—

“In your experience, did they use words of counsel only or words much stronger—words of denunciation, if the votes were not given in a particular manner?”

The answer was—“Only words of counsel, and not words of denunciation.” On evidence of that kind the foundation of the Report of the Committee was based. Another important witness examined before the Committee was asked this question—

“I understand that the confessional would not in any way aid the priest in obtaining a knowledge of how a man voted?”

The reply was—“Decidedly not.” Now, how was this evidence to be reconciled with the statements made by Mr. Justice Keogh in his judgment upon the Galway Election case? Father Cohen had declared that the confessional could be used, if necessary, to defeat the Ballot Bill, which measure, however, he added, had not become law. Mr. Justice Keogh further stated that he would report the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, two other Bishops of that Church, and a large portion of their clergy, as having been engaged in an organized attempt to interfere with the free exercise of the franchise by the electors. The evidence given before the Committee had been entirely contradicted by the statements made before the learned Judge. It seemed to him (Sir Frederick Heygate) most extraordinary that a Bill like the present, which had so few friends in the House, should be considered necessary to pass into a law. In the present day, however monstrous a proposition might be, if it were brought forward again and again, people began at last to believe that it was necessary to accept it. Instead of endeavouring to improve this measure, the House should unhesitatingly kick it out, when it would never be heard of again. He did not believe that the country wanted such a Bill, which was really nothing but a gigantic sham, and which would fail in curing electioneering evils that might more certainly be got rid of by other means. The Irish Land Act had deprived landlords in Ireland of all influence, legitimate or illegitimate, and therefore this Bill would in no way affect them; but still if this measure became law the ignorant voter, whom Parliament had declared to be unfit to enter into a contract, would be left without any guide whatever as to which way he was to vote, because he would not know how the educated classes voted. If the Ballot were adopted, suspicion would be aroused in the event of unexpected results occurring with regard to elections, and the greatest dissatisfaction would exist among the non-electors, who at present possessed some amount of political influence. Following closely upon the Ballot must come universal suffrage, which ought, indeed, to precede it. If the experiment of the Ballot must be tried at all, let it be tried first in England for a limited term of years, at the expiration of which he was satisfied it would fall to the ground. If it were extended to the whole of the United Kingdom, the result would be to throw the entire management of elections into the hands of two classes of people—of the priests in Ireland, and of the Press in England. He begged the people of this country and the House to throw off the hypocrisy of pretending that they were bound to pass this measure into law. If the country were really anxious to have it, the matter ought to be submitted to it by means of a General Election, when the real views of the people with regard to it could be ascertained.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS congratulated the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill on the able and skilful way in which he had steered it through Committee. He had always felt that, considering so many Members on his side of the House, and supporters of the Ballot were evidently not earnest in their desire to have a secret voting measure in all its integrity, great allowances ought to be made for the difficulties with which he had had to contend. The Bill had been described by its enemies and those who hoped to destroy its efficiency when put in practice, as having been emasculated in Committee, and rendered altogether ineffectual as a security for protecting the voter by secrecy, and having been made, in fact, nothing but a sham Ballot. From this view he entirely dissented. Having carefully watched its progress in Committee, and having since had an opportunity of conferring with some of his own constituents, who were warm advocates of the Ballot, he and they were satisfied that, as it stood, it provided perfect security and protection to the voter by the absolute and inviolable secrecy of the mode of voting. It seemed to him that the Ballot, in order to afford a real protection to the coerced or intimidated voter, must not only provide a means of voting secretly, but must go further, and compel the voter to vote secretly. Permissive secrecy left the coerced or intimidated voter open to the alternative of compulsory publicity. His position was precisely that which was expressed by the law which said that "may" in certain statutes had the force of "shall," which only meant that when a general duty or force commanded them to do all they could in a particular direction, the mere ability to do a thing became instantly converted into an obligation. He could quite understand people objecting to the Ballot altogether, but he could not understand anyone being in favour of a permissive Ballot. His own natural instincts led him at first to dislike any system of secret voting, and he even now deplored the necessity for it. He had that day spoken and voted boldly on another question in a manner which he knew would be very displeasing to many of his constituents, and it might readily be supposed that, with his temperament, he should prefer the exercise of the franchise in a manly open way, in the face of day, and with all the responsibility of publicity; but the misery, wretchedness, and unnecessary trials to which he had seen plain and simple people subjected by tyranny and coercion had made him, some years ago, an unwilling but firm convert to the Ballot in all its integrity as a compulsory system of secret voting. Coercion and undue influence was not chargeable more to one side than to the other, nor was it exercised for the most part—so far as his observation went—by the great landed proprietors, but was resorted to chiefly by petty squires and owners of cottage property and local magnates surrounding county towns, who wished to curry favour with their more aristocratic neighbours. The tyranny and discomfort which such persons inflicted on the small tradespeople and artizans was intolerable, and had driven them to the Ballot as an unfortunate necessity, if the franchise was to be exercised by the people; and how could it be contended that a system of permissive secrecy would afford even a shadow of protection to voters so situated? He never could understand the honesty of such an argument. Suppose, for example, that in a district a proprietor had 300 small tenants—that the privilege of voting secretly was permissive, and that 275 of those tenants declared that they would, like men as they were, vote openly, and so voted in favour of their landlord, he should like to know how anyone could candidly say that the remaining 25 could derive any real protection from the Ballot. He wished to show that the provisions of the present Bill afforded a perfect security; but, before doing so, he wished to remove a misconception which he found to prevail respecting the secrecy aimed at by the Bill. It never was intended to be proposed that any elector should be prohibited from declaring which way he intended to vote, or which way he had voted—the whole scheme of the Ballot was directed and limited to enforcing secrecy in the act of voting, it being obviously impracticable to prohibit a man from talking about the way in which he intended to vote, or how he had voted. In order to secure and enforce compulsory secrecy, it had been proposed at one time by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), that the disclosing by a voter of a voting paper after it had been marked should be made an offence punishable, summarily before a justice, with six months' imprisonment. He thought at the time that that was a formidable proposition, and that it would have been far better to have summarily punished the disclosure of the voting paper by forfeiture of the vote, or some trifling fine, and to have confined the severer punishments to those who induced the voter to violate secrecy. That hon. Member's proposition was, however, negatived; and since then it had been loudly proclaimed and boasted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that as the Bill now stood it would be no violation of the law for a voter openly to show his ballot paper in the polling-place after he had marked it, so that it might be seen and known which way he had voted. He had no hesitation in saying that that was a total misrepresentation of the nature of the Bill. It could not be too clearly or too widely known that, according to the present Bill, it would be a violation of the law for an elector to show his ballot paper open after he had marked it; and that his doing so in such a manner as to enable it to be seen which way he had voted might render himself and others liable to several serious consequences. Clause 2 ran thus—

Sir Frederick W. Heygate

"The voter having secretly marked his vote on the ballot paper, and folded it up so as to conceal his vote, shall place the same in a box, &c."

Now, here was a direct and positive enactment that the voter should secretly mark his vote, and then fold the paper up so as to conceal his vote; a violation of which would be a violation of the Act of Parliament, which would be attended with more serious consequences than some people were perhaps prepared for. Then, again, Clause 4 said—

"Every officer, clerk, and agent in attendance at a polling station shall maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of the voting in such station."

And further—

"No person shall directly or indirectly induce any voter to display his ballot paper after he shall have marked the same, so as to make known to any person the name of the candidate for whom he has voted."

And further—

"Every person who acts in contravention of this section shall be liable to imprisonment for six months, with or without hard labour."

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

In the face of such provisions as these, it was astonishing that hon. Members could get up in that House and state that under the present Bill it was optional with the voter either to show his voting paper or not, and that his doing so would be no violation of the law. He thought that this fallacy and misrepresentation could not be too widely exposed. It should be fully known and understood that the language of the Bill commanded the voter to observe secrecy in the act of voting. And further, that if the voter attempted to show his paper it was the imperative duty of all persons at the station to prevent him from doing so, to abstain from looking at it, and to aid generally in maintaining the secrecy of the voting, and that a violation of this duty was punishable summarily with six months' imprisonment. There was no doubt that this secured absolute and inviolable secrecy in the act of voting, so far as the law could secure it; and if the Bill contained no other provision than that, he would have been perfectly content with it. When it was fully understood what the law was, he believed that there was loyalty enough on the part of the agents and all parties concerned—at least, in that part of the country with which he was best acquainted—fairly and honourably to carry out the intention of the Legislature without the necessity of resorting to any punishments to enforce the law. As to bribery, he did not know what would be the probable effect of the Bill. Bribery was totally unknown in Wales. [An hon. MEMBER: You have intimidation in Wales.] Intimidation and undue influence were exercised in Wales, and his object in supporting a real and effective Ballot Bill, such as he believed this to be, was to put a stop to such practices. He did not believe that either political party would in the long run obtain any particular advantage; but it would undoubtedly promote freedom of election and bring out the honest opinion of the country, and for that reason alone it would be a valuable measure. It was said the country did not want the Ballot at all. If that was true, he would admit that the Bill ought to be rejected by the other House; but there was an extraordinary misconception on this subject. He had taken great pains to ascertain the real truth; and if there was no excitement or agitation in the country, it was because the Ballot was regarded as a foregone conclusion. The constituencies had made up their minds that the Ballot would become law, and they meant to have it. That such a feeling should be construed as indifference was a circumstance deeply to be deplored. He trusted that this long-contested question would be speedily settled, and that Parliament might thus be enabled to devote its time and attention to remedial measures, which were much required. If, on the other hand, through a misconception as to public feeling on the subject, the Bill should in "another place" be either so far altered as to be deprived of its essential provision for compulsory secrecy, or be thrown out altogether, he believed a storm of agitation would be raised throughout the country, and beneficial legislation would be postponed for an indefinite period. Of one thing he felt certain—that the country was determined to have an honest and complete system of secret voting.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, there was an old proverb, "Live and learn," and he had learned something that evening. When the House was discussing this subject last year he was not, he confessed, fully alive to the great sagacity displayed by the Prime Minister in directing his friends and supporters to maintain a total silence in regard to the Bill. This year, although he heard many able arguments against the Ballot Bill from the Opposition benches, he had listened to nothing in point of stringency and force to compare with the speeches of those who had intended to speak most strongly in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) had begun his speech by telling the House that if it expressed its candid opinion there would not be found 10 Members in favour of the Ballot. The hon. Gentleman had said that this Bill would become the law of the land. He would not presume to enter into a contest of prophetic powers with the hon. Gentleman; but he must be allowed to be a sceptic on that point. He would ask the hon. Gentleman, as a man of long Parliamentary experience, whether he could refer to any instance of a Bill dealt with by the House as this Bill had been which had become the law of the land? In his own experience he knew nothing of the kind. All the most stringent clauses had been struck out by a House of Commons which was said to be strongly in favour of the Ballot. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No. Which clauses?] The clauses which the right hon. Gentleman himself said were essential to the character of the Bill—the only clauses which could enforce secret voting. The hon. and learned Member whom he had the pleasure of following was quite accurate when he said that corruption was not confined to any particular party. No; corruption was practised by every party, especially in electioneering matters; and it was because it had been established upon indisputable evidence that nothing could so much facilitate corruption as the passing of a Bill for secret voting, that he had always opposed this measure. The hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say that secret voting would put a stop to bribery; but he (Mr. Bentinck) was of opinion that most people would think that secret voting would prevent the detection of bribery. He had not heard any hon. Gentleman get up to grapple fairly with this question, and to show how it was possible by secret voting to prevent unmitigated corruption. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), who had made a most able speech to-night, had said, with great truth, that the people did not want the Ballot, and were really not in favour of it. An attempt, however, had been made by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Watkin Williams) to prove that there was a strong feeling in favour of the Ballot, and he indulged in a practice sometimes adopted by hon. Members, who took what was called a popular view on the subject, he predicted all sorts of dreadful consequences if noble Lords in "another place" presumed to differ in opinion from the Assembly which he had now the honour of addressing, in which Assembly, however, the most active supporters of the Ballot were strongly disinclined to this measure. He trusted that in "another place" it would not be forgotten that the two men in this House most at issue on the principle of this Bill were the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. These two right hon. Gentlemen were distinctly at issue upon a most important principle. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) had told them that he was the advocate of secret voting. There could be no mistake upon that subject, and he thought it was proper to give the right hon. Gentleman a reminder on the subject. The Prime Minister used words which he would now quote. It was true the right hon. Gentleman would say they were addressed to a few gentleman at a country house. But 16 or 17 gentlemen were present on that occasion, representing a very large deputation, and the speech occupied two columns of The Times, so that it could hardly be called a mere conversational statement. Alluding to the Ballot Bill, the right hon. Gentleman said—

Mr. Watkin Williams

“We mean to put it into the power of the voter to vote secretly, if he likes. The principle on which we proceed is, that the voter must be the best judge whether he needs protection. Where he needs protection the Ballot will give it; where he does not, there will be no secrecy, and his vote will be pretty nearly as well known as it is now. [Loud cheers.] It is in that sense that I hope the Ballot Bill will speedily become law.”

Now, it was impossible for the English language to convey an opinion more strongly in favour of making this measure apply only to men who wished to resort to it, leaving to others the option of open voting. Unless these conflicting statements could be reconciled, the Bill must go to “another place” marked in this way—the Prime Minister saying that the Bill was to be optional, whereas the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill said it was to be enforced by penalties. There was another point to which he wished to direct attention, which had been adverted to by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). Hon. Members were aware of the observations which had been made during the last few days by a learned Judge (Judge Keogh) in the sister country, and he (Mr. Bentinck) would ask whether any man in his senses, having regard to what he had there learned respecting the conduct of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland, would vote with satisfaction for the extension of this measure into that country? Was it possible to conceive, on the part of a Protestant country—and he hoped England was yet a Protestant country—a more complete surrender of all the rights, privileges, and independence of the electors of Ireland, than to place them in the power of the Roman Catholic priesthood by such a Bill as this? If the Bill had been re-committed in accordance with the Motion of the hon.

Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), he should have moved the insertion of a clause exempting Ireland from the operation of the Bill, and he hoped that such a clause would be introduced in the other House of Parliament. Meanwhile, it should stand on record that the right hon. Gentleman who had carried the Bill through the House with so much courtesy, good humour, and ability was most attached to the penal clauses.

MR. MAGUIRE said, it was scarcely fair to refer at present to the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh, a very imperfect report of which had appeared in the London journals.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman, having moved the Amendment and spoken to the Question, was not entitled to speak again.

MR. AGAR ELLIS said, as this was said to be the last time on which the principle of the Bill could be discussed, he would like to have a quiet growl at it. He could not quite make out what the Bill did. It certainly abolished the nomination day, which he thought should be maintained, its abuses being corrected. But, without obtaining secrecy, it seemed to him that the Bill encouraged bribery, while it in no way that he could see prevented intimidation. Now, secrecy was the summum bonum of those who favoured the Ballot system; but the most ardent supporters of the Ballot could not say that they had obtained secrecy under the Bill. A voter might have a wife—he was not bound to hold his tongue to her—or by some means or other his vote might become known. Persons who sought to intimidate or coerce might in the period elapsing between one General Election and another make it their business to find out how a man had voted, and by a process of exhaustion the discovery would not be difficult: at all events, such persons would act on their supposition. He was convinced that a landlord or any other person desirous of ascertaining how a man had voted would be able to do so within a few months after the election, and that he would thereupon act as he had acted hitherto. As to bribery, the Bill would certainly encourage and facilitate it. What would be easier than for a gentleman anxious to become a candidate for a constituency to wait on the organizers of the party, learn what the cost of the seat would be, and undertake to pay the amount upon being returned? It was said, indeed, that persons would not disburse money without being sure of a return for it; but people were found to bet money on the Derby 12 months beforehand, taking the risk of the particular horse dying or becoming disabled, and in the same way money would be hazarded on the event of an election. The hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Watkin Williams) had talked of compelling people to vote secretly; but how could that be effected? He should probably give offence to his political friends by the remark he was about to make; but he maintained that the whole Ballot system was un-English. He would explain what he meant by that. If the Ballot had any value it was as a protection to the weak voter. Now, his employer would have as much a right as at present to ask him how he was going to vote, so that the only protection of the Ballot would consist in his telling a downright falsehood. Did Parliament intend to teach people to tell falsehoods in the exercise of the most important duty of citizens? What was the cause of the great disaster in France? It was that nobody had been telling the truth. From the Emperor to the peasant they—he would not use a strong word, but they did not tell the truth. This system culminated in the last plébiscite, when the poor peasants eagerly voted for the Empire on the assurance that it signified peace—the country in a few months being plunged into grievous disasters. He was sorry to disagree with hon. Members among whom he sat, and with whom he was probably at one on every other political question; but entertaining strong feelings on the matter, he had felt himself bound to give expression to them.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he thought it would have been extraordinary had these debates concluded without the introduction of the argument that the Ballot was un-English. He believed not a single Member opposite had resorted to it, and he felt rather ashamed that the cry should have been raised by an hon. Gentleman on his own side of the House. Hon. Members were all in good spirits at having got rid of Ballot debates, for they had certainly had enough of them this Session and last. Indeed, he had found that during the two Sessions there had been 129 divisions on the subject. It was creditable to hon. Gentlemen opposite to have made so gallant a fight against superior numbers; but they had happily only been able to damage the measure when aided by deserters from the Ministerial side. The Bill was not perfect, for the House was not in the habit of passing perfect Bills on any subject; but it was a great measure, and, as the embodiment of the principle that a man's vote was his own, it would effect a revolution in election proceedings. With honest officials it could be satisfactorily worked. If honest officials could not be found, the country must be in a much worse way than anybody believed to be the case. The allegation that the Ballot would increase bribery was sufficiently disproved by the experience of our colonies and other countries. The Bill was not without faults, and he regretted the rejection of the clause proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Leatham); but he believed it contained provisions which would ensure that the vote would be given secretly and that the paper would not be shown when marked to any person. He thought, too, that when secret voting became the law of the land, many even of those who disliked it would honourably shrink from any infringement of it. Another defect in this Bill was the provision which enabled the ballot paper of the illiterate voter to be marked by another person; but if it should in practice be found to be a great evil, it would be easy to put the matter right afterwards by a short Bill. He thanked his right hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill for the care, ability, and good feeling he had exhibited in conducting it through the House, and he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would feel more pleasure in passing a measure to promote peace and good order, with the aid of his Friends, than in having passed two years ago, with the aid of his enemies, another Bill calculated to produce a contrary result. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) stated last year that he had ransacked the election addresses of hon. Gentlemen, and found that very few of them alluded to the Ballot; but they all knew what had been declared by the votes of the Liberal Members in that House, and they were all aware of the unanimity with which the Bill had been supported by the Liberal party. After to-night the Bill would go to "another place" where, perhaps, it would encounter greater dangers than it had met in that House; but he hoped that if the House of Lords should spoil the Bill, and strike out the provisions which enacted that the vote should be given secretly, the Government would have the courage to reject the measure so altered rather than pass a sham Bill. Let the country have a real Bill, for a sham Bill would be worse than no Bill at all; and he believed that if the Government took the course he recommended they would safely get over every difficulty.

Mr. Agar Ellis

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought that there could be but one feeling of sympathy with the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the congratulation he was prepared to offer for the success of the Bill had been somewhat spoilt by the little bitterness which had been infused into the cup by the hon. Member who preceded him, and who revived the good old phrase, and described the Bill as "un-English." Now, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) did not know why they should be particularly ashamed of reviving that old phrase, which was singularly apposite in expressing the objections felt to the Bill. They who sat on the Opposition side of the House did say that this was an un-English Bill, not because there was necessarily anything un-English in giving a vote secretly under certain circumstances, but because it was at variance with the whole history of the growth of their English freedom, and because the arguments by which it was supported were drawn not so much from English, but from foreign authorities. He felt that they in England might consider themselves rather the leaders than the followers in the establishment of political freedom, and might consider it better to follow their own precedents than those of other countries. He contended that, speaking broadly, the course which English history had followed had been a course of open contest against great difficulties and dangers; and the English nation had attained to the proud position it held among the constitutional Nations of the world by manfully facing dangers and difficulties far greater than those which this measure was intended to face. Looking back upon English history, and upon those struggles which from time to time the people of this country had gone through; against the undue influence of the Crown, or of the Barons; against undue ecclesiastical influence, popular fanaticism, corruption, or a hundred other influences which the people had to contend with, they had no need now to fear to meet other struggles which might be in store for them with the same manly spirit which animated their forefathers, and which led them to the position which they now occupied. In the political institutions of the country, and in the general life of the country, which was the expression of those political institutions, they had that for which they might be thankful and proud. There was no other Nation that possessed such an Assembly as the British House of Commons, which furnished an attraction for men of rank and position, men who might enjoy every luxury with ease and respect, but who were yet proud and anxious to make great sacrifices in order to take their part in the councils of the Nation, to fight openly in those contests in which they in that House were engaged, and in which, whilst they had no private end to gain, they felt that they were doing a public duty. But did that spirit only animate those who were elected as Members of Parliament? It permeated the whole community; and numbers among that community would be found prepared to sacrifice time, to encounter odium, and difficulty, and labour for the sake of promoting the cause which they thought was, on the whole, the broad national cause. There was that spirit abroad, and it was not desirable to see that spirit sicklied over or diminished. He did not deny that there was a reverse to this picture; and the reverse was that the electoral system was subject to various drawbacks and evils which they would be glad to get rid of, if they could remove them without destroying the old spirit and principles of the system itself. The standard complaint was that the period of election was a period of riot, Saturnalia, intemperance, and debauchery on the part of the people. Another and sad complaint was that the elections were to some extent tainted with bribery and corruption, vitiated by intimidation and coercion, and were not entirely free from the danger of fraud. Well, those evils were admitted, and it was acknowledged to be a great object to contend against them, and to try to get rid of them. But for that purpose was it necessary to go through this revolution prepared by the Government? Were there no other modes by which those evils might be dealt with, and had not they already adopted some of those modes, the effect of which had, to a certain extent, been tried, and which were in harmony with the genius and spirit of the Constitution and people? Might they not, then, in any struggles of the future, look to such remedies for the same results as had been experienced in the struggles of the past? He did not think the elections of the present day were more chargeable with those evils than elections of half-a-century ago. Never was there a time when there was a more earnest desire than at present honestly to put down those evils by the legitimate pressure of the law, and by discouragement on the part of public opinion. The laws were made more stringent, and public opinion was vastly gaining strength against them. He did not know whether what was now proposed would take away from the force of the law; but he was sure that it would greatly take away from the force of public opinion. If it were true that elections were now less disgraced by rioting and debauchery than in times past, and that bribery, intimidation, and coercion were less prevalent, to what was that owing? To the force of public opinion brought to bear on all those evils. They had a striking instance now before them of the manner in which these most formidable evils were dealt with, which would be referred to all over the country. He spoke of that courageous judgment which had just been delivered in Ireland. He said it was that kind of spirit and expression to which they must look if they would really eradicate these evils from their system. He did not say they might not put them out of sight by such a measure as this; they might smother, but they could not cure these evils. If their object was to eradicate these evils from the English people and system, they must attack them by open, not by secret means. Was it necessary to have recourse to this measure for the repression of these evils? He answered boldly—he said that it was not. He went further; he asked would this measure really prove a cure of those evils? Rioting and debauchery it would have nothing to do with; and with regard to bribery he very much doubted whether anyone in the House, with the single exception of the right hon. Gentleman having charge of the Bill, really in his heart believed that this measure would to any sensible extent diminish bribery. Probably it would to some extent change the form of bribery, but it would not put a stop to it. The right hon. Gentleman never said anything he did not believe; and whenever he was challenged on this subject he always got up and said one thing, which was this—that he could not believe a man would think it worth his while to bribe if he did not know how the person bribed had voted. Now that was an argument which might pass muster once in a speech, but which could not satisfy the mind of any reasonable man when it was calmly examined. If a man now gave £5 for a vote he had no security that the vote would be given for him. The money was paid, and nothing was more common than the statement on an election that So and so had taken bribes and voted against the man who had bribed them. They had now no check against that; for a promise to vote was not like an engagement to plough a field. If a man failed to do so he might be sued for breach of contract, or he might be told he would never be employed again; but they could not enforce an immoral contract. The risk run would be the same as at present, and the briber would be able to take measures in 50 different ways to secure that he got his money's worth. One suggestion frequently made was that there would be bribery by organization; a certain number of men would undertake, if paid so much, that so many votes should be given, and they would find a way of providing them. He thought, therefore, the inducement to bribe would be pretty nearly, if not quite, as strong as at present. The difficulty of detection would be greatly increased; and setting one against the other he believed this measure would go rather to increase than to diminish the temptation to bribery. Then, with regard to fraud, everybody admitted there would be much greater danger of fraud than at present. The only question was whether this measure, in any satisfactory way, would stop the greatly increased temptation to fraud. He feared it would be found exceedingly difficult. The measure would introduce new frauds. There was great danger of fraud on the part of the officers engaged in conducting the election, and if they shook the confidence reposed in those officers they would shake the very foundation of the whole electoral system. He ventured last year to mention some instances of the kind of dangers and frauds which might arise, and he would not now go back upon them, but the House might depend upon it they deserved serious consideration. But the main point of all urged in favour of the Bill was that it would stop intimidation and coercion. Now, did they really believe it would have that effect? He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman did believe it. But would it diminish the more insidious forms of those evils? There was one class of coercion — moral, religious, spiritual coercion, against which they might be able to guard, as in the judgment to which he had alluded; but he did not speak only of coercion by priests of a particular religion, because difficulty might arise among other classes. Many persons might appeal to moral considerations, and exercise a very serious coercion over the minds of the people, and induce them to vote otherwise than they might do if they were free to vote. That might be so not only with regard to ecclesiastical systems, but he should be surprised if it were not found to be so under the organization of trades unions. No argument had more force with certain Members, especially on his side of the House, than this—the Ballot was not so much a protection against the landlord or employer as against the customer and the trades union; and the alarm created by trades unions had no doubt a very considerable effect in making converts to the Ballot. But did they really think that the Ballot was going to protect them against the intimidation of trades unions? He did not believe it would. If trades unions took it into their heads that it would be important for them to interfere with an election, and they determined to exercise coercion and intimidation over their members to induce them to vote in a particular way, they would be able to coerce and intimidate under the system of the Ballot as well as under the system of open voting. He did not deny there were some evils that might be stopped by a system of, he might call it temporary Ballot or temporary secrecy, preventing the vote being known at the moment or intimidation being practised on the day of polling; but he argued against the system of voting where the vote was not to be known afterwards. The voting might be kept secret in certain cases, but not in the case of trades unions. An organization of men dealing with their fellows, seeing them day by day, having a regular system of espionage, a regular system of questioning and cross-examining, would be able sooner or later, by a species of moral torture, to find out how the men voted. The hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Watkin Williams) said that permissive secrecy was no secrecy at all. Take, for example, the case of a man with 300 tenants, and that 275 desired to vote openly, whilst 25 asked to vote secretly. Could he not make a pretty shrewd guess of the way in which the latter voted, although their votes were supposed to be given secretly? The case would be the same with trades unions or any other similar body of men. Did they suppose that some process of this kind would not be resorted to in order to discover how certain men, who were suspected by the officers of trades unions or other large bodies, were about to vote, or had voted? In such cases they would have the intimidation of suspicion substituted for open and direct intimidation. The crop of evils they were endeavouring by this Bill to smother would spring up under other and new forms. He contended that this Bill would not be effective in suppressing those evils, but it would prove productive of other and greater evils. The Bill would greatly help to extinguish that political courage in the country which it ought to be their endeavour to foster and encourage. Some of the reasons given by its advocates for the Ballot were in his mind base reasons. It was to be imposed on nine-tenths of the electors who did not want it, for the sake of the one-tenth who did, who were the weakest, least courageous, and least conscientious portion of the public; and it would protect the weak and the feeble, who lacked courage, at the expense of other qualities. Having enlarged their constituencies, what they required to do was to cultivate manly, honourable, and honest political feeling, and that sense of honourable shame which would make a man afraid to give a vote from private pique and private interest instead of voting for that which he believed to be for the public good. So far as party feeling conduced to keeping up that honourable shame, it was an excellent principle; and, kept in check, as it ought to be, by the expression of public opinion, it was a quality which they would rue to get rid of. Were they really to go on the principle of protecting persons from unpleasant consequences that might follow the discharge of public duties? He trusted not. Voting at elections was not the only public duty the performance of which exposed one to danger. There recently appeared in the papers a thrilling narrative of the sufferings of a poor woman who was savagely assaulted for giving evidence in a Court of Justice, which she did simply from a sense of public duty. Were they, therefore, to say that evidence should be given secretly for the protection of witnesses? They did all they could to protect witnesses by bringing public opinion and the law to bear upon those who interfered with them; and were they to make the election of Members of Parliament an exception to that rule? That was an English measure contrary to the whole spirit of English institutions, and though that night's vote against it might be only a protest, he hoped the public mind was not so completely made up as to be insensible to the objections to the Ballot. The Government had seen how their own supporters fell off from unwillingness to endorse the extreme features of the measure, which they felt were contrary to the genius of English institutions, and those defections faithfully represented the feeling of doubt which pervaded the country as to the wisdom of the policy of the Bill. The party with whom he acted did not deny that the Government had brought the measure forward for good objects. But they on his side of the House had the same good objects in view. Their ends were the same; but the mode by which they wished to attain those ends were widely different. In opposing this Bill they were not less anxious than the Government to put down anything in the shape of illegitimate influence—such as corruption, intimidation, and fraud; and it was because they believed that bringing public opinion and the law to bear upon admitted evils was the more excellent way that they entered their protest against the third reading of this Bill.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it would ill become him to detain the House at any length at this ultimate stage of the Ballot Bill—indeed, he should have contented himself with thanking it for the patience with which it had borne with him throughout these protracted discussions, were it not that, having charge of the Bill, there were two or three remarks which had been made which should not be allowed to pass without some observation from him. No doubt, the object on both sides of the House was the same—to make elections pure and free, and to encourage honest political feeling; and it was for these objects he so earnestly supported the Bill. In the present state of their social arrangements they could not secure honest political feeling in any better way, nor in any other way, than by making it clear that the vote was the voter's own; that he was responsible to his conscience for it; and that no man had a right to interfere with the giving of it, nor to ask how it was given. It was all very well for them to talk of voters manfully contending with their difficulties; but they must put themselves in the position of voters exposed to undue influences. Every person who intimidated, bullied, or bribed knew at present how a man voted, and therefore it was thought necessary to take away this knowledge, in order to take away from everyone to whom a vote was not given the power of interfering with the man whose duty it was to give it. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) used one extraordinary argument. He said that the effect of their Bill would be to substitute for the present influences moral coercion. He (Mr. Forster) had no objection to replacing the present coercion of employers, or landlords, or trades unions, by moral coercion. Their policy was to replace coercion by persuasion, and persuasion was moral coercion. What they desired was, when the Bill became law, that the enormous majority of voters who desired it should be accessible to persuasion, but should not be approachable by coercion. That was the object and ground of the Bill; that was the reason why the constituencies of the kingdom desired that it should become law. As respected bribery, he still believed very strongly that by no means could they stop an illegitimate trade more completely than by making the buyer very uncertain whether he wanted the article for which he paid. That had been found to be the result of the operation of the Ballot wherever it had been fairly tried. The late Prime Minister of Sydney (Mr. Cook) said he had never heard of a case of bribery since the introduction of the Ballot—secret voting prevented it; and in the course of the debates on this Bill it had been admitted by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) that candidates would not convey voters to the poll because it would not be known how they voted. Possibly the operation of the Ballot might lead to wholesale bribery, which could be practised now; but still the Bill, so far as it produced such bribery, would drive men into an uncertain and dangerous method of bribery instead of a comparatively easy one. It would be as easy under the Bill as it was now to detect bribery. It was not necessary to a conviction that you should know how a man voted. He now wished to remove some misconceptions as to the real character of the Bill. Often had he observed that every measure of importance had to go through three stages before it became law. First, their opponents endeavoured to prevent its being passed at all; next, they tried to spoil it; and, on this attempt failing, they exaggerated faults and deficiencies in the hope that even some of the original supporters might be induced to give it up. The latter course had been adopted to a considerable extent by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he was not surprised at it, because it was good policy on their part to do so; but he would remind the supporters of the Bill that the more their opponents lamented over the Bill that it was not strong enough, the greater his suspicion that they wished to get rid of the measure, because it was strong enough to make them thoroughly dislike it. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had made a most extraordinary statement that evening, that all the most stringent clauses had been struck out by large majorities, and that the only clauses which enforced secret voting had been expunged. He would, therefore, briefly state the provisions for secret voting in the Bill as it stood, as it was important there should be no misconception in the country on the subject. The 2nd clause stated that the voter must secretly mark his vote on the paper, seal it up, and place it in the ballot box. After that clause was passed the Amendment of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) was rejected by the Committee, and that circumstance led him to think it would be better to make still more clear the object of the Bill in regard to the mode of voting. Consequently, he introduced in the 25th sub-section, 1st Schedule, an Amendment, which was passed unanimously, adding these words—"and fold it up so as to conceal his vote, and shall then put his ballot paper so folded up into the ballot box." Therefore he could not understand how the hon. Member for West Norfolk could assert there would be no secret voting. Any transgression of this clause would be an infringement of an Act of Parliament, and any offenders in this respect would be guilty of a misdemeanour. He did not say, however, it was probable that an action would—nor did he think it desirable that it should—be brought except in the case of a determined endeavour to defeat the object of law; but as the law at present stood such a determined endeavour could be met. It was quite true the special penalty proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield had not been accepted by the Committee. If he had deemed it a vital Amendment, he could not be excused for not having brought it forward; but the ground he took was that, although it was certainly an additional safeguard, he much doubted whether the House would feel inclined to pass that special provision. He need not remind the House that the 4th clause provided, under stringent penalties, that all persons in the booth should preserve secrecy as to the way votes were given, and that no person, in or out of the booth, should, directly or indirectly, induce a voter to decipher his vote. To the allegation that this was a Bill of Pains and Penalties, his reply was that if they were to have secret voting they had a perfect right to impose penalties on those who tried to defeat the law by inducing a voter to declare how he had voted. This was done in a clear manner by the 4th clause, and the result was that this was the strongest Bill for secret voting—with the exception of that passed in South Australia—which had ever been brought before any Legislature. The Bill would leave that House that night, and he believed it would become law that year. Of course, it was not for anybody in that House to prophecy what the other House in the exercise of its constitutional power might do; but he entertained a strong and confident conviction that the Bill would become law, because the other House of Parliament would feel this was a matter specially concerning the House of Commons, and one on which the House of Commons had unmistakably shown their opinion. He also thought their Lordships could not be blind to the fact that the constituencies of the country were determined the measure should become law. ["No, no!"] There could be no doubt as to the large majority of the constituencies. [An hon. MEMBER: Try them.] The Members for Liberal constituencies were the best judges of the feelings of their own supporters, and there could be scarcely a Liberal Member who was not aware that if an election came on to-morrow his supporters would expect him again to vote for the Ballot. Nay, he would go further, and state his belief that the same opinion was held by a large proportion of the Conservative constituencies of the country. He based that statement on two undoubted facts. Recently there had been two important meetings, at which most influential Members of the party opposite attended. First, there was a meeting held a few weeks ago at Manchester. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) went to Manchester, all the Lancashire Conservatives, as was natural, gathered round him. The right hon. Gentleman entered into almost all the questions interesting to the country with the exception of the Ballot. When this Bill was introduced, the right hon. Gentleman took the opportunity of declaring that to its principle he should give his unceasing and unflinching opposition. But if the Conservatives throughout the country were as hostile to the Ballot now as they were two or three years ago, would not the right hon. Gentleman have taken advantage of the opportunity afforded by the meeting at Manchester to have rallied them round him in support of his unceasing and unflinching opposition to the principle of the Bill? Would not the country have been immediately informed that Lancashire had spoken out against the Ballot? The Ballot was the only question of importance which was not alluded to either by the right hon. Gentleman or any person who addressed that meeting, as far as he could find from the reports of what occurred. Again, there was the meeting, almost as important, recently held in Bradford, at which his right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Hardy) whom he was glad to claim as a fellow-townsmen, and the right hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), attended. Well, at that meeting also almost every political subject was treated of except the Ballot. These facts would have their weight in the other House, as they must have here, and would convince that Assembly that the time had now arrived when the unmistakable desire of the large majority of the constituencies ought not to be any longer interfered with.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN remarked that hon. Members who denounced the Ballot as un-English, nevertheless used it in their clubs. The Ballot would afford to the constituencies a protection which they desired and had a right to demand, and which Parliament could not in justice or with safety refuse.

MR. A. F. EGERTON desired to say a few words in reference to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill with regard to the state of feeling in Lancashire upon this question. Among the Liberals in that county there was, without doubt, a feeling in favour of the Ballot; among the Conservatives the feeling was one of complete indifference, a feeling the existence of which he, for one, regretted. They had a majority in both the county and borough representation, and he felt convinced that if the mode of voting was altered to-morrow their majority would be increased, rather than diminished. With regard to the theory of the Ballot, the Conservatives of Lancashire maintained the opinion that it was erroneous, and as to some extent the representative of that opinion, he should record his vote against the third reading of the Bill.

MR. PHILIPS, as one of the Liberal Members returned by a Lancashire constituency, testified to the feeling which existed in favour of the Bill, a feeling based on the belief that the Ballot would enable the working-class electors to vote according to their conscientious opinions.

Main Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 274; Noes 216: Majority 58.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

AYES.

Aeland, Sir T. D.	D'Arcy, M. P.
Adair, H. E.	Davies, R.
Akroyd, E.	Delahunty, J.
Allen, W. S.	Denman, hon. G.
Amory, J. H.	Dent, J. D.
Anderson, G.	Dickinson, S. S.
Anstruther, Sir R.	Dilke, Sir C. W.
Antrobus, Sir E.	Dillwyn, L. L.
Armitstead, G.	Dodds, J.
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.	Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Aytoun, R. S.	Dowse, rt. hon. R.
Backhouse, E.	Duff, M. E. G.
Bagwell, J.	Dundas, F.
Baines, E.	Edwards, H.
Barclay, A. C.	Egerton, Capt. hon. F.
Bass, A.	Ellice, E.
Baxter, W. E.	Enfield, Viscount
Bazley, Sir T.	Ennis, J. J.
Beaumont, Captain F.	Erskine, Admiral J. E.
Beaumont, H. F.	Ewing, H. E. Cruin-
Beaumont, S. A.	Ewing, A. Orr-
Beaumont, W. B.	Eykyn, R.
Bentall, E. H.	Finnic, W.
Blennerhassett, R. (Kry.)	FitzGerald, right hon.
Bolekow, H. W. F.	Lord O. A.
Bonham-Carter, J.	Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Fitzwilliam, hn. C. W. W.
Bowring, E. A.	Fletcher, I.
Brady, J.	Fordyce, W. D.
Brand, H. R.	Forster, C.
Brassey, H. A.	Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Brewer, Dr.	Fortescue, rt. hon. C. P.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Fortescue, hon. D. F.
Brinckman, Captain	Fothergill, R.
Bristowe, S. B.	Gavin, Major
Brogden, A.	Gilpin, C.
Brown, A. H.	Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
Browne, G. E.	Gladstone, W. H.
Bruce, Lord C.	Goldsmid, Sir F.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Goldsmid, J.
Buckley, N.	Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Buller, Sir E. M.	Gourley, E. T.
Bury, Viscount	Gower, hon. E. F. L.
Cadogan, hon. F. W.	Gower, Lord R.
Candlish, J.	Graham, W.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Gray, Sir J.
Carter, R. M.	Greville, hon. Captain
Cavendish, Lord F. C.	Greville - Nugent, hon.
Cavendish, Lord G.	G. F.
Chadwick, D.	Grieve, J. J.
Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E.	Grosvenor, Capt. R. W.
Cholmeley, Captain	Grosvenor, hon. N.
Clay, J.	Grove, T. F.
Clifford, C. C.	Guest, M. J.
Coleridge, Sir J. D.	Hamilton, J. G. C.
Colman, J. J.	Hanbury, R. W.
Corrigan, Sir D.	Hanmer, Sir J.
Cowen, Sir J.	Harcourt, W. G. G. V. V.
Cowper - Temple, right	Hardcastle, J. A.
hon. W.	Harris, J. D.
Crawford, R. W.	Hartington, Marquess of
Dalglish, R.	Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
Dalrymple, D.	Henderson, J.

Henley, Lord	Ogilvy, Sir J.
Henry, M.	O'Loughlen, rt. hon. Sir
Herbert, hon. A. E. W.	C. M.
Hibbert, J. T.	O'Reilly-Dease, M.
Hoare, Sir H. A.	O'Reilly, M. W.
Hodgkinson, G.	Osborne, R.
Hodgson, K. D.	Palmer, J. H.
Holland, S.	Parker, C. S.
Holms, J.	Parry, L. Jones-
Horsman, rt. hon. E.	Pease, J. W.
Hoskyns, C. Wren-	Peel, A. W.
Howard, hon. C. W. G.	Pelham, Lord
Howard, J.	Philips, R. N.
Hughes, T.	Pim, J.
Hughes, W. B.	Playfair, L.
Hutt, rt. hon. Sir W.	Plimsoll, S.
Hutton, J.	Potter, E.
Illingworth, A.	Potter, T. B.
James, H.	Powell, F. S.
Jardine, R.	Power, J. T.
Jessel, Sir G.	Price, W. P.
Johnston, A.	Rathbone, W.
Johnstone, Sir H.	Redmond, W. A.
Kay-Shuttleworth, U. J.	Reed, C.
Kensington, Lord	Richard, H.
King, hon. P. J. L.	Richards, E. M.
Knatchbull - Hugessen,	Robertson, D.
E. H.	Roden, W. S.
Lambert, N. G.	Rothschild, N. M. do
Lancaster, J.	Russell, A.
Lawrence, Sir J. C.	Russell, Sir W.
Lawrence, W.	Rylands, P.
Lawson, Sir W.	Salomons, Sir D.
Lea, T.	Samuda, J. D'A.
Leatham, E. A.	Samuelson, B.
Leeman, G.	Samuelson, H. B.
Lefevre, G. J. S.	Sartoris, E. J.
Lewis, J. D.	Seely, C. (Lincoln)
Lloyd, Sir T. D.	Seely, C. (Nottingham)
Lowe, rt. hon. R.	Scymour, A.
Lubbock, Sir J.	Shaw, R.
Lusk, A.	Sheridan, H. B.
Lyttelton, hon. C. G.	Sherlock, D.
Macfie, R. A.	Sherriff, A. C.
Mackintosh, E. W.	Sinclair, Sir J. G. T.
M'Arthur, W.	Smith, E.
M'Clure, T.	Smith, J. B.
M'Lagan, P.	Stacpoole, W.
M'Laren, D.	Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
M'Mahon, P.	Stapleton, J.
Magniac, C.	Stepney, Sir J.
Maguire, J. F.	Stevenson, J. C.
Marling, S. S.	Stone, W. H.
Martin, P. W.	Storks, rt. hn. Sir H. K.
Mellor, T. W.	Strutt, hon. H.
Melly, G.	Stuart, Colonel
Merry, J.	Synan, E. J.
Miall, E.	Talbot, C. R. M.
Milbank, F. A.	Tipping, W.
Miller, J.	Tollemache, hon. F. J.
Monk, C. J.	Torrens, W. T. M'C.
Monsell, rt. hon. W.	Torrens, R. R.
Morgan, G. Osborne	Tracy, hon. C. R. D.
Morley, S.	Hanbury-
Morrison, W.	Trevelyan, G. O.
Mundella, A. J.	Verney, Sir H.
Muntz, P. H.	Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Nicholson, W.	Vivian, A. P.
Norwood, C. M.	Vivian, H. H.
O'Brien, Sir P.	Wells, W.
O'Connor, D. M.	West, H. W.
O'Connor Don, The	Whitbread, S.

White, hon. Colonel C.	Woods, H.
White, J.	Young, A. W.
Whitwell, J.	Young, G.
Whitworth, T.
Williams, W.	TELLERS.
Wingfield, Sir C.	Adam, W. P.
Winterbotham, H. S. P.	Glyn, hon. G. G.

NOES.

Addorley, rt. hn. Sir C.	Feilden, H. M.
Agar-Ellis, hon. L. G. F.	Fellowes, E.
Amphlett, R. P.	Figgins, J.
Annesley, hon. Col. H.	Finch, G. H.
Arbuthnot, Major G.	Floyer, J.
Archdall, Capt. M.	Forde, Colonel
Assheton, R.	Galway, Viscount
Baggallay, Sir R.	Garlies, Lord
Bagge, Sir W.	Gilpin, Colonel
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Goldney, G.
Baring, T.	Gooch, Sir D.
Barnett, H.	Gordon, E. S.
Barrington, Viscount	Gore, J. R. O.
Barttelot, Colonel	Gore, W. R. O.
Bates, E.	Gray, Colonel
Bateson, Sir T.	Gregory, G. B.
Bathurst, A. A.	Guest, A. E.
Beach, Sir M. Hicks-	Hambro, C.
Beach, W. W. B.	Hamilton, Lord C.
Bective, Earl of	Hamilton, Lord C. J.
Bentinck, G. C.	Hamilton, Lord G.
Bentinck, G. W. P.	Hamilton, I. T.
Benyon, R.	Hamilton, Marquess of
Beresford, Lt.-Col. M.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.
Bingham, Lord	Hardy, J.
Birley, H.	Hardy, J. S.
Bourne, Colonel	Hay, Sir J. C. D.
Bright, R.	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
Brise, Colonel R.	Henry, J. S.
Broadley, W. H. H.	Herbert, rt. hon. Gen.
Brooks, W. C.	Sir P.
Bruen, H.	Hermon, E.
Burrell, Sir P.	Hervey, Lord A. H. C.
Butler-Johnstone, H. A.	Hesketh, Sir T. G.
Buxton, Sir R. J.	Ileygate, Sir F. W.
Cameron, D.	Ilick, J.
Cartwright, F.	Iildyard, T. B. T.
Cawley, C. E.	Hill, A. S.
Charley, W. T.	Hoare, P. M.
Child, Sir S.	Hodgson, W. N.
Clive, Col. hon. G. W.	Hogg, J. M.
Clowes, S. W.	Holford, J. P. G.
Cole, Col. hon. H. A.	Holmesdale, Viscount
Corbett, Colonel	Holt, J. M.
Corry, rt. hon. H. T. L.	Hood, Cap. hn. A. W. A. N.
Crichton, Viscount	Hope, A. J. B. B.
Croft, Sir H. G. D.	Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.
Cross, R. A.	Jackson, R. W.
Cubitt, G.	Jervis, Colonel
Dalrymple, C.	Kekewich, S. T.
Damer, Capt. Dawson-	Kennaway, J. H.
Davenport, W. Bromley-	Keown, W.
Dawson, Colonel R. P.	Knight, F. W.
Dimsdale, R.	Knightley, Sir R.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Knox, hon. Colonel S.
Duncombe, hon. Col.	Lacon, Sir E. H. K.
Du Pre, C. G.	Laird, J.
Dyott, Colonel R.	Langton, W. G.
Eastwick, E. B.	Laslett, W.
Eaton, H. W.	Learmonth, A.
Egerton, hon. A. F.	Legh, W. J.
Egerton, Sir P. G.	Legh, Lieut.-Col. G. C.
Egerton, hon. W.	Lennox, Lord G. G.
Elliot, G.	Lennox, Lord H. G.

Leslie, J.	Scott, Lord H. J. M. D.
Liddell, hon. H. G.	Scourfield, J. H.
Lindsay, hon. Col. C.	Selwin - Ibbetson, Sir
Lopes, H. C.	H. J.
Lopes, Sir M.	Shirley, S. E.
Lowther, J.	Simonds, W. B.
Lowther, hon. W.	Smith, A.
Mahon, Viscount	Smith, R.
Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.	Smith, S. G.
Manners, Lord G. J.	Smith, W. H.
March, Earl of	Somerset, Lord H. R. C.
Matthews, H.	Stanley, hon. F.
Meyrick, T.	Starkie, J. P. C.
Milles, hon. G. W.	Steere, L.
Mills, C. H.	Straight, D.
Monckton, F.	Sturt, Lt.-Colonel N.
Monckton, hon. G.	Sykes, C.
Montagu, rt. hn. Lord R.	Talbot, J. G.
Montgomery, Sir G. G.	Talbot, hon. Captain
Morgan, C. O.	Taylor, rt. hon. Col.
Morgan, hon. Major	Thynne, Lord H. F.
Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.	Tollemache, Major W. F.
Muncaster, Lord	Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill.
Neville-Grenville, R.	Turner, C.
Newdegate, C. N.	Turnor, E.
Newport, Viscount	Vance, J.
North, Colonel	Veraer, E. W.
Northote, rt. hn. Sir S. H.	Walker, Major G. G.
O'Neill, hon. E.	Walsh, hon. A.
Paget, R. H.	Watney, J.
Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.	Welby, W. E.
Palk, Sir L.	Wells, E.
Parker, Lt.-Colonel W.	Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.	Williams, C. H.
Peek, H. W.	Williams, Sir F. M.
Pell, A.	Wilmot, H.
Pemberton, E. L.	Winn, R.
Phipps, C. P.	Wise, H. C.
Plunket, hon. D. R.	Wyndham, hon. P.
Powell, W.	Wynn, C. W. W.
Raikes, H. C.	Wynn, Sir W. W.
Read, C. S.	Yarmouth, Earl of
Ridley, M. W.	Yorke, J. R.
Round, J.
Salt, T.	TELLERS.
Sandon, Viscount	Dyke, W. H.
Selater-Booth, G.	Noel, hon. G. J.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY AMENDMENT

BILL—[Lords]—[Bill 136].

(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Separation of services).

MR. MONK moved, in page 3, line 30, after "used," to insert "with or." He thought it was desirable that shorter services should be used in the way provided in the Bill; but he regretted there was no provision for shorter services being used in country parishes, where there were seldom more than two services, as well as in towns, on Sundays.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Preaching a sermon without previous service).

MR. MONK moved in line 39, after "preached," to insert "anything in the Act of Uniformity to the contrary notwithstanding," with the view of making the meaning of the clause more clear, as he conceived that as the clause now stood the penalties imposed by the Act of Uniformity might be incurred under it.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was advised that the clause was sufficiently clear as it was now expressed, and the introduction of the words would throw doubts on other parts of the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Preamble.

MR. BOUVERIE said, there was an important proposal in that Preamble which was almost without precedent in any Act that Parliament had ever passed. It was proposed really to make the clergy of the Church of England in their Convocation the absolute masters of Parliament, as far as the recital in an Act could do so. The Ritual Commissioners made their Report, and Her Majesty, acting, no doubt, on the advice of her responsible Ministers, gave her letters of licence for Convocation to consider that Report. Convocation accordingly considered it; and the House was now asked to assent to the recital that it was expedient, with a view to carry into effect, not the Report of the Commission issued by Her Majesty to inquire into the ritual and rubrics of the Church of England; but the Reports of the Convocation of the Provinces of Canterbury and York, to make certain provisions. There were only two quasi-precedents for such a course. The first was in the time of Henry VIII., when the assent of Convocation was recited in the Act of Parliament which enacted the divorce of that Monarch from Anne of Cleves. After the Reformation there were several alterations made in the Prayer Book by Act of Parliament, twice in the reign of Edward VI., and once in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and in those Acts no reference was made to the proceedings of Convocation in the matter. In the Act of Uniformity, passed in the reign of Charles II., it was true there was a reference to the proceedings of Convocation, with respect to the Book of Common Prayer, as then submitted by the Crown and amended by them under Royal licence. But that was a most extraordinary time and occasion, being then just after the Restoration. There was then a Parliament of a most peculiar character, ready to carry into effect all the extreme views of the extreme High Church party of that period; and that was a precedent which the House would not like to follow. Moreover, the proceedings on that occasion in the time of Charles II. were of the most formal nature. The Book of Common Prayer was submitted to Convocation; they deliberated and reported upon it to the Crown, and the Crown sent a Message with that identical Book of Common Prayer to the House of Lords, and requested them to proceed upon that Book;—besides the reference to Convocation in the Act of Uniformity was not at all equivalent to that contained in the Preamble of the present Bill, which said it was expedient to carry into effect the Report of Convocation. Therefore, the precedent even in that time did not go the full length of this proposal. The House had no evidence whatever of any Report of Convocation. What did they know about the proceedings of Convocation? Did they read them or trouble themselves at all about them? Did they believe that they expressed the feelings of the great body of the laity? In many matters the opinions of the clergy in Convocation by no means expressed or represented the opinions of the laity. Technically, Convocation did not represent the Church. Nobody who knew anything about the law or the history of those matters could contend that they were the representative body of the Church of England. They merely represented the clergy. And now, for the first time, in the middle of the 19th century, they were asked to found their legislation on an important matter affecting the interests of that vast body belonging to the Church who were not of the clergy. That was really a revival of the ancient pretension of the clergy. It was one of the proposals of Convocation just before the Reformation and the Act of Submission, which subjected the clergy to the supremacy and authority of the Crown by their consent, that no measure should be passed affecting the clergy or the Church of England without the consent of Convocation. Henry VIII. in those days entirely disregarded that demand of the clergy; and it was reserved for the present time and the present Government to ask Parliament to assent to that proposal. He hoped the House of Commons would not assent to it. All who were interested in the welfare and the improvement of the Church ought to be very slow in giving their assent to it as Churchmen, for he was assured by those who were able—which he did not pretend to be—to judge of the spirit and temper of Convocation, and particularly of the Convocation of Canterbury, that if they could once establish that principle that no measure was to be passed by Parliament without the consent of Convocation to it, nothing would ever be done by the latter body for the improvement of the Liturgy, the services, and other matters affecting the Church. The only mode of affecting such improvements hitherto had been by Parliament altogether disregarding Convocation and their wishes; and they then took care when they saw they were met by determination to make their desires concur with those of the Legislature. Five or six years ago Parliament passed an important measure respecting the subscription of the clergy to the Articles and Liturgy of the Church, and there then was no recital or condition like that contained in the present Bill. He entreated the House not to create now, for the first time, a precedent of a most mischievous and dangerous character.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 25, to leave out from the words "And whereas," to the words "Her Majesty," in line 29, both inclusive.—(Mr. Bouverie.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Preamble."

MR. GLADSTONE desired to express his regret that his right hon. Friend, instead of treating this as a dry matter of business, should have indulged so much in the language of exaggeration, for if they wished to make any progress in these difficult matters it could only be done by putting the severest curb upon the language they employed, and keeping literally and strictly within the facts in the assertions they made. His right hon. Friend had stated that before the Reformation there was a demand that no Bill should be passed relating to the Church without the assent of Convocation—[Mr. BOUVERIE: Of the clergy]—of the clergy assembled in Convocation, and his right hon. Friend asserted that that was the claim made in the present Bill. Now there was no such claim, nor was there any approach to it; and if his right hon. Friend had adverted to the second paragraph in the Preamble he should have admitted that it was a question whether the language of the Bill was exactly in conformity with precedent. But his right hon. Friend objected to the precedent, and said that the Act of Uniformity was due to the High Church party of a particular period, and that it was a proposal to make the clergy masters of legislation. Now, where was there any declaration that the assent of the clergy was necessary to the assent of Parliament? The recital in the Preamble was not the mere recital of the act of Convocation, but of the declaration of the Royal Commission. He presumed that his right hon. Friend adhered to the whole of his Amendment. The recital in the Preamble was a recital of what had taken place—a recital in strict analogy to the recital in the paragraph relating to the Royal Commission, and to which his right hon. Friend had made no objection, and the effect of his right hon. Friend's objection was that the House could not legislate except on the Report of a Royal Commission. Now he (Mr. Gladstone) was not content to admit any such assertions. He held that Parliament was competent to legislate without the assent of a Royal Commission, or the assent of Convocation. But what it was competent for Parliament to do was one thing, and what was a convenient method of procedure was another. The recital, too, to which his right hon. Friend objected was strictly conformable to the precedent established by the Act of Uniformity, and though, as his right hon. Friend said, the Act of Uniformity was only one precedent, that Act formed the basis of our procedure in this direction from 1661 to the present date. What it was now proposed to do was to follow exactly the precedent established by that Act. And why did he ask it? His right hon. Friend ought to know the exact position of the Government with regard to Bills of this kind. They were not measures of the Government in the same sense as Bills usually framed and designed by the Government. It was not desirable that the Government should mix itself in ecclesiastical matters more than necessity required. The course taken had been this:—When a serious want had been felt an attempt had been made, on the responsibility certainly of the Government of the day, to appoint a Commission, and to make that Commission, as much as possible, representative of the Church—and of course when he said the Church he meant the laity as well as the clergy—and, if the Report of the Commission was satisfactory, to make it the basis of ulterior proceedings. The first case of the kind in our time occurred under Lord Palmerston, and reference was made to Convocation to ascertain what the opinion of the clergy was with respect to the alterations proposed, which at that time affected the declaration which they were called upon to make. He did not suppose that Lord Palmerston or the Government of the day in any way intended to imply that Parliament was under any obligation to make that reference, but simply that, with a view to the preservation of harmony between the different orders of the State, it was convenient to adopt that course. He was certainly one of those who approved that method of proceeding; and in the same way it had now been thought fit to refer this question to Convocation to ascertain their opinion upon it. Was that an unjust or an unfair course to adopt with regard to the daily services of the Church? Who were the congregation at the daily services of the Church? They consisted chiefly of the clergy and their families. ["Oh!"] It should be remembered that those who attended these daily services were generally a few units in a parish, and it was not unreasonable that they should endeavour to learn the opinions of those who undertook these daily services voluntarily, at the cost of considerable labour, and partly with a view to their own edification. The Bill was introduced in the House of Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury as the head of the clerical body of this country, and it had received not only the unanimous assent of that body, but the unanimous assent in its present form of the House of Lords. And now, having in the first instance been founded upon the Report of a Royal Commission constituted under the advice of the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and made as representative in its character as possible, as having not only received the willing assent of the clergy but the unanimous support of the House of Lords, both of its lay and spiritual Members, his right hon. Friend asked the House to refuse to follow the precedent established in the great statute—the Act of Uniformity—which had regulated our public worship down to the present day. He trusted that the House would not adopt the course proposed by his right hon. Friend, and thus add another to the already sufficiently numerous subjects beset with difficulty and disturbance which demanded the consideration of the House.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. HORSMAN said, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had failed to notice the real practical Parliamentary objection which had been started by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and had fixed upon that paragraph of the Preamble which referred to the Report of the Commissioners, and not to that which referred to the Reports of Convocation. Who, he should like to know, in that House had any acquaintance with the Reports of Convocation on which hon. Members were asked to legislate? As a matter of Order, therefore, he wished to ask the Prime Minister to inform the House whether he was aware of any precedent in which the House of Commons had been called to make Reports the basis of legislation of the contents of which it was in perfect ignorance?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had carefully endeavoured to separate the two paragraphs of the Preamble which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie) had embraced in one and the same Motion, and he (Mr. Gladstone) had confined his speech entirely to the first paragraph.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the foundation of the proceeding referred to in Charles the Second's time was a formal Message to the Lords from the Sovereign stating what had been done by the Convocation, at the desire of the Crown, and laying before Parliament with the Book of Common Prayer, as revised by Convocation, a recital of that which the Crown had done. That, therefore, was a precedent which could not be quoted in favour of the present mode of proceeding. After what had fallen from his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, he hoped he would, at all events, assent to the striking out of the words to which he objected in the second part of the Preamble.

MR. HORSMAN wished to know, what knowledge the House could be supposed to have of the fact that Convocation had made the Report in question?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied the House had the authority of the First Minister of the Crown, who stated on the part of Her Majesty that such a Report had been made. [MR. GLADSTONE: And that of the Archbishop.] Speaking, he might add, with respect to the question of submitting to the Convocations of York and Canterbury matters connected with the Church of England, he could quite understand that many gentlemen connected with that Church would wish that it was more fully represented by Convocation. They should, however, bear in mind that Convocation as it stood was the only representative body of the Church and the clergy which we had at present. He should like to ask the members of other religious persuasions whether they would wish that that House should rise up in opposition to what had been done by the representative bodies of those persuasions? Such men ought, he thought, to look with some delicacy on the position which was occupied in that respect by the Church of England. Convocation had acted for her from time immemorial, and was her only representative body. The House of Commons, too, now occupied a very different position with respect to the Church of England than did the House of Commons in the time of Charles II.; for now it had Members from Ireland and Scotland, the one country having no Established Church, and the other having a Church which, in many respects, was of a different character from the Church of England. And would the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), he should like to know, wish the House of Commons to legislate on the services and doctrines of the Church in the first instance without consulting those who were her representatives? Her Majesty had been advised to issue letters of business to the two Convocations of Canterbury and York, and it would be a dangerous proceeding to strike out of the Bill the recital of the fact that Her Majesty had consulted

Mr. Bouverie

Convocation and obtained the assent of the clergy to the changes recommended by the Ritual Commissioners. He quite admitted the supremacy of Parliament; but there were many ways in which he hoped it would never deem it right to exercise that supremacy, with which in the present instance there had not been the slightest desire to interfere. He entreated the House therefore, not for the sake of a mere suspicion that there was any interference attempted with its dignity, to set aside what many conscientious persons looked upon as a most important part of the Bill.

MR. MONK remarked that the Convocation of the Southern Province consisted of 149 members, of whom 107 were nominees of the Crown or of the Bishops, while only 42 members represented the parochial clergy, so that Convocation could hardly be taken as a fair representation of the clergy, and far less of the laity. But, as the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had agreed to strike out the latter part of the Preamble stating that it was expedient to carry into effect the Report of Convocation, he thought the House could not refuse to accept the statements of fact contained in the earlier paragraphs.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock had taken a sound constitutional view of the matter, and that the course proposed by the Prime Minister would make Convocation master of the situation. He thought the whole of the second portion of the Preamble should be omitted.

MR. GLADSTONE admitted that in drawing the Bill the precedent of the Act of Uniformity had been exceeded, and said he was therefore ready to strike out the latter paragraph of the Preamble.

MR. T. HUGHES said, that if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock pressed his Amendment to a division, he should vote for it. The late doings in Convocation did not give him such confidence in that body as would induce him to consent to the introduction for the first time of Convocation into an Act of Parliament.

MR. KINNAIRD remarked that the House of Commons was the only real lay representative of the Church of England, but it would not do any good for the Church until it got rid of the Act of Uniformity.

MR. MIALL said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government ignored the fact that there were in the House Nonconforming Members of the Church of England, who had as much right to speak on questions affecting the Church of England as any Member of the House. He simply wished to say, however, that there seemed to be a general disposition on the part of some Members of the Government and of the House to bring this country under the sway of sacerdotalism, and he must protest against such a course. He could see no reason for introducing these words into the Preamble, unless it was intended to give greater importance to the clergy of the Church of England.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 97: Majority 44.

A further Amendment made.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

TRAMWAYS PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (NO. 3) BILL.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill, so far as it relates to Birmingham Corporation, committed to a Select Committee, to be appointed by the Committee of Selection as in the case of a Private Bill.

Ordered, That all Petitions presented during the present Session against the Bill be referred to the said Committee; and such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel or agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the said Bill against the said Petitions.—(Mr. Arthur Peel.)

TRAMWAYS PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (NO. 4) BILL.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill, so far as it relates to Hull, committed to a Select Committee, to be appointed by the Committee of Selection as in the case of a Private Bill.

Ordered, That all Petitions presented during the present Session against the Bill be referred to the said Committee; and such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel or agents, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the said Bill against the said Petitions.—(Mr. Arthur Peel.)

MINE DUES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. LOPES, Bill to amend the Law respecting the Rating of Mine Dues in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. LOPES and Mr. GREGORY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 177.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 31st May, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* (115);
Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation* (116);
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections* (117);
Infant Life Protection* (118).

Second Reading—Juries Act Amendment (Ireland)* (109).

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—
Gas and Water Orders Confirmation* (101);
Petroleum* (104).

Select Committee—Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment* (51), and Debtors (Ireland)* (52), The Lord Camoys added.

Committee—Report—Metropolis (Kilburn and Harrow) Roads* (94).

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Correspondence respecting claims for indirect losses put forward in the Case presented by the United States Government to the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva—Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.—North America No. 7. (1872).

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA) THE SUPPLEMENTARY ARTICLE.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I wish to put to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to ask him, Whether he is prepared to lay on the Table the Supplementary Article which is proposed to be added to the Treaty of Washington, together with the amendments on that Supplementary Article which have been introduced by the Senate of the United States? I wish also to ask, whether, considering the general anxiety which prevails upon this subject, he will be prepared to state what is the present position of the negotiations, and whether any decision has been come to by Her Majesty's Government as to the acceptance or rejection of the Article with the amendments understood to be introduced by the Senate of the United States?

EARL GRANVILLE: With the permission of my noble Friend I will answer his second Question first. This is the position of affairs. At this moment we are in active communication with the Government of the United States. Congress, which was to have adjourned on Friday, has postponed its adjournment till Monday; and this, therefore, is exactly the moment when it would be most inconvenient for Her Majesty's Government to make a statement with respect to the matter in question. I think, under these circumstances, my noble Friend will not expect me to make any statement to-day. With regard to the presentation of the Article, which has already appeared in a surreptitious manner in the United States, I do not think its appearance in that way would justify me in making use of it in this country; and I do not think it would be satisfactory to lay the Article on the Table without certain Papers connected with it, which will give your Lordships the fullest information on the subject. I can only say that I think delay is not a thing to be desired—and, if we did desire it, it would not be possible except for a very short time indeed.

EARL GREY: My Lords, the answer of my noble Friend compels me to ask another Question. Is it the intention of Her Majesty's Government to decline to go on with the Arbitration unless the Claims on account of Indirect Damages are withdrawn? I am afraid I must ask your Lordships' indulgence while I say a very few words in explanation of that Question. Your Lordships are aware that from the moment when this country learnt the nature of what are called the Indirect Claims put forward by the American Government very great anxiety on the subject prevailed. When my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the debate on the Address, declared that these Claims were regarded by Her Majesty's Government as being of such a nature that it was impossible this country could consent to their being referred to any tribunal, however high —and at the same time assured your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government would, on the one hand, maintain the rights of this country, while, on the other, no effort should be spared to bring the question to an adequate and satisfactory conclusion—this statement of my noble Friend for the moment allayed the anxiety of the country. But when we heard that the "friendly communication," as it was termed in the Speech from the Throne, made on Her Majesty's part to the Government of the United States had not induced that Government to waive the Claims which it had preferred, and when we found that negotiations on the subject were proceeding, the anxiety which had before existed was revived and increased. On two or three different occasions the subject was referred to in this House, and though my noble Friend was pressed upon the point, he constantly declined to give us or the country any express assurance that we should refuse to go to arbitration unless those Indirect Claims were withdrawn. No doubt, he implied that such would be the conduct Her Majesty's Government would steadily pursue; but he would give no express assurance to that effect. That being the case, the anxiety of the country has been greatly increased by what has become known to us since the last meeting of the House. We have learnt not only what was the nature of the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the American Government, but the newspapers have been enabled to publish—by what means it is not for me to guess—the communications which have been passed between the Government at Washington and their Minister in this country. From those communications we learn that it is the fixed determination of the United States' Government not to withdraw the Claims which have been preferred. Now, that being their fixed determination, the announcement just made by my noble Friend that negotiations are still in progress is calculated to excite the most lively alarm in our minds. Because, what does that declaration imply? Does it not imply this? That, knowing such to be the determination of the American Government, from the confidential communications between that Government and their Minister here, Her Majesty's Government yet think it worth while to continue to negotiate? Does not that imply the contemplation at least of some concession on our part? Now, I believe it is the all but unanimous opinion of your Lordships, and the all but unanimous opinion of the nation, that this is a case which calls for firmness and determination. We concur in the view taken by Her Majesty's Government at the beginning of the Session that these are Claims which it is impossible this country can submit to have referred to any tribunal, however high. But I say more. We not only cannot consent to their being decided on by any tribunal, but, for my own part, I believe it is necessary for the honour and dignity, as well as for the interests of the country that these Claims should not be in any way before the Arbitrators—because, possibly, they might swell the amount of the lump sum the Arbitrators are empowered by the treaty to reward against us without assigning any reason for it. This is what I believe to be the situation. Therefore, I think it is alarming in the greatest degree to find that negotiations are still in progress. And I must add that the anxiety which we feel in the situation of affairs is not removed by the fact, which has been stated on the highest authority, that before the Treaty can be ratified, it will be laid and will remain for some time before Parliament. If I am not mistaken, it has been explained in this House on very high authority—I am not sure that it was not the authority of my noble Friend himself—that it is not competent to a nation, consistently with its honour, to refuse the ratification of a Treaty concluded by its authorized representatives, unless it can be shown either that the Plenipotentiary has exceeded his powers or has departed from the instructions he had received. If, therefore, the Plenipotentiary has kept within his powers, and has obeyed his instructions, it is not a matter of discretion with the Government to withhold or not that ratification which they are in honour bound to give. That we have been told on high authority is the ordinary rule of diplomatic practice—and certainly it seems to be a correct one. Therefore, the statement that we shall have the Treaty on the Table before it is ratified does not remove the anxiety which we feel; and I do think that before any step is taken which may be final, and which may commit this country to a course which I believe would be universally disapproved, my noble Friend should state whether it is or is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to refuse to proceed to arbitration unless these Claims are withdrawn. My Lords, these negotiations have now lasted between four and five months, and I do think it is high time we should now know definitely what is the position of the Government. The fact that negotiations are still pending is no longer a valid reason for refusing to give that information.

EARL GRANVILLE: In one word I will answer the noble Earl. Yesterday I received from my noble Friend the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) a letter to this effect—

“I wish to ask you, with the permission of the House, whether you will lay on the Table the text of the Supplementary Article, together with the amendments which have been introduced by the Senate of the United States, and also what is the present state of the negotiations, and whether or not any decision has been come to by the Cabinet.”

Now, these are matters of fact; and although it is inconsistent with the general practice of the House to ask any Question on which a debate might arise, unless formal Notice has been given, it was quite clear that, under the circumstances, my noble Friend had no alternative but to give me the Notice he has done. To his Questions I have given an answer. I can quite understand that the answer I have given is not perfectly satisfactory to your Lordships, who are naturally anxious to get all possible information on the subject; but it is the one which a sense of my duty compels me to give. An hour ago my noble Friend on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) sent me a note. I do not exactly remember the words, but it was to the effect—“If nobody else does so, I will ask what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government.” My answer would have been exactly the same as I have given to the noble Earl opposite; but I must put it to your Lordships that it is singularly inconvenient that after my assurance that only one or two days can elapse before I make a full statement, my noble Friend should get up and make a long argumentative speech, containing all sorts of assertions, which I deny, and then expect me to rise and answer categorically, either with or without arguments, Questions which may be inconvenient in the critical moment at which we have arrived. I decline to answer those Questions. If he chooses he can give Notice of any Question for Monday next—then I shall give the answer which it will be my duty to give: but certainly I will not, by the somewhat severe speech he has made, or by the unfounded assumption that Her Majesty's Government are likely to compromise the honour of the country, be drawn into making a premature declaration.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, I am one of those who recognize a considerable amount of the advantage in our constitutional principle that the Sovereign, through her Ministers, is entitled to negotiate and conclude treaties with Foreign Powers; but I must say that Her Majesty's Government are straining that principle on the present occasion to a degree to which I think it never was strained before, and which, I venture to say, if carried much further, will go far to subvert the principle altogether. Before your Lordships adjourned on the eve of the Recess we had a statement made to us by the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs; but it was accompanied by a refusal to produce the despatches which had passed between the two Governments up to that time, and your Lordships adjourned without any knowledge of the contents of those documents. Hardly had 24 hours elapsed, however, before we were put in possession of the whole contents—not through the medium of Her Majesty's Government, but by means of telegraphic despatches from the other side of the Atlantic. That was a very unsatisfactory thing for Parliament, the Great Council of advice for England, which may naturally expect if these matters are made public they should be communicated to them by the Ministers of the Crown. But that is not the only way in which we have received information. We received some further information through the medium of a lecture delivered by one of Her Majesty's Commissioners; and we have to-day received a fresh instalment of an interesting character, through the publication of the telegraphic despatches said to have passed between one Member of the Government at Washington and their Representative in this country, who details with great explicitness and frankness the conversations he has had with the Secretary of State opposite. I cannot, under these circumstances, help recognizing the justice of what was said by the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey). The Secretary of State declines to give us even the text of the Supplementary Article which has occupied public attention during the last fortnight—he does not dispute that this Article, as published in the ordinary sources of information, is correct—and I own I am somewhat surprised that, if that is the case, it should not be laid on the Table in the ordinary course. What the noble Earl on the cross-benches says is perfectly well founded. In the telegraphic despatches which have been published as those which have passed between the Government at Washington and their Minister at this Court we find it declared—not once but again and again—that whatever may be done on the subject of the Supplementary Article, it must be understood that no words in that Article may amount not merely to a direct, but even to an indirect withdrawal of the Indirect Claims. Now, I do not want to elicit from the noble Earl anything he may not think it right to tell us; but I do venture to say—on behalf, I am sure, of many of your Lordships as the public out-of-doors—it is utterly impossible that there should not be felt the greatest anxiety by the public of this country when they hear there are further negotiations on the Supplementary Article, which even when deprived of the alterations made in it by the Senate was sufficient to create great uneasiness and anxiety, and I think to create the greatest possible embarrassment; but which we are told, on authority we have no right to dispute, must not, however settled, be understood to amount to a direct or indirect withdrawal of the Claims which have already been made.

Earl Granville

EARL GREY: My Lords—

EARL GRANVILLE: It is the custom in this House when a point of Order is raised for the Peer who is interrupted to sit down. I submit that my noble Friend is quite irregular in continuing this conversation.

EARL GREY: I submit that I have not been guilty of any irregularity. When a question of pressing importance arises, a Question may be put on such a Notice as I gave this morning—the observations I have made would have been too late had I not made them to-day, and I gave all the Notice in my power by writing a note to the noble Earl. In consequence of what has passed, I have authority on the part of Earl Russell to say that on Tuesday next he will make the Motion which he postponed before the Recess. I should have fixed it for him for Monday, but that I observe that some other business placed on the Paper for that day might interfere to prevent the Motion of my noble Friend from coming on. I am very unwilling to defer it till Tuesday.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I rise for the purpose of asking for some information, and I hope I shall have more success than the noble Earls who have preceded me. My Question is of a comparatively subordinate character. I am not going to ask the noble Earl either as to his policy or what he is going to concede to the American Government or to withhold—but with respect to his intermediate policy, and as to the precautions which it will be necessary for him to take in consequence of the lapse of time. The Court of Arbitration is to sit on the 15th of June. We have been told on high authority in the other House that, though the negotiations may be conducted by telegraph, the ratification must be by post. If that is the case, unless the negotiations are concluded within a day or two—and even then it would be difficult—it will be impossible that the final step should be taken before the time comes for the Geneva Arbitrators to sit. I wish, therefore, to ask what precautions have been adopted, or what course the noble Earl means to pursue under these circumstances? An answer to this Question will not prejudice the ultimate termination of his policy; but it is evident he must be prepared with some direction to be given or some Motion to be made before the Geneva Arbitrators for adjournment, or in some way for preventing them from going on with the consideration of the Case before it is decided whether the Claims as placed before them are within their jurisdiction.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I can only state that we have most carefully considered the subject. The statement the noble Marquess has made is perfectly accurate as to the fact that some step must be taken within two or three days as to the course to be pursued. But I remember once hearing my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Derby) quote an old diplomatic saying to the effect that no question is indiscreet, but the answer may be so. I think I may reserve to myself, at all events, another couple of days before I go into the explanation which I shall certainly have to give at the beginning of next week.

LORD WESTBURY: My Lords, I will not now enter into a general discussion, though a time must come when this important subject must be discussed fully. The character of the country for common sense and intelligence requires it. When we parted for the holidays we were contented to remain in a certain degree of mystery and confusion; but we could not have imagined that mystery would have been so darkened, and that confusion so much worse confounded, by the addition of this Supplementary Article. As to the Treaty itself, I think three boys of ten years old might have succeeded in making a more intelligible one. However, as to the composition of the Treaty, that is a matter with which I have now little or nothing to do. I am principally concerned with the error which it appears to me has been committed by Her Majesty's Government in the Additional Article which they have proposed to the United States and which is still greater than that which was committed in the Treaty itself. The document is proposed to the United States as a satisfactory thing, and at the same time as a fulfilment to this country of the pledge which Her Majesty's Government had given, that under no state of things would they be induced to enter into arbitration on the Indirect Claims or proceed with the Treaty until the Indirect Claims had been unequivocally withdrawn. Now, what the Government understand by the unequivocal withdrawal of these Claims must be answered by the language of this Article; and we find in it that, instead of an unequivocal withdrawal, there is no withdrawal at all. It is a promise for the future, and, by implication, a confirmation of the past. If Her Majesty's Government have a notion that supposing the Article were signed in all its integrity, the Indirect Claims would be barred, they will be miserably undeceived when its legal effect comes to be considered. My Lords, I am not going to constitute myself the legal adviser of Her Majesty's Government, but I may speak with some sort of claim to the title of their friend when I warn them that they had better ask their legal advisers whether it is not the duty of an arbitrator to exhaust the reference made to him, and whether this Supplementary Article would, in terms and in law, unequivocally discharge the Arbitrators from the duty of adjudicating and giving some decision on the Indirect Claims now formulated before them, and which that Supplementary Treaty declines to withdraw. That is a very serious subject for consideration, and they had better take it into account. My Lords, another thing has occurred during the Recess which cannot fail to interest us. That is the revelation made by Sir Stafford Northcote, that a promise had been given by the American Commissioners to the English Commissioners that these Claims should not be brought forward. I want to know under what circumstances that promise was given? I want to know whether this was not the state of things?—that the Commissioners had before them the Treaty as it is now worded, and that our Commissioners desired an alteration in the shape of a withdrawal of the Indirect Claims, and that the American Commissioners said—"No; we should have great difficulty with the Senate; do not insist on it; be content with our personal promise that these Indirect Claims shall not be brought forward." Now, were our Commissioners weak enough to do any such thing? Were their principals—our Government—weak enough to accept anything of the kind? Was it intended that this promise should be communicated to the Senate, or was it intended that the Treaty should remain and the Senate should be left under the impression that there had been no alteration in it, by which the American Commissioners would be guilty of an imposition on their own Senate, and we should be guilty of abetting and assisting them in the commission of that imposition? If that promise were given, as Sir Stafford Northcote unequivocally says it was, and if, when given, it was communicated to Her Majesty's Government, I wish to know, when my noble Friend (Earl Granville) got that information, why he did not impart it to Parliament? I wish also to know why my noble Friend continued in the idle occupation of arguing on the construction of the Treaty if he had any right to believe there had been a promise that, whatever the language of the Treaty, it should only be acted on in the sense of the Indirect Claims not being brought forward, or attempted to be brought forward, against this country. My noble Friend has unfortunately been brought into the position that these Claims have been formally and duly lodged. Is it the intention of my noble Friend to hold up this Supplemental Treaty in the face of the House and of the country as a proof that he has always insisted on the withdrawal of those obnoxious Claims? It may be necessary at some future time to substantiate the statements to which I have just alluded as to the promise alleged to have been given by the United States' Commissioners. It would be a painful thing to do; I would, however, rather we should be outwitted in any way than that we should be outwitted in the manner in which we should prove to be outwitted if the imaginary case I have put before your Lordships should turn out to be an accurate narrative of the facts.

Lord Westbury

EARL GRANVILLE: I hope your Lordships will excuse me if I say one or two words after what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord (Lord Westbury.) The noble and learned Lord has been good enough to say he wished to make a "friendly communication" to Her Majesty's Government, and he made it in that kind manner in which he sometimes favours us on the Treasury bench. He says that this important question must be thoroughly debated in substance and detail, for the honour of the country requires it, and this House will demand it. I entirely agree with him; but I put it to your Lordships whether the best means of securing such a discussion is for the noble and learned Lord to get up and ask a number of Questions which he has been warned we cannot answer at this moment, instead of reserving his invective against the course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued for an occasion when we shall be able to defend ourselves and give the answer which the noble and learned Lord wishes for as to the advice which our professional advisers have given us—and, in short, clear ourselves from the insinuations which the noble and learned Lord, without any foundation, has thought fit to cast on us.

LORD REDESDALE: My Lords, there is a point which I think requires consideration, and it is that Parliament has a right to claim more information with regard to this Treaty than any other, inasmuch as the Arbitration provided by the Treaty may result in an award against us of some millions of money, which Parliament will have to vote. I believe there is no instance of treaties having been made by which this country undertook the payment of large sums of money without some consultation with Parliament before ratification.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before
Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 31st May, 1872.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Committee of Selection and Standing Orders, Mr. Hastings Russell discharged, Mr. Dodson added.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Locomotives on Roads * [180]; Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation * [181].

Committee — Report — Cattle Disease (Ireland) Acts Amendment * [159]; Poor Law (Scotland) * [35-179].

Report— Salmon Fisheries (No. 2) * [10-178].

Considered as amended — Act of Uniformity Amendment * [136]; Charitable Trustees Incorporation * [120].

Third Reading— Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental * [162]; Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * [141], and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL—CHARGES ON PUBLIC REVENUE.—QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in accordance with the usual practice, he will, before asking the House to go into Committee on the Public Health Bill, propose a Resolution in Committee of the Whole House, to sanction the imposition on the public Revenue of such part of the expenditure under that Bill as he intends to provide for from that source, in order that the House may have time to consider his proposals on this point, before it is asked to proceed with the Bill?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, it was necessary to take the course suggested by the hon. Baronet only when the measure contained clauses proposing a charge upon the public Revenue. The Bill referred to contained no such clause. Whatever charges it would impose would be voted from year to year. Under these circumstances, it would be out of his power to take the course suggested.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the right hon. Gentleman had not stated whether the House would have time to consider his new proposals before the Bill was proceeded with.

MR. STANSFELD said, he should be quite prepared to give any information on the subject at such time as might appear convenient to the House.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, before going into Committee on the Education (Scotland) Bill, he will place on the Notice Paper Amendments for giving effect to the Resolution of the House of Commons of the 7th May in reference to that Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that the Government had no intention of placing any such Amendments upon the Paper, for the simple reason that they did not propose to take any step calculated to give effect to the Resolution. The Government thought that the Amendment given Notice of by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) sufficiently embraced the spirit of the Resolution, and would afford the House an opportunity of re-considering the question in Committee.

MR. DISRAELI asked when the Bill would be proceeded with?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that depended upon the course of Business next week. It was necessary that some provision should be made for such portion of the Miscellaneous Estimates as would not be voted that night, and the Government intended asking for a Vote of Credit for four weeks on Monday. After that the Motion would be made that the Speaker leave the Chair, that the House might go into Committee on the Scotch Education Bill. On Monday, also, he proposed moving the ordinary Resolution relating to Morning Sittings, making them subject to the Resolution of 1869, and he proposed the House should sit at two o'clock on Tuesday the 4th of June, and proceed with the Scotch Education Bill.

In reply to Mr. SCOURFIELD,

MR. GLADSTONE said, the present intention of the Government was to proceed with the Scotch Education Bill morning and evening until the close of the Committee.

MINES REGULATION BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked, Whether the Mines Regulation Bill will be proceeded with at the close of the Committee on the Scotch Education Bill, in accordance with the understanding already come to?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would prefer not to bind himself to that; it would be necessary to look at the Bill and see how long it would take.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must ask for some assurance that the Government positively intended to go on with the Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE said, unquestionably, as far as they were capable of forming an absolute determination.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

THE NEGOTIATIONS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT: Sir, as the right hon. Gentleman has not risen to give the House or the country any information with respect to the Question asked him yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) I wish to ask in what position the negotiations between this country and America stand, and in what position we now find ourselves placed within fourteen days of the expiration of the term at which the Indirect Claims must be withdrawn or not. The House has patiently waited for information on the subject; but I think the time has now arrived when the country is entitled to know in what position we may find ourselves fourteen days hence?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that nothing has occurred in any way to compromise the declaration we have made to Parliament—that is to say, no negotiation will be carried on between this country and the United States except under circumstances which will allow Parliament to become cognizant of the nature of the negotiations, and, if it thinks fit, to express its opinion upon the result before the negotiations are finally concluded by ratification. Likewise, we have kept fully in mind the passage of time with respect to the approach of the day when the Tribunal of Arbitration will sit at Geneva, and we have taken such steps as appear to us to be required by that consideration. But early as is the day, and short as is the interval, before the meeting of the Tribunal of Geneva, the hon. and gallant Member may be aware that another event, material to the progress of this important affair, is to arrive at a still earlier date. The Session of the American House of Representatives and of the Senate is appointed to terminate on the 3rd of June—namely, on Monday next, and the hon. and gallant Member will naturally understand that the present negotiations in which the Government is engaged have reference to the early arrival of that date, when, as the arrangements of the American Government have been communicated to us, the action of the Senate would of necessity be suspended. It is with reference to an arrangement before that date that we are now carrying on communications, so that the hon. and gallant Member will not have long to wait before he receives information.

Mr. Gladstone

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE COLONIES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MACFIE, in rising pursuant to Notice, to call attention to the relations between the mother country and the colonies, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should consider whether it is expedient and opportune that they should advise Her Majesty to appoint a Commission to inquire as to the propriety and best means of admitting the Colonies, which, by their loyalty and patriotism, their intelligence and vigour, their numbers, geographical position, and resources, have become a highly important part of the nation, to participation in the conduct of affairs that concern the general interest of the Empire," said, that the subject, although most important, had as yet received very little attention from the House. Happily, the relations of the United Kingdom with the colonies had never formed a party question, and he trusted they never would. We had just completed arrangements with the Dominion of Canada which had been required, in some degree, in consequence of the want of representation in this country of that great colony, and matters bearing on its connection with the mother country must before long be brought under the consideration of that House. Again, that subject was rising rapidly and prominently into the view of the public here, and especially of the working classes, who regarded the colonies in some degree as their natural future homes, and the vast unoccupied territory held by the Crown as affording lands to be cultivated by subjects of Her Majesty, who would hereafter form communities which would add to the strength and prosperity of her Empire. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) when starring it in the provinces lately, had publicly stated that if the party with which he was connected came into office again it would be one of their great duties to maintain our colonial Empire. He hoped that declaration would stir up the present Government to greater zeal than they had in time past felt at liberty to show in carrying out the wishes of the people in favour of a consolidation of the Empire. What might now be done with ease in that direction might before very long become a work of difficulty. Into two great groups of our colonies the system had been introduced of what was called responsible government—a high-sounding phrase which he was afraid was rather calculated to mislead them. Sir Philip Wodehouse, a recent Governor of the Cape Colony, in a despatch lately laid on the Table of the House, said he had always held responsible government to be applicable only to communities which were fast advancing to fitness for absolute independence. The then Colonial Secretary in 1870 wrote to Sir Philip Wodehouse that he could hardly expect the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government in the views he had put forward respecting the consequences to be speedily anticipated from the establishment of responsible Government in any colony. About the same time, writing to Sir George Bowen, Governor of New Zealand, the Colonial Secretary said

Her Majesty's Government disavowed any desire to bring about any separation between the mother country and that colony. Instead of that somewhat weak language he should have preferred a declaration from the Government of a resolute determination on the part of this country to uphold the relations which subsisted between England and her colonies, and to draw still closer the bonds which united them to her. The late Sir William Denison, another Governor of great eminence, expressed his opinion that in order to get rid of the cost of supporting the colonies we were trying to induce them to claim their independence. Earl Grey, in 1869, stated it as his view that the result to be looked for from the policy declared by Her Majesty's Government was the breaking up of our colonial Empire. After quoting the opinions of Mr. Haliburton—son of the author of Sam Slick—and other colonial writers as to the progress now being made in the career of dismemberment, and denying the power of any Government to fritter away by carelessness or indifference the rights of citizenship from its colonial subjects unless they showed a wish to cast off their allegiance to it, the hon. Member referred to a Commission appointed in the Australian Colonies, which said that the relations now subsisting between those communities and the mother country was so wanting in mutuality that it could not safely be regarded as a lasting one, and that it became necessary to consider how it might be so modified as to give a greater security for its permanence. The Government of Queensland had declared that the time was not distant when the colonies would ask from the British Government a declaration as to how far the latter would recognize any duties towards the colonies in time of war. It was evident that the colonies looked forward to the time when the Government of this country would be inclined to sever the connection which at present joined them to us. Statesmen in this country had uttered predictions relative to the colonies which unfortunately had a tendency to fulfil themselves. They had regarded the future separation of the colonies from the mother country with complacency; they had told us that in such an event they and we should remain allies—a fact which he very much doubted—and that we should not suffer in our trade with them. With reference to the latter subject he felt bound to point out that those countries which had been separated from Great Britain consumed less British goods proportionately than our colonies did. The United States took but a comparatively small amount of British goods. When a man emigrated from this country, if he went to Canada he took with him his property, whatever it might be, and it was not lost to the Empire; but if he went to America, besides the possibility of his becoming an enemy, he took his property with him, and the Empire became so much the poorer. In the event of war our colonies would be of infinite service to us, as they would furnish us with coal and other necessary supplies, while their ports would afford our ships shelter in case of need. Were we, on the other hand, to be separated from them, we should not have a single port open to us in the world, because our colonies, having the neutrality laws before their eyes, would be afraid to receive us. The United States treated their colonies in a very different manner. Instead of constantly threatening them with separation, they asked them to send representatives to Congress, and to contribute towards the general expenses of the country. [The hon. Member proceeded to read somewhat long extracts from the late Lord Elgin's letters, with the view of showing that he was in favour of a more intimate connection than now existed between this country and our colonies.] It was not, however, merely in words that this country had taken pains to inculcate the belief that its connection with the colonies was only temporary, but every opportunity had been taken of showing our intention on the subject by means of our deeds. We had conferred upon one of our colonies the ambiguous name of Dominion; we had withdrawn our troops from them; we had urged them to provide themselves with armies and navies apart from those of the Empire, and we had permitted them to enter into independent negotiations with foreign Powers. We had not required the colonies to contribute to the Imperial Revenue, although in time, when the greater part of Her Majesty's subjects resided out of England, the question would arise whether we were to undertake the protection of their trade solely at our own expense. The colonists were excluded from representation in the British Parliament, though they were obviously interested in many Imperial questions, India, for instance, from its proximity and probable future trade, being as much a matter of concern to the Australians as to ourselves. In other respects our treatment of the colonies was very liberal. They bore no part of the burden of the National Debt; the hundreds of thousands who yearly left our shores thus freeing themselves from all liability; the lands won by British valour had, excepting some slight changes, been handed over to them; self-government was allowed them; their Bills being scarcely ever vetoed; they were protected by us in case of war, without obligation to assist us with a man or a shilling; they were permitted to frame hostile tariffs, and part of the New Zealand Loan guaranteed by us was being expended in the conveyance of Scandinavian emigrants—8,000 of whom were now under contract to go to the colony—to the neglect of our own workingmen. The attitude of the Colonial Office towards the colonists was undoubtedly courteous and conciliatory. He trusted that the guarantee of a loan for New Zealand, the policy now pursued towards the Cape, the acquisition of Dutch territory in Africa, and the loan to be handsomely guaranteed to Canada indicated a change of policy on the part of the Government. Having gone thus far we were bound to go further. Considering the anxiety which prevailed to give political representation to every class of the community at home, our millions of prosperous and enterprising colonists ought surely to be represented. France and Spain allowed their colonies representation, and Germany—which unless we looked sharp would probably seize upon some island to which we might fancy we had a claim—would probably do the same. When representation of the colonies in Parliament was advocated by Adam Smith, it was objected that the complexion of the House of Commons was corrupt, that the distance was too great, and that the colonial members would be outvoted, but that these objections or most of them had no longer force. Joseph Hume, at the time of the first Reform Bill, proposed representation of the colonies, and in Mr. Cobden's speeches he found nothing in disparagement of the connection of the colonies with the mother country. He believed a Council of State, on the German principle, would be an advisable arrangement. Persons in the colonies were anxious that a great federation should be established, of which England should be the centre. He thought no time should be lost in carrying that idea into effect. Who were opposed to the scheme? He knew of no one. It might be objected that it was too soon to undertake such a work, but he hoped he had shown that it was not too soon. The danger was rather that it was too late. Surely, when the Empire was at peace, when there was so much prosperity, we should be willing to negotiate with the colonies on this subject. No time should be lost in making earnest endeavours to carry into execution a scheme which appeared to be wise and popular. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name upon the Paper.

Mr. Macfie

MR. D. DALRYMPLE, in seconding the Motion, said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that the connection between this country and the colonies ought to assume a more definite, regular, and intelligible shape than it had at present, and although differing from him as to the possibility of federation, which was a subject full of difficulties, yet he could not see why we should accept the policy of drifting no one knew whither. The reason why our policy of late had been so indefinite was not only owing to the fact that successive Administrations had been lukewarm on the subject, but that the House of Commons and the country had been indifferent to the manner in which the colonies were governed. We had been living too much upon our luck, and so long as things went well we had been content, without looking the dangers and difficulties of the subject boldly in the face. He would confine the remarks he was about to make to one portion of the subject to which his hon. Friend had called attention, and would preface them by the assertion that it was impossible to give assent to the statement that our colonies were in as satisfactory a state as we could wish; for instance, at the present moment it was hardly possible to find one of our colonies in so unsatisfactory a state as our great North American Possessions, and yet it was one that might so easily be brought into a satisfactory condition. We had not in all our dominions a people more thoroughly loyal than the people of Canada, and yet at that moment, because they did not know that England would stand by them so long as they stood by England, a large party was growing up in Canada favourable to annexation; for a small population of 4,000,000 so near a neighbour to a great country with 40,000,000 of people, if left unprotected, must necessarily gravitate towards the latter. It was not that the people of Canada desired to become part of the United States—they were too acute to wish to become one of the most heavily-taxed populations in the world, instead of remaining one of the least taxed; but they believed that they had not got that equivalent in the shape of assured protection which they considered themselves entitled to. In that remarkable, comprehensive, and statesmanlike speech which Sir John Macdonald lately delivered—and which did him such great honour—he showed that he relied on the promise that England, in the event of difficulties arising, would come to the aid of Canada; but, while we were promising to send men whom we had not on the spot, and fleets which were on this side of the Atlantic, there was no doubt that the principal places in Canada would be pounced upon, nor would they be given up until at the end of a costly and probably a protracted war. Therefore, he was one of those who were sorry at the withdrawal of the last of our troops from Quebec a year ago. He admitted his entire unacquaintance with military matters, but he could not think that a country ought to be left for defence to an ill-trained and ill-provided Militia alone; for instance, in this case Canada had 40,000 Militia on paper, but they had no arsenals, nor magazines fitted for carrying on a campaign, nor were their officers sufficiently numerous or well trained. It was, therefore, in his opinion, the duty of this country, not through menace or with an idea of menace, to keep such a body of troops in Canada as would secure it from a filibustering expedition or a coup-de-main. Then, again, he did not think we sufficiently estimated the grandeur and importance of Canada, a colony growing in wealth and material prosperity year by year, as a proof of which he would name that in the past year we had discovered of what enormous value as a grain-growing country Canada was likely to become. The new Provinces which had lately been made a part of the Dominion, only required capital to bring land of the most fertile description into cultivation. Their climate was capable of ripening every cereal with which this country was acquainted; the summer temperature was of 70 degrees, and in the western portion the cattle might be fed through the winter season out of doors. Then there were in those Provinces gold and copper and minerals of every description; there were fisheries, and everything that went to make up national wealth. Was that a country which we ought to be content to lose for want of a little help at the right moment? There was no more loyal people than the Canadians, especially those of the Lower Province, who at one time were so disaffected. What they asked was, to know one of two things—either that they were to be united to us by closer bonds, or that they were to stand alone. In the latter case Canada would be able to make her own terms, instead of being taken as a conquered country, and one of the first results of adding Canada to the United States would be, that property in Canada would go up at once from 15 to 20 per cent, because the United States would give her ample means of opening up her great resources, while we were looking at both sides of the paper before consenting to guarantee a loan of some £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. Let Canada feel assured of the support of the mother country, and all doubts would cease, and there would be but one Queen, one flag, one destiny, one Empire.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should consider whether it is expedient and opportune that they should advise Her Majesty to appoint a Commission to inquire as to the propriety and best means of admitting the Colonies, which, by their loyalty and patriotism, their intelligence and vigour, their numbers, geographical position, and resources, have become a highly important part of the nation, to participation in the conduct of affairs that concern the general interest of the Empire,"—(Mr. Macfie,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, there were two deprecatory remarks of the hon.

Mr. D. Dalrymple

Gentleman who had last spoken which he had listened to with great pleasure—one which regarded the withdrawal of our troops from Canada, and the other with respect to the guarantee of the loan which it was proposed to give. It appeared to him, considering the great value of the connection between this country and Canada, and that we did not risk one sixpence by giving that guarantee, that it was most unfortunate that there should appear to be any haggling or bargaining about the matter. He hoped, therefore, that when brought forward the proposal would receive the unanimous assent of the House. In former times, before the great change made in the Constitution of this country by the Act of 1832, the colonists found it much easier to obtain a seat in the House of Commons; and, although there were, no doubt, countervailing evils in the condition of things before 1832, yet it was very forcibly argued by the advocates of the old system that it practically gave representation to the colonies. Rich Indians or rich colonists could get seats for such places as Old Sarum and Gatton; and the great man who was afterwards Lord Clive, when he first came home from India, was returned for the now extinct borough of St. Michael's. Colonial statesmen, in fact, now found it more difficult to recommend themselves to any constituency, for the reason that they had lived so long abroad, and were consequently not so familiar as others with the class of subjects most interesting to the people, and adapted to the legislation of the day. The time had now come, however, when we should look this question seriously in the face, for there was no doubt of the immense importance of the colonies to this country, and that we maintained our place among the great nations of the world by means of our Colonial Empire. Take that away, and this country would sink into the position of a third-rate Power. We ought, therefore, to do everything we could in reason to meet the wishes of our colonists. All of them united in hearty attachment to the Sovereign. We had evidence of this feeling during the illness of the Prince of Wales. They, moreover, would regret to dis sever themselves from this country. While cordially reciprocating this feeling, we ought to do all we could to meet their wishes, and he was, therefore, glad that his hon.

Friend had brought this important subject under the notice of the House.

MR. R. TORRENS said, that no person could regard the position of affairs in the Dominion of Canada and the group of colonies in the Southern Hemisphere, without feeling that there was great danger in the indefinite postponement of this subject with a view to settle it once for all. Having taken part in the foundation of one of our most thriving colonies, he could not agree with those who thought that the severance of the colonies from the mother country was either desirable or inevitable. On the contrary, he was unable to see anything which should bring about such a severance, unless it were neglect to take advantage of the present opportunity, and establish our relations with the colonies on a satisfactory basis. He could not say that our existing institutions were such as to insure harmonious relations with the colonies, or lead them to depart, if depart they must, in amity and good-will, instead of in bitterness of heart and with angry feeling, for our institutions could hardly be vindicated either upon philosophic or constitutional principles, or on the ground that they worked practically in an advantageous manner. The position of a Governor of a colony under the old régime was one consistent with the then existing colonial system. The Governor ruled the colony through the instrumentality of Officers of State, who were appointed to carry out the pleasure of the Home Government; and most efficient instruments they were for enforcing upon the colonists that policy. But when the change came, and responsible government was introduced in the colonies, the Governor, who formerly had but one master to serve, then became the servant of two masters, occupying the position of Her Majesty's Representative and the potential advocate of the policy of Her Majesty's Ministers; he had now put upon him the incompatible duty of being the sole recognized medium of communication between the colonists and the Home Government—the advocate to urge upon the Secretary of State the colonists case from the colonists point of view. An officer so placed naturally leaned towards the interests of those upon whose favour his future career was dependent. The colonists were not adequately represented, and whilst that state of things continued he did not think there could be the harmonious understanding which was desirable between the mother country and the colonies. As to the remedies suggested, he could not approve of them. He demurred altogether to the view of the hon. Mover of the Resolution that the colonists should be represented in that House. It might have been so at one time, but now they had given to the colonies a degree of independence which they could not retract, and which was inconsistent with representation in that House. Neither did he concur in the view advocated by some, that an Imperial Parliament should be established superior to and overriding this and the other House of Parliament, which should take cognizance of all the greater matters of State, for he could not conceive how the existence of such a body could be reconciled with our form of Government by Parliamentary majorities. Nor was he in favour of another proposal advocated by some—namely, that the Colonial Secretary should be aided by a Council, to be chosen from retired colonists, for what could a Canadian know of New Zealand, or vice versa? But there was ready to hand a practical mode of redressing the grievance. The colonists complained, and he (Mr. R. Torrens) thought rightly, that they were not placed at home on a footing of equality with foreign States—many of which were of much less importance—in the matter of diplomatic representation. In his opinion, our colonies should have the right to appoint chargés d'affaires or Envoys to wait upon the Secretary of State and represent their interests. The self-governing colonies had sent home some of their most eminent men to act as agents here for the management of their affairs, and he must at once admit that those agents had been of late placed in a much better position than they used to be. But further advance in that direction was required. The colonists should have the privilege of sending their own political agents to this country, and that those agents should enjoy the same rank, position, and prestige that was at present accorded to the Envoys of foreign States. That would afford a ready and easy solution of the difficulty which existed at present. He would now state, as an instance of the value to this country of the colonies, that the value of the British products exported from this country for consumption to the Australian Colonies alone amounted to £10,000,000 annually, or little less than the amount of our exports to France; quite as large as that of our exports to Spain, Portugal, and Italy combined, and double the amount of the British products exported either to Belgium or to Russia. The tonnage of the shipping, too, which sailed from England to Australia amounted to 4,000,000 tons annually, of which 93 per cent was British owned. Now, some of those who advocated a separation of the colonies from the mother country contended that if they were independent to-morrow, the colonies would maintain their commercial relations with this country just as they existed at the present time. The facts, however, were strongly and clearly against any such view, for when an Englishman or an Irishman emigrated to British North America, he consumed double the quantity of home products that was consumed by an Englishman or an Irishman who emigrated to the United States, and if he went to the Australian Colonies the consumption was twelve times greater than in the United States. That the trade follows the flag was further demonstrated by what took place in settlements originally planted by other countries. The French Canadians retained the language, their habits, their tastes; yet their trade had so completely passed over since their annexation to us that these French colonists consumed £5,000,000 British produce as against £250,000 French. If this were attributed to the less commercial spirit of the French, he would point to the Cape Colony, where the descendants of the Dutch settlers consumed £1,760,000 of British as against £26,000 of Dutch produce. There was another feature connected with this question which deserved consideration. Irishmen who emigrated to British Colonies almost invariably remained loyal subjects of Her Majesty. The truth of that was illustrated by the cases of Mr. Gavan Duffy—formerly a Member of that House—and Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee, who in this country were at least suspected of disaffection; but, emigrating to British colonies, became eminently loyal subjects and advocates of the British connection. But when such men went to the United States they at once began to organize themselves into societies whose object was to overturn the Government of this country and erect some other form of Government in its place. From that he contended that the more intimate were our relations with the colonies, the better it was both for this country and them. Another aspect in which the importance of the colonies to this country was shown, was involved in the consideration of our position in the event of war. England existed simply by reason of her command of the sea: she could not retain that command unless she had numerous and secure coaling stations for the ships composing the Navy, and she could not have these coaling depôts unless she retained her colonial possessions. How long would Great Britain retain her position in the Mediterranean if she lost Gibraltar or Malta? For what length of time would the Red Sea continue to be the channel between this country and India if Aden was lost to the possession of England? Precisely similar was the case of King George's Sound, which, situated at the south-west angle of New Holland, formed one of the finest harbours in the world. The nation which held possession of that harbour and coaling station absolutely commanded the navigation and the commerce of the whole Southern Seas. He did not wish a shilling of the taxes of this country to be expended for the benefit of the colonies, but it was a mistake to suppose that outlay on naval stations, such as King George's Sound, Halifax, Sydney, and Melbourne, came within that category. The colonists were unable to defend some of those places. King George's Sound, for example; having only about 100 inhabitants, and in case of war it would make a material difference whether those harbours could be used by our fleets for shelter, coaling, or refitting, or whether they would be debarred from those advantages, for the latter would be our position if the colonies were severed from us and acted towards us as neutrals. He thought, then, the custody of those places should be resumed by the mother country, not in the interest of the colonists so much as in that of British shipowners and merchants, for it was a fact that nearly all the ships plying to and from Australia, amounting to upwards of 4,000,000 tons annually, were, with their cargoes, the property of British merchants, Australian produce being paid for, wholly or partially, prior to shipment. The colonists should not be called upon to undertake the armament and defence of these strategic positions. It was neither consistent with security nor justice that this burden should be imposed upon them. In conclusion, he would observe that those philosophers of the closet who spoke lightly of the severance of the colonies could not be aware of the advantage of common rights of citizenship between Englishmen and the colonists. An Englishman who had spent years in the colonies was not deemed the less an Englishman on his return, and might, as in his own case, be elected by a British constituency; while the younger sons of our gentry found a career open to them in the colonies, with similar institutions, habits, and social position; members, too, of our over-crowded Bar were elevated, sometimes in a few months, and in one case that he remembered in a few weeks, to the colonial Bench. On the other hand, the colonists always regarded themselves as Englishmen, and their children were taught to regard the mother country with veneration and respect. Taking those facts into consideration, he thought the colonies should not be deemed less a part of the nation than the Isle of Man, and he saw no possible advantages, whether in a military, economical, or mercantile point of view, in separation. He hoped the Government would not receive the Motion for inquiry in a hostile spirit, and he believed that the policy he had suggested would be the best solution of all pending difficulties.

Mr. R. Torrens

MR. HERMON said, that though he concurred with the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie) who introduced the Motion, that it was most desirable to maintain the most friendly and intimate relations with our colonies, yet he was not prepared to support it in its present terms, and was glad that hon. Members had an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the important question to which it referred, more especially because what was said in that House on the subject might aid in dissipating the feeling which obtained in the colonies—that we desired to separate ourselves from them entirely. With regard to the guarantee proposed between this country and Canada, until its terms were fairly before the House, he would reserve any opinion he might entertain upon the matter; though he could not help saying that the House ought to have a chance of knowing what was the nature of such guarantees, before they were actually entered into, for he believed it would be found that certain circumstances connected with the guarantee between this country and Canada were not so satisfactory so the House could wish. The Government ought not to enter into such a guarantee without the sanction of Parliament, or they might as well impose taxes without its concurrence.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he would at once admit the right of any hon. Member to bring forward any Motion which he thought deserving of discussion; but he questioned the wisdom and discretion of the hon. Member for Leith in submitting that Resolution at the present moment, and when informed of the hon. Member's intention he had endeavoured to dissuade him from proposing it. There was some subjects which did not gain by frequent and constant repetition in that House, and he asserted, without hesitation, that the repetition of debates in which the question of separation between this country and the colonies was brought under public notice did not tend to strengthen the ties between the colonies and the mother country. If the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the opposition, or any hon. Gentleman who had some Parliamentary following or long Parliamentary experience, thought fit to bring before Parliament the colonial policy of Her Majesty's Government, or the general question of the relations between this country and her colonies, the result was that public attention was called to the subject, the benches of the House were well filled, persons well known in the political world expressed their opinions on the subject, and the subject was thoroughly discussed; but when an hon. Gentleman who, however respectable his position, could not boast either of a Parliamentary following or of long Parliamentary experience brought forward a question of this magnitude, it often happened that public interest was not awakened, the benches were not filled, and the discussion was sometimes brought to an abrupt and inglorious termination. That had before now happened to the hon. Member for Leith. Of course, the colonists could not be expected to enter into all the considerations which affected the amount of importance given to a debate in this country, and consequently they might be led to attribute to the British Parliament the blame which in reality attached to the want of judgment of the hon. Gentleman who brought forward such a Motion on his own responsibility. Having made that remark because he deemed it his duty to do so, in order that the colonies might understand why a debate on their affairs was not carried on by the Leaders on both sides of the House, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not think he was actuated by a spirit of personal incivility towards himself. He could state his objections to the present Motion in about four sentences. First, he maintained that the relations between this country and the colonies were satisfactory as they at present existed; and, moreover, that there scarcely ever had been a period when they were more satisfactory; secondly, inasmuch as no demand for a change of that description had been made by the colonies themselves, and as they had, on the contrary, expressed their opinion in opposition to any such change, he did not think it at all desirable that the change should be made by us; thirdly, he maintained that there were great inherent difficulties in the working of all the schemes which had been proposed for an alteration of the present system; whether the plan were adopted of a council to consult with, or rather to embarrass the Secretary of State, or of another council whose authority would inevitably clash with that of Parliament; and, fourthly, the subject had twice been amply discussed in the House of Commons within the last two years, and he was not aware of any new circumstances which should induce the House again to take it into consideration. With these few remarks he should have been inclined to dismiss the subject, but he could not address the House on the general question of our colonial relations without adverting to the language of hon. Gentlemen who carried greater weight even than his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Macfie). It was no doubt the right, and perhaps it was the duty of the Opposition to criticize the policy and measures of Her Majesty's Government; but these criticisms, however severe they might be, ought to have some foundation in justice; and he was bound to say that hon. Gentlemen opposite and their supporters in the country had, especially during the last year and a-half, delivered speeches which had not such a foundation in reference to the colonial policy of Her Majesty's Government. He wished to call the attention of the House to two statements made with respect to that policy by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) and his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy). He had extracts from their speeches which he must allude to in the hope of obtaining from them some satisfactory explanation. Twice during the past year the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire had made attacks on the colonial policy of the Government, and was reported to have said at a dinner of the Conservative Registration Society in the City of London—"They," that was, Her Majesty's Government—"have endeavoured to alienate our colonies." However, since he entered the House that afternoon the noble Lord had informed him that he did not make use of those exact words; but that he meant to say an impression had been created in the country that such was the intention, or was likely to be the result of the colonial policy of Her Majesty's Government. Still, he regretted that the noble Lord should have allowed the words to appear so long uncontradicted in the public Press. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford had, during the Whitsuntide Recess, made a short, and he hoped a pleasant tour in the provinces, delivering addresses on political topics at Canterbury and Bradford. In the latter occurred this statement, according to a report which appeared in two daily newspapers—

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

"The colonial policy of the Government was no better. From every colony came complaints of neglect on the part of the Government; and it was not too much to say, that discontent in the colonies was an increasing danger to the Empire."

Another report, which subsequently appeared in The Standard, and which was probably revised by his right hon. Friend, gave his words as follows—

"Without entering into our colonial policy, I say this—that from every colony almost that we have, there comes a voice saying they are neglected, they are treated ill, and that, if there is no interference with them, there is a want of warmth and heartiness of feeling to reciprocate the affection which they bear to the mother country. They tell us that they are ready to do all for us, if we will do what we can for them. They do not ask us to undertake their liabilities; they do not ask us to undertake their defence now in the same way as we did on former occasions; but they ask that this country, who sent forth the founders of these colonies, shall be a home to the colonists; that they may look to us as the mother country, and that so long—and we should never put forth a hand to separate them from us—so long as they cling to us we will cling to them, whether it be in peace or whether it be in war, and that, under all circumstances and on all occasions, we will not neglect the responsibility of duty which lies on us in this matter.”

The House would observe that, under these expressions of sympathy with the colonies, in which he himself heartily concurred, his right hon. Friend brought accusations of neglect and want of warmth of feeling on the part of Her Majesty's Government towards the colonies.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The quotation which my hon. Friend read first is taken from an abstract of my remarks that appeared in one of the newspapers. I had nothing to do with the report which appeared on a subsequent day in The Standard. It does, however, express what I said; but I may remark that I sedulously avoided saying anything in reference to the colonial policy of Her Majesty's Government; and with respect to my hon. Friend himself, he knows I have spoken of what he has done in quite different terms from those I might apply to some of his predecessors. Therefore, that part of my speech was not an attack on the Government, but a statement of my views of colonial policy.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, while grateful to his right hon. Friend for the remark he had just made, was unable to accept any expression of feeling which would separate him from his Colleagues on a question like that. He must stand or fall by the general policy of the Government. He alluded especially to the speech in question, because he had the greatest respect for his right hon. Friend who had held high office under the Crown, and had proved himself an able and efficient public servant; but in proportion to his respect for him was his regret to find him lending the weight of his authority to such statements. His right hon. Friend said that complaints came from nearly every colony, and that the colonies were not treated with sufficient warmth and heartiness. To that statement he was bound to give a distinct denial. Here and there might perhaps be individuals who raised objections; but it was not anything like a correct statement to say that complaints were coming from almost every colony of coldness, neglect, and ill-treatment. He wanted to ask his right hon. Friend—who appeared to have access to channels of information from which Her Majesty's Government were excluded—from which colonies was it that these complaints proceeded? Was it from Canada? Some persons, he was aware, thought Canada had not been well treated in the recent negotiations with America; but such was not the opinion of the Canadian Parliament. With regard to that point, it was not now his intention to enter into a consideration of the Washington negotiations; but he might remark that in a recent speech Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister of Canada, used language which by no means bore out the idea that any complaint existed there of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Sir John spoke of the relations between England and Canada having been of “so friendly and pleasant a character throughout the negotiations;” and, referring to the proposed loan, he said—

“No one can say now, and under these circumstances, that England has any idea of separating herself from or of giving up her colonies. This will put a finish at once to the hopes of all dreamers and speculators who desire or believe in the alienation or separation of the colonies from the mother country.”

And, speaking of the great sacrifice which, in the interests of peace, England had made in consenting to make herself liable to large money payments under the Geneva Arbitration, he says—“Has she not made it principally for the sake of Canada?” And all through the speech of that able and eminent man—the opinions expressed in which were afterwards ratified by the Canadian Parliament, he shows that Her Majesty's Government have acted in a loyal and friendly spirit towards Canada. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would put this point to the House. If during these negotiations Canada had been treated as she would have been, if she had been a separate or independent country, nothing could be urged against us; but if she had suffered in the slightest degree; if any concession had been made by her which would not have been made if she had not been a colony, then by that action we were pledged more deeply than ever to the assertion that we consider Canada to be an integral part of the Empire, and that in her hour of danger we should be bound to use the whole power and strength of the country to defend her as much as if she were a part of the United Kingdom. Were there any other colonies from which complaints had come? Were there any complaints from the great colonies of Australia? The accounts received from them concurred in describing a state of great and, even at this moment, exceptional prosperity. Did the Colonial Secretary and himself display lack of interest and coldness by attending early this year a large dinner given to an eminent colonist about to return to Australia? The language they heard on that occasion, the language they used, and that which was addressed to them, must have convinced all who were present that the most kindly feelings existed between the colonies and the Colonial Office. It was not possible for an Englishman worthy of the name to look at Australia without feelings of the deepest sympathy, without satisfaction at its increasing prosperity, and without being proud of the enterprize and ability which were developing its resources, and which were exalting the English character in that part of the world. In New Zealand, no doubt, the policy once pursued caused bitterness and soreness, which at the time were not unnatural; but a change of policy had been cordially accepted by the colonists, who deserved the highest praise for the conciliatory course they had pursued towards the native tribes. So happy were the results that had followed that within the last few days information had been received that William King, to whom the late war was due, and which lasted almost without intermission from 1860 to 1870, had voluntarily tended his submission, and had become a warm supporter of the Crown. In fact, there never was a period when loyalty was at a higher flow in New Zealand, when the prosperity of the country was greater, nor when the relations with the mother country were more satisfactory. Had the Cape or the South African Colonies complained of the lack of interest taken in them? The Government had lately advised the Crown to assent to the annexation of a large portion of valuable territory, and he took his full share of the responsibility for that, having warmly recommended it to his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office. In regard to the Cape and Natal, recent events had shown a sincere desire on the part of the Government to promote the prosperity of the colonies and to carry out the wishes of the colonists in their management, and the debate of the previous Tuesday showed that the House appreciated, as would the colonies, the action taken by the Government. In West Africa we had just effected an amicable arrangement, and though of course there were some complaints—as would be the case everywhere where free discussion and a free Press happily prevailed—there was increasing prosperity in every one of the West African Colonies, and we might anticipate that their material prosperity would promote the advancement of civilization and Christianity in the interior of Africa. Turn to Ceylon, which had now a revenue of £1,000,000 a-year, and an annual surplus and where, on the recent report of an eminent engineer, his noble Friend the Secretary of State had been able, as he had long wished, to adopt the views of the colonists as to the construction of a breakwater instead of an inland dock at Colombo. Turn to the West Indies; the Act for the federation of the Leeward Isles, passed last year, was working satisfactorily; and Jamaica was never more prosperous than now. Had we neglected British Guiana? To that colony we had sent a Commission to enquire into the labour question, and in consequence of its Report we had just sent out an Ordinance, by which we hoped to remove various difficulties and to improve the condition of the labourers. Had Mauritius cause to complain? There had, indeed, been financial embarrassment and complaints of insalubrity of climate, greatly owing, he believed, to the felling of the forests; but we had lately been endeavouring to promote works which would preserve the public health, and the financial prospects of the colony were better than they had been for many years. He might go further through the list of our colonies without discovering whence the alleged complaints proceeded. No doubt something in the nature of complaint must have reached his right hon. Friend, or he would not have made the statement he did, and the only quarter from which he could imagine complaints had come was Hongkong. True, it was flourishing, and had a port the tonnage of which was exceeded by that of only three ports in the United Kingdom. Action had been taken with respect to the licensed gambling-houses there, which had been suppressed, and it was possible complaints might have been received by his right hon. Friend from Chinese gamblers. If such was the case, he heartily, though very respectfully, wished his right hon. Friend joy of his clients. After the kind expressions to which his right hon. Friend had given utterance, it must be inferred that he did not intend to make any severe attack upon the Government; but when these charges were made by Gentlemen of position and authority, and were published in the papers, the damage they did was not confined to the Government; indeed, that was as nothing compared with the damage to the country resulting from the uncomfortable and disagreeable feelings produced in the minds of colonists. Therefore, no public man could make such grave charges without incurring great responsibility. The proper place to make them was the floor of the House of Commons, where they could be answered; and therefore he would say—"Hit us fairly in the face here; but don't stab us in the back at Conservative banquets." If there was a subject on which patriotism ought to rise above party, it was that of colonial policy. Of course, there were difficulties in dealing with the colonies, which required different treatment according to their age, position, and circumstances; and the policy of the Government was to foster and aid their development, at the same time strengthening the links which bound us and our colonies together. What was the difference between this policy and that of the Government which preceded them? It was impossible to discover. Last year it fell to his lot to expound the policy of the present Government. The Prime Minister sat by his side as he did so, and would have corrected him had he been wrong. Therefore his exposition must be taken to have been just and true. He knew that that speech had been received with great satisfaction in the colonies. For himself, he would be the last man to remain connected with a Government which had adopted a policy of separation; indeed, he would rather take his seat on the back benches behind his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) than be committed to such a policy upon the Treasury Bench. There might be some who valued the colonial connection less highly than he did; but the policy which he advocated was not only the policy of the present but must be that of any future Government, because it was the only policy which would be supported and endorsed by the spirit of the British people. The colonies did not make extravagant demands upon us; they wanted nothing that we ought not really to grant them; they wanted warmth and heartiness in our dealings with them; and so long as he occupied his present position, that warmth and heartiness of sympathy on the part of the Government would not be wanting. As it had been stated that there was a large party in Canada who wished for annexation to the United States, it must be remembered that there would be varieties of opinion in a country where discussion was free; but he was sure that the great bulk of the Canadian people were thoroughly loyal and true, and the cordial expression of our good feeling was all that was required to secure a continuance of their loyalty. The statements made with respect to the Canadian Militia were not quite correct; a large proportion of the total number enrolled had gone through their annual drill this year, and the Reserve Forces of Canada numbered 700,000, including an increase of between 30,000 and 40,000 which had been made during the last two years. He would not enter into any speculation as to the future of Canada, if certain eventualities should happen; but this he would say—there was every determination in the Government and the country to stand by Canada, and he would add, he knew that the loyal spirit of the English people was thoroughly reciprocated by the Canadians. With regard to the language used by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens), no doubt there were inherent difficulties in the position of some colonial Governors. That was a subject well worthy of consideration; but, for his own part, he did not find that either the colonies or Governors themselves complained of any such awkwardness as had been referred to. No doubt, however, the Governor at the head of a large colony with responsible government must assume a somewhat different position from that of the Governor of a small Crown colony. With regard to federation, so long as they received no complaints from the colonists, it would be most unwise, either by a Royal Commission, or by a Committee, to investigate the subject, especially when our doctors disagreed as to the remedies they prescribed. He entirely agreed with the tribute paid to the colonies in the Resolution. He owned that they were an important part of the Empire, and considered it our duty to cement the alliance between them and the mother country. He considered the colonists separated from us only by water; they were just as much our fellow-subjects as if they lived in this country; and, taking that as the basis of our policy, he always had been and always should be in favour of maintaining and cementing the bonds between them, and of dealing with every colony as much as possible according to the wishes of the colonists themselves. He hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that he was not sorry—even at the expense of what he considered to be a somewhat unfair attack upon himself—that the hon. Gentleman opposite the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies should have risen in his place and spoken out so plainly in regard to the policy of the Government towards the colonies. He had heard the hon. Gentleman read the extract from his (Mr. G. Hardy's) speech with great satisfaction, because it expressed exactly what he felt, but not a word of it justified the attack that the hon. Gentleman had made on himself. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman might have remembered that on one occasion last year, when the hon. Gentleman expounded the policy of the Government on the subject, he (Mr. G. Hardy) had taken the opportunity of expressing then—as he begged now to express again—the satisfaction with which he had heard the hon. Gentleman speak of the union which it was so desirable to maintain between the colonies and the mother country. The hon. Gentleman might have known, therefore, that he had had no intention of attacking him. It was a little inconvenient, however, to say the least of it, that he (Mr. G. Hardy) should be called upon then, at a moment's notice, to defend what he said, because he had had no opportunity of providing himself with documents, but he would say that he was prepared to stand by everything that he had expressed on the question. It might have been a rhetorical expression to say that "every colony" was in a state of dissatisfaction; but any hon. Gentleman who had received the number of pamphlets that had been sent to him from various parts of the world with reference to the grievances of our colonies would admit that the feeling of soreness was very widespread indeed among them. Certainly, all the great colonies considered that they had ground of complaint; the very debate that evening proved it. They had heard one hon. Gentleman—formerly a distinguished politician in Australia—rise and complain of the conduct not of the Government only, but generally of the attitude of the country towards that colony; and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Dalrymple) considered that Canada had been in some respects unfairly used—nay, more, it was notorious, even with respect to the Governor General of Canada, that he had used expressions with regard to the probability of the separation of Canada which had given rise to the impression that such an event might be near at hand. That very day, moreover, he (Mr. G. Hardy) had been in conversation with a colonist of some distinction who had sent him a pamphlet on the subject, and his tone throughout was—not, indeed, that there was anything specially wrong, but that they had not been treated by the Government or by the country in the way that they had expected. The gentleman in question had also complained of the neglect of the interest of the colonies in that House; but he (Mr. G. Hardy) had assured him that it was not by passing abstract Resolutions that they would show their affection or interest for the colonies. Abstract Resolutions led to no result, but if there were grievances, let them be brought before the House and discussed; while with regard to the Motion, he objected to it as much as the hon. Gentleman himself did. It was vague and uncertain. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie), who moved it, was in favour of a federation; the hon. Member for Bath was in favour of something different, which he did not explain; while the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens) wanted neither a federation, nor a Council, but something else—he did not exactly seem to know what—in the interest of the Australian Colonies. Well, he hoped that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hugessen) would deal a little more mercifully with him (Mr. G. Hardy) on any future occasion, seeing that he had expressed sentiments entirely concurring with the hon. Gentleman's own, for he had only spoken in favour of a cordial feeling with the colonies, and against that party which was rising up in the country who wished for a dismemberment of the Empire. He knew that there were hon. Members in that House who wished it—there were even some who thought that it would be desirable that we should give up our connection with India. It was against that feeling, which he considered would be fatal to the country, and not against the Government, that he had directed his remarks at Bradford. He was glad, however, to have been the means of stirring up the hon. Gentleman to the vigorous speech they had just listened to; for he did not believe that the hon. Gentleman would have arrived at such a pitch of high enthusiasm if it had not been for the attack that he supposed had been made upon him. Therefore, he (Mr. G. Hardy) had done a great deal of good, by enabling the hon. Gentleman to prepare an answer to the hon. Member for Leith beforehand. The skeleton speech made by the hon. Gentleman last year had been clothed with a degree of warmth which it might otherwise have lacked but for him, and it would now go forth in vigorous flesh and blood. They had now received a fresh and clear embodiment of the views of the hon. Gentleman, who loved the colonies even beyond his party; and if ever any of these insidious enemies of the State who wished for the disintegration of the Empire should creep into the Cabinet or on the front bench, the friends of the colonies on the Opposition side of the House were in that case to have the hon. Gentleman as a recruit to speak with enthusiasm in their behalf, while he would no doubt be received with due consideration if he did not become the great exponent of colonial policy of the Opposition. He hoped that the hon. Member for Leith would be content with the discussion and with the enthusiastic appreciation of the hon. Gentleman, and would not press the Motion, because it would do the colonies harm and the mother country no good.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was greatly obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University for having drawn out the explicit statement they had heard from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies, and he only regretted the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose able speech on the subject they must all remember. They were now acting generously by their colonies, and Canada might dismiss her apprehensions for the future; although he feared that the withdrawal of the troops, both from Canada and New Zealand, at a critical moment had produced an indelible impression on the minds of the colonists.

MR. GREENE said, that anyone after listening to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies would imagine that the Millennium was about to commence. Now, as a colonist, he must say that there was much to complain of. The Under Secretary talked of federation, but how had it been carried out in the Leeward Islands? If he (Mr. Greene) had known the opportunity would have offered itself that evening, he should have been glad to call attention to the manner in which that Confederation had been forced upon the inhabitants of those islands. For six successive times the Governor in chief had caused the Legislative Assembly to be summoned to meet for the dispatch of business, and had afterwards annulled the summons, to the great inconvenience of the Members of the Assembly and of the public, the object of his Excellency being to secure a packed Assembly, in which he might carry the vote in favour of Confederation. He (Mr. Greene) could produce testimony for what he had asserted, and must say that he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) that there was a general feeling of dissatisfaction among our colonies at the treatment they were receiving from the mother country.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EDUCATION—RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES FOR CERTIFICATED TEACHERS.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. WHITWELL, in rising to move—

“That this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to consider of an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that, by a deduction from the Parliamentary Grant in aid of Public Elementary Schools, a provision may be made for granting Annuities to the Certificated Teachers of such Schools upon their retirement by reason of age and infirmity; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the same,”

said, that during the time when the Education Bill was before the House the subject had so much attracted the attention, and nearly the unanimous sympathy, of hon. Gentlemen on both sides, that the Vice President of the Council had promised it should receive his serious attention, and he hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would now be able to announce that he would accept the Motion. The subject of superannuations had much engaged the attention of the teachers, and had been brought under the notice of the Education Department by deputations to the Privy Council Office. There had also been a meeting of 5,000 teachers at Birmingham, and another at Manchester, where resolutions were passed in support of some such scheme as he now submitted to the House. Seeing that such was the unanimous feeling of a body of men to whom the country was indebted for the position it had attained to in respect to education, he certainly thought that their opinion was deserving of attention by the part of the House. Everyone knew that the work of these teachers was highly important and very laborious; it lasted from Monday morning till Friday night, and often on Sundays also, and was generally carried on in rooms of which the atmosphere was far from wholesome. They did not ask for any additional Government grant, but only that out of the present capitation grant as much might be set aside as would enable the Education Department, by such a system of arrangement as might be found desirable, to provide a small annuity for the teachers in the time when the infirmities of age should overtake them. He had intended to introduce a Bill on the subject, but he found that the Rules of the House forbade it, so that he was obliged to explain the details of the scheme in connection with the Motion. The proposal was this—that, in the first year after the plan had been decided upon, 1 per cent from the capitation grant should be deducted; in the second year, 2 per cent; and an additional 1 per cent up till five years, when a sufficient sum would have been provided to meet all contingencies that need be anticipated. He also proposed that a similar percentage should be deducted from the teachers' salaries. He knew it would be objected that by such a scheme, the younger teachers would be providing for the elder ones; but that would really not be the case, because it was certain that the Capitation Grant would last as long as the number of years likely to be attained by any teacher now living. It might also be said that teachers earning larger salaries ought to receive larger pensions; but his proposal was, that at the age of 55 years every teacher who had served 30 years should be entitled to a pension for the number of years he had served at the rate of £1 per year for males, and 15s. per year for female teachers. The teachers had themselves fully contemplated the point, and were unanimously in favour of the system he proposed, and he trusted, therefore, that the House would not consider the scheme an impossible one. If the Government, however, consented to refer the difficulties, admittedly connected with the question, to a Committee upstairs, he should be perfectly satisfied. Teachers were not public servants in one sense, though they were employed in the public interest, nor did he expect in any new measure that their relations to the State would be changed; but they nevertheless felt themselves to be public servants, and entitled to the superannuation enjoyed by other servants of the State. There were few employments so depressing, and those who followed the profession had only a gloomy picture to look forward to, with nothing to brighten the prospect in their old age. They asked no more than what the State had already given; all they wished was that it should be differently appropriated; and what they asked was simply that their scheme which evinced prescience and self-denial on their part, should be encouraged. In 1846 the Government did actually promise pensions, and several teachers were induced to take service under them on that account. In 1851 a large sum was paid to carry out the promise given in 1846, and in 1870 something like £466 was devoted to that purpose; but he would not enter into the details of that extraordinary promise, or breach of promise. His system was to deduct from the payments of the present a sufficient sum to provide future superannuations; and inasmuch as the Scotch Education Bill contained a clause providing for superannuation, and, moreover, as they had just passed a Bill to enable corporations to grant superannuation allowances to their town clerks and other officials, they really should not forget the claims of the teachers, for town clerks had generally something besides to look to, but the poor teachers had hardly anything else. The number of letters he had received from members of that useful body detailing their painful situation, their poverty, disease, and trials were such as to harrow his feelings morning after morning; he must, however, say that they had made every exertion their scanty means enabled them to obviate those evils, and it was to their credit that they had established a benevolent society, and out of their own subscriptions they granted sums varying from £10 to £20 to those of their number who were obliged to leave their duties. He hoped he had said enough to secure for his Motion the sympathy, if not the support of the House, and would conclude by laying it before them to deal with as they thought fit.

MR. MELLY, in seconding the Motion said, he wished to bear testimony to the great interest with which this debate was watched by many thousands of teachers, and also to the great moderation of their wishes. It was not that they asked for an increase of salary, but rather for recognition in some degree as public servants, and for the establishment of some system of life assurance under Government guarantee, which they might look forward to without fear of risk. Speaking for the managers, he might also say, that they were almost as unanimous on the matter as the teachers. There was no position more painful than that in which a school manager was placed when he found the capitation grant falling off, and his school losing ground, because the masters or mistresses were getting a little past their work; and it would be a great advantage if, without an appearance of too much hardship, he felt he might give a hint to the teachers to leave their situations within a certain time. There were, however, some serious difficulties in the way of adopting the Resolutions; for instance, his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal had proceeded on the assumption that the capitation grant went direct to the masters and mistresses; but in that he was in error, for in many instances that was not so. It also made retirement from age the sole condition of superannuation; but no scheme would be satisfactory which did not take into consideration cases of infirmity brought on by the energetic discharge of duty. He was certain, therefore, it would be wise if Her Majesty's Government met with favour the proposal of his hon. Friend for some inquiry.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to consider of an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that, by a deduction from the Parliamentary Grant in aid of Public Elementary Schools, a provision may be made for granting Annuities to the Certificated Teachers of such Schools upon their retirement by reason of age and infirmity; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the same,"—(Mr. Whitwell,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BIRLEY said, he understood that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to accept the principle of the Motion, but that its terms were not the most desirable, and therefore it should be referred to a Committee for careful examination. Two considerations ought to weigh with the House in taking that course—first, the comfort and well-being of the teachers, who in after life, had little opportunity of earning a livelihood after they had quitted the profession; and secondly, in the prospect of a great increase in the number of elementary teachers, it was the duty of Parliament not only to maintain, but to improve the standard. He agreed with those who thought that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee, or, at all events, that some means should be taken for seeing whether the scheme could or could not be worked. The House must feel that by affording to teachers such a resource their profession would be elevated; and none who had had practical experience of elementary schools could doubt the importance of improving the standard of the teachers, looking especially to the large increase that there would probably be in their number. It was only necessary to remind the House that not a shilling would be added to the present burdens of the country.

MR. PIM said, he sympathized with the views of the hon. Member for Kendal, and hoped that the inquiry would be extended to the Irish teachers, whose necessity was as great, if not greater than any other part of the kingdom, and who would feel disappointed if they were not treated in the same manner as the teachers in English schools.

MR. HERMON said, he would remind the House that from the Returns of the salaries of the teachers all over the country they did not average £90 a-year. He might be told that curates worked for less, but they had the prospect of preferment, whereas the persons in question had no prospect but that of teaching in schools, while a curate, who received about the average amount of salary that was paid to a schoolmaster, might become Archbishop of Canterbury. Teachers, indeed, were not eligible to become even sub-Inspectors of schools, unless they qualified by taking the degree of B.A. at the University of London, although the prospect of such advancement might stimulate them in the performance of their duties. He was glad to hear that to some extent the Government sympathized with the Resolution, for the demand which the teachers made was a moderate one; although he was, as a matter of principle, opposed to superannuation, as he thought that all persons should be paid a sufficient sum for their own labour to enable them to make provisions for old age.

MR. REED also hoped that Her Majesty's Government would allow the whole question, in the broadest form, to go before a Committee. They were not going then to enter its details, but, representing, as he did, the London School Board, he begged to say that that body was most anxious to have the whole question investigated. He believed that such investigation would give great satisfaction to the teachers, than whom there was not a more meritorious class of persons in the country, nor any who were worse paid. Under these circumstances, he felt bound to support the Motion for referring the matter to a Committee.

MR. SCOURFIELD also supported the Resolution, believing its object to be of great importance as affecting the energy of teachers, for with a good master, there would be a good school with an indifferent set of regulations; while with a bad master, there would be a bad school, in spite of the best regulations.

MR. O'REILLY DEASE also desired that this inquiry should be extended to the teachers of Ireland in accordance with their expectation.

MR. MAGUIRE, in expressing a similar wish, asked how the proposition of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) could be applied to the Irish teacher, the payments to whom only averaged £35 per annum. With the utmost self-denial it was impossible to make provision for old age out of such a pittance.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this question was not only interesting in itself, but it vitally affected the interests of many thousands of persons to whom the House should give every consideration. As regarded the Irish teachers, however, he thought it would not be to their advantage to be included in this inquiry, for, although he was not departmentally informed of their position, he had some knowledge of it. He did not, in that, by any means say that there might not be reasons for inquiring into their condition; but their position was different from that of the English teachers, while the sources from which they received payment were not the same, neither were their relations to the State similar, and he felt that they would not gain by being included in the proposed inquiry as to England and Scotland. And here he must take the opportunity of informing the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) that he was in error in saying that schoolmasters could not become inspectors' assistants, because they were not only able to do so, but the appointments were limited to them. As to the particular question before the House, he sympathized with the object of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), for he thought there was no more deserving body of persons in England than the certificated teachers, and it was desirable that they should be able to look forward to some provision in their old age, for their labour was one which wore out life quickly, and, after a comparatively early age, did not leave either men or women able to do other work. Unquestionably some provision should be made for them, but the question was, in what manner such a provision could be made; whether by voluntary association, or assistance from individuals, or from the State. It was a matter which deeply affected the interests of individuals for whom every one felt a great sympathy, but it was only kindness for a person in his position to point out what he considered the actual relations of these persons to the State and to the House of Commons as guardians of the public purse. Schoolmasters and schoolmistresses were not Civil servants nor public servants. The State did not employ them, and ever since the Revised Code of 1862 they had received no pay from the State, for one of the main principles of the Revised Code was, that the question of pay and employment was left between them and the managers of schools, and they still remained in that position. But although the State did not employ or pay them, it had this relation to them, that it had conferred upon them two great services. In the first place, it had trained them almost entirely at the expense of the taxpayers; and in the second place, it gave them by the action of the Code and the Education Act, if not a monopoly in the business of teaching, a great preference over any of their competitors. Having put them in such a position, they were left to the general condition of supply and demand. It was true that the Act passed two years ago had somewhat changed their condition. But in what manner? It had improved their position throughout England—and the Scotch Education Act would do the same for them in two ways, first, by increasing the funds out of which they were paid; and, secondly, by increasing the demand for their services. That being the case, he came to the consideration of the plan proposed by the hon. Member for Kendal. Last year he (Mr. W. E. Forster) stated that he had looked into the question with great care and anxiety, and that he was prepared to consider any plan that could be brought forward with the assent of the large body of the managers of schools;

but he stated also that he did not consider there was any claim for a State grant, and that the State could not increase the Parliamentary grant now made. The hon. Member for Kendal had now taken up the question—and he congratulated the teachers on having put their case into such able hands—but he regretted that the Rules of the House prevented the plan being brought forward in the shape of a Bill, in which it might have been considered more fully and more clearly. Whilst, however, he sympathized with the object which the hon. Member had in view, and whilst he admitted that the hon. Member's scheme did not attempt to obtain any grant from the public purse, yet he thought difficulties which were almost insuperable would be found in its working. The plan was that the Education Department should begin with a deduction of 1 per cent from all the grants to managers of schools, and that it should go on increasing until it reached 5 per cent; that the sum thus deducted should be put to the credit of an account; and that out of that sum persons should be paid on this principle—that any master or mistress, upon proof being given that he or she had taught for a certain number of years, a certain sum should be paid to them. The meaning of that was, that the young and strong teachers would have to pay the old and weak teachers. The hon. Member had stated that the young teachers were willing to submit to such a sacrifice. If so, it was much to their credit; but the House ought to be well informed on the subject before making such self-denial compulsory. It would, moreover, give precisely the same sum to teachers with a small salary as to those in receipt of a large salary—the same sum to the teacher of a small school as to the teacher of a large one, so that the pension to be given was irrespective of the sum which had been paid for what he might call insurance. Now, that was contrary to the general principles of insurance. It might be the best way of meeting the difficulty; but if he had proposed such a plan on the part of the Government, he should have received many assurances that it was not a fair plan, and he did not think it would be right to assent to the principle of such a plan unless he was assured that the teachers thought it the best plan. The House ought also to be satisfied that the managers were willing to put such a plan into force, for the result of the working of the plan would be this—that 5 per cent reduction being made, the managers of large schools would have to submit to a larger reduction than the managers of small schools, whilst the payment to their teachers would not be larger than the payment to the teachers of small schools. He thought, therefore, there were great doubts whether the teachers and managers would assent to such a plan. Under all the circumstances it was doubtful whether the teachers would be benefited by the scheme, and again it was doubtful whether the pensions could be paid out of the sum it was proposed to deduct. Now, it was very unwise to encourage expectations of a pension and then withhold it from want of funds, and he feared the ground for withholding it being founded on the fact that the framers of the scheme had made a mistake would not be held sufficient, and that the public purse would eventually be drawn upon to supply the deficiency, despite the resolution that the pension should cease on the fund becoming exhausted. There were also difficulties in regard to the machinery by which the system would have to be managed. His hon. Friend was no doubt to some extent conscious of those difficulties, and therefore he proposed that there should be an inquiry into the subject upstairs. Now, he thought they ought to be very cautious before they agreed to a Committee on that matter, for two reasons—first, that all those who had work to do had so much on their hands that they had little time to spare; and it was always found that Committees were best formed of those who were busy people, and who therefore had to make great exertions to attend. Again, they ought not to enter upon an inquiry of that kind, the very fact of instituting which would excite expectations among a large body of persons, unless they had real and strong grounds for entering upon it. Therefore, if the House assented to appoint the Committee, he was very anxious that the teachers should not be under any misapprehension as to its appointment, and consequently, the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) must allow him to correct his assumption, that the Government accepted the principle of the Motion, for the difficulties surrounding the matter appeared to him at present to be so great that that was far too strong a statement for the hon. Member to make. But, at the same time, he was very anxious that the large body of persons who were assisting them in the work of education should feel that the Government and the House gave every fair consideration to their position, and he should be exceedingly sorry if they thought that, from any dislike to engage in a troublesome inquiry, the Government were unwilling thoroughly to weigh their statements and their own propositions for meeting the difficulty which certainly did them credit. If such an inquiry were made, it might perhaps be found that some such plan would effect the object in view, or, on the other hand, that the difficulties were so great that they must ask the teachers to band themselves together in a voluntary association. If it should be found necessary to take the latter course, no doubt many people in the country who took an interest in education would be ready to assist them in any way they thought desirable. He would not anticipate the result of the Committee; but, under all the circumstances, the case was one which might fairly be inquired into, and therefore if the hon. Member would withdraw his Resolution, and substitute for it a Motion for a Select Committee, he had no doubt the inquiry would be granted without further discussion.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. GREGORY said, he thought the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman a reasonable one, and would hope that the parties interested would be able to present to the Committee a fair, reasonable, and proper scheme for carrying out that which would be so much for the benefit of the teachers, and which would enable the managers of the schools to carry on their work in a much more effective way. He also thought there was no doubt whatever that the teachers would feel grateful for the way in which their services had been recognized by the House and the country.

MR. WHITWELL said, he would withdraw his Resolution.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CRIMINAL LAW — RELEASE OF THE WHITEHAVEN RIOTERS—THE LATE
MR. MURPHY.—RESOLUTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM, in rising to call the attention of the House to the release of the men sentenced by the Lord Chief Baron at the Summer Assizes held at Carlisle in 1871, to twelve months' imprisonment for a riot at Whitehaven, before their term of imprisonment was expired, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the release of the Whitehaven rioters before the expiration of their sentence was not warranted by the circumstances of the case, and has a tendency to weaken the deterrent power of the Law against offences of the like character," said, that in calling attention to the subject, he was very anxious that his motives in bringing it forward should not be misunderstood. Mr. Murphy, the Protestant lecturer, who suffered on the occasion of this riot, had since died—a fact which was sufficient to make him speak of him with respect. Having said that, however, he must proceed to state that he had not the slightest sympathy with the manner in which that gentleman enforced his views at the various places where he lectured, and that he had always been of opinion that the authorities of any town in which Mr. Murphy attempted to lecture would have been quite justified in using all means direct and indirect which were consistent with the liberty of the subject to prevent his doing so. His object, however, in bringing forward the Motion was to point out that a very serious breach of the law having been committed, and those who were guilty of it having been convicted and sentenced to certain punishment, in measuring which every weight had been given to all the circumstances which told in their favour, the verdict of the jury ought not to have been reversed, nor the sentence so pronounced mitigated, unless some very strong reasons could have been shown to justify such a course being taken. The facts of the case were short and easily stated. In April of last year Mr. Murphy delivered a lecture at Whitehaven, which was attended with considerable riot, and he subsequently announced his intention to deliver another on the 20th of that month. In the meantime, there was considerable excitement among the Roman Catholic population at Cleator, a place about three or four miles from Whitehaven, and on the day in question a very large body of them marched through the town of Whitehaven to the place where the lecture was to be delivered, their numbers quite overawing the inhabitants; and having entered the lecture hall, in the words of the learned Judge who presided over the trial, they committed a most cowardly assault upon Mr. Murphy, which was attended with circumstances of great brutality. It was right in a case of this kind to give every weight to the circumstances under which this assault was committed. He was not one of those who would deny that the causes which led to this breach of the law were such as deserved special consideration. No doubt, if a man's religion were assailed, he was to an extent justified in feeling a certain amount of indignation; but he wished to impress upon the House the fact that the mitigating circumstances in the present case had been fully considered by the learned Judge in measuring out their punishment. The prisoners were defended by a most able advocate, Mr. Charles Russell, and the learned Judge, after carefully summing up, in passing sentence dwelt upon the brutal nature of the assault, and used the words—

"I make allowance for some degree of irritation—I may even use a stronger term, and say a feeling of indignation, by which some of you may have been actuated, and, therefore I do not sentence you to that extremity of punishment which I cannot help saying you have merited."

He (Mr. Wyndham) regretted to state that from the unfortunate feeling that prevailed between Orangemen and Roman Catholics in the North of England, and from a jealousy which existed between English and Irish miners and "navvies" which had given rise to the riot and assault in question, other assaults and riots were of frequent occurrence, which those who were engaged on the commission of the peace found much difficulty in dealing with, and the fact was that this particular case did not stand alone. Under these circumstances, the mitigation of these men's punishment was greatly to be deplored. Common justice required that sentences of this kind should not be interfered with by the Home Office. At the Summer Assizes of last year, after this case had been tried, three men were put upon their trial for what was either very aggravated manslaughter or murder, which was tried by the Lord Chief Baron, who summed up with the greatest care, and these men, to the astonishment of the learned Judge and of everybody in Court, were found "not guilty." It never occurred to the Lord Chief Baron that such a verdict could be given; indeed, in summing up, he had directed all his attention to drawing a distinction between murder and manslaughter. It was felt at the time by all who were interested in the preservation of the peace in this country that the result of that trial would have a very unfortunate effect, and in the opinion of the magistracy and of those who were capable of forming a correct opinion on the subject, many violent assaults that happened shortly afterwards might be considered as the direct consequences of that verdict, as the people who committed such assaults believed that juries were inclined to regard such offences lightly. One of the misfortunes that followed upon this sort of spasmodic interference with the due course of law was that apparent injustice was inflicted upon other persons whose punishment was not mitigated. Thus, at the Carlisle Christmas Assizes last year three Roman Catholics were charged with an aggravated assault on an Orangeman; but there was this distinction between that case and the Murphy riot—that the offenders in the former had committed the offence in their own town—Maryport—and had not walked to another place four miles distant with the intention of breaking the law. Moreover, a large minority of the magistrates were in favour of imprisoning the men for 18 months with hard labour; but the sentence actually passed upon them was 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour, whereby an apparent injustice was inflicted upon them, for their sentences had not been mitigated in accordance with the precedent set in the Whitehaven case. Now, he wished to know if the Home Secretary would advise the Crown to extend its mercy to those men? He was the last to wish that the Home Secretary should do so; but those kind-hearted people who signed this Memorial would, doubtless, think otherwise, and would believe that the Lord Chief Baron had now himself arrived at the opinion that the sentence he had passed last year was more severe than the circumstances of the case warranted. In the case of the Murphy rioters the Home Secretary had acted upon a Memorial which was sent to him on the subject. That Memorial, like all such documents, should be received with the utmost caution, for it stated facts and evidence without any of those safeguards which attended a trial in an open Court. It was stated, for instance, that the men accused were not armed with sticks or other weapons; but that was not true, for they had sticks, and one of them carried a crowbar, and no doubt some of the injuries inflicted upon Mr. Murphy were inflicted with instruments of that description. It was almost certain, also, that one of the men carried fire-arms; and it was the fact that though there were 40 police in the crowd they did not deem it prudent to make a single arrest at the time, and when they did arrest one of the men afterwards a loaded revolver and a dagger were found upon his person. Another statement in the Memorial was that great peace and good-will had prevailed in the neighbourhood since. How far that was true was shown by the fact that not only at the quarter sessions, but also at the petty sessions since, there had been many charges of assault made between Orangemen and Roman Catholics. Four or five of the magistrates who had signed the Memorial were friends of his own; but he felt bound to say, with great respect, that they did not represent the opinions of the magistrates generally, or of the people of the county upon this question. The memorialists also declared that the effect of extending the mercy of the Crown to the imprisoned men could not fail to be salutary; but certainly that anticipation had not been realized, for on the very night these men were released five others were arrested for assaults. And not only that, but the released prisoners were met at the station by cars and carriages, and were carried in a triumphal procession, which showed that these remissions of sentence were only regarded as the triumph of one party over another. Indeed, before the evening was over, one of the magistrates who had signed the Memorial had himself to try Roman Catholics and Orangemen for assaults arising out of the excitement occasioned by the procession. The Home Secretary had stated on a previous occasion that he referred the Memorial presented to him to the Lord Chief Baron, who gave his assent to the prayer of the memorialists. But nothing could be more mischievous than the practice of making such appeals to the Judges, and giving them the opportunity of revising their sentences. The Judges at present had a great amount of responsibility, and it was very unadvisable to weaken the sense of responsibility which existed in them; and it would be a great evil if a Judge, who might himself feel great doubt in dealing with a particular case, were led to think that he would have an opportunity of revising his sentence before 12 months were over. He (Mr. Wyndham) wished to know what were the general and guiding principles upon which Home Secretaries acted in these matters? He had heard it laid down as one of those guiding principles that if, after a trial, circumstances came to light which were not given in evidence at the trial, and which it was clearly shown could not have been given in evidence then, that would be a valid ground for the re-consideration of the sentence. But apply that principle to this case. So far from anything having been shown after the trial which could mitigate the offence of the prisoners, Mr. Murphy had died since the trial; and his death, though not caused by the injuries he sustained at Whitehaven, was clearly shown by medical evidence to have been accelerated by those injuries. And yet these men were released three weeks or a month after Mr. Murphy's death. In conclusion, he must say he had brought the subject forward with great reluctance; but he felt that it was his duty to bring it forward.

Mr. Percy Wyndham

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the release of the Whitehaven rioters before the expiration of their sentence was not warranted by the circumstances of the case, and has a tendency to weaken the deterrent power of the Law against offences of a like character,"—(Mr. Percy Wyndham,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he would have much pleasure in voting with the hon. Member if he divided the House on this question. He (Mr. S. Aytoun) entertained a very strong opinion of the manner in which the Government had acted with regard to the release of these prisoners, and he thought their conduct should not be forgotten with regard to the riotous proceedings which had occurred in various parts of the country in connection with the lectures given by Mr. Murphy. The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. P. Wyndham) had stated very distinctly that he had no sympathy with the meetings held by Mr. Murphy, and he (Mr. S. Aytoun) begged to say that he expressed no opinion as to the propriety of holding them; but he thought at the time, in consequence of the accounts which he read in the newspapers, that riotous proceedings would be occasioned by the ill-will which Mr. Murphy's lectures would excite among the Roman Catholic population. At the same time, however, he thought it was the duty of the magistracy of this country to protect every British subject who was not violating the law, for if when any person was doing anything of which the authorities disapproved, those authorities, though not empowered to interfere with him, were to connive at and tacitly encourage attacks by a mob upon him, all safety for life and liberty in this country would be at an end. What were the circumstances antecedent to the Whitehaven riot? He believed Mr. Murphy attempted to hold a meeting in Manchester, but that in consequence of certain persons having deposed in an affidavit that such meeting would occasion a riot, that meeting was prohibited. Mr. Murphy then gave notice that he intended to hold a meeting in Tynemouth, he believed, which notice excited indignation among the Roman Catholics, the Irish population, navvies, and other persons in that part of the country. It appeared, in consequence, that the local authorities were very anxious to prevent that meeting being held, and a most extraordinary circumstance occurred. The walls of the town, he believed, were covered with a placard stating that a very old Act of Parliament would be put in force against Mr. Murphy and any of those who sympathized with him in holding the meeting or attending it. He (Mr. S. Aytoun) could not have believed that such a placard would have been put on the wall of any English town, and he therefore asked the Home Secretary whether the Mayor of the town was acting within his powers in issuing such a placard, and the Home Secretary replied that he had authorized him to issue it. The Home Secretary further said he believed he had the power to do so. Now, he (Mr. S. Aytoun) found in the Library certain Acts which were passed, he believed, when Mr. Pitt was Prime Minister, and when great fears were entertained of the spread of Jacobin principles. Those Acts, which were entirely opposed to the principles of the Constitution of this country, were passed for the purpose of punishing any person holding a meeting, or even attending a meeting; and one of the most extraordinary things that had occurred in the history of this country was, that at the time when the Home Secretary gave authority to the Mayor to issue the before-mentioned proclamation, the Government had a Bill in this House for the purpose of repealing the statute under which the Home Secretary had given that authority. He was very anxious to hear the Home Secretary explain to the House the reasons for the course he had pursued. He believed the Home Secretary on a former occasion expressed very strongly his opinion on the conduct of Mr. Murphy. He (Mr. S. Aytoun) would not debate the question whether Mr. Murphy's conduct was right or not; but if the Government thought he ought not to hold these meetings, and the law was not sufficient, it was their duty to ask Parliament for an Act to suppress them, and not to have raked up an old Act like the one they had put in force. The course taken by the Government had had a most disastrous effect, and if the hon. Member persisted in dividing the House on what was really a censure of the Government, he should most cordially support him.

MR. O'REILLY - DEASE said, he hoped that the House would reflect calmly before it came to a decision, and remember that this man Murphy opposed in very violent language the religious opinions of a large section of the community, accusing them of idolatry, and making use of the most offensive expressions with extreme violence of manner, thus exciting the feelings of his hearers in the highest degree, and causing the riot which had occurred. It was to be remembered, however, that the more sincere were the religious convictions of those he assailed, the dearer they were to them, and the greater the hostility which would be created. The insults thrown out against them tried their patience beyond endurance, and they were undoubtedly guilty of riotous conduct, but, at the same time, the law had been vindicated and rioters punished, and he therefore hoped that the House of Commons would not pass a censure upon the right hon. Gentleman who had shown himself so competent to deal with questions of this nature, by attempting to interfere with his discretion when exercised on the side of mercy.

MR. BRUCE said, that his conduct upon the occasion of the Murphy riots had been the subject of discussion in that House, and he had no reason to complain of the result. He should, therefore, follow the example set by the hon. Member (Mr. P. Wyndham) in strictly adhering to the terms of the Motion. These terms had nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the Government with respect to Murphy; it was simply whether, in the exercise of the functions of the Home Secretary, he (Mr. Bruce) had acted judiciously. All he had to say was, that he had proceeded in this matter without reference to Murphy, or the consideration whether it was a religious question or not; and just as he would have proceeded, if it had been a riot of colliers or of any other persons. A Memorial had been presented to him by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck), and when he put it in his (Mr. Bruce's) hands, he said it was signed by a number of gentlemen in Whitehaven who were fully cognizant of the circumstances. That Memorial was signed by seven magistrates, two of whom were clergymen of the Church of England, one of them being the rector of the principal church in Whitehaven, besides which it was pointed out that there was a number of other signatures of persons of the greatest weight and authority in the town of Whitehaven attached to the Memorial. The result was, that he had done what his hon. Friend the Member for West Cumberland had condemned, but which had been universally practised by every Home Secretary—namely, he forwarded the Memorial to the Judge who tried the case and passed the sentence. The case was not exactly as stated by his hon. Friend, who had led the

Mr. Sinclair Aytoun

House to believe that the riot had been an organized riot. The Judge was not of opinion that it had been an organized riot. On the 19th of April, Murphy proposed to deliver one of those lectures which had already involved so many of the towns of England in disturbance and bloodshed. A number of Irishmen collected to prevent the delivery of the lecture. On the next day they appeared again in still larger numbers, and the memorialists, among whom it should be remembered were seven magistrates and two clergymen, stated in their Memorial that these men were men of good character, and had not gone with any intention of committing violence. They were not armed, and they had gone for the purpose of expressing their opinion, it might be noisily. That was the view of the Judge as well as of the memorialists. Murphy presented himself at the door of the hall and appeared determined to prevent their entering. In consequence of that proceeding, their passions were roused; he was treated with great violence, and those injuries were inflicted which the hon. Member was right in saying had hastened his death. Twelve persons who had been taken into custody were identified and brought up before the magistrates. Seven of them were committed for trial, and the magistrates took the most unusual course of refusing to liberate them on bail. They remained in prison from 21st of April to July, or for about three months, after which time they were tried and sentenced—five of them to twelve months' imprisonment, and two of them to three months. At the end of their nine months' imprisonment, this Memorial was presented, and he forwarded it to the Lord Chief Baron, who tried the men. He received the following reply, which he had been especially authorized to read to the House. The Chief Baron said—

“I have very carefully considered the case of Dennis Doyle and others convicted at the Carlisle Summer Assizes of last year of a riot and assault upon the late Mr. Murphy. There was much provocation, and the prisoners had all borne irreproachable characters; and, though there was evidence that three or four of them took part personally in dragging about, and inflicting some degree of injury upon Murphy, it certainly did not appear that they had assisted in the attempt to throw him over the bannisters, from which he had received the severest hurts to which he had been subjected. Considering, upon the whole, that the religious feelings of the prisoners were put to a hard test, and may be said to have been outraged by the perseverance of Mr. Murphy in publicly denouncing the observances and practices of Roman Catholics, and that the agitation caused by these contentions and conflicts has now subsided, I would venture to observe that Her Majesty might well be advised to remit the sentence pronounced as to the yet remaining portion of the term of imprisonment.”

There was one other reason which the Chief Baron did not mention; but which he (Mr. Bruce) did not doubt had some weight in the re-consideration of the case by the learned Judge. It was one which was constantly acted upon—namely, that, although a sentence might be right and proper at a time of great excitement, when the law had been violated, yet that upon the return of peace and tranquillity, it might be wise to recommend a remission of the sentence. The same course had been taken not long since in the case of the Thorncliff rioters. A violent riot had occurred in which several persons had been injured. A long and heavy sentence had been passed; but after a portion of it had been undergone, an application was made to the Home Office from the masters, magistrates, &c., representing that it would conduce to the peace and good order of the district if the remainder of the sentence were remitted. The Judge concurred in this recommendation. He had inflicted a severe sentence; but when peace was restored, he was of opinion that the public interests would not be injured by the remission of the sentence. A similar feeling existed on the part of the Chief Baron. The memorialists stated, among other reasons for the remission of the sentence—that since the occurrence peace had prevailed, that the feelings of bitter animosity which had been excited had been allayed; and that, in their opinion, law and order had been sufficiently vindicated. It was the opinion, moreover, as he (Mr. Bruce) had been authorized to say, of the experienced Judge who had heard the whole of the evidence, that the prisoners did not come to the place for purposes of violence, but only with the intention of preventing Murphy from delivering his lecture, and that they were led into violence by accidental circumstances. What, then, was it the duty of the Home Secretary to do? He would have been acting in complete disregard to the principles upon which his predecessors in office and himself had always acted, if he set aside the opinions of the Judge, and why? Simply to satisfy the religious feelings of certain hon. Members. It was no part of his duty to act with a view to those sentiments. He was there to administer the trust reposed in him for the maintenance of peace and good order, and he was satisfied that that had been done. Having acted in accordance with the opinion of the learned Judge who tried the case, and with the views of those who were most interested in the maintenance of peace and order in the district—magistrates, clergy, bankers, merchants—he would have subjected himself to the severest censure, and to the charge of having acted with partiality, if he had followed a different course. Without entering, therefore, into previous circumstances, he put it to the sense of justice and to the good feeling of the House to say whether that was a Motion which ought to be persisted in.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he was very sorry that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, towards the conclusion of his remarks, had hinted that the Motion had been brought forward from motives of religious animosity. [Mr. BRUCE said that he had made no such statement.] However that might be, he must say that for his part, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was very much obliged to his hon. Friend and Representative for having brought this matter under the attention of the House, and he thought his hon. Friend would have failed in his duty as a Member for West Cumberland, if he had not taken notice of the proceedings of the Home Office in this business, as the course taken by his right hon. Friend had been the subject of very unfavourable comments in the county. What were the facts? His hon. Friend opposite had stated them ably and most succinctly; and in dealing with that statement, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) altogether disputed the construction which the Home Secretary had endeavoured to put upon this outbreak. In his opinion, it could be proved that there was a pre-concerted plan, and that the men who took part in the outrage marched into Whitehaven in hundreds, in regular battle array. He believed they were armed with sticks, and his hon. Friend said that fire-arms had been found on some of them. These men marched up to the hall where the lecture was to be delivered, set upon Mr. Murphy, beat him with sticks—he believed drew out knives—and left him half-dead upon the spot. He was not exaggerating, but he did not think anything much worse could be done. His right hon. Friend had appealed to what the Judge said. But surely what the Judge said on the trial, when the facts were fresh in his memory, and he was doing his duty as Judge was still more important. He had not a copy of the exact words used by the Judge on that occasion, but he took the following statement from a well-informed and respectable journal. The Chief Baron said, there was no doubt that there was a riot, and that the prisoners had taken part in it, and he could find no excuse for the riot and assault. When a verdict of guilty was returned, his language was equally emphatic. He dwelt upon the cowardice of the attack, the brutal nature of its incidents, and said that he found himself compelled, in vindication of the law and in the interests of peace, to pass a severe sentence. The paper went on to say—

Mr. Bruce

“The words conveyed to each prisoner that the sentence was the least that the Judge felt himself justified in passing. So minutely did his Lordship go into the details, that he apportioned out the exact amount of punishment for each offender according to his guilt.”

His right hon. Friend had talked about the men not having been admitted to bail; but surely that was known to the Judge when he was passing sentence, as were, indeed, all the other features of this remarkable case which had been commented upon. The result was that the men had served the greater part of the sentence inflicted upon them, when up came this remarkable Memorial, upon which the Home Secretary had said that the Judge would rest his case, and the first argument in which was, that there was at the time when the Memorial was signed peace in the county. Well, probably there was, for the rioters were shut up; but the fact was there was not peace, for his hon. Friend the Member for Cockermouth (Mr. Fletcher) knew that for months past there had been smouldering religious feuds between one party and another, which was continually breaking out in riot and tumult. The second argument was that the particular riot in question was an exceptional circumstance. Yes, it was a case of an ex-exceptionally brutal outrage. The third argument was that the men had previously been men of good character; but all that was brought forward in Court, and was known to the Judge. But what rendered the conduct of his right hon. Friend still more extraordinary was that on the recommendation of the Judge he remitted the sentence absolutely a few weeks after Mr. Murphy had died in consequence of the outrage, and in doing so, his right hon. Friend's defence was that he acted ex officio on the report of the Judge. But the public looked to the Home Secretary for a knowledge of the state of the county, and for acting with a sense of responsibility, and if the right hon. Gentleman had gone to those who knew the condition of the county, he would have received advice which would have led him to act in a very different manner, and which might have tended to induce him to avoid pursuing a course which tended to bring justice into contempt in this country. He (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) regretted very much the religious feuds and animosities which existed; he had no sympathy with any of the parties, and for the life of him he could not understand why men should do evil to one another for holding different beliefs; but they must look at facts as they existed, and when there were feuds it was for the Government to prevent them from doing harm. The course, however, which the right hon. Gentleman had taken would tend to make those men be looked upon as martyrs, for it would be said they were cruelly treated, that they had been sentenced to 12 months, but 10 months had been found sufficient. And not only would they be made martyrs but heroes, for their own party would say that they had triumphed over the other party, as he understood from his hon. Friend the victory had been celebrated by some other disturbances. The present, moreover, was not a time to let men of the kind out, for there had lately been symptoms of a great desire to interfere with the freedom of speech, as, for instance, the chief magistrate of Staleybridge not long since declared that the people who came to lecture in his town ought to be mobbed out of it. Then, a man at Bolton was killed some time since at a disturbance arising out of a public meeting; while in other places where lectures were delivered riots were got up. He himself recently took part in a meeting to promote temperance, and they were attacked by drunken ruffians, and covered with flour as though they had been to the Derby. And now in this case, where there had been a ruffianly, dastardly attempt of the same description, the men guilty of it had been set free before their sentence had expired. In his opinion the course taken by his right hon. Friend in this matter had been most mischievous; and if the Motion were pressed to a division he should certainly vote for it. If not, the speech made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Percy Wyndham) would still do good service, for it would tend to prevent in the future a course calculated to foment strife, to encourage disorder, and weaken that respect for law which it should be the object of every Government to maintain.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, it has been my misfortune to have to impugn the conduct of successive Home Secretaries in the exercise of the discretion which is intrusted to them for the remission of sentences; and in doing so, I was guided by no feeling of party, for, in the first instance, I had to impugn the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) when he was Secretary of State for the Home Department. That right hon. Gentleman had commuted a capital sentence for a murder committed in Birmingham, against the remission of which I presented a Petition which was signed by 3,000 respectable inhabitants of that town and 10 magistrates. I had again to complain of the remission of a sentence in the case of a murder in my own county, and in my own neighbourhood, which remission was made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, by a strange perversion of the law, managed to commute the capital sentence into one of a year's imprisonment; but under what statute he assumed that power, I have never yet been able to discover. I am sorry to say that the right hon. Gentleman remitted a sentence for murder in the city of Coventry, and that almost immediately afterwards there was a case of manslaughter in the district; and although I do not mean to say that that crime is to be traced to the remission of the sentence, there certainly was a general these men, he saw Dennis Doyle, and he heard Dennis Doyle say—this is his sworn evidence before the magistrates—“Don’t strike him now.” And why? Because Superintendent Little had reached the spot. And what was the other evidence? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary says that Murphy had excited these men’s passions! Did they want to go into the hall to hear the lecture? No; the evidence is, that they dragged the man out of the hall, and trampled him almost to death in the street. How does that accord with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman? I have the whole of the evidence here which was given before the magistrates; but that I may not commit any mistake, I will read to the House that which was given by Superintendent Little on oath. This, then, is the evidence which was given by Superintendent Little before the magistrate as I find it reported in The Whitehaven Herald of April 29th, 1871. Superintendent Little says—

“I was on duty in the streets that night with Inspector Howard, Inspector Wood, and one or two more constables. 8 o’clock was the hour at which he was to give the lecture. I was in the street between 6 and 7 o’clock, and everything appeared very quiet and orderly at that time. Near about 7 o’clock—perhaps 10 minutes to—we observed a large number of men coming down Lowther Street. They were coming as you may have seen them coming from the train, all in a group or nearly so, and they came quietly down the street, passed the inspectors and myself, and went into the Oddfellows’ Hall quietly. After they had gone up, I spoke to one of the inspectors, and said—‘Can Mr. Murphy be in.’ He replied—‘No, I think it too soon; it is not yet 7 o’clock.’ However, after they had been in a minute or so, I said—‘He must be in, because he is checking them; they are coming back.’ Immediately we heard a yell, a cry out—‘They are murdering Murphy.’ We immediately repaired to the entrance door. At that time there was such a scene of confusion as I have not seen for some time. They were all in a crowd, and appeared as if they had got some person under their feet. When we got to the spot, I saw Mr. Murphy on the ground, face downwards, bleeding very much, and these parties round about him. As soon as I sprang in I raised my stick, and they fell back. I saw then that they seemed very much enraged, and that our only chance was to try to get Mr. Murphy taken safely back into the hall through the iron gate, and that we ought to lose no time in doing so. By that time the parties who were kicking him, rushed back into the crowd, some hundreds of people having collected round about. I thought that the man was killed outright. He was taken into the hall and carried upstairs, and I immediately sent for Dr. Lumb, who was not at home. Dr. Henry came in his stead, and, with the assistance of Dr. Horan, attended Mr. Murphy. He was very much cut about the head. They laid him on a bench in the ante-room, and he was obliged to remain there all night. A bed was provided for him; but as he was in such a prostrate state the doctors did not consider it advisable to remove him until next day, when he was taken to his lodgings. I may state that at that time I did not attempt to take any of the parties into custody, because I knew if I had done so there would have been a serious breach of the peace. I have not the least doubt that some of the men might have been armed with fire-arms. On one of the prisoners taken last night—Dennis Doyle—this loaded revolver (produced) was found in his breast, also this dagger-knife, bullet-mould, and a box of caps.”

Mr. Newdegate

That was the first time that Dennis Doyle was seen after he was known to have taken part in the outrage upon Mr. Murphy; but I have further evidence than this. These men were all identified as having been engaged in trampling Murphy to death, and upon the pavement were found a broken stick, a poker, and several stones, and upon one of the stones was some hair which seemed to have come off Murphy’s head. Sir, I hesitate not to declare that there never was a more determined attempt at murder. True, the man did not die at the time; but that which the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) has most justly impugned is the discretion of the statesman, who, within five weeks or a month after this man’s funeral, at which a disposition to renewed outrages was manifested, remits a penalty of one year’s imprisonment inflicted on the only men who had been convicted fairly as participators in the outrage from the effects of which Mr. Murphy died. Let me again assure the House, in conclusion, that I bring forward the facts to which I have referred from no vindictive feeling or animosity towards the Home Secretary; but I do, in this instance as I have been compelled before, impugn his wisdom and discretion in the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, and do declare before this House my deliberate opinion that his conduct in this particular case has produced a most evil impression with regard to the administration of justice not only in Birmingham, but throughout the county generally.

MR. HOLT said, that if it were allowed that Murphy observed some want of judgment in his method of treating the subject upon which he lectured, it should not be forgotten that opposition usually arose in cases when he quoted extracts from Roman Catholic writers, the accuracy of which had never been questioned. But however that might be, he (Mr. Holt) had yet to learn that when a man entered a hall to deliver a lecture—a hall that was engaged by himself, and which, though open to all persons, no one was compelled to enter—that he had committed an offence for which he should be punished. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had broadly asserted that no evidence existed of any conspiracy to injure Murphy; but he would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the evidence reported at the time—that Dennis Doyle, one of the prisoners, was heard to say the first thing that would be seen was "Murphy coming out from yonder top window." That was said before Murphy had entered the hall. It was likewise proved that there were wounds on Murphy's body which must have been given by a sharp-pointed instrument. And not only that, but the men were seen approaching in a body to the attack, and, generally, the evidence clearly showed a preconcerted intention to injure Murphy. The right hon. Gentleman had also said he had decided the case without reference to Murphy's death. That was precisely what was complained of. Usually sentences were remitted when circumstances came to light after the trial showing that those found guilty were less culpable than was supposed at the time; but in this case, subsequent events would have required the infliction of a more severe penalty if the sentence were interfered with at all. When the sentence was passed it was clear a brutal assault had been committed; but when the penalty was in part remitted, it was known that that brutal assault had resulted in the death of the victim. The intervention, therefore, of the right hon. Gentleman in that respect was both unjust and impolitic; for if the right hon. Gentleman had desired to show clemency there were scores of prisoners at present in gaol whose sentences were far more severe than those passed by the Chief Baron upon the assailants of Murphy, and which he might have remitted without fear of adverse criticism. Indeed, he believed that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman would lead the people to think that in the estimation of the Government killing is no murder—that if lawless men had a grudge against any person all they had to do was to collect a mob, to create a riot, and kill him in concert. Then if any fatal result should happen, and the guilty parties should be convicted, an application to the Home Secretary would obtain the remittal of their sentences. He thought that the course which had been adopted was calculated to prevent freedom of speech and action, and for that reason he should most heartily support the Motion.

DR. BREWER said, he thought hon. Members ought not to depart from the Motion under consideration; and that if it invited the House to review the judgment of a Criminal Court, he should have been unable to take any part whatever in the discussion, but he did not think that was the subject brought before them. Although he agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate) that it was the duty of the Government to afford protection to all British subjects, yet it was, in his (Dr. Brewer's) opinion, equally the duty of all members of society so to exercise their judgment as to avoid calling down upon themselves the wrath and indignation of their fellow-men. In the present instance, the Home Secretary had followed the ordinary course. If, indeed, it could be shown that the right hon. Gentleman had travelled out of the ordinary course, or had been influenced by passion or by favour, he would undoubtedly have committed a very serious offence. It appeared to him, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had been influenced neither by passion nor favour, but that he had acted in the same way as he always did when the punishment of criminals was brought under his notice.

MR. MUNTZ said, that while unable to agree with all the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), he could not but feel that this was a matter which called for serious consideration, because it involved the right of free discussion. He presumed his hon. Friend would be the last man to defend the noisy and obstreperous endeavours of Mr. Murphy to abuse the Roman Catholic religion and to annoy the believers in it; and he certainly must say that for himself (Mr. Muntz), while he was desirous of offering freedom of religion, he was not inclined to allow supremacy on one side or the other. Murphy travelled over the country delivering speeches which he neither appreciated nor was inclined to tolerate; but it should be borne in mind that other persons made speeches at the same time which were never interfered with. What he complained of, in fact, and what the House could hardly have failed to notice was that, by a singular accident, no doubt, there had been a leniency and tolerance on the one side which had not been displayed on the other. Mr. Murphy, he admitted, was a great nuisance to the town he had the honour to represent, and to the neighbouring constituencies; but, still, he was a subject of the Crown, and had a right to protection during a free discussion. Some of Mr. Murphy's statements had reference to a work entitled The Confessional Unmasked. Now, he had had the misfortune to read that work, which was once published in The Times. It appeared there in Latin, or otherwise that paper would have been liable to an indictment for a disgusting exhibition. Since then it had been translated by Murphy into English, and he had read extracts from it, in indecorous language, all over the country. For his own part, he did not justify this for a moment; but the book, translated into plain English, was sold at the same time in the streets of London, and no attempt was made to punish the persons who sold it daily.

MR. BRUCE remarked that persons had been prosecuted and punished for selling the work. In fact, there was a man now undergoing imprisonment for this very offence.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was very glad to hear that such was the case. On many occasions persons had been interfered with for distributing lottery tickets; but there was a lottery in Dublin which sent round tickets every year, which many Members of that House received, but he never heard of any prosecution being instituted. He wanted to secure fair and equal play for all parties. Those men who attacked Mr. Murphy in such a brutal manner were certainly not deserving of clemency, and such persons should not only be punished, but their punishment should be carried out.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it was a great blessing that the exercise of mercy was entrusted to a responsible Minister of the Crown, and not to the House of Commons. In his judgment, therefore, it was a very grave matter for the House to interfere in the way of censure with any act done by that officer of the Crown; and, unless there was reason to believe there had been some corrupt motive, or great carelessness, or an amount of ignorance in the matter that would be clearly blameable, he, for one, would be very shy in taking part in so grave a matter as passing a Vote of Censure on the right hon. Gentleman's conduct. He could not see, for instance, that any blame attached to the right hon. Gentleman for taking the opinion of the Judge, for he did not believe the right hon. Gentleman took it with a view of shielding himself from any responsibility, but solely with an honest intention to ascertain in the best manner the facts on which the sentence was passed; indeed, he should be almost inclined to say that the right hon. Gentleman would have been blameable if he had not availed himself of every means in his power to obtain the real facts of the case. The right hon. Gentleman had, he might say, a dreadful office to execute in dispensing the mercy of the Crown, and in the present case he certainly could not concur in the proposed censure of his conduct.

Mr. Muntz

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POLLING-PLACES (SCOTLAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. M'LAREN, in moving for an Address for Returns respecting Polling-Places in Scotland, said, he was surprised to find that it was the intention of the Government to oppose the Motion. He had always understood that it was the privilege of hon. Members of that House to be supplied with any useful information which might be obtained without incurring any very great expense; and in that view, the Return for which he had asked would only have occupied 30 lines, or half-a-sheet of paper, and it could not, therefore, lead to any great expense; while as to the use of the Return, he might state that when it was proposed by the Ballot Bill which had now left that House to exclude Scotch counties from the operation of the provision with respect to polling-places, he with other hon. Members objected, being satisfied that if the House could be made acquainted with the real facts as regarded the large area of Scotch counties, the small number of polling-places, and the almost insuperable difficulties which parties had to encounter in getting to them from great distances—even requiring steamboats sailing among islands—they would see that neither in England nor in Ireland was it so necessary to make an alteration in the law as it was in the Highland counties. However, the information which he had hoped to obtain in an official form he had obtained for himself in spite of the opposition of the Government, and he would inform the House of some of the results.

	Area.	Electors to 50 sq. m.
Orkney and Shetland	1,545	1,500	50
Argyllshire ..	3,250	2,900	42
Inverness.. ..	4,200	1,600	20
Ross and Cromarty	3,100	1,500	25

Why, if that number of electors was thought too small, they might have increased the area; but as the Bill stood now, the House would hardly believe that in one of these three counties there was only one polling-place for 600 square miles; in another, a polling-place for every 700 square miles, and in the third a polling-place for nearly 800 square miles. Yet the House refused a proposal for the benefit of the electors of these Highland counties. Whether it might interfere with aristocratic arrangements, or displace the aristocratic power existing in these counties, was a question which he held they had nothing to do with. What they had to do with was the convenience of the electors. It was for that purpose that the Bill to which he had referred was brought into that House; but he held it was utterly impossible in some of these counties for any independent candidate to start, who did not come forward under the wing of great aristocratic landlords. If that sort of thing was to be put an end to in other parts of the country, he did not see why it should be retained in the Highland districts. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Address for Returns.

MR. CANDLISH seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Return respecting the counties, divisions of counties, and combined counties in Scotland which severally return a Member to Parliament, showing, as far as can be given, the population of each, the area in square miles, the number of electors, the number of polling places at last election, the average number of electors to each polling place, the average number of square miles to each polling place, and the number of electors who at last election polled at each polling place, the two divisions of a county recently made for the purpose of returning a Member each for each division to be bracketed together and treated as an original county for the calculation of this Return, and the number of square miles in each county to be taken from the 'Edinburgh Almanac,' or any other authentic source,"—(Mr. M'Laren,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CRAUFURD objected to the Motion because he was opposed to the practice of allowing hon. Members of the House to ask Departments of the State to occupy their time in gathering information which could be easily obtained in the Library. Why was the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) to encumber the clerks of the House, who had plenty to do already, by getting them to furnish him with Returns which were most expensive, and were in reality quite valueless? The real object of this Motion was to bolster up an argument which had already been unsuccessfully urged, having been defeated on a division by the majority of Scotch Members, who believed that the present system was sufficiently elastic to admit of what was really required being done. He hoped that the Government would not accede to the Motion.

MR. BRUCE thought that, as a rule, the Department over which he presided was rather open to censure, not for being too unwilling to grant Returns, but for the opposite fault of acceding to Motions of this character too readily. When Returns were moved for where the facts were not within official cognizance, but were contained in certain books of authority open to everybody—as in this case had been proved by the hon. Gentleman's own statement—he did not see the propriety of giving the Return. It was different where the information could be had only from the Department, and he should have no objection to give a Return of the number of polling-places at the last Election, and the number of electors polled at each.

MR. CANDLISH thought this a very small matter to be refused by the Home Office. Thirty shillings would cover the whole expense, and the utility of the Return would be unquestionable.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he was surprised to hear the Home Secretary refuse to supply a Return which was in itself reasonable, and would be attended with very trifling expense. As to the purpose for which the Return was to be used, it did not appear to him that was any business of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd).

MR. GORDON thought that the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) was quite entitled to get the Return he asked for. It was quite clear that the printing of the Return would not cost more than £1 or £1 10s.; and there were various officers receiving salaries in the counties who could easily get up the information required.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he would certainly not be a party to withhold any information from the House which was in the possession of the Government or in the possession of any public Department in the control of the Government. In such a case, he should be happy to afford any hon. Member such assistance as he could desire. But in this case the information sought was not in any respect within the control of the Government. He agreed that the purpose for which information might be required by the party asking it could not be considered a reason for withholding it. It was quite sufficient that the information sought should be of a character as to render it available for public purposes. His objection to this Return was that the hon. Member was not asking for information at all which was within the possession of the Government, or within the control of the Government. Everyone knew that although the hon. Member ostensibly asked for a Return in the ordinary form, he was really asking the Government to employ its officers in obtaining information from sources open to all—such as The Edinburgh Almanac and Cyclopædias—and to manipulate the information thus obtained into such a form as would suit his own views. Now that, he confessed, appeared to him altogether objectionable in principle. To ask for papers or documents within the control of the Government was one thing; but it was quite another to ask the Government to find official clerks and other persons to extract information out of The Edinburgh Almanac and The Cyclopædia, and put it into a tabulated and printed form, in order that an hon. Member might have it in that form in his hand. No doubt if the information was to be gathered in that way the Return would not cost more than 20s. or 25s.; but the hon. Member could do that for himself, without putting the country to any expense; but if he wanted official information there must be a survey and an unknown expenditure. For these reasons, he must oppose the Motion.

Mr. Bruce

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £26,402, to complete the sum for the Department of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £26,397, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and Subordinate Department."

MR. BOWRING said, he wished to take occasion to call attention to the increase of the salary of the Registrar of the Privy Council from £1,300 to £1,500 a-year, which it appeared from a foot-note was only to be a temporary arrangement lasting for three years, a clerk being also appointed under him for the same limited period. Now, what he objected to was not so much the amount of the salary to be given to a highly deserving officer, as the novel principle involved in the mode of remuneration for a specified period to which he referred, and he should like to be told the reason for the course adopted. When the Board of Trade Estimates came on he should have to remark upon a similar case, where an appointment stated to be for 18 months only, and agreed to by Parliament on that understanding, had been forthwith converted into a permanent appointment.

MR. BAXTER said, the increase of salary had been granted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in consequence of the recommendations of the Privy Council, founded upon any increase in the work to be done.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he should like to know why the period of three years had been fixed upon? Who could tell whether the extra duties for which the increase of salary was given, would come to an end at the expiration of that time?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped, unless some more satisfactory explanation were furnished on the point, the Committee would decide against it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER pointed out that the reason why the salary was fixed for three years was, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was at present in a transition state, and that it was also very much encumbered with appeals. It was expected that those appeals would be got rid of at the end of three years, and that there would then be some change. Under those circumstances, it had been deemed to be the best course to reserve the question as to what should be the permanent salary of some of the officers.

MR. LIDDELL remarked that the change referred to depended on the passing of a very important Act of Parliament, and contended that the mode of fixing the salaries of the officials adopted by the Government was not satisfactory.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS asked whether the Registrar was bound to devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office for £1,300 per annum? If he was, he could be given £200 a-year for part of his holiday being taken away.

MR. RYLANDS said, he must object to grants, amounting to £1,200 per annum, being given to the officials, as it seemed to him that some influential person was being very liberal at the public expense. He would move to reduce this portion of the Vote by £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £26,197, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and Subordinate Department." —(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. CANDLISH hoped the Amendment of the hon. Member for Warrington would be withdrawn. He objected to the Vote of £1,950 for incidental expenses, and would move its reduction.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that in order to allay the alarm that existed last year of the danger of cholera visiting this country in the summer and autumn, it was found necessary to make provision in the event of its visiting this country. That course had been again followed, and it did not follow that because the money was voted it must be spent. It was to be hoped that the money would not be wanted.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought the Estimates applied to the coming year, and not to the past.

MR. BAXTER said, the Estimate was for the current year. The Treasury had cut down the Vote, thinking the cholera was not so near as the Department imagined, but still it was only safe to take a Vote. With regard to the personal allowances, they had been adopted as an economical measure, for the Department had been reorganized, and instead of advancing the salaries, these personal allowances had been given.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY pointed out that such personal allowances were very common in all mercantile establishments.

MR. MUNTZ thought that few vessels coming from Russia went to Liverpool. Bristol and Cardiff were as likely to take the cholera as Liverpool.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, there was no rule as to the resort of particular ships to particular ports. He had often taken exception on this Vote, but would not do so now, as the Department had taken a great deal of trouble, and incurred considerable expense, in order to satisfy the public in reference to the prevention of cholera.

MR. CANDLISH complained that the application of the money would be partial. It was to meet cases arising in London, Liverpool, and Cardiff; but in Hull, Newcastle, Sunderland, and other ports, there would be probably as much need for it as the places named. He, therefore, wished to know why, up to the present time, the money had been expended in so partial a manner, instead of being applied to all the ports at which danger might arise?

MR. D. DALRYMPLE denied that there had been any partial application of the funds, and strongly deprecated the mischievous and dangerous parsimony involved in the proposal of the hon. Member for Sunderland.

MR. M'LAREN objected to the proposal to make provision in the shape of personal allowances for three years in advance. Let Her Majesty's Government provide for the current year, and leave the future to be arranged for by the Government in office.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, that the conversation that had taken place was an illustration of the extreme inconvenience of placing under the Privy Council functions so entirely diverse as judicial functions, quarantine, and the veterinary department, and he expressed a hope that the time would come when the Privy Council duties would be confined to one department. He was surprised to find so large a Vote for quarantine, though he was aware that in some ports, especially Liverpool, great alarm appeared to prevail on the subject.

MR. BAXTER said, there was not the slightest intention of expending the money, unless it was absolutely necessary to do so. The necessity of taking the Vote arose from the fact that the Treasury had been warned by an authority that they dared not disregard that there was danger of cholera this year. If that were to be so, the Government had been greatly to blame for not having taken a Vote in anticipation with which to take the requisite precautions. The Treasury had power to alter the destination of the money, or any portion of it, according as the necessity arose.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked for an explanation of an item in the Vote for auxiliary scientific investigations concerning the causes and processes of disease.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was true that the State interference in questions affecting the health of the country was by the Act of last year divided between the Local Government Board and the Privy Council; but it had been thought best, for the present year at least, to include in the Civil Service Estimates the Vote for scientific investigations concerning the progress of diseases.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he wished for some explanation with regard to the item for the Veterinary department of the Privy Council. Whenever a temporary emergency arose, the House was always ready to vote whatever money was required to meet it; but, unfortunately, when the temporary emergency passed away, there was a tendency to make the provision permanent. When Providence removed the cattle plague, Providence did not remove Mr. Williams with it, and relegate him to another office. It had been thought necessary to make provision for him where he was, and his department was rendered permanent for him in the Privy Council, there he remained till the present time, and would remain till eternity, unless the Committee did something in the matter. Mr. Williams had a salary of £1,000 per annum for presiding over this Veterinary department, and there was a large staff, with inspectors, clerks, and temporary clerks. It was true the foot-and-mouth disease, after the cattle plague disappeared, was prevalent in the country; but it did not require the perpetual interference of the Privy Council and the permanent establishment of a Veterinary department, besides great expenses in every county, in the way of inspection, connected with this department. The importation of diseased foreign cattle might be prevented by local officers at the ports. He therefore asked the Committee to consider whether it was necessary to maintain this central department; and he must state that if such a department was required, it seemed proper that subjects of this kind should be dealt with by the Local Government Board. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would explain why this subject should be dealt with at all by the Privy Council Office; and, if so, why so large a staff of officers was permanently employed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the only answer he could make to the first question was, that he found this department at the Privy Council Office when he went there; but he should be glad if it could be removed, for the change would relieve him from much work; although he supposed it would then fall upon some other Minister, so that little public advantage would result from the alteration. Probably the department was originally placed at the Privy Council Office because the Orders in Council were there issued. The right hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken in supposing that with the present Acts of Parliament, and the expectations of the country, the department could be conducted at smaller expense, because a great deal of hard work was done in the office, and the salaries were carefully examined. During the cattle plague the expenditure was enormously larger than at present; but at that time the country got frightened, and thought it necessary that cattle diseases should be guarded against in future. The duties of the department related to the carrying into effect of those views. There might be some doubt as to whether any trade should be interfered with; but Parliament having decided to interfere with the importation of food, its wishes could not be enforced without a central department, and that department had very grave and onerous duties to discharge. For instance, until the completion of the Deptford Cattle Market, a cordon had to be maintained around the City of London. It would not be sufficient to employ local officers, and Parliament had no justification for requiring a department to perform duties if it did not provide adequate means for the purpose. The House had passed an Act to check home diseases, and if the right hon. Gentleman thought it should be repealed, he ought to move to that effect. But the Act related not only to the foot-and-mouth disease, but to the fatal disease of pleuro-pneumonia. He was glad to say that the House had been pleased also to try to make better regulations for the transit of cattle, and Parliament could not refuse to pay clerks to apply these provisions. He believed the Office was managed economically, and that the clerks in it performed their duties as efficiently and received as little pay as the officials in any other department.

Mr. Candlish

MR. WHITWELL asked for explanations respecting the personal allowances paid to individual officers.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE thought that without having veterinary inspectors and an organized staff, with competent authorities to decide whether animals were diseased or not, it was quite idle to pass such Acts of Parliament at all.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY thought that a more useless body than the inspectors of foot-and-mouth disease could not exist, and regarded the London superintendents as an equally useless body. A penalty on anyone caught driving diseased cattle on public roads, enforced by Justices, would be quite sufficient, and save every county great annual and useless expense.

MR. W. E. FORSTER submitted that it was impossible for the Government to constantly interfere with the cattle trade without they had the advice of some scientific persons, whose services they could not secure without they were adequately remunerated.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he would remind the right hon. Baronet that both sides of the House had forced the Government to take steps to prevent the importation of cattle disease, and that therefore they ought not to refuse now to pay the necessary expenses resulting from the course they had adopted.

COLONEL CORBETT supported the Vote, on the ground that it would be unwise to scrutinize too carefully the means that were adopted to prevent the importation of cattle disease into this country.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS asked, and repeated the question, whether the Registrar of the Privy Council, like a County Court Judge, undertook, on his appointment, to give his whole time to the duties of the office?

MR. LIDDELL said, he also thought it desirable to check the increase of the staff of the Department, but was willing to leave the matter to its discretion. There was, however, great danger in the accumulation of work on certain individuals. The Department ought to see that each individual had such an amount of work as he could perform properly, and not to give him more than he was able to do. The concentration of work on one individual, and asking him to do more than he was capable of doing, was a false economy.

MR. BAXTER said, no doubt the understanding was the Registrar was to give his whole time for the salary; but additional duties had since been imposed upon him, and that was a reason for increasing his pay.

MR. MONK said, the explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury was unsatisfactory, and he hoped the hon.

Member for Warrington would divide the Committee.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN asked whether the Registrar had at first too little to do, or now had too much to do?

DR. BREWER said, there was not an officer in the metropolis whose salary was not raised with the increase of duty.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, with regard to the Registrar, he was quite certain that an official of equal efficiency could not be obtained without the payment of a large salary. It should also be borne in mind that considerable additions had been made to the work performed by this gentleman.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK deprecated what looked like a personal attack on the Registrar.

MR. RYLANDS repudiated any intention to make a personal attack, and, while willing not to press the Amendment, would leave it to be disposed of by the Committee.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 28; Noes 74: Majority 46.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

LOCOMOTIVES ON ROADS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CAWLEY, Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the use of Locomotives on Turnpike and other Roads, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CAWLEY, Mr. HICK, and Mr. PENDER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 180.]

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL.

On Motion of The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Council, under "The Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1860," extending the time for completing Tramways in the borough of Cork, ordered to be brought in by The Marquess of HARTINGTON and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 181.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock till Monday next.

Mr. Monk

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 3rd June, 1872.

MINUTES.] — Took the Oath — The Earl of Belmore.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental* (121); Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (122).

Second Reading—Statute Law Revision* (107); Prisons (Ireland)* (108); Isle of Man Harbours* [83].

Select Committee—Gas and Water Orders Confirmation* [101], nominated.

Third Reading—Metropolis (Kilburn and Harrow) Roads* (94), and passed.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Further correspondence with the Government of Canada, and correspondence with the Governments of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, respecting the Treaty of Washington (in continuation of Paper presented May 1872): Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

Draft of Article proposed by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the United States, 10th May 1872: Presented (by command), and to be printed.—North America (No. 8., 1872.)

ARMY—BAND OF THE GRENADIER GUARDS.—QUESTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HERTFORD rose to put a Question to the noble Marquess the Under Secretary of State for the War Department (the Marquess of Lansdowne). As the circumstance to which the Question related admitted of no delay, he had not been able to give the usual Notice; but he had written that morning to the noble Marquess, so that he might be in a position to inform their Lordships what he intended to do, and he had also thought it his duty to apprise His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief of that intention. Their Lordships were probably aware that there were seven battalions of Guards, of which four were stationed in London. These had only three bands. Now, he was given to understand that on Thursday last the Adjutant General received orders from the War Office to cause one of the bands to proceed to Liverpool to-morrow on duty, in order to embark next morning for the United States. The Adjutant General thereupon wrote to the Officer commanding the Home District, His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, directing him to send the band of the Grenadier Guards—one of the three bands to which he had referred—immediately to Liverpool. The order had been accordingly given, and the band was to embark on Wednesday morning at Liverpool, in order to proceed to Boston, to take part in what was called the “World’s Peace Jubilee and International Musical Festival.” He was further informed that an officer had been ordered to go out in the same ship to take charge of the band. He only hoped that this gallant officer had great experience, tact, and judgment, for he could not conceive a more delicate office than that which he would have to perform. He was also in a position to state that the bandmaster of the Grenadier Guards, Mr. Godfrey, had actually received £1,000 for the purpose of paying the passage money of the officer and men. Mr. Godfrey was also to receive at the rate of £600 per week while the party was out, and each bandsman would receive £40 when he came back. He was also told—but of this he had no means of judging—that, the band not being of sufficient strength, in order to bring it up to the proper number certain civilians were to go out as members of it, dressed in the band uniform of Her Majesty’s Regiment of Grenadier Guards. Now, what power would the unfortunate officer have over this band? It seemed to him that this was one of the most singular proceedings ever taken. It was extraordinary in every way; for the order was given from the War Office—at least he believed so—without the previous sanction of Her Majesty, or of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, or of the Colonel commanding the regiment. He granted that the information on which he acted stated that the sanction of the Sovereign had been obtained subsequently; but his position was that such an order ought never to have been given by a Civilian War Minister without the previous sanction of Her Majesty. Most heartily did he, for one, regret that such an order had been given. If a civilian could order out one of Her Majesty’s bands, equally well might he send out one of the battalions of the Guards without any reference to the Queen’s pleasure or comfort. He would not make any allusion to the instruments being the property of the officers, because some change had been made at the time of the Crimean War with which he was not exactly acquainted; but his impression was, that before that time they belonged to the officers. The Colonel, he believed, paid £150 or £200 a-year, and the officers supplemented that sum to a certain amount both for the purpose of providing instruments and band’s clothing. That was a strong reason why the Secretary of War should have consulted the officers of the Regiment, through their Colonel, before giving the order. The Officers of the Guards were very much averse to the proceeding, and he believed it would give them the greatest satisfaction if it were countermanded; but, unfortunately, we lived in days when everyone gave way in everything, and nobody stood up for anything. In nine cases out of ten judgment was now allowed to go by default. He hoped it would not be so in this instance, but that a voice of indignation would be raised against this unheard-of outrage. This money which was to be paid to the band could not be paid by the United States Government; therefore, probably the request came at the instance of some advertiser—some Barnum—who, to have the pleasure of showing off the band of Her Majesty’s Grenadier Guards, was willing to pay them out of his own pocket, at so much per head. He concluded by asking, If it was true that such an order had been issued by the Secretary of State for War before Her Majesty’s sanction had been received, or without the consent of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, or that of the Colonel of the Regiment?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that if the statement with which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hertford) had prefaced his Question were accurate, he would concur with him as to the demoralization of the times; but he must give an emphatic denial to two or three of the allegations contained in that statement. It was quite true that in consequence of a request made through the Foreign Office, conveyed through the Secretary of the American Legation in London, permission had been given to the persons conducting the arrangements for the forthcoming musical Festival at Boston to engage the band of the Grenadier Guards for the purpose of taking part in the musical arrangements. The correspondence on the subject had been entered into as long back as September last; but before any order was given for the bandsmen to proceed to Liverpool the War Office had received the sanction of Her Majesty, obtained on the submission of His Royal Highness Commanding-in-Chief. The noble Marquess was mistaken in supposing that any civilians were to go in the band, and to be dressed in the uniform of the regiment. The men were to leave tomorrow; and it was true that they were to proceed to the United States in charge of an officer.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the answer of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) was one of the most unsatisfactory statements he had ever heard;—and he had not answered two or three of the principal points made by his noble Friend who introduced the subject. He understood the noble Marquess to say that on the application of the Secretary of the American Legation, made through the Foreign Office in London, some persons were permitted to engage the band to go to America. To “engage”—that was his word—that meant that leave had been given to American speculators who were desirous of getting up a “World’s Peace Jubilee and International Musical Festival,” to enter into engagements with the band of one of Her Majesty’s Household Regiments. The noble Marquess did not deny that, and therefore it would be assumed to be the case. He wished to know whether persons had come from the United States of America wishing to enter into an arrangement with, and to engage the services of, the band, and were permitted to do so before the sanction of Her Majesty had been obtained? He took it from the statement of the noble Marquess that it was so, and he ventured to say that a more irregular proceeding never took place, and that a more irregular proceeding never was sanctioned by the Secretary of State for War. The most essential part of the Question had been left untouched, and that was how discipline was to be maintained when the band went to America; because bandsmen were liable, like other people, to indulge in intoxicating liquors. Had the officer any instructions given to him to whom was he to apply when he went to America, and under whose orders was he to place himself? He (the Duke of Richmond) hoped not under the orders of the person getting up this “World’s Peace Jubilee and International Musical Festival.” If so, it was very derogatory for an officer of Her Majesty’s Army to be employed in connection with a musical troupe.

The Marquess of Lansdowne

EARL GRANVILLE must say that the experience of the Government was not that judgment in their favour was allowed to go by default. He thought the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) had much exaggerated the facts of this case. The proceeding complained of was not one without precedent. He himself had before now joined with other “speculators” in inviting the military bands of foreign Governments to visit us, and he had never found the proceeding other than productive of good feeling. These bands came under the command of officers, had been cordially received, had behaved admirably, and their performance had given a great deal of pleasure to English audiences. He was informed that military bands of three or four of the greatest countries in Europe—including, he believed, bands from Austria, Russia, and Prussia, but he was not sure as to these particular nations—were going to this Musical Festival at Boston, on exactly the same terms as those on which the band of the Grenadier Guards would go over. He was informed also by a noble Friend behind him that the band of the 71st Regiment of the Line had gone to America before now, had been cordially received there, and had in no way misconducted themselves. He must say that he did not think this was a moment for the House of Lords to show any grudging ill-will towards a country with which we might at present have some difference, but in relation to which we were desirous of standing on the best and most friendly footing.

LORD DE ROS thought that on grounds of discipline the arrangement to which the War Office had given its sanction ought not to have been made.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE observed that all the objections made to the permission given to the band to go to Boston would apply to any removal of a band from the regiment to which it belonged.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
 TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
 THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
 THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.
 OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, although the time is past for reading the Orders of the Day, I am sure your Lordships will excuse me if I say something with reference to a conversation which took place at our last meeting with regard to the negotiations between this country and the United States. At that time I certainly was in the hope—or possibly under the apprehension—that I should be in a position to give your Lordships a final statement on the subject either to-night or in the beginning of the week. My Lords, this is not the case. Communications are still continuing. We have arrived at no final result; and the only fact of any importance I can give to your Lordships is one of which I believe your Lordships are already aware—namely, that Sir Edward Thornton has informed us that Congress has postponed its adjournment to this day week. Without knowing the reasons, I think we have a right to infer that this evinces a desire to remove obstacles to some possible arrangement. As to that possible arrangement I can give your Lordships no assurance whatever. In this position of affairs my lips are as much sealed as they were the other day, except as to some misapprehensions which evidently were in the minds of some of your Lordships on Friday last; and I have obtained the sanction of my Colleagues to make an explanation in regard to those points which do not involve in any way and will not complicate the negotiations now going on. I understood the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) to state that the declaration I made just before the Whitsuntide Recess had allayed the anxiety of the public.

EARL GREY: No—I referred to the speech of my noble Friend on the Address.

EARL GRANVILLE: I certainly misunderstood my noble Friend. I may be allowed to state publicly what I have already said to him in private, that I was hardly ever more gratified than I was by a short letter which I received from the noble Earl at the Table (Earl Russell) after the Supplementary Article had been published, couched in terms of his old and usual kindness to me, and expressing his satisfaction at what had been done. It appears that since that time certain things have happened which some of your Lordships think have tended to weaken what confidence you might have had in the course which the Government would take. These facts were of a different character. One was the publication of certain Papers which we had refused to the House, and which, though of a confidential character, were published in the United States. I can say for myself that, for obvious reasons, no one regretted more than I did the publication of those Papers; but in regard to it I heard afterwards that some of your Lordships believed that publication to be an act of the United States Government. Now, Sir Edward Thornton had informed me that those Papers were obtained surreptitiously by one of the New York newspapers; and the United States Minister, General Schenck, has since informed me that he believed they were not published with the privity or sanction of the President, the Senate, or the Secretary of State, but that the publication was due to the “enterprise”—he prefers to use no stronger term—of the proprietor or editor of a New York paper. Another point was that by that publication your Lordships were made aware of the Article which Her Majesty’s Government had stated their willingness to adopt. Some of your Lordships thought the Article was weak in itself, and you were much alarmed lest it had been further modified and weakened by the United States Government; and you felt some apprehension that Her Majesty’s Government would make some compromise, and would yield to an Article of a less sufficient character. Now, with regard to that Article, the noble and learned Lord behind me (Lord Westbury), in some observations which I am sure your Lordships will not have forgotten, advised me to consult our professional Advisers on questions connected with it. My Lords, we were in full possession of the opinion of our professional Advisers; but I thought out of abundant caution I would submit exactly the words of the noble and learned Lord to the Law Officers; and I can only state that the opinion of the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and Dr. Deane, entirely concurred in not only by my noble and learned Friend on the Wool-sack but by Sir Roundell Palmer, our counsel in the case, is entirely satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government.

LORD CAIRNS: What is satisfactory to the Government?

EARL GRANVILLE: Their opinion. Then with regard to Her Majesty's Government being in danger of agreeing to some compromise that would further weaken the Supplementary Article, the public is under a misapprehension as to that part of the case. With regard to the operative part of the Article, so far as it has to do with the Indirect Claims, the American Government have not in the slightest degree proposed or endeavoured to modify that operative clause, and we have no reason to believe there is any difference of opinion between that Government and our own on that point. The noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) observed with regard to the correspondence which has been surreptitiously published—and I am not surprised at his being struck with the circumstance—that there are passages in that correspondence which show that Mr. Fish maintains the existence of the Indirect Claims before the Tribunal. Though it is not quite regular, I will ask your Lordships to read a record which I have made, and which I have shown to General Schenck, and which has been approved by him, of a conversation I had with him in consequence of what was thrown out by the noble and learned Lord—

“I have spoken to General Schenck as to the annoyance which has been felt in and out of Parliament at the publication in the United States of the papers submitted to the Senate in their Secret Session.

“I told him that, for obvious reasons, I much regretted it, but that I believed that it was no act of the Government of the United States.

“Sir E. Thornton had informed me that these papers had been surreptitiously obtained.

“General Schenck told me that he believed that the Government of the United States had not, through any of its Departments—the President, the Senate, or the Secretary of State—been a party to the publication of that correspondence. It appeared to have got out surreptitiously through the enterprise (if it may be called by so innocent a name) of the newspapers.

“I have also spoken to General Schenck, and alluded to the unfavourable impression which has been created by certain passages in that correspondence, wherein Mr. Fish declares the determination of the President to maintain the Indirect Claims before the Tribunal of Geneva. I told General Schenck that from the various conversations which I have held with him, and from his written communications, I have been led to believe that the position of the United States was this:—

Earl Granville

“The President held that the Indirect Claims were admissible under the Treaty; that the Treaty was made and ratified in that sense; and that, therefore, although he might by interchange of notes or otherwise agree not to press for compensation for those claims, yet, as being within the scope of the Treaty, it was not in his power to withdraw them—that could only be done by the exercise of the full Treaty-making Power, including the concurrence of the Senate; that it was for this purpose that the President preferred, instead of an interchange of notes, that Her Majesty's Government should adopt a Supplementary Article, which for some sufficient consideration might enable the Government of the United States to declare that they would make no claim for such losses, and that the Arbitrators would thereby be prevented from entertaining these Indirect Claims.

“General Schenck informed me that he agreed with me in my construction of what had passed, and I have submitted to him this report of our conversation.”

I trust, as far as that goes, my explanation may be satisfactory to your Lordships. The point of difference which now exists between the two Governments is not with regard to the operative clause of this Supplementary Article, but with regard to the exact extent of the engagement by which both parties bind themselves for the future. That being the point of difference, I do not know whether we shall come to an understanding or not; but I see no reason why we should not. I am aware there are some difficulties at this moment as to the forms of procedure; but I am advised that, supposing we come to a substantial agreement on the subject, those difficulties may be overcome. With regard to the declaration with which I certainly understood my noble Friend (Earl Grey), for once in his life, to be satisfied, what I have to say is that Her Majesty's Government from the very first day we met determined it was impossible that these Indirect Claims should be submitted for arbitration. I adhere to that declaration, and I am willing to repeat it in any form your Lordships may desire.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, with regard to the Notice which I put on the Paper for to-morrow—namely, that an Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the Arbitrators be suspended till the Indirect Claims have been withdrawn—I must say it appears to me that we have come to a stage in these discussions when it is necessary that the words used should not only be enough to satisfy the Law Officers, whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic, but should be clear and open to but one interpretation. It is with that impression on my mind I must say that, though I was originally satisfied with what I saw in the papers as to the terms of the Supplemental Article, yet I found afterwards by the correspondence published in the The New York Herald that I had misunderstood that Article—that it could be taken in a different sense from that which I at first supposed it to bear, and that it would not be satisfactory in the way in which it was understood. I was also convinced by those letters addressed by the Secretary of State for the United States to the Minister of his Government in London that there were ways of evading the apparent sense of that Article. Any one of the Arbitrators might say—"There are on the table certain Indirect Claims, of which the Arbitrators are in possession, and of which they have been declared to be in possession by the accredited organ of the United States Government, and it is necessary we should take those Claims into consideration, together with all that is contained in the Case of the United States." This is a danger so great that it appears to me nothing but an explicit declaration that those Claims are withdrawn can be satisfactory. It appears to me that if the proposal of my noble Friend can be adopted by Treaty, there is no reason why a new Treaty should not be framed; and in that Treaty it should be expressly provided that none of these Indirect Claims, which are sufficiently defined by Mr. Fish and my noble Friend, should be produced before the Arbitrators. Having this impression on my mind, I shall certainly proceed with my Motion to-morrow and take the sense of the House on it.

EARL GRANVILLE: I wish to ask my noble Friend whether he will proceed with the Motion which he placed on the Paper before the Recess, or one for Correspondence, of which he gave me Notice by letter this afternoon?

EARL RUSSELL: I shall proceed with the Motion which I placed on the Paper before the Recess.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, I cannot help thinking that the course taken by Her Majesty's Government on this very important question is somewhat unusual and very inconvenient. Up to the present time the language held by the noble Earl opposite has been this—he has deprecated in the strongest way any discussion on the subject of the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States; he has deprecated any reference to the points in dispute, and, indeed, to any specification of what the points in dispute were. Nay, more—on Friday evening, when the noble Earl was requested to lay on the Table the text of the Supplemental Article which he had proposed to the United States Government, he declined to do so, although—if I am not misinformed—the ordinary sources of information—the journals of the metropolis, one or more of them, had received copies of that Article, and had stated that they had received them from the Foreign Office. It seems strange, if that be so, that your Lordships should not be allowed to have on your Table the text of the Supplemental Article which had been so dealt with. But a further move has been made this evening. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) comes down to your Lordships' House, and no doubt anxious to give every information in his power, he has gone beyond anything he did up to this time. He has not only referred to the Supplemental Article, but he has stated the points of difference in respect to it, and has endeavoured to calm your Lordships' apprehensions by the statement that the Law Officers of the Crown have given an Opinion which is perfectly satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government. I am at a loss to conceive what was satisfactory. I asked him whether it was the Opinion? and he said it was. I have no doubt the Opinion is satisfactory to the Government. What, however, we want to know is, not whether the Opinion of the Law Officers is satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government, but whether the terms of the Article under negotiation are satisfactory to the people of this country. Then the noble Earl goes further. He reads an extract from a despatch recounting the statements made in a conversation between him and General Shenck—statements which relate to the construction of a document which the noble Earl will not allow us to see. That being the state of things, I think the time is come when we should no longer hear comments made by the noble Earl on his view of what the Article is, but when we should be free to look for ourselves and express for ourselves our view on the propriety and expediency of that Article. I, for one, do not scruple to say that I look on the Article in the form proposed as so unsatisfactory and so pregnant with elements of danger, and so inconvenient in the future, that a source to me of the greatest alarm is the probability of that Article being adopted in the form proposed by the noble Earl. The sooner we discuss that question the better; and I rejoice that the noble Earl (Earl Russell), by persevering with his Motion to-morrow night, will give us an opportunity of expressing freely and openly what is our opinion of the Article. That must be decided, not by statements as to what the Opinion of the Law Officers is, but by the common sense construction to be put on such English words as occur in the Article—for all the words in it are not English—and therefore I rejoice at the opportunity which the noble Earl will afford us.

LORD WESTBURY: I want to point out a misapprehension on the part of the noble Earl (Earl Granville). I do not want the Opinion of the Law Officers; but I should like to see the Case. I will not stop now to point out how entirely the noble Earl—from my fault, no doubt—has misapprehended the difficulties which presented themselves to my mind; but, as he now seems to be desirous of sheltering himself under the Law Officers, I should like to have an opportunity of seeing how far the shield is likely to be an effectual protection. I do not want to see the Opinion, I want to see the Case.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) says there is something unusual in the course I have taken; but I do not think I am at all to blame in the matter. Your Lordships will see that I am placed in great difficulty. I doubt whether in any foreign affair, or in any great international question, any Minister was ever more cross-examined than I have been in this, notwithstanding my statements that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government it was impossible to give the explanations required. I say this while acknowledging that the general forbearance of the House has been remarkable. I think—if as a layman I may be allowed to say so—there is the greatest inconvenience during diplomatic negotiations in the utterance of extra-judicial opinions by noble and learned Lords of great weight, and which opinions neither the people of this country or the people of America understand to be very different from judgments given in a different way. In the speech of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns)—his speech of last year, which augmented his fame to a considerable degree—he gave an opinion as to the construction of a particular Article in the Treaty; but I beg to remind your Lordships of the circumstance of the case. After a challenge by the noble Earl, I stated what was my view of the construction of the Treaty. I think that statement, coming from the Minister of the Crown who was responsible for the Treaty just concluded, was one of considerable weight and authority. I went on, yielding to the temptation to which we all too often yield, and made a sort of ad hominem attack on the noble Earl opposite, the late Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I said his Treaty did not exclude the Indirect Claims. What happened then? The noble and learned Lord got up and said he entirely agreed with me.

Lord Cairns

LORD CAIRNS: No, no.

EARL GRANVILLE: The report may be wrong. If I am not mistaken, I stated that the Stanley-Johnson Treaty did not exclude those Claims, but ours did. Thereupon the noble and learned Lord said that ours did not exclude them any more than the Stanley-Johnson Treaty. I believe we were both wrong. But if the Stanley-Johnson Treaty did exclude them, it was no depreciation of our Treaty to say that it did not exclude them more than the former Treaty had. But if he meant that he condemned them both alike, when the noble and learned Lord says that we seek to shelter ourselves under the professional advice of the Law Officers, I do not consider it a reproach when we avail ourselves of the advice of the professional advisers of the Crown. I must repeat that those extra-judicial opinions appear to me to be of no value, and should not be expressed when they can lead to no practical result. If the noble and learned Lord (Lord Westbury) wishes to bring forward his opinions in the shape of a deliberate Vote of Censure let him do so. Her Majesty's Government must deal with that in the best way they can.

NAVY—STEAM AND COAL—ADMIRALTY ORDERS.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

Return respecting (laid before the House on the 7th of May last): To be printed. (No. 120.)

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE, in moving for Copy of the revised Orders from the Admiralty to admirals and captains relative to the use of steam and consumption of coal in the Navy, said, that while he did not go the length to which Lord Clarence Paget went in his pamphlet on the subject, he believed the restriction of the use of coal in Her Majesty's ships had been attended with injurious consequences. Under the regulations which have been in force for some years, steam was never allowed to be used if it possibly could be avoided. Now, he (the Earl of Lauderdale) wanted to know how a captain could be up to managing his ship in action under steam if he was never allowed to practice; besides, if he did get up steam he was only allowed to go at five knots. Steam at low speed was easily managed, but steam at full power required the greatest attention and care, and would always be required in action; and he repeated that, without practice, the consequences would lead to disaster, as neither captain, engineers, nor stokers, would be up to their work. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Camperdown) had been kind enough to produce certain Papers on the subject, but they did not contain all the information he sought for, and he therefore begged to move for Copies of all Orders issued on the subject from 1865 up to the present time.

Moved that there be laid before this House, Copy of the revised Orders from the Admiralty to admirals and captains of Her Majesty's ships relative to the use of steam and the consumption of coal.—(The Earl of Lauderdale.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he believed the Papers he had already laid upon the Table contained an exhaustive statement of the Orders and Circulars issued from the Admiralty with reference to the consumption of coal in the Navy, and he did not think he could produce any further information; but he would make inquiry, and if there were any other Papers he was quite willing to supply them. With regard to the pamphlet of the noble and gallant Admiral (Lord Clarence Paget) which the noble Earl had quoted he did not think the cases it cited bore out the inference drawn — namely, that the Admiralty paid more attention to economy than to the proper management and safety of Her Majesty's ships. The reports concerning the various ships mentioned showed, with reference to the Captain, a strong probability that she had her steam up when the catastrophe occurred. In his report, Admiral Sir A. Milne said — "I directed Captain Burgoyne to get his funnel up, steam ready, and to connect his screws." Again, the Admiral said that after leaving the ship he made signal to get steam ready to keep station if required. Chief Gunner Hay said — "Steam was up, but I do not know whether the screw was revolving." So much as to the Captain. Now, as to the Agincourt — at the time she ran on the Pearl Rock the Admiral's order was that the ships were to have steam up sufficient to steam six knots if required. With respect to the Lord Clyde, in the night orders it was directed that the after-boilers should be kept banked and the foremost boilers should be ready for use with 10 minutes' notice. She was under steam even during the night, and could have been under steam according to her orders in 10 minutes at any time. Then as to the Defence. She ran ashore owing to an accidental mistake in the transmission of a message from the engineer to the captain, in consequence of which the ship's cable was shipped before steam was up in her boiler, and she was unable with two boilers only to make head against a heavy sea. With regard to the Royal Albert, she grounded through a mistake that was made as to the latitude. That mistake was not shared by her consort, the Danaë, which consequently escaped; and the captain of the Royal Albert, Captain Nicholson, himself admitted that he would have increased his steam if he had seen sufficient reason for so doing. If this had been the first time economy in the consumption of coal had been enjoined he could have understood the objection raised by the noble Earl; but the fact was that from the very earliest employment of coal and from the invention of steam the necessity of economy in the consumption of coal had been generally recognized, and by no one more than by the noble and gallant Admiral whose name the noble Earl had quoted (Lord Clarence Paget). That necessity was recognized in the Circulars which bore that noble and gallant Admiral's name, and in the Queen's Regulations and Instructions from 1861 down to the present time. He believed with the noble Earl that it was absolutely necessary that a discretion upon this subject should be vested in the officer under whose control the vessel was placed; and the noble Earl would find that, not only was this discretion reserved in all the Circulars and Instructions referring to this matter, but that it was also alluded to in express terms in the very Circular to which the noble Earl had alluded. Observations had at various times been made by officers upon the paragraphs of these Circulars, and some recommendations had been made as to certain changes which it was stated would, if adopted, tend to the more economical and efficient use of coal in the service; and if the noble Earl would look at the heading of the last Circular he would find that it was owing to these reasons that the restrictions formerly imposed had been considerably modified, and that more latitude had been left to the officers in certain cases with regard to the employment of steam. He would undertake to make inquiries as to any other Orders on this subject which might have been issued from the Admiralty, but he believed that there were none in existence beyond those which had been laid upon the Table of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, that he had not the slightest doubt from the evidence that the Agincourt was carried on shore in consequence of not going at a sufficient speed to resist the force of the current, and that the accident would not have occurred had that vessel, instead of going at six knots an hour, been going at a greater speed.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN observed that the speed of the Agincourt depended, not upon any orders from the Admiralty, but on the speed of, and on orders received from, the flag-ship. She had orders to have steam sufficient for six knots, but at the time of the accident she was only going at the rate of three.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

The Earl of Camperdown

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the working of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, said, that he had every reason to ask for their Lordships' indulgence, because, while on the one hand he should have to refer to some trying details, he should on the other hand have to state some circumstances so extraordinary to English ears that he should probably be told—as he had been told out-of-doors—that there was a screw loose somewhere, and that there must be some mistake about the matter. He might also be told that the cases to which he was about to refer were still pending; but, in reply to that objection, he could only say that if they waited until no case was pending, they would never enter into the matter at all. He might also be told that there must necessarily be some difficulty in working the Act at first; but he should be able to show that there were good reasons for bringing forward the subject at the present time. The point to which he proposed to address himself was the absolute necessity of uniformity in the decisions given under the Act, so that they might learn in Ireland what they had lost as landlords and what they had gained as tenants. In doing that he had not the slightest intention of attacking the principle of the Act. It was an accomplished fact, and they must make the best of it, although he believed it was opposed to the principles of political economy. Nor had he the slightest intention of attacking the persons by whom its provisions were administered, and still less of attacking the Irish Judges. Their Lordships would, no doubt, remember that in the Act a wide distinction was drawn between the case of Ulster and the rest of Ireland. In the rest of Ireland the amount of compensation for disturbance was limited to £250; in Ulster there was no limit whatever. He had at first believed that tenant-right arose from the circumstance that the tenant had for a long time done everything for the farm; but, on inquiry, he found that in large districts in Ulster in the course of the last century houses were built, lands drained, and fences made, such as they were, by the tenant, who in consideration of this work received a lease for, probably, 70 or 80 years. He, consequently, at last came to the conclusion that tenant-right in Ulster merely implied the difference between the proper rent which the landlord might have asked and the real rent which the tenant paid; and in that view he was supported by Mr. Senin, the able Poor Law Commissioner. The administration of the provisions of the Land Act in regard to tenant-right, was confided to certain gentlemen called in that Act "Judges of the Civil Bill Court," whose position was similar to that of the County Court Judges in England. It was a singular circumstance, however, that in Ireland the least efficient Chairmen were appointed to the most important counties, because in a large county the Barrister who took the chairmanship could not practise on his own account. He would not say one word against these gentlemen, for he did not wish to assume that any one of them had ever intentionally given a wrong judgment. Having looked at the tribunal, let them see what these Judges had to administer. It would be invidious to say that any man was the ablest of his class, but every noble Lord of those he addressed would admit with regard to Mr. Butt that his tendencies were essentially popular, and that he would desire to uphold the Land Act in every way. Mr. Butt had written a work characterized by great learning and the deepest research on the subject of the Land Laws in Ireland, in which, as a general rule, he expressed approval of the Land Act, but in which there occasionally peeped out an expression of actual contempt for the enactment in question as being one which placed immense difficulty in the way of the Judges of the Civil Bill Courts who had to administer it, particularly with regard to the compensation for improvements to be paid to out-going tenants. No Act of Parliament had ever been passed; the alterations to be effected by whose provisions depended so much upon the mode in which it was administered; and to many, at all events, it was a matter of regret that the power was committed to a number of co-ordinate tribunals, instead of to one tribunal, by which general principles might be laid down, and a certain uniformity of decision secured. But while a large discretion was given to the Judges, very little assistance was afforded to them in order to guide their discretion in accordance with the general principles of law. Such being the difficulties of this dangerous and uncertain Act, its administration was intrusted to the tribunals to which he had alluded. In England, questions relating to property such as were involved in the Land Act could be taken from Court to Court, until they were finally settled by the highest tribunal; but in Ireland the questions were left to be settled by a single Judge, who could grant an appeal from his own decisions if he chose, and not otherwise. Such being the case, some of the decisions arrived at were of a startling character. He would call their Lordships' attention to a few which seemed to him, to say the least, curious. In the early part of the Session he had directed attention to a case which had occurred in the county of Antrim. Here was another. Within half-a-mile of the borough bounds of Waterford there was an estate which for many years had been used as a gentleman's domain, but for which the Assistant Barrister granted compensation because it had once been occupied as a farm. In another case a landlord, acting upon the wish of his late tenant, granted a lease of the farm to the second instead of the eldest son, who thereupon claimed and obtained at the hands of the Barrister compensation from the landlord for disturbance. In yet another case the Barrister, contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter of the Act, decided the case on the evidence of witnesses who were practically a jury called, not by the Sheriff, but by the plaintiff, and who decided not on the matter of fact, but as to the amount of compensation in a case that might any day be their own. The farm was originally let at £53 10s. 9d.; last year it was valued under the Ordnance Survey at £151, and the tenant claimed £2,000 as compensation when deprived of the farm. The Barrister, with the assistance of the jury of tenants, awarded £1,400, and, addressing the witnesses, the Chairman said—

"This is the first time I have had the pleasure of meeting the fine, independent, seaside farmers of the county of Down, who have come forward so nobly to give their testimony in this case, utterly irrespective of the odium they will incur from both landlord and agent."

This was followed by shouts of applause and clapping of hands, which were not repressed. In the county of Tyrone a Judge of the Civil Bill Court used this remarkable expression—"I always think I am bound to interpret on the friendly side of the tenant." He did not know which to admire most in this passage, its orthography or its morality. On one estate two of this gentleman's decisions—both of course in favour of the tenant—were reversed. The third case, which was the most extraordinary of all, occurred in the county of Donegal, where a landlord who desired to make a new road over his land found it necessary to evict one of his tenants. The tenant threatened to shoot the bailiff, and the consequence was that he was dispossessed. The man made a very large claim, and went before the Judge of the Civil Bill Court, who gave him very nearly 42 years' purchase of the rent of the land, although the fee simple of land in that county was only worth 21 years' purchase—so that the landlord was obliged to buy back the land at double the value. The result of this decision was extremely curious, for the landlord had better have written—"Take the farm in fee simple for evermore, and do not apply to me to pay you double its value." [A laugh.] The news of decisions of this kind flew like wildfire through the county of Donegal, and it was spread abroad that everybody who quarrelled with his landlord could get double the value of the land he occupied. Laughable as such an idea might appear, it had a very serious effect. Their Lordships were doubtless aware that in Ireland turbary was a very valuable possession, being a property above ground very like what a coal mine was below ground. Well, throughout the county of Donegal there had been a general seizure of this and other landlords' rights. A neighbour of his possessed some very valuable moor land, and he annually let to Englishmen for a considerable sum the right of shooting over a portion of it. Recently the tenants wrote him a letter saying that the game was now their property and not his; but that, in consideration of his kindness as a landlord and his uprightness as a magistrate, they would give him a day's shooting occasionally if he asked for it. Indeed, in the present state of the law two codes of Land Law were growing up—one administered by the Judges and the other by Barristers,

Viscount Lifford

many of whom had seldom held a brief. As Judge Christian prophesied in his celebrated judgment—

"The Judges who attempt to carry out that section (the 18th) will be placed in the position of the Judges of primitive times, who made laws as fast as they administered them."

Subscriptions were being raised in all parts of the country to enable tenants to prefer their claims; and even the Press was becoming demoralized in consequence of the necessity of pandering to the people who supposed they had these rights over the land; the class of low attorneys were reaping a rich harvest, and many of them who were before unheard of had acquired extensive practices. When all these circumstances were taken into consideration it could hardly be said that it would be premature to inquire into the subject. All he asked for was that the landlords should be enabled to ascertain on trustworthy authority what the landlords had lost and what the tenants had gained by the Act of 1870. This was a subject on which even Judges of great eminence held different opinions. It entirely depended on the Judge who went a circuit whether a gentleman had to pay a large sum or nothing at all at the termination of a lease; and he was told that Chief Justice Monahan had said the Ulster custom applied to the termination of a lease, while Judge Lawson held a different opinion. All he asked for was uniformity, and he would suggest that, instead of these important cases being tried by Judges of the Civil Bill Court, two or three Judges of high character should be sent twice a-year to try all cases arising under the Act. On the 11th of March, 1870, the Prime Minister used the following words:—

"We are called upon, therefore, to begin this rectification of land tenures in Ireland with a plan which, if it be good at all, is good not for Ireland only, but for the whole of the Three Kingdoms, and which certainly amounts—I do not wish to describe it in language of excessive strength—to, perhaps, a peaceful, but yet a very searching and complete social revolution."—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1848.]

He thoroughly agreed with the latter portion of the statement. By refusing inquiry into what he had described, their Lordships would say that this state of things was to continue another year, and that rights were to be assumed day by day and month by month which would produce difficulties and heartburnings—especially in Ulster, where there always had been attachment between landlord and tenant. Would their Lordships do this, or would they grant a Committee, which would probably make a very moderate Report, pointing out the weak parts of the Act from which these varied decisions spring, and advising the appointment of a tribunal to administer the present law with uniformity and with justice?

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,"—(The Viscount Lifford.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, their Lordships would recollect that when the Irish Land Bill was under discussion in this House there was no part of it that was more difficult than that which related to the Ulster tenant-right. There were two courses which might have been pursued. One was to attempt to define the custom by statute; and the other was not to attempt to define the custom by statute, but to make the custom statutable, and to leave it to the Courts of Law to determine between the parties where the custom applied, and to what extent it applied. Parliament deliberately determined upon the second course, and, in his opinion, it wisely determined upon it. He should not think it would have been possible, by any inquiry that could have been made, by however competent persons, to devise any scheme which would have done complete justice in all the cases of minute differences existing in Ulster, and which would not have erred by giving either too much to one party or too little to another. No doubt the other alternative left considerable uncertainty and considerable chances of conflicting decisions. It was not surprising we should hear that decisions had been given which had not given satisfaction, at all events to one party in a suit—he never heard of a decision which gave satisfaction to both parties—but it was not always that the losing party had the chance of bringing his appeal to the House of Lords, and of asking for a Committee to which the question in dispute should be referred. It was still more unusual that cases should be brought on, as it were, for a fresh trial though not in a judicial manner, when in those very cases appeals had been carried to the proper Court, the decision of which was not yet given. He did not wish to identify the Government or himself with any particular decision; he was not competent to say whether any decision was the wisest that could have been given; he would not examine into the grounds of any decision and pass censure or approval upon the learned Judge who tried the case; and he did not think it at all convenient that any attempt should be made on the part of the Government to review such decisions; but as the noble Viscount (Viscount Lifford) had mentioned two or three cases, he would explain what he believed to be the facts of them in order to remove some misapprehension. The case decided in the county of Down involved the question whether, on the termination of a long lease—a lease for three lives—a claim for compensation under Ulster tenant-right would arise. On the expiration of the lease the landlord wished to resume possession; the tenant made a claim for tenant-right, and the Chairman held that the custom applied in the case, and gave an award in favour of the claimant; that decision was now appealed against. This was a proper question to be argued before a Court of Law—he could not imagine that in the administration of the Act any more important question could arise than that of determining precisely within what limits and under what circumstances Ulster tenant-right existed on the termination of a lease. There had been another decision, to which the noble Viscount did not refer, by which it had also been held that Ulster tenant-right existed on the termination of a long lease. In mentioning it he was not arguing the principle that tenant-right existed at the close of a lease; he was only pointing out that this was precisely the matter which had to be argued before a Court of Law, and it was not a matter of policy for discussion in Parliament. It was not the intention of Parliament to take away by statute any rights which tenants enjoyed by custom in Ulster; but it was the intention of Parliament to preserve to tenants the rights that belonged to them by custom, and to make them statutory instead of customary; and if after a full inquiry by a competent Court it should be found that Ulster tenant-right might be properly claimed at the end of a lease, it was the policy of the Act not to deprive the tenants of Ulster of their tenant-right. The whole question turned on a matter of fact—was or was not an Ulster custom one which arose at the end of a long lease? If it did, great injustice would be done to the tenant if it were taken away, and no injustice to the landlord if it were maintained. If on full inquiry before a competent Court, it should be shown that the custom did not arise, it would be so decided; the Act would take effect, and no injustice would be done. He must not be understood as giving an opinion on the decisions of the Courts, for these were questions of evidence and of law which he was not competent to discuss. He was arguing that it would be premature and most unwise for the House to insist upon an inquiry into an important branch of the subject by a Committee which might possibly decide contrary to previous decisions of Courts of Law how the Act was intended to apply; and this was the most important of all branches of the subject. The second case arose in the county of Donegal and had excited great attention. The property was owned by a noble Earl. In this case an appeal was made to a very competent judge, Mr. Justice Lawson, who upheld the decision of the Chairman that tenant-right existed upon the estate in question at the time when the tenant entered on his holding, and that no act done since had extinguished the tenant-right. That seemed to him to be a decision which was quite in accordance with the principle of the Act. He did not say whether Mr. Justice Lawson was right or not; he assumed that the Judge was right in the particular case; it was a simple question of fact whether tenant-right existed or did not, and he could add nothing to the case by expressing an opinion of his own; but surely there was nothing outrageous or monstrous in the decision, which, upon full inquiry, found that on a particular estate tenant-right had existed and had not been extinguished by anything done, and which, therefore, sustained the decision of the Chairman. A smile was excited by the statement of the amount of the award in that case. There was nothing more astonishing to English landlords, and to himself as one of them, than the extraordinary amounts at which Ulster tenant-right was valued. It was a thing he never understood, and he never should understand it; he doubted if any Englishman ever could understand it; he really did not know upon what principle the calculations for these purchases of Ulster tenant-right were based. What they knew was that as a matter of fact these large sums had been for a long course of years given for the Ulster tenant-right; and they must assume that the Judges who administered the Act were guided by the ordinary rules of evidence in endeavouring to give such sums as from the custom of the country appeared to be right and fair. The game case which the noble Viscount referred to was a peculiar case. As he understood it, the landlord had grouse moors, over which the right of shooting had been reserved, and, without interruption from the tenants, he had exercised that right and had left it for a considerable sum. The tenants, finding there was no actual reservation of the exclusive right on the letting of the farms, demurred to the landlord any longer exercising his right by letting it to another person. Now, there was a clause in the Irish Land Act which specially dealt with this class of cases. That was Clause 14. The first part of that clause dealt with cases where the right on the part of the landlord to shooting, fishing, &c., had not been expressly reserved, and the second part of it where there was an implied right in the landlord to shoot and fish. In this he thought Parliament had gone as far as it could in giving the right to the landlord. The other objections of the noble Viscount were directed against the character of the Courts before which these cases had been tried. He confessed he had but little experience of this part of the subject—much less, probably, than the noble Viscount who introduced the subject to their Lordships. He must say, however, that the gentlemen who presided over these Courts were considerably higher in position than briefless Barristers. They were usually selected from those who were just below the highest ranks of their profession.

The Earl of Kimberley

VISCOUNT LIFFORD: They are Assistant Barristers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No doubt they were Assistant Barristers, but they were drawn from a class by no means contemptible, and by their position, experience, and knowledge, were generally competent to discharge the duty imposed on them, and generally speaking, had considerable local knowledge. He had had the honour of selecting three or four gentlemen for that special duty, and he was sure those of their Lordships who knew the facts would admit that, as a class, they were the most competent set of men that could be obtained, and quite fit to administer the law. He very much doubted whether some of the observations which the noble Viscount had quoted with reference to their decisions were correct, and whether considerable colour had not been given to them. With regard to the inquiry proposed, their Lordships, he ventured to think, would not inquire into the working of the Act until they had some considerable experience of its alleged failure. They had as yet no such experience. He believed the Act had succeeded on the whole very well and worked good in Ireland. Doubts might be expressed by persons qualified to express them whether in all cases the best decisions had been given by the Courts; but he asked—could such an Act be administered without some such cases having arisen? This, it must be recollected, was a new law, admitted on all hands to be of a very unusual character. A number of Courts held in different parts of the country had to administer that law as to which there was no body of precedents. In such a state of things it was impossible, however competent the Judges might be, that there should not be occasionally conflicting decisions and erring from the path ultimately found to be the straight one. They must wait for a body of decisions which could only be formed after appeals to the Judges. No doubt it might be said that it was a hardship on landlords and tenants to be compelled to bring questions before the Courts, which led to expensive and burdensome litigation; but that was the inevitable result of an Act like this, which was new in its nature, and which brought into play new principles. It was foreseen from the first that there would be considerable difficulty in working out the Act. They must be prepared for objections being brought against it; but within two years of its enactment were they to say this Act had failed, and an inquiry ought to be made by Parliament into its operation because it had been found that difficulties had arisen, which difficulties must have been foreseen?

He had little more to say than to appeal to their Lordships not to agree to the Motion of the noble Viscount. After full experience had been obtained of the working of the Act, no doubt some amendments of it would in different respects be found necessary; but to have an inquiry at this period, after only two years experience, and especially in that House, composed entirely of landlords, would not, he thought, be productive of the slightest benefit, and certainly it would not be creditable to their Lordships' House.

LORD ROMILLY said, he did not rise to make any observations with reference to the proposed inquiry, but to read a statement, which he had been requested to do by Mr. Justice Lawson—a very old friend of his, for whose learning, judgment, and impartiality he entertained great regard—in consequence of a decision of his having been impugned by a noble Earl. Mr. Justice Lawson informed him that it was only when a question of law arose that a Judge was to call in his colleague, and if he thought it expedient to reserve a question, by way of case stated, for the Court of Land Cases Reserved. The case was "Friel v. Lord Leitrim," and the statement of Mr. Justice Lawson was as follows:—

"This was an appeal from a decree of the Chairman, awarding £235 upon a claim for disturbance by the plaintiff under the Irish Land Act. The claimant proved before me that he paid £180 to his brother Patrick for the tenant-right of part of this farm, and that this payment was made with the sanction and approval of Mr. Wray, who was the agent over the estate at the time. This evidence was wholly uncontradicted. He also stated that his brother John had an adjoining part of the farm held separately under Lord Leitrim, that Lord Leitrim evicted him two years ago, and that he, the claimant, was served with notice to quit because he had given shelter to his brother after he was so evicted. It was proved that the Ulster custom of tenant-right had always existed upon this estate and all the estates in the district. A respectable surveyor, Mr. M'Neely, swore that the profit rent of the claimant's farm was worth £19 7s. 6d. a-year, and that the tenant-right would sell for £278. The only witness produced for the respondent was Lord Leitrim himself. He proved that Wray was his agent down to 1857, he having succeeded to the estate in 1855; he stated that he had evicted many tenants and had never recognized the tenant right-custom. I held that it was clearly proved that the holding was subject to the Ulster custom of tenant-right, and I saw no reason to reduce the amount given by the Chairman, as there was no evidence to contradict the value put upon it by the claimant's witness. After I had pronounced my judgment, the junior counsel for the respondent asked me to reserve a point for prive the tenants of Ulster of their tenant-right. The whole question turned on a matter of fact—was or was not an Ulster custom one which arose at the end of a long lease? If it did, great injustice would be done to the tenant if it were taken away, and no injustice to the landlord if it were maintained. If on full inquiry before a competent Court, it should be shown that the custom did not arise, it would be so decided; the Act would take effect, and no injustice would be done. He must not be understood as giving an opinion on the decisions of the Courts, for these were questions of evidence and of law which he was not competent to discuss. He was arguing that it would be premature and most unwise for the House to insist upon an inquiry into an important branch of the subject by a Committee which might possibly decide contrary to previous decisions of Courts of Law how the Act was intended to apply; and this was the most important of all branches of the subject. The second case arose in the county of Donegal and had excited great attention. The property was owned by a noble Earl. In this case an appeal was made to a very competent judge, Mr. Justice Lawson, who upheld the decision of the Chairman that tenant-right existed upon the estate in question at the time when the tenant entered on his holding, and that no act done since had extinguished the tenant-right. That seemed to him to be a decision which was quite in accordance with the principle of the Act. He did not say whether Mr. Justice Lawson was right or not; he assumed that the Judge was right in the particular case; it was a simple question of fact whether tenant-right existed or did not, and he could add nothing to the case by expressing an opinion of his own; but surely there was nothing outrageous or monstrous in the decision, which, upon full inquiry, found that on a particular estate tenant-right had existed and had not been extinguished by anything done, and which, therefore, sustained the decision of the Chairman. A smile was excited by the statement of the amount of the award in that case. There was nothing more astonishing to English landlords, and to himself as one of them, than the extraordinary amounts at which Ulster tenant-right was valued. It was a thing he never understood, and he never should understand it; he doubted if any Englishman ever could understand it; he really did not know upon what principle the calculations for these purchases of Ulster tenant-right were based. What they knew was that as a matter of fact these large sums had been for a long course of years given for the Ulster tenant-right; and they must assume that the Judges who administered the Act were guided by the ordinary rules of evidence in endeavouring to give such sums as from the custom of the country appeared to be right and fair. The game case which the noble Viscount referred to was a peculiar case. As he understood it, the landlord had grouse moors, over which the right of shooting had been reserved, and, without interruption from the tenants, he had exercised that right and had left it for a considerable sum. The tenants, finding there was no actual reservation of the exclusive right on the letting of the farms, demurred to the landlord any longer exercising his right by letting it to another person. Now, there was a clause in the Irish Land Act which specially dealt with this class of cases. That was Clause 14. The first part of that clause dealt with cases where the right on the part of the landlord to shooting, fishing, &c., had not been expressly reserved, and the second part of it where there was an implied right in the landlord to shoot and fish. In this he thought Parliament had gone as far as it could in giving the right to the landlord. The other objections of the noble Viscount were directed against the character of the Courts before which these cases had been tried. He confessed he had but little experience of this part of the subject—much less, probably, than the noble Viscount who introduced the subject to their Lordships. He must say, however, that the gentlemen who presided over these Courts were considerably higher in position than briefless Barristers. They were usually selected from those who were just below the highest ranks of their profession.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD: They are Assistant Barristers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No doubt they were Assistant Barristers, but they were drawn from a class by no means contemptible, and by their position, experience, and knowledge, were generally competent to discharge the duty imposed on them, and generally speaking, had considerable local knowledge. He had had the honour of selecting three or four gentlemen for that special duty, and he was sure those of their Lordships who knew the facts would admit that, as a class, they were the most competent set of men that could be obtained, and quite fit to administer the law. He very much doubted whether some of the observations which the noble Viscount had quoted with reference to their decisions were correct, and whether considerable colour had not been given to them. With regard to the inquiry proposed, their Lordships, he ventured to think, would not inquire into the working of the Act until they had some considerable experience of its alleged failure. They had as yet no such experience. He believed the Act had succeeded on the whole very well and worked good in Ireland. Doubts might be expressed by persons qualified to express them whether in all cases the best decisions had been given by the Courts; but he asked—could such an Act be administered without some such cases having arisen? This, it must be recollected, was a new law, admitted on all hands to be of a very unusual character. A number of Courts held in different parts of the country had to administer that law as to which there was no body of precedents. In such a state of things it was impossible, however competent the Judges might be, that there should not be occasionally conflicting decisions and erring from the path ultimately found to be the straight one. They must wait for a body of decisions which could only be formed after appeals to the Judges. No doubt it might be said that it was a hardship on landlords and tenants to be compelled to bring questions before the Courts, which led to expensive and burdensome litigation; but that was the inevitable result of an Act like this, which was new in its nature, and which brought into play new principles. It was foreseen from the first that there would be considerable difficulty in working out the Act. They must be prepared for objections being brought against it; but within two years of its enactment were they to say this Act had failed, and an inquiry ought to be made by Parliament into its operation because it had been found that difficulties had arisen, which difficulties must have been foreseen?

He had little more to say than to appeal to their Lordships not to agree to the Motion of the noble Viscount. After full experience had been obtained of the working of the Act, no doubt some amendments of it would in different respects be found necessary; but to have an inquiry at this period, after only two years experience, and especially in that House, composed entirely of landlords, would not, he thought, be productive of the slightest benefit, and certainly it would not be creditable to their Lordships' House.

LORD ROMILLY said, he did not rise to make any observations with reference to the proposed inquiry, but to read a statement, which he had been requested to do by Mr. Justice Lawson—a very old friend of his, for whose learning, judgment, and impartiality he entertained great regard—in consequence of a decision of his having been impugned by a noble Earl. Mr. Justice Lawson informed him that it was only when a question of law arose that a Judge was to call in his colleague, and if he thought it expedient to reserve a question, by way of case stated, for the Court of Land Cases Reserved. The case was "Friel v. Lord Leitrim," and the statement of Mr. Justice Lawson was as follows:—

"This was an appeal from a decree of the Chairman, awarding £235 upon a claim for disturbance by the plaintiff under the Irish Land Act. The claimant proved before me that he paid £180 to his brother Patrick for the tenant-right of part of this farm, and that this payment was made with the sanction and approval of Mr. Wray, who was the agent over the estate at the time. This evidence was wholly uncontradicted. He also stated that his brother John had an adjoining part of the farm held separately under Lord Leitrim, that Lord Leitrim evicted him two years ago, and that he, the claimant, was served with notice to quit because he had given shelter to his brother after he was so evicted. It was proved that the Ulster custom of tenant-right had always existed upon this estate and all the estates in the district. A respectable surveyor, Mr. M'Neely, swore that the profit rent of the claimant's farm was worth £19 7s. 6d. a-year, and that the tenant-right would sell for £278. The only witness produced for the respondent was Lord Leitrim himself. He proved that Wray was his agent down to 1857, he having succeeded to the estate in 1855; he stated that he had evicted many tenants and had never recognized the tenant right-custom. I held that it was clearly proved that the holding was subject to the Ulster custom of tenant-right, and I saw no reason to reduce the amount given by the Chairman, as there was no evidence to contradict the value put upon it by the claimant's witness. After I had pronounced my judgment, the junior counsel for the respondent asked me to reserve a point for the Court above, on the ground that there was no compensation given to John, the claimant's brother, when he was evicted. I refused, being of opinion that there was no question of law fit to be reserved."

He (Lord Romilly) must be permitted to say that it did not accord with his ideas of judicial procedure that a noble Lord who had been an unsuccessful suitor should, under such circumstances, make an appeal to their Lordships' House.

LORD DE ROS said, he could not help thinking that there was some mistake in the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) supposing that the noble Viscount had made an attack on the Act of Parliament. What had been complained of was not the Act itself but the administration of the Act; and what was desired was, that a more satisfactory tribunal for giving effect to the Act should be appointed.

LORD LURGAN said, that whatever affected Ireland would sooner or later be felt in other parts of the United Kingdom; and therefore he had heard with regret the speech delivered by the noble Vicount (Viscount Lifford) who introduced the present Motion. The noble Viscount had, in his opinion, alluded to circumstances which were only exceptional, and he could not concur in the noble Viscount's conclusions; for as a resident in the province of Ulster, he could assure their Lordships that the Irish Land Act was, to the best of his belief, working satisfactorily, and had in no way diminished or impaired the good feeling which, as the noble Viscount stated, had always existed between the Ulster tenantry and their landlords. He would go further, and say that the legitimate influence of the landlord was as great as ever. He was still the guide, friend, and counsellor of his tenants in all cases of difficulty. He could confirm what had been stated before, that it was not the estates of the large landed proprietors, but of the smaller proprietors, which furnished cases to go before the Assistant Barristers. He thought that the noble Viscount had been rather hard in his remarks on the Chairmen of counties. It should be borne in mind that the work falling on them was new work; and, speaking in respect to the Chairman of his own county, he could state that that gentleman anxiously and studiously devoted days and weeks to the consideration of the cases coming before him, and he believed that the Chairmen of other counties acted in the same spirit. One case had been alluded to which, as the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies stated, was still under adjudication; and therefore he should follow the good example of the noble Earl, and refrain from saying one word either in favour of one side or the other. He could not but think that the Assistant Barrister, who, the noble Viscount assumed, had engaged himself in collecting evidence, pursued a wise course when he tried to get the very best testimony from the stalwart farmers of the county of Down as to what was the practice of the district. As to the Ulster custom, many of their Lordships did not understand what that custom was, and he thought Parliament had exercised a wise discretion, when the Irish Land Act was under consideration, in not laying down any definition of the Ulster custom, but in leaving each particular case to be decided on its own merits. He felt bound to state his belief, and what he knew to be the belief of a large body of the manly and upright tenantry of Ulster, that the expiration of a lease did not do away with the Ulster custom of tenant-right. That circumstance might modify or diminish the amount to be paid by the landlord if he wished to take the law into his own hands, but it did not do away with the tenant-right altogether. That he thought to be a wise arrangement, for the recognition of the fact induced the tenant, instead of exhausting his farm, as he might do if he knew that he had no security for compensation on leaving it, to endeavour to keep his farm in a state of improvement and good cultivation. It was with great satisfaction he had heard that, so far as the Government were concerned, it was not their intention to comply with the Motion of the noble Viscount. He thought it would be unwise on the part of the Government and ungenerous on the part of their Lordships to agree to the Motion. He rejoiced to find the character and conduct of the landlords coming out so well in the debate in 1870 on the Land Act, and he hoped that their Lordships would bear in mind that the Irish Land Act was passed not for the protection of the landlords, but for the protection of the tenants.

Lord Romilly

LORD CAIRNS said, he could not but think that the subject brought under their Lordships' notice by the noble Viscount (Viscount Lifford) was of great importance, and well worthy of consideration. In a great deal of what had fallen from the noble Earl the Secretary of State he agreed. He thought nothing could be more undesirable and inconvenient than that the House, in its legislative capacity, should pass in review the merits of particular judgments which might hereafter come before their Lordships on appeal. So far he agreed with the noble Earl. The noble Earl also described truly the considerations which had led to the establishment of the tribunals by which the Act was administered. The Government at the time of its passing admitted that there was a great deal of vagueness in the Act—and nobody, for example, could explain in what the custom of Ulster consisted. A great deal of power had to be given consequently to the Judges under the Act, and there was in it a clause called the "Equities Clause," which armed them with a degree of authority and discretion which never, he supposed, had been committed to the hands of any Judges before. That he was not complaining of; he simply mentioned the fact without suggesting that any alteration should in that respect be made. There was, moreover, a complete absence of any precedents by which the Judges could be guided, which rendered the Act and the proceedings under it a measure altogether without parallel. He should be sorry at the same time to see any steps taken by the Legislature for the purpose of altering the provisions of the Act. Indeed, he himself no later than last Session had introduced a Bill for the purpose of explaining some portions of it which seemed to be open to doubt, and that Bill had received the assent of the Legislature. But let him for a moment ask their Lordships to consider what was the character of the tribunals which were established for the purpose of administering the Act. He was not going to say one word with regard to the merits or demerits of individuals, with one exception. The noble Lord the Master of the Rolls had referred to Mr. Justice Lawson; and although he (Lord Cairns) did not know the merits of the case mentioned in the least, he must observe that he knew no one to whom, in his judicial capacity, he should be more willing to submit the decision of a question than Mr. Justice Lawson. He must not be understood as wishing in the slightest degree to depreciate the Judges by whom the law was administered, while at the same time he regretted the want of uniformity in the decisions. But who, he would ask, were the primary Judges who carried out its provisions and had to decide on the difficult and intricate questions which arose under it between landlords and tenants? There were 32 Assistant Barristers in Ireland, and to them was intrusted that duty. Now, he dared say these 32 Assistant Barristers were very proper persons for the discharge of the duties which they were originally appointed to perform, which was to decide on what were known in this country as County Court cases—cases not exceeding, he believed, in value £40, which arose in various districts of Ireland. Not merely was there that limit to their jurisdiction, but the cases which they were appointed to decide were cases governed by clear precedents—ordinary cases of contract and the administration of the common law of the country, as to which there could be very little doubt, and in regard to which there could be no vagueness. Such were the Judges who were all at once transferred into Judges to administer the Land Act in the cases under which the amount of money which might change hands was absolutely without any limit, and to decide those cases under an Act which was vague, indefinite, and difficult to administer beyond any measure which had, he believed, ever received the sanction of the Legislature. They had, he admitted, a very difficult task to perform; but there was another remark which he also wished to make. The number of the Assistant Barristers was 32, and they had to administer the Act in the different counties of Ireland. Now, it was notorious—and the truth of the allegation ought to be inquired into—that, without impugning the uprightness of these Assistant Barristers or their capacity in an ordinary way, there had, as a matter of fact, owing to the way in which the Act was administered, already sprung up in Ireland completely different systems of law as between landlord and tenant. He could name two counties within sight of each other in which the law as between landlord and tenant had come to be as different as the law of England was different from that of the Mauritius. But the noble Earl had told them this was a state of things which could be rectified by an appeal to the Judges. Now, to whom did the appeal lie? To the Judges of Assize. But when it was considered that there were 12 Judges of Assize for Ireland, it was not to be wondered at that the decisions of these learned functionaries should also be at variance with each other. Instead, therefore, of having one Appellate Court to steady and rectify the decisions of the Assistant Barristers, there were 12 distinct tribunals. It should be borne in mind, also, that the Judges of Assize were men who were very much pressed for time, who went down to the assize towns to transact business of great urgency and importance, with only a limited number of hours for the purpose, and that these cases were submitted to them without notice; yet those Judges suddenly found themselves, while thus engaged, face to face with appeals from the Assistant Barristers, involving not merely difficult questions of law but of fact, in which the different opinions of surveyors, tenants, landlords, and other persons had to be heard. In the midst of the scramble of civil and criminal business on his circuit, the Judge of Assize had interposed those weighty and tedious and embarrassing cases—in which great latitude was left to him, too, in point of discretion, in consequence of the vagueness of the Act. The result was, that as there arose great differences in the decisions of the 32 Barristers in the first instance, so there were differences between the decisions of the Judges in like manner; so that the appellate tribunal had not had the effect, he believed, of reducing the law to any system whatever. Now, he wanted their Lordships to observe in what the urgency of the question consisted; because, unless the question were urgent, the Act ought, perhaps, to be allowed to go on working a little longer before any decided conclusions were drawn with respect to its operation. The urgency of the matter seemed to him to lie in the fact that there were a great many of those cases, and that once a decision was given by it with regard to the custom of Ulster, or any other custom in reference to a farm, that farm would become indelibly impressed for all time with the character of that custom, or until the landlord abolished the custom by buying it up. Now, it was a very serious thing that farm after farm should thus have a custom finally settled upon it. Another reason for urgency was that, as their Lordships were aware, the Act of Parliament provided that the Government might increase the salaries of the Assistant Barristers in consideration of the greater amount of business which they would have to transact. No increase had, he believed, been given, although strong pressure was being put upon the Government with that object. That being so, it was no wonder that certain proposals for effecting a change were made. What was proposed was, that instead of there being 32 Judges deciding those cases in the first instance, there should be two Judges appointed, of the character of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court; that they should visit all the counties in Ireland, and that they should transact the whole of the business now transacted under the Act by the Assistant Barristers. In that way, by having Judges of a superior stamp, uniformity of decision, as well as greater expedition in hearing the cases, would be secured. The arrangement, instead of being more expensive, would be less expensive, inasmuch as the salaries of the two Judges would not amount to so large a sum as the increased salaries of the 32 Assistant Barristers. The question was one which he hoped would be carefully considered before any such increase was made. It was also proposed that, instead of there being an appeal to the Judge of Assize, who might, if he pleased—but only if he pleased—allow an appeal to the Court of Land Cases Reserved in Dublin, there should be no appeal to the Judge of Assize, but an appeal as a matter of right to the Court of Land Cases Reserved. In that way we would have one appellate tribunal reducing to uniformity all the decisions of the primary Court. What they desired to avoid was the difference which at present existed in the mode of administering the Act in different counties, and the danger of the opinion arising that there was one set of Assistant Barristers whose decisions were always in favour of the tenant, and of another set of Assistant Barristers whose decisions were as invariably favourable to the landlord.

Lord Cairns

Whatever the decisions might be, let them be uniform throughout the whole country. The subject was one to which he thought it was extremely important that the Government should turn their attention, and he did not believe that, in the long run, the working of the Act could be made satisfactory without some provisions of this kind. The noble Lord who spoke last (Lord Lurgan) lived in a county where there was an able and experienced Barrister, and being satisfied with his decisions, did not wish any alteration. If, however, he would go a little further, and inquire into the decisions in other counties, he would see the necessity of some change.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR begged their Lordships to pause before, at the expiration of two years only from the passing of a Bill of the utmost importance, and considered with the deepest deliberation, they adopted the Motion of the noble Viscount (Viscount Lifford); for by adopting such a course they must shake public confidence in legislation so deliberately adopted, and which had, as he believed, been attended by the most admirable results as far as concerned the country to which it was applied. Were they to do so—if, after the lapse of two years from the planting of a new system, they were to grant the Committee of Inquiry asked for by the noble Viscount, they would act like children who pull up a plant to see how it is growing. No worse course could be adopted in legislation. There was serious objection against taking such a course with regard to any measure whatever; but with regard to the present Motion there was this further objection—in which his noble and learned Friend who had spoken last (Lord Cairns) evidently agreed—that nothing could be more prejudicial to their Lordships' authority, both as legislators and as Judges, than to mix up the two capacities, and to attempt to investigate in this House, by means of a Motion of this description, questions which were the proper subjects of legal inquiry and decision before properly constituted tribunals. It was quite clear that a Motion such as this should not be supported—looking to the very recent passing of the Act, looking to the care bestowed upon it, and looking to the large interests involved in it—it was quite clear that a very strong case must be made out before such a Committee was appointed; and this the noble Viscount who moved for the Committee evidently felt, for he had sought to make out his case by citing instances of grievances; and this his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) also evidently felt, although he had declined to follow the noble Viscount, for he felt it would be wrong to enter into the merits of cases which had been recently decided and some of which were at this moment under appeal. His noble and learned Friend, therefore, instead opened new ground, and said that, according to his own knowledge and according to notoriety, a conflicting series of decisions, some on behalf of the landlord, and some on behalf of the tenant—which he (the Lord Chancellor) supposed were to be assumed consonant with a strict construction of the Act—had been established in adjoining counties, and therefore that there was a grievance which ought to be inquired into in regard to the administration of justice. One remarkable thing, however, was that all the cases cited by the noble Viscount in that part of his speech he had heard—for as the noble Viscount's back had been turned towards him he had not heard him distinctly—were landlords' cases—not in the sense of corruption, but in the sense of undue and improper decisions with regard to the construction of the Act of Parliament. But the argument urged by his noble and learned Friend was that there were conflicting decisions delivered in adjoining counties. If that were so, why had not the tenants complained? How was it that under those circumstances the grievance of the landlords had alone reached their Lordships' House. But whether it were a landlords or a tenants grievance, how was it possible to inquire into it in the course of a debate of this kind? No doubt it would be said that it was proposed to make the inquiry by means of a Select Committee; but a very strong case ought to be made out before they questioned the policy of an Act passed so recently, and under the circumstances to which he had alluded. The noble Viscount (Viscount Lifford) had referred to a case decided by an Assistant Barrister—whose judgment but not whose motives were assailed. But it appeared that this decision on appeal had been confirmed by an eminent Judge, to whose ability, honour, and capacity noble Lords particular Act, and consider whether it ought to be included in the schedule.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad the noble Marquess had brought this subject under his notice. He wished their Lordships to understand that he was only doing his best with the agents employed to carry these Acts into effect. When it was remembered that the Bill dealt with some 400 statutes, it was not to be wondered at that some error, such as he presumed this to be, should have been committed, notwithstanding the competence of the draughtsmen employed. He would make a note of the matter and have it looked into.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

GAS AND WATER ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—E. Cadogan (chairman), E. Rosse, L. Vaux of Harrowden, L. Blantyre, L. Balinhard.

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, 'till
To-morrow, a quarter before
Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 3rd June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Elementary Schools (Certificated Teachers), appointed.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [May 31] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered—First Reading—East India (Bengal, &c. Annuity Funds) * [182]; Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension * [183].

Second Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation * [175]; Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation * [181]; Limited Owners Residence Law Amendment * [165].

Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.P.; Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections * [86]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) and Act (No. 2, 1864) Amendment * [163]; Alteration of Boundaries of Dioceses * [170].

Third Reading—Act of Uniformity Amendment [136]; Charitable Loan Societies (Ireland) * [167]; Cattle Disease (Ireland) Acts Amendment * [159]; Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment * [168]; Charitable Trustees Incorporation * [120], and passed.

The Marquess of Salisbury

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Copy presented,—of Draft of Articles proposed by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the United States, May 10, 1872 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.—North America (No. 8, 1872).

IRELAND—INTOXICATION BY ETHER.

QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the great increase of intoxication in the North-west of Ireland, caused by the use of ether and of a mixture of naphtha and ether, sold by chemists and grocers, and, if so, if he is prepared to take steps to put a stop to the abuse, and deter parties who turn their establishments into dram shops?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the attention of the Irish Government had not been called to that matter lately, but as long ago as 1868 its attention was directed to it by a presentment of the Grand Jury of the county of Tyrone, forwarded by Mr. Justice George. The Government then made a full inquiry into the subject, and ascertained that the practice of using ether as a stimulant instead of ordinary spirits was confined to the North of Ireland, and principally to the counties of Tyrone and Londonderry, where ether was taken in enormous quantities, not as an addition to whiskey, or any other spirit, to strengthen it, but merely diluted with water as a stimulant, instead of ordinary spirits. Thereupon the Irish Government communicated with the Board of Inland Revenue as to whether any measures should be taken for checking that practice. The Board of Inland Revenue reported that in the existing state of the law they could not interfere. The subject appeared to have been further considered by the Government; but, looking to the fact that the practice was almost confined to the two counties he had named, and that ether was very largely used for medicinal and many other legitimate purposes, and that the people who used it as a stimulant could use other stimulants which would be quite as injurious, it was not then thought necessary to take any further step in the matter. At present an inquiry was, however, being conducted under the direction of the Irish Government into the alleged adulteration of whiskey in many parts of Ireland. As soon as the Reports on that subject were received they would be considered by the Government, who would also take the opportunity of considering the question to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred.

IRELAND—GALWAY ELECTION INQUIRY —JUDGMENT OF MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.
QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that as the proceedings on the Galway Election Petition had extended over many days, and the evidence taken was very voluminous, and as the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh extended over nine hours, and contained language of an unusual nature, he hoped that, in justice to that learned Judge, the earliest opportunity would be afforded to the country of knowing what it was that Mr. Justice Keogh really did say in giving his judgment. He, therefore, wished to put to the First Lord of the Treasury the Question of which he had given Notice—namely, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh in the Galway Election Petition case; and, whether means will be taken to place upon the Table of the House the shorthand writer's report of the exact terms and language of that judgment, without the delay that must ensue if the production of the document in question is deferred until the voluminous evidence taken in the course of the inquiry is ready for publication?

MR. GLADSTONE: Certainly, Sir, the attention of the Government has been called to the report of the important judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh in the Galway Election Petition case. But I may observe that neither we nor the public are as yet in what may be termed authentic possession of that judgment. I have been told—I cannot say I know it, but I have been told—that Mr. Justice Keogh does not at all desire to be bound by the precise expressions of the report, and thinks that they are not in some respects likely to convey his meaning in the fullest and most satisfactory manner. But, as far as we are concerned, I do not think we have any title to interfere as an Executive Government in this matter, as the statute, I apprehend, makes full provision for dealing with it, and under the statute it will be the duty of Mr. Justice Keogh, I believe, to make a Report to the Speaker of the House of Commons. Mr. Justice Keogh has reserved a case for the Court of Common Pleas; and I believe it is not until Thursday, or some later day, that it can be dealt with; and until that has been dealt with, I do not believe that in the regular course of proceedings any further step will be taken. When that case has been disposed of, I believe that Mr. Justice Keogh will make his Report to the Speaker, and that the evidence will be forwarded to the Speaker. That will also be the time for our procuring—and it will be more consonant with precedent—a copy of his judgment. And I think in a case of this kind—where matters of very considerable consequence may be involved—it is especially requisite that we should allow the whole of the proceedings to take their own natural course, particularly as we believe that the provisions of the statute are quite sufficient for bringing the whole matter regularly before the House.

SUGAR—DRAWBACK CONVENTION
(1864).—QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will inform the House whether France has up to the present time conformed to the obligations of the Treaty between Great Britain, France, Holland, and Belgium, made in 1864 for a period of ten years, called "The Drawback Convention," for the mutual adoption of classified rates of Duties on Sugar; if not, whether the Government proposes to enter into a fresh Treaty with that Country for regulating Duties on Sugar; and, if so, whether it is proposed to renew the Treaty for the unexpired term of "The Drawback Convention" of 1864, or for a longer period, and on what principles it is proposed the new Duties shall be levied?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was true that France had not fully observed the Drawback Convention of 1864, because she had failed to bring the drawback and the duty into the relation with each other defined by that Treaty. A Convention, however, was to meet on the subject, but he could not state exactly what it was proposed to do in that Convention. It was generally to consider the whole question, but more especially, he thought, whether it was expedient to introduce into the four countries the practice of refining in bond.

ARMY—EXCHANGES BY SUB-LIEUTENANTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for War, If Sub-Lieutenants in the Cavalry can exchange for Infantry; if not, can those Sub-Lieutenants who have passed the highest examination at Sandhurst exchange generally with each other?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, sub-lieutenants in the cavalry can exchange to infantry, subject, of course, to the general regulations, and provided they do not exceed the age for infantry. There is no objection to the exchange between two sub-lieutenants of infantry without reference to the list on which they pass out of Sandhurst.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL—PUBLIC HEALTH BILL. QUESTIONS.

MR. FAWCETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What are the intentions of the Government with regard to the Corrupt Practices Bill; and, further, what Government measures will take precedence of it?

MR. GLADSTONE: At the commencement, Sir, of the Session, when we obtained the leave of this House to introduce the Corrupt Practices Bill, we did it with a full expectation of being able to pass that measure into law in the present Session, and that expectation, I am happy to say, we retain entire. We fully look forward to its being passed as one of the measures of the year. Beyond that I am not prepared to go at this moment. There is, I think, no advantage, and it does not conduce to regularity or expedition in Business, long beforehand to place a large number of measures in numerical order, as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and so on, for we are too liable to be interrupted by causes which we cannot foresee to make that expedient. We intend to take that which is known as the Scotch Education Bill, and after that to proceed with the Mines Bill. When those two measures are disposed of, we should then think it time to lay down where we can the order of further Business, and then I shall be very happy to give the hon. Gentleman the best information in my power.

In reply to Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, MR. GLADSTONE said, that although the Government looked upon the Public Health Bill as one of the measures which they hoped to pass during the present Session, still if it came to be a question of priority between that Bill and the Corrupt Practices Bill, the former would have to be postponed.

ROME—DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION AT THE PAPAL COURT.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the appointment of Mr. Clarke Jervoise to a diplomatic post at the Papal Court in 1870 was of a temporary nature; and, if not, whether he would state to the House what advantage this country now derives from maintaining two distinct diplomatic missions in Rome?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Mr. Clarke Jervoise is only temporarily employed at Rome. He draws his salary at £530 a-year as clerk in the Foreign Office, and is paid the difference between that sum and £800, the salary assigned to the Secretary of Legation, who previously resided at Rome. Mr. Jervoise has also the benefit of the allowance of £200 a-year for house rent formerly assigned to the Secretary of Legation residing at Rome. His stay at Rome is, for the present, rendered necessary by the refusal of the Papal Government to hold any communication with a diplomatic agent accredited to the King of Italy—as is Sir Augustus Paget—and this dual representation at Rome is maintained by Foreign Governments generally.

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND) INSPECTORS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked, Whether the Lord Advocate's attention has been called to the fact that the local Poor

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Law authorities in Stromness having unanimously appointed a woman to be Inspector of the Poor for that parish, the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh cancelled the appointment, although the woman had performed all the duties to the entire satisfaction of the parish for several years previously, in place of her father, who nominally held the office, but from the state of his health could not perform the duties; and, to inquire whether there is any Law disqualifying a woman from being appointed to the office of Poor Law Inspector in such a parish as Stromness?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, this Question refers to the conduct of the Board of Supervision in dismissing from the office of Inspector of the Poor a woman who had been appointed to that office by the Parochial Board of the parish. I have to inform my hon. Friend that this matter is not one with which I have any duty or authority to interfere. Nevertheless, I have communicated with the Chairman of the Board of Supervision, and requested an explanation of the circumstances of the case. From the answer returned, it appears that in the first instance the Chairman of the Parochial Board sought the opinion of the Board of Supervision as to the competency of making the appointment of a female to such an office. The Board of Supervision, without expressing an opinion as to the legal question involved, informed the Chairman of the Parochial Board that the appointment of a female was unprecedented, and in the opinion of the Board of Supervision inexpedient. In spite of that, the Parochial Board appointed a female. Now, the Scotch Poor Law Act vests in the Parochial Board the sole power of appointing a suitable person as Poor Law Inspector; but under another section of that Act the Board of Supervision has the power to dismiss any person who may be incompetent to discharge the duties of the office. The whole subject was very carefully considered by the Board of Supervision, and they came to the conclusion, upon the general question, that a female was not a fit or competent person to discharge the duties of an Inspector of the Poor Law, and therefore they had no alternative but to dismiss the female who had been appointed by the Stromness Board. The matter is entirely within the jurisdiction of the Board of Supervision, which is not a Department of the Government, but an independent statutory Board, whose proceedings are not interfered with by the Government, but who are subject to any complaint which may be made against them. As to the abstract legal question involved in the matter, as the Board of Supervision has not passed an opinion, I hope my hon. Friend will not think me wanting in respect if I also decline to pass any opinion on that subject.

JAPAN—THE JAPANESE EMBASSY.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government are preparing to take steps to receive the eminent Japanese statesman Iwakura and the other distinguished persons composing the Japanese Embassy, who are expected shortly to arrive in England, in a manner calculated to mark our appreciation of the policy of the Emperor and the efforts of his Government to establish cordial relations with Foreign Powers?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir Harry Parkes, General Alexander, and Mr. Aston, Interpreter to the Legation in Japan, have been appointed to attend to the Japanese Embassy on their arrival and during their stay in this country, but at present we have no intimation as to the probable time of their arrival.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ACT OF UNIFORMITY AMENDMENT BILL. — QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS wished to ask the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock Whether he intends to give the House an opportunity of reconsidering the opinion it had expressed on Thursday night with regard to that portion of the Preamble of the Act of Uniformity Amendment Bill which related to the approval of Convocation being required to the provisions of the Bill?

MR. BOUVERIE, in reply, said, that although his objection to the measure had been in a great degree obviated by an Amendment made in it, he yet regarded himself as bound to fulfil the promise he had given to afford the House an opportunity of reconsidering its opinion on the point referred to. He had, however, no idea that the Report upon the Bill would have been brought up so promptly as the following day after the Committee, and therefore he had not given the necessary Notice to enable him to raise the question on that occasion. If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would not press the third reading that night, he would give the necessary Notice to enable him to raise the point on a future occasion.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought it would be as well for him to state that it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the third reading of the Bill that night, as it was desirable that it should be passed as promptly as possible, seeing that it would affect the form of service of the Church. The right hon. Gentleman had had ample opportunity, had he thought fit to do so, of giving Notice of his intention to take such a course that evening as he might deem it right to adopt with reference to the measure.

ARMY—BAND OF THE GRENADIER GUARDS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF YARMOUTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Band of Her Majesty's Grenadier Guards have been ordered to proceed to-morrow to Liverpool for the purpose of embarking for the United States on duty; and, if so, whether the order was given by the Secretary of State for War before the sanction of Her Majesty or that of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief or that of the Lieutenant Colonel of the regiment had been obtained; whether it is true that the Bandmaster has received, or was to receive, a large sum of money, and that every member of the Band was to receive extra payment, and if so, from whom; and, whether it was true that some Civilians had been permitted to wear Her Majesty's uniform and to go with the Band as bandsmen of the regiment?

MR. CARDWELL: It is true, Sir, that, in consequence of a request made through the Foreign Secretary by the Secretary of the United States Legation in London, permission was given to those who are conducting the International Musical Peace Jubilee in Boston to engage the band of the Grenadier Guards to take part in that festival. This Correspondence was held in September last.

Mr. Bouverie

The arrangements have been carried into effect under the direction of the Adjutant General of the Army. The sanction of Her Majesty was obtained on the submission of His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief before any orders were issued to the band. I believe that the conductors of the festival propose to give extra payment to the bandmaster and the members of the band; but these arrangements are not within my official cognizance. In conclusion, I may say that no permission has been given to any civilians to wear Her Majesty's uniform.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I feel that after what I stated on Friday last, when I again asked for the indulgence of the House with respect to the Treaty of Washington, and when, after I had called the attention of the House to the fact, that the Session both of the Senate and the House of Representatives was to terminate to-day—thereby indicating that the demand made upon your patience could not be for any great length of time—the House will naturally expect to hear from the Government what we have to say to them, that day having now arrived. As regards the immediate point to which I then referred, hon. Members will have read in the newspapers the statement, which is quite accurate, that the Session of both Houses of the American Legislature has been prolonged from the 3rd to the 10th. That prolongation, I apprehend, is a matter entirely in their own hands, and we were not informed beforehand that it would be done. It, however, opens a door, and probably gives time to the Senate—if there be a disposition, even amid the great pressure of business which there as here attends the close of a Session—to revert to this subject; but I must leave hon. Members to appreciate the significance or importance of the fact as they think proper, because we have no official or absolute right to place any particular construction upon it, beyond what the statement itself conveys. I will not, however, confine myself to another appeal to the indulgence of the House, but will endeavour, so far as the public interests involved will permit, to convey to the House some particulars respecting this important negotiation, which I trust will be so far of advantage that they will tend to obviate certain misconstructions which have evidently more or less possessed portions of the public mind. I will advert first to an isolated point—namely, to the publication of certain Papers in America, with regard to which we ventured to express our full belief that it was in no way due to the action of the American Government. That which we formerly stated as an opinion we are now entitled to state as a fact. I am assured that not only was the publication not due to the action of the Executive Government, but that it was not due to the action of the Members of the Senate; and if I am asked to what it was due, we are told that it resulted from what is termed “enterprise.” [Laughter.] The House can interpret that phrase for itself quite as well as I can, for it can well conceive the anxiety of the Press to supply and the public to receive what may be termed sensational information, and that there are persons ever on the search for means of affording it; and, accordingly, we presume that the vigour and ingenuity of some gentlemen engaged in that important profession were the cause and the means of what we thought—and indeed what all must have felt—on political grounds, to be an inconvenient publication. When the Article was published, an opinion was expressed in this country that its language was weak in that part which refers to what are known as the Claims for Indirect Losses, and that it would not preclude the prosecution of those claims before the Tribunal at Geneva. When I say there was an opinion to that effect, I am far from saying it was the opinion of the country; but it was an opinion which occurred to some to conceive, and I wish, therefore, without entering into any argument on the words themselves, to say these two things—in the first place, we have not proceeded with respect to those words without availing ourselves of the assistance of the best legal information and authority at our command, in order to assure ourselves of their purpose and significance. I may say that we had the assistance of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor in the Cabinet, and the Law Officers of the Crown; only—specifying a change which has recently taken place in the Law Officers of the Crown—in lieu of the officer who was formerly the Queen’s Advocate, we have now, as the legal adviser of the Foreign Office, Dr. Deane; and last, but not least, we have had the advantage of the assistance of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) who, as the House knows, has accepted and discharged the office of Counsel to Her Majesty’s Government in regard to the prosecution of the Arbitration under the Treaty of Washington. The unanimous opinion of those legal authorities assured us of the sufficiency of those words to preclude the entertaining and prosecution of the Indirect Claims at Geneva; and I will venture to make this observation—some persons have supposed that the words “for the future,” which are contained in the previous portion of the Article are applicable to the engagement not to make any claim for Indirect Losses at Geneva. Now, that is not so. The words “for the future” are only applicable to what I think is the penultimate clause of the Article; and the engagement of the President, supposed to be undertaken in virtue and consideration of what has preceded, is not limited by any such condition as those words might appear to imply. That is the case so far as regards the view of Her Majesty’s Government, and the view of those on whom they rely for legal guidance as to the choice of terms and expressions. With respect, however, to that point—and it is one of importance—I feel justified in saying that, so far as our knowledge goes, we have not the slightest reason to believe that there is any difference of construction upon the two sides of the water in this matter. The House will bear in mind that telegraphic messages are, of necessity, less full of explanation than communications by post, and that, in fact, explanations are very rarely offered upon them until some challenge has occurred which makes it necessary; and there has been no challenge whatever indicating any difficulty or difference of opinion with respect to this phrase. I will, however, briefly describe the state of the case as we conceive it to be, and it may be of some interest to the House to hear it, because it will explain—perhaps more clearly than the Government have yet done—the manner in which we came to effect a transition from the proposal which was first made to proceed with the American Government by an interchange of Notes to the other method of procedure—namely, by reference to the “treaty-making power” of the United States, which includes the Senate as well as the Executive Government. The state of the case, so far as we understand and believe, was this—and the House will be able from its knowledge of the Papers to a great extent to check what I say—The President held that the Indirect Claims were strictly admissible under the Treaty. The Treaty was a formal document, imposing certain obligations on him: it had been made and signed, as he deemed, in that sense, and therefore, although he conceived himself perfectly warranted in agreeing by an interchange of Notes not to press for compensation in respect to claims for Indirect Losses, yet he did not conceive that it lay within his discretion as Head of the Government to withdraw those Claims. It must be obvious that even the word “withdrawal” may perhaps be open—quite irrespective of the sensitive feelings with which it is regarded in America in connection with the Treaty—to a good deal of technical discussion, because the Claims exist in the American Case; and I apprehend that when public opinion in this country expresses a desire for “withdrawal,” what is really meant is that we wish to be secured from any further proceeding of any kind tending to a practical issue on the Claims, either in the shape of money or opinion, or any other shape being taken upon them. Well, Sir, the President felt that to proceed with those Claims in the manner which was thought necessary was beyond his discretion. He considered it could only be done by an exercise of the full “treaty-making power,” and it was for this purpose he expressed to us—we were not, indeed, at the first moment by telegraph apprized of the reason of the change—a desire that, instead of an interchange of Notes, the two Governments should proceed by a draft Supplemental Article, under which, for some sufficient consideration, the Government of the United States might make a declaration that they would make no claim for Indirect Losses, so that the Arbitrators should thereby be prevented from entertaining such Claims. That is our view of the case and our belief is, that that is the sense which the American Government places upon the words—which sense does not appear to us doubtful—of the ultimate clause of the Supplemental Article; and I am authorized to say that that is the view which has been made known to the distinguished gentleman who represents the United States Government at this Court, and which has received his concurrence. The House will be pleased to understand a distinction which I am now very anxious to make between the real state of things and the impressions which have prevailed abroad. There has been a prevailing impression that the Correspondence which has been going on between the two Governments has been due to an attempt of some kind on the part of the American Government to procure the weakening, or dilation, of this covenant, whereby the President is supposed to undertake that he will make no claim for the Indirect Losses before the Tribunal at Geneva. That is not so. No such attempt whatever has been made by the President, and there has been no difference whatever between the two Governments as to the letter of that stipulation, nor, so far as we know, as to its spirit or construction. The subject of the communications between the two Governments, indeed, has been of an entirely different character. It has related to that portion of the Article which, very naturally, has not received by any means the same amount of critical attention from the public in this country as the closing and more immediately operative words, but which, notwithstanding, it is our duty, as it refers to an obligation to be undertaken, and to an effect in the practical policy of this country in time to come, to weigh and canvass with the utmost minuteness. In fact, the remaining question is altogether one of a prospective character. The House is aware of the general scope of the argument which the Government held with respect to the Indirect Claims inserted in the American Case. It is also aware of the disposition and desire of the American Government to generalize the expression of their argument, and to lay it down, as a principle for the conduct of future negotiations and the regulation of the relations between the two Governments; but the very utterance of those words will show clearly that an attempt to generalize principles of that kind, and convert them into an engagement, is a matter which in the use of expressions requires the utmost possible care and circumspection. Well, Sir, perhaps I may be asked whether, as the terms of the Article are before the House, we are willing to make known the amendment proposed by the Senate, I having stated to what portion of it the amendment refers? In answering that question, I hope the House will not think it is due to any jealousy on our part, if we say we have come to the conclusion that it might not be expedient with reference to the state of things in America—certainly it would not be consistent with a due respect to the Senate and the Government of the United States—if the terms of the amendment were to be published by us. The House will be good enough to understand that there is no difference existing between us, or likely to exist, with respect to the method of the proceedings as to these Indirect Claims, which have formed the subject of very anxious discussion during the last few months—no difference—that is to say, presuming that we arrive at an understanding with respect to prospective engagements. But the immediate differences have reference entirely to the precise extent of that prospective engagement, which, it is obvious, is a very nice matter to express in words, and although we have been discussing the extent of that precise engagement to be expressed in words, we have no reason to believe that the variations of opinion—the divergences of opinion—which there have been on particular expressions, are referrible in any degree to the differences in aim and purpose of the two Governments. We venture, as far as the nature of telegraphic communications permits us, to believe the contrary; but, at any rate, we should be very wrong if we allowed it to be supposed on our authority that there was a real difference in the aim, purpose, and policy of the two Governments. The affirming of the engagement, and the extent of that engagement, as defined by its language, is the point on which our recent communications have turned, and that being so, I trust that what I have said, although I am far from thinking that it can draw forth or challenge in any manner the approval of the House —which I wish it to be understood I in no degree or manner ask at the present moment—yet, if there be elsewhere uneasiness at the continuation of the negotiations, it may serve to allay that uneasiness, because that uneasiness undoubtedly has reference to the supposition that the continuance of the negotiations had reference to the whole subject of the Indirect Claims; whereas, in reference to that, the negotiations have not continued, inasmuch as no point of difficulty has been raised or suggested. I have taken the liberty of presuming on the indulgence of the House in offering to them this statement, which is a statement we think that our public duty requires we should lay at the present moment before the House.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, practically speaking, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman amounts to this—that the negotiations which he had led the House to believe must terminate to-night, may be extended by the Government of the United States for another week, or until the 10th instant. But the right hon. Gentleman has not informed the House—and I think that under these circumstances, even independently of the anxiety of the House, it ought to be informed on the point—what arrangements are made or contemplated by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to our engagements under the Treaty of Washington which are due on the 15th?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with regard to the engagement as to the proceedings at Geneva on the 15th of June, they are also, of necessity, the immediate subject of the communications now going on, and the only pledge I think the House will expect from me at the present time with respect to such communications, will be that all our proceedings will be in the strictest conformity and consistency with the assurances we have given to the House.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I am not quite assured that I correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman's statement. He says there is no difference of opinion between the two Governments as to their engagements—as to their aim, purpose, and policy. Now, I have understood the difference to be this—that the British Government has insisted that the Indirect Claims did not fall under the Treaty, and could not be submitted to arbitration; and that the Government of the United States, on the other hand, insisted that the Indirect Claims did come under the Treaty, and that the President, to use the words of my right hon. Friend, had no discretion to withdraw them; and the language of Mr. Fish, as we have seen, has been clear, consistent, and resolute on that subject. Now, the Question I have to ask is, whether or not Her Majesty's Government has any reason to suppose that the Government of the United States is at all disposed to withdraw from the position which Mr. Fish has stated—namely, that “concessions by the British Government must precede any settlement of the question?”

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I did not imply in anything I have said to the House that the United States and the British Government had arrived at a complete understanding on those questions which they have been debating during the last four or five months. My right hon. Friend is aware that the object of the Supplemental Article is to bring the matter to a controversial issue by striking out a new path to obtain the end we have in view. In fact, as he will remember, the existing differences with regard to the scope and aim of that Treaty are set forth in the Supplemental Article itself, and the endeavour is to escape from them, rather than to solve them, by a new mode of procedure. I think, then, that in what I have stated, I have stated pretty accurately the view that we take of the bearing of the Supplemental Article on the Indirect Claims. The President, by the Supplemental Article, engages, of course, contingently upon the conclusion of the Supplemental Article—and, therefore, upon the settlement of all the matters which it contains—that he will make no claim in respect of Indirect Losses at Geneva. Those words we understand to bear no meaning except one, and that is—that Claims for Indirect Losses shall not be prosecuted before, or entertained by, the Arbitrators at Geneva. The American Government has signified to us no different construction of those words. We have made known our construction of them to the American Minister at this Court, and he assures us that it is his construction also, and that it is consistent with the construction put upon them by the American Government.

Mr. Horsman

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I, for one, acknowledge the delicate situation in which Her Majesty's Government are placed, and therefore I do not intend to enter at length into the subject; but, at the same time, when the right hon. Gentleman talks of the sensitive feeling in America, I think he ought to recollect that there may be a sensitive feeling in this country, and that, so far as his explanation of the matters in hand goes, it is directly at variance with the Papers which we have seen, both private and confidential correspondence, and also with the Papers, No. 7, which have been issued this morning. I cannot therefore but say that I think the explanation he has given to-night has told us really nothing to the point. How far the House is prepared to accept this statement of the right hon. Gentleman as an explanation it is not for me to say; but I think the House will hardly be doing its duty to the country if it is satisfied with the very meagre explanation given on behalf of Her Majesty's Government as to what they intend to do at Geneva on the 15th of June. I hope this House will not be satisfied, but that they will extort, if it be necessary, from Her Majesty's Ministers something more direct, to the effect that they will refuse utterly to go into any arbitration at all, unless these Indirect Claims are fully, fairly, and at once withdrawn. We have had a long statement from the right hon. Gentleman. He has covered a very small matter with a great quantity of words; but I very much doubt whether, when that explanation goes forth, it will give satisfaction to the sensitive feeling of the people of this country. The matter has now arrived at a direct issue, and I call upon all those hon. Gentlemen who have the true honour of this country at heart not to be satisfied with the bare explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman about going into arbitration on the 15th of June, although the right hon. Gentleman says that the policy of the Government will be in conformity with the principles they have hitherto announced. I have not such confidence in the expressions or actions of the Government on the subject as to induce me to receive that promise. I hope therefore the right hon. Gentleman or some Secretary of State will give us a more direct pledge on this question, and tell us that Her Majesty's Government will not go into arbitration, unless these Indirect Claims are fully, fairly, and explicitly withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Osborne.)

MR. BOUVERIE said, he did not wish to prolong this discussion, but he wished to ask one Question, and to make one observation. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, as he had referred to and quoted the Supplemental Article, according to rule the Supplemental Article should not be laid on the Table of the House? The observation he wished to make was this—he heard with great alarm his right hon. Friend say that he and his Colleagues had an understanding as to what was the meaning of the stipulation of the Supplemental Article. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] He was in the recollection of the House that the right hon. Gentleman said—"We understand what is the meaning of the stipulation of the Supplemental Article, and we have an assurance from the Minister of the United States at this Court that that is the correct understanding," Now, as far as they knew of that transaction, a great deal of the difficulty had arisen from a similar state of things—an understanding on our part as to what was the meaning of an ambiguous clause, and the same assent, verbal or otherwise, on the part of the United States Government—that that understanding—which subsequently was departed from—was the right one. It had been said, but he did not know with what truth, because they could not get at the bottom of it, that that was the origin of all this difficulty, and therefore he said it was with considerable alarm that he heard the statement of his right hon. Friend; and he would entreat the Government not to be satisfied with a mere verbal assurance of the Minister of the United States, as to what was the meaning to be put upon this stipulation, but to have a distinct recognized acknowledgment on the part of the Government of the United States as to the meaning which they, in common with our own Government, put upon it.

VISCOUNT BURY: Sir, whatever may be the meaning of "the understanding" which has been arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and the United States with regard to the Supplemental Article, one thing, at least, is clear from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is, that at the present moment the Indirect Claims are not definitely withdrawn. It was therefore well said by the hon. Gentleman who spoke behind me (Mr. Osborne) that Mr. Fish, in the whole of his diplomatic correspondence, had never held out one single hope that the Indirect Claims should be withdrawn from the consideration of the Arbitrators at Geneva; and, therefore, when the country heard that a renewal of the negotiations had been entered on by Her Majesty's Government, it was received universally with a feeling somewhat akin to dismay. And not only that, but the position of the country—that we should never even discuss the Indirect Claims has been gathering strength day by day, and a Notice of Motion has been put on the Notice Paper of "another place" by that veteran of British statesmen, whose conduct through the whole of this matter, from the time of the escape of the Alabama until now, has, at any rate, been manly, patriotic, and intelligible. This House, too, with great self-denial, has hitherto refused to discuss the subject now before us; but I suppose that Her Majesty's Government will recognize the fact, that it is impossible to impose permanent silence upon us, and I rise accordingly for the purpose of saying that it is my intention to put upon the Paper of this House a Notice, similar in its terms to that which is to be moved by Earl Russell in "another place." I do so, as Earl Russell has stated that he does, not from any dislike to the Treaty, or any wish to embarrass the Government; not from any dislike to the Treaty, because a treaty of amity between this country and the United States must be most valuable—but it may be too dearly bought; and not from any hostility to the Government, because I believe that in discussing this matter we should not embarrass them, but rather strengthen their hands. In fact, the progress of these negotiations from the beginning, if it has shown us as anything, has shown us this—that we have been willing to concede too much, and that every concession has only evoked from the Americans renewed and increased demands. Anyone who knows American character will thoroughly understand why that is. Our concessions were regarded not as friendly concessions, but as proofs of weakness; and therefore continued negotiations have been constantly drawing us from our ground, while the Americans have held firm to the original propositions which they laid down. But if we had taken a more decided line, and, to use an American phrase—"put our foot down more firmly," we should have been far more likely to conclude the Treaty, than by allowing American politicians to suppose that we were in any respect squeezable. If this matter were discussed in this House—as I know it would be—in a quiet, calm, gentlemanly spirit, so far from embarrassing the Government we should strengthen their hands; we should do so by distinctly repudiating the Indirect Claims by a vote of this House, and by stating that this country will not under any circumstances allow them to come before the Arbitrators for discussion. In the present state of Business and of the Notice Paper it will be impossible for a private Member to bring forward such a Motion without the concurrence of the Government and their assistance. I am in the hands of the Government and the House; but I cannot suppose that they will not be willing to give every facility for bringing the subject forward at the proper time. I beg to give Notice that I intend to place the terms of my Resolution on the Notice Paper to-night.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM: Sir, I understand the right hon. Gentleman has stated the position of affairs to be this—that Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States are now perfectly agreed that the Indirect Claims are not to go before the Arbitrators at Geneva on the 15th of June. Now, that is an important statement, and it would be a satisfactory one except for what has occurred before in relation to this business. What we want to know is, not only whether they are not to go before the Arbitrators on the 15th of June, but whether they are distinctly "and unconditionally" withdrawn? If this concession has been made, and if those claims are not to go before the Arbitrators on the 15th of June, on account of the sacrifice of some prospective rights which this country may have at a future time, then the statement we have heard to-night is not satisfactory. I trust, therefore, before this discussion closes that we shall hear that the reference is not limited to the 15th of June, but that the Indirect Claims are entirely withdrawn in substance and form, and that this has been done not by any compromise of the rights of this country on a future occasion.

MR. OTWAY: Sir, I am not desirous of saying anything to embarrass the Government, nor do I blame them for any arrangement they may make, provided always that arrangement be one which is consistent with the honour and interests of the country and with the engagements which Her Majesty's Government have made with this House; nor should I have said one word on this occasion had it not been for a statement made by the Prime Minister, which seems to me to be one of great importance. If I understood the right hon. Gentleman rightly—and, I say it respectfully, it seemed to me exceedingly difficult to understand him—the position is this—The right hon. Gentleman and his Government have maintained that there was nothing in the Treaty which justified the Government of the United States in bringing what are known as the Indirect Claims before the Arbitrators at Geneva. An opinion, however, entirely opposed to that has been maintained by the United States' Government. The right hon. Gentleman, if I understood him rightly, stated to the House this afternoon that the country would be mistaken if it supposed that the difference now existing with the United States referred to that matter, for the sense of the speech I take to be this—that an understanding could be arrived at on the matter between the two Governments, provided they could agree on some prospective arrangement for some consideration which was to be given in return. Let me ask the House one moment to consider what an important statement that is. We have not been fortunate hitherto in our negotiations with the United States in this matter, and the word of warning which I wish to utter to this House is this—that we are incurring a danger far greater than that which we have already incurred, if we are about to enter into a fresh engagement with the United States as to some prospective consideration, by means of which an arrangement may be come to between the two Governments on the all-important point on which they now differ. The question which I wish to ask now, if the right hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to answer it, is, Whether any proposition on this matter has been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the United States; and, if so, whether that proposition has been accepted or not by the Government of the United States?

MR. GREGORY: There is one other point, Sir, to which I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention. It is admitted on all hands that the Supplemental Article is not in itself a withdrawal of the Indirect Claims; but the right hon. Gentleman states that the construction put on it by his Government is that it amounts to a withdrawal of those Claims, and that that construction is acquiesced in by the American Minister. What I want to know is, Whether that acquiescence of the American Minister is in writing, and in such form as to bind the Government of the United States, or whether it is one of those verbal—I cannot call them understandings but misunderstandings?

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN: The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. P. Wyndham) asked whether this was the position of the case—that the Indirect Claims were not to be pressed either on the 15th of June or at any future time. The question which I want to ask is this—Do Her Majesty's Government make it a condition of allowing the reference to arbitration to proceed, that it is understood and admitted by the American Government that the Arbitrators have no power to inquire into Indirect Claims of any kind whatever? Is that the understanding, or is it not?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Questions and points that have been taken up by various Members are a little promiscuous, but I will endeavour to answer them in as intelligible a manner as I can. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock has, I think, stated that I have said we had “an understanding” with the Government of the United States as to the meaning of certain words. That was one of the points which I contradicted, and then he appealed to the recollection of the House.

MR. BOUVERIE: What I wished to say was, quoting the words of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Government here understood what was the meaning of the Supplemental Article, and they had the assent of the Minister of the United States to that understanding; but I spoke in reference to the understanding which everybody now knows that there was as to the meaning of the Treaty of Washington.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am quite satisfied with the words of my right hon. Friend; but the understanding on the Treaty of Washington was this—that the Government had come to an understanding as to a certain Treaty and the covenants of it, though the covenants were not expressed. That is quite a different matter. I am satisfied with the words of my right hon. Friend. We do not find fault with them as being incorrect, but they are not quite complete. The state of the case is this—We believe the words to be perfectly distinct. They have not been challenged in any manner on the other side of the water; but there has been criticism upon them on this side of the water, and it is with reference to that criticism, and not to any international controversy, that I mentioned that we had fortified ourselves by obtaining the best legal advice at our command. We likewise stated our view of the matter to the American Minister, and the American Minister distinctly concurred in the view stated by Her Majesty's Government. [MR. GREGORY: Was that concurrence reduced to writing?] I am coming to that point. That is the statement I made, and I hope it is intelligible. The hon. Member for Sussex asks whether it was reduced to writing. Certainly, we have not thought it necessary or becoming, when the American Minister stated his view on a particular subject, to say to him—“Will you be kind enough to put that view in writing?” But Lord Granville has taken care to record the effect of that conversation, and to ascertain by the usual and proper means that the record is correct. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy asks whether we are making any stipulation with respect to the power of the Arbitrators at Geneva to entertain the Indirect Claims? Sir, that is no part of the subject-matter of the present negotiations. We have our own view of the powers of the Arbitrators, and when the occasion arises, it will be our duty to act on that view; but it is no part of the present negotiations to discuss the question of the power of the Arbitrators. My hon. Friend the Member for Chatham—though I think he has misapprehended the word I used—was perfectly justified in putting without Notice the Question he has addressed to me. He is very much alarmed at the phrase “consideration” employed by me, and seems to think there is to be some price not expressed or brought to the knowledge of the public, and which is to be paid by us to the American Government as an equivalent for the surrender of the prosecution of the Indirect Claims, or in other words, for a practical reduction of those Claims to a nullity. Now, no such matter is in reserve at all—nothing is in reserve. The word “consideration” was used by me, entirely for the reason that it had passed into conversation, and is so recorded in the communication between Lord Granville and the American Minister; the “consideration” being that expressed in the Article—it is a covenant for the future, and is strictly reciprocal between the two countries. I hope by that explanation I have removed any apprehension on that point from the mind of my hon. Friend. Then, my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford challenged me upon the question whether, under any circumstances, we should consent to allow the Indirect Claims to be prosecuted at Geneva. With respect to that all-important subject, I do not think this is the proper moment to enter upon it. It formed the subject of discussion before the Whitsuntide Recess; it was referred to in the terms of the Queen’s Speech, and I indicated the sense we placed upon those terms. We then referred to the single and separate views of the British Government; but we are now engaged in negotiation, endeavouring to express the combined view of the two Governments, and while we are so negotiating it would be, in my opinion, madness—it would certainly be a gross breach of duty—on the part of Her Majesty’s Government, if they were to choose that moment for going back to the expression of their separate views. Should we fail, however, to concur with the American Government, then will be the time when it will be right to state the separate views of Her Majesty’s Government. There is but one other matter to refer to. My noble Friend the Member for Berwick says he will give Notice of a Motion relating to this important question, with a view to strengthen the hands of the Government; but he says that as a private Member, he has no power of introducing any such question to the notice of the House, and, consequently, he hopes the Government will, as it is called, “give a day” for that purpose. Sir, I cannot accede to such a request. I cannot accede to the doctrine that private Members have no means of introducing subjects in which they are interested to the notice of the House, though I admit there is a degree of competition between them as to the particular subjects they wish to bring forward. In the present state of things, however, I do not think it would be consistent with my duty to interrupt the course of Business, in order that the House might discuss the Motion proposed by my noble Friend.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. GOLDNEY: I gather from what the right hon. Gentleman has said that he will have no objection to lay the Supplemental Article upon the Table; but we have had no distinct assurance to that effect.

MR. GLADSTONE: As a matter of form, the House is in possession of the Supplemental Article; but it is a point on which I should like to consult my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and I will answer the question to-morrow.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PARLIAMENT—SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE moved that, whenever the House shall meet at two o’clock the Sitting of the House shall be held subject to the Resolutions of the 30th of April, 1869.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he presumed that nothing in this Resolution would preclude the House from considering the question whether the House should in future sit at two o’clock on Tuesdays, Government Business being taken at the Evening Sitting.

MR. GLADSTONE replied in the negative.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That, whenever the House shall meet at Two o’clock, the sitting of the House shall be held subject to the Resolutions of the House of the 30th day of April 1869.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SUPPLY.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a further sum, not exceeding £846,100, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services, to the 31st day of March 1873 :"
viz.—

[Then the several Services are set forth.]

MR. BAXTER, in asking for a further Vote on Account, said, he was not surprised at the indisposition on the part of the House to permit these frequent Votes on Account, instead of going on with the consideration of the Votes in detail. There was a natural feeling that the new system to some extent committed the House to the principle involved in the various Votes, and that it might have a tendency to delay the consideration of the Civil Service Estimates to the close of the Session. The explanation was, that up to the time of the passing of the Exchequer and Audit Act, the balances upon the various Votes were applicable to the current expenses of the year, and consequently it was within the power of the Government to go on till a late period of the Session without going into Committee of Supply. All that, however, had been changed. The provisions of the statute he had cited were of the most rigorous character. On the 31st of March, or the day after, every shilling of surplus upon the Votes had to be surrendered into the Exchequer, and consequently the House of Commons must take one of three courses, either pass the whole of the Civil Service Estimates on the 1st of April, or vote money on account, or repeal the Exchequer and Audit Act. The Government were urged very strongly last year, by several hon. Gentlemen opposite, to bring in the Estimates at the commencement of the Session, and to pass them on without delay. That would, however, be, in his opinion, an extremely unwise as well as unconstitutional course. Arbitrary and despotic Governments in former times were anxious to have recourse to that mode of proceeding, and when Supply was obtained Parliament was prorogued. Things had, however, greatly changed, and the principal part of the Session was now devoted to legislative business. That being so, the best course, he contended, to pursue was, to pass Votes on Account, and thus furnish the time which would enable the House to make progress with the legislative business before it. The Government, in adopting that course, were simply following the recommendation of the Select Committee, and he begged hon. Members distinctly to understand that it was the intention of the Government to avail themselves of every available opportunity which might present itself to go on with the consideration of the Estimates in detail. They intended to have proceeded with them last Friday, and would probably have succeeded in obtaining a good many Votes had it not been for the unexpected length of one of the discussions which preceded Supply. Under these circumstances the House would, he hoped, have no difficulty in assenting to the Vote for which he now asked.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would not trouble the Committee with any observations on the Audit Act, but he must protest against the growing practice of the Government in taking Votes on Account and not giving the House proper time for the discussion of the Votes in Supply. It certainly was not the intention of the Legislature when the Act to which he had just referred had been passed, that Supply should be stifled. Let hon. Members look at the position in which matters now stood. It was now the 3rd of June, and the House had sat in Committee of Supply eight days since the commencement of the Session. There were still four most important Votes connected with the Navy to be passed which would take some time to discuss. Only one Vote for the Army had been agreed to, seven for the Civil Service, and not one at all in the Miscellaneous Estimates. That, he was sure, the House could not regard as a very satisfactory state of things; and if the answer of the Prime Minister with respect to the course of Business the other evening were taken into account, hon. Members would, he thought, be of opinion that it was quite time some remonstrance should be made against the mode in which Supply was treated. The Scotch Education Bill and the Mines Regulation Bill were no doubt very important measures; but the taxpayers of the country ought to have some assurance that the House of Commons, who held the purse-strings of the country, would not neglect their interests.

Entertaining those views, he begged to give Notice, that if a further Vote on Account were asked for, at all events until much greater progress was made with the Estimates, he should oppose it.

MR. RYLANDS said, he must express his regret that his hon. Friend had not carried out on the present occasion the resolution which he announced last year, to oppose Votes on Account at so late a period of the Session. Last year there might have been some slight excuse for the Government taking a Vote on Account on the eve of the Whitsuntide holidays, but they had no such excuse to offer that evening. He should be glad, he might add, to see Monday nights taken by the Government for Supply, and they might do so the more easily now that they were about to have Tuesday and Friday mornings at their disposal, for the purpose of making progress with legislative measures. To ask for a Vote on Account for four weeks from the present time, meant simply that Supply was to be postponed until the heat of July arrived, and many hon. Members would be leaving London. As to taking Supply at odd scraps of time, he entirely objected to it; for when it was fixed for Friday evenings, for instance, when other Business was before the House, it was impossible for hon. Members to know whether it was to come on or not. There seemed to be an opinion growing up that no practical good resulted from discussion in Supply; for the result was that when Votes were discussed hon. Members were told that they were only wasting time, and that if they wanted to effect a reduction in expenditure they must propose a Motion in general terms with that object. But when such a Motion was proposed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer immediately got up and said that it was all very well to raise grand discussions of that kind, but what the Government required was the assistance of hon. Members in Committee of Supply. Well, he, for one, wished to render that assistance, and he was reluctant to believe that the House of Commons would willingly relinquish one of its most important functions. The Civil Service Estimates, he found, were gradually increasing, for they now exceeded by £1,000,000 the amount for 1869, an increase which he did not think was at all satisfactory to the country.

Mr. Assheton Cross

MR. GLADSTONE said, the grant asked for was required to meet the honourable engagements of the country. A day or two hence the money would be absolutely wanted, and if any question could arise upon the matter, it was a question affecting the conduct of the Government. The Government time was but a fixed quantity, and he regretted that that debate had arisen, for it tended to delay the Scotch Education Bill longer than was necessary. He hoped, however, within the course of the next four weeks to make considerable progress in Supply. The hon. Member for Warrington should remember as regards the employment of Mondays, that the Ballot had hitherto occupied the attention of the House on that day.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, a postponement of Supply for the purpose of passing some great political measure was an unconstitutional mode of proceeding, for the primary object for which they had been sent to Parliament was to check expenditure; and, probably, if Supply had been taken earlier last Session there would have been a discussion on the American Treaty, which would have had the effect of preventing England from being placed in her present humiliating position. He thought the Committee would be perfectly justified, under the circumstances, in refusing to give the Government more than half the amount now asked for.

MR. CANDLISH said, he could well understand hon. Members opposite objecting to the postponement of Supply, because it had been postponed in favour of a measure which was unpalatable to them; but he could not understand the motives of the hon. Member for Warrington, because the time had been employed in furthering a measure which he was anxious to see passed. Would he have had the Ballot Bill postponed for a single night? ["No!"] Well, that was the main measure of the Session, and they had been engaged on it night after night.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it had been a leading argument of the Prime Minister with regard to Supply, that important Votes should be discussed on their merits; but, instead of that, the House were asked to take a Vote on Account. The position of the right hon. Gentleman—that it was the primary business of the Government to conclude its legislative programme before asking for Votes in Supply, was a startling and novel doctrine; and he hoped the House would never tolerate anything so mischievous as that political measures were to be allowed to occupy the time of the House almost exclusively until the close of the Session, and that then the Estimates were to be hurriedly pushed through Committee without criticism or comment.

MR. DILLWYN said, he must agree that the way in which the Estimates were "shunted" till the fag-end of the Session made the control of the House over them a perfect farce. He had a Motion on the Paper to strike off altogether the Vote for the office of the Privy Seal—an office not of the slightest use, and one, therefore, which ought to be abolished. Now, however, the Government were taking a sum for that sinecure office, thus forestalling by their Votes on Account the Motions of private Members. If this Vote on Account were granted, he was afraid at the end of a month they would be told the same story and be asked for another Vote on Account. Instead of giving a whole month's Supply, he would suggest that the House should only give half that amount, which would be quite enough. He would, therefore, move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £423,050.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a further sum, not exceeding £423,050, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the above-mentioned Civil Services, to the 31st day of March 1873."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he understood the Prime Minister to say that the Scotch Education Bill was to be carried on de die in diem at Morning and Evening Sitings. Did he know then there were no less than 30 pages of Amendments in that Bill; and did he not think it would be better to withdraw a Bill which uprooted the established system of education in Scotland, and which was very unpopular, than to postpone Supply?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had not stated that, as against Supply, he would go on with the Scotch Education Bill de die in diem. He hoped that the House would be able to get through that Bill in the present week.

MR. GOLDSMID said, they had the prospect before them of being again asked late in July at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning to vote away millions of the public money when discussion was out of the question. Instead of doing that, it would be better to vote the Estimates en bloc in one evening, and not trouble themselves any further about the matter. The plea as to the Scotch Education Bill might equally apply to a dozen other Government Bills, and they might go on indefinitely giving Votes on Account. He should support the proposal of the hon. Member for Swansea.

MR. HERMON asked the Secretary of the Treasury, whether the House, by agreeing to that Vote on Account, would be precluded from striking out of the Estimates at a later period any particular item which might be deemed objectionable?

MR. BAXTER said, hon. Members would not be bound to agree to any particular item; but were now merely asked to vote a sum on account of the whole Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 202: Majority 75.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Resolved, That a further sum, not exceeding £42,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the Post Office Telegraph Service, to the 31st day of March 1873.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 31.]
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Clause 1 (Interpretation of Act).

MR. GORDON said, he would suggest that, as his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock (Mr. Grieve) and himself had placed Amendments upon the Paper, involving questions of principle which would arise on the clause, and as the Preamble had been postponed, it would be better to postpone the consideration of those principles until other portions of the Bill had been disposed of.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the question was between the scheme of the Bill, part of which was the establishment of a Government Department to be called "The Scotch Education Department," and the scheme of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen (Mr. Gordon), which was the establishment of a statutory Board of Education in Scotland. That was a question which must be discussed at a very early stage, and from the best consideration he was able to give to the subject, he thought that question might be as conveniently discussed now as at a later period of the discussion on the Bill.

MR. GRIEVE, who had an Amendment on the Paper substituting a Board of Education for Scotland instead of the Scotch Education Department, said, the question resolved itself into the simple issue—whether they were to have an Education Board for Scotland, or whether they were to have the educational affairs of that country managed by a Committee of the Privy Council. He believed he expressed the feelings of the people of Scotland generally, when he said that they were greatly in favour of a Board in Scotland. A short time ago, about 35 Scotch Liberal Members had an interview with the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate with regard to the Bill, and the right hon. and learned Lord then said that if his (Mr. Grieve's) Amendment, or that of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon) were carried, he should consider it fatal to the Bill; but that, as he was willing to consult the feelings of the people of Scotland, he was disposed to recommend that a Commission should be appointed to sit in Edinburgh, and to continue in existence four or five years, to put the Bill into working shape. If that Commission were properly constituted, it would, to a great extent, satisfy him (Mr. Grieve), for he confessed he would rather have the Bill pretty much as it stood, than no Bill at all. He trusted that the right hon. and learned Lord would be explicit on this point. For these reasons he preferred to withdraw his Amendment, and allow the issue to be taken upon that of the hon. and learned Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen; and the course which he should himself afterwards take would depend upon the explanation which the right hon. and learned Lord would give of the intentions of the Government in the matter.

Mr. Gordon

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should, of course, abstain as far as possible from offering the same explanation twice over to the Committee upon a subject so important as that brought under the notice of the Committee by his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock. ["Order!"] He asked the indulgence of the Committee while he expressed his obligation to his hon. Friend for the considerate course he had taken.

LORD HENRY SCOTT rose to Order. He understood the hon. Member for Greenock to withdraw his Amendment. [An hon. MEMBER: He never moved it.] Then, he should like to know what question was before the Committee?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he only wished to make a remark in courtesy to his hon. Friend.

MR. GORDON in rising to move, as an Amendment, in page 2, to leave out lines 5, 6, and 7, and insert "Board of Education shall mean the Board of Education for Scotland constituted in terms of this Act," said, that he could not understand how the Representatives of Scotland could allow themselves—and he trusted they would not allow themselves—to be influenced in this matter by the consideration that any Amendment for the establishment of a Scotch Board would be regarded as fatal by the Government. It was their duty to make as good a Bill of that as possible, and to make it as palatable to the people of Scotland who were to be placed under its operation as they could, consistently with justice to other parts of the United Kingdom. The question was a very important one, being neither more nor less than this—What was the proper body to superintend education in Scotland? Was it to be a Board in Scotland, or a branch of the Privy Council in England? The people of Scotland were unanimous in the answer they had given to that alternative. The Scotch people required that there should be a Board of Education established in Scotland for the purpose of carrying out the Bill. What was the evidence of that? The fact that the Established Church, the Free Church, the United Presbyterians, however they might differ upon other matters, were all agreed upon that point; so, also, were the Universities of Scotland, and surely they were bodies well qualified to express an opinion on the subject. They thought that if there was not a Board of Education established in Scotland, the system of education which had hitherto existed in their parish schools would become deteriorated to such an extent that the people would no longer derive the blessings from these schools that Scotland had hitherto enjoyed. Then, all the schoolmasters of Scotland were clearly of that opinion. They had Petitions from 220,000 people who required a Scotch Board as one of the essential provisions of the Bill; while they had not 4,000 who approved of the Bill generally without such a provision. In 1854 and 1855 a Bill was introduced by Her Majesty's then Government, containing a provision for a Board of Education in Scotland very much of the same representative character as that provided for in his Motion. The Scotch Commission was, however, appointed in 1864, who took two or three years to consider this question. They were men of different ecclesiastical bias, and were unanimous in the opinion that there should be a Board of Education for Scotland, and they recommended that it should be of a representative character. Then, again, the Bill of 1869 was introduced by the Duke of Argyll in the House of Lords—and he (Mr. Gordon) ventured to say there was no person better entitled to express an opinion of the feelings of the people of Scotland on the subject of education than that nobleman. Well, the Duke of Argyll's Bill contained a representative Board, and his Grace said he had heard differences of opinion as to whether the Board should be vested in a Department of the Government or in a separate Board, and for his part he could not conceive that any doubt should be entertained on the subject by those who had looked into the matter; and it was for that reason that the Commissioners expressed their opinion that the Board should be a representative one, embracing various great interests, including the county and burgh interests; that of higher education represented by two members chosen by the Universities of Scotland; the schoolmasters themselves by one; and that two should be nominated by the Crown. The question was ultimately settled by admitting the principle that there ought to be a Scotch Board, but that the members should be nominated by the Crown. When the Bill came down to this House, however, there was an enlargement of the members, and it was proposed that some of them should not be paid. [Mr. M'LAREN: The Law Officers of the Crown were added.] He had not the least objection to that; but was of opinion that it would be hopeless to expect that the right hon. and learned Lord would have the time to discharge any of the duties. In the House the principle of a Scotch Board was supported by the Lord Advocate of the day (Lord Moncreiff), though he expressed his regret at the alteration by the present right hon. and learned Lord, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Education, who pointed out at the same time that it would be advantageous to have the two matters of the administration of the Parliamentary grant and the money derived from the rates kept perfectly distinct. In England schools were under the administration of the Privy Council, and the reason for that was that the original administration of the National Schools in England was under the Privy Council. One reason why Scotch schools should not be subjected to the management of the Privy Council was, that the system of education in country schools in Scotland differed essentially from the system of education in England, and so difficult had it been for the Privy Council to work the Scotch system that in 1862 it was resolved that the Revised Code should not extend to Scotland. In fact, the feeling in Scotland was strong against the adoption of the Revised Code of 1862, and till the present time the schools in Scotland were under the Code of 1860. Now, some of those who were educated under the Scotch system had distinguished themselves by getting the highest position in the English Universities, and last year a gentleman who had been educated at a parish school, and had become a professor of Hebrew, was selected as one of those who sat on the revision of the Bible. But the Privy Council system, which was a mere elementary system, would, if applied to Scotland, have a most deleterious effect on the education of the schools, and that was the opinion of men of all kinds of politics; and in confirmation of that opinion, he had received representations from Professors and from Universities, who felt satisfied that unless there was a Board in Scotland, the people of that country would be subjected to very prejudicial influences in regard to that education which they had hitherto enjoyed. But what was the case with respect to Ireland? Ireland could make herself heard; her Members always stood up for her rights, and he wished very much that Scotch Members would imitate their example, and give effect to the opinions—the unanimous opinions of the people of Scotland. A Commission was issued three or four years ago to inquire into the state of education in Ireland, and to report whether any improvement could be made in the Board who administered it. That Board consisted of 20 members—10 Protestants and 10 Roman Catholics—and, with respect to it, the Commission reported that they had come to the conclusion that, at present, it was the best plan to preserve the Board as a representative and consultative body. It had been said that there would be a jealousy on the part of other Boards in Scotland, on account of the formation of a new one for this purpose; but the Report of the Committee of the Poor Law of Scotland expressed its highest satisfaction at the existing Board of Supervision, and there was even some notion of extending its powers, if found expedient. He therefore asked why, if the House of Commons trusted Irishmen with more than £400,000 a-year for the purposes of national education, they could not trust Scotchmen as well? They did not want to interfere with the financial affairs of the Privy Council; but what they wanted was that they should have—as they had always hitherto had—a managing body at the head of education in Scotland. It would be an injustice to Scotland if it did not get a Board; and he should like to know what there was to prevent the Government from returning to the principle on which they proposed to legislate in 1869, and their predecessors in 1854? He was asking the Committee now to vote on the question that there should be a Scotch Board, and it would be a subsequent question how that Board should be constituted. He, however, would propose that the Board should be constituted as follows:—Two persons to be chosen by the conveners of counties, as representatives of the country; two persons to be chosen by the Provosts of Royal and Parliamentary burghs; one by each of the four Universities; one by the Educational Institute of Scotland; three by Her Majesty, one of whom should act as Chairman; and he had no objection to add the Lord Advocate and Solicitor General of Scotland as ex officio members. But he was now asking the Committee to vote not upon the constitution of the Board, but upon the question that there should be such a Board in Scotland, leaving its constitution to be afterwards determined by the House, and, in his view, it would be unjust to withhold it. He regretted that he was obliged to bring the Motion on without having had the advantage of hearing the views of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate upon it—the forms of the House not permitting him to give such explanation on the second reading. He could not help thinking that the right hon. and learned Lord would be in favour of adopting a principle which he adopted in 1869, and which was adopted by his predecessor, and adopt his Amendment, which was—

Mr. Gordon

“That such proposal shall mean a Board of Education in Scotland, constituted in the terms of this Act.”

Hon. Members, however, would not, by voting for the Amendment, pledge themselves to the approval of the constitution of the Board as he should thereafter propose it; and all he wanted was an affirmation of the principle that the Scotch system of education should be watched over and managed by an Education Board in Scotland. That was a proposal which ought, at least, to receive the sanction of Scotchmen. He had every confidence that the fair play of Englishmen would give effect to it; and as to Irishmen, he should be very much astonished if they did not support a principle which, if they opposed it in the case of Scotland, they could not expect to see applied to their own country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 8, to leave out from the words “Scotch Education Department,” to the words “in Scotland,” in line 7, and insert the words,

"Board of Education shall mean the Board of Education for Scotland constituted in terms of this Act."—(Mr. Gordon.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, although the Amendment had reference merely to a definition, he admitted that that was a convenient mode of raising a discussion on the question at issue between the Government and his hon. and learned Friend. He, however, could have wished that his hon. and learned Friend had stated what were the duties which he intended the Board which he contemplated should perform; for he doubted whether his hon. and learned Friend quite appreciated the vastness of the alteration which he proposed. On the other hand, the scheme of the Bill was, he trusted, quite intelligible; for, speaking generally, it established a system of national as distinguished from a denominational system of education. Its great leading features were—First, that the money voted by the Imperial Parliament for national education should, in Scotland as in England, be administered by the Government and not by a statutory Board, irresponsible to the Government, and for whose proceedings therefore the Government could not be responsible to Parliament. Secondly, that a popularly-elected school board should be forthwith established in every parish and burgh, and that the duties of each school board should be to manage all public rate-supported schools within its district, to provide such additional public school accommodation as should be necessary within the district, and to impose and levy such local school rates as were necessary. Thirdly, that there should be one uniform system of management, applicable without distinction to all public rate-supported schools, whether existing before the Act, or established under the Act, to supply ascertained deficiencies. Fourthly, that in the teaching of religion there should be no further interference by legislative enactment than should be necessary to secure that the teaching should be at such hours as should not interrupt or interfere with the secular instruction, and that those who did not desire their children to receive religious teaching should be able to withdraw them without losing any part of the secular teaching in the schools. These were the great features of the Government system, to which generally the House assented by passing the second reading; whereas the Amendment now proposed, viewing it as a key-note to the series of Amendments of his hon. and learned Friend, embodied another system of education, not only not in harmony with the Bill, but altogether inconsistent with at least three of the essential features he had mentioned. His hon. and learned Friend, in fact, proposed that Imperial money, voted for national education, although in England administered by the Government, should in Scotland be administered by a statutory Board, having an independent statutory existence, not responsible to the Government, not controlled by the Government, not represented in Parliament, and not responsible to Parliament. The Bill of 1854, which was lauded by his hon. and learned Friend, contained no provision analogous to that; neither did the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners on Education, or the measure introduced by the Duke of Argyll in 1869 contain anything at all resembling it. In fact, there was no precedent whatever for Parliament committing the administration of something like £250,000 of public money—and the fair share of Scotland in the education grant annually voted could not be far short of that amount—to a statutory Board not responsible to Parliament, and whose duties were defined by the Legislature. The intention of the Government scheme was that the Scotch Education Department should be a Government Department, responsible to Parliament for the manner in which it performed its duties; whereas under his hon. and learned Friend's scheme the Committee of Council would have no right to exercise any judgment in the matter, but would simply have to hand over the £250,000 to a Scotch Office, to be distributed according to the rates, and under the conditions contained in the Minutes of the Scotch Board of Education, and Parliament would, in that case, have no control whatever over the spending of the money. By another Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend it was proposed, in very emphatic terms, that the Board of Education should devise an Educational Code for Scotland, and should from time to time make rules and regulations for the conduct of the business, and so on.

MR. GORDON observed, that the rules and regulations would have to lie on the Table of the House for a month.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that was true; but he did not see how the House was to give effect to an adverse opinion on the subject. It would have no power over the statutory Board, and if the House of Commons said it did not approve of the rules and regulations, the answer might be—"We don't care about that; the duty of framing rules and regulations has been committed to us." A stranger proposal than that he had never heard of, and he believed that nothing of the kind had ever been submitted to the House before. His hon. and learned Friend said over and over again that it was not fair to Scotland to commit the management of Scotch schools to a department of the Privy Council. Well, there was no such provision in the Bill; for the management of the schools was committed to the school boards in Scotland, and to no one else, and nothing whatever connected with the management of the schools in Scotland was committed to the Privy Council. He rather thought his hon. and learned Friend was endeavouring to establish denominational schools rather than the national system which the Government wished to create, for one part of his scheme was, that there should be no school board established in any parish until the Board of Education had determined that it was necessary; and it was not to determine that it was necessary, until a sufficient time had been given to supply an existing deficiency by denominational efforts; and even although the deficiency had not been supplied, it was not to order a school board to be established, if it thought the people of the district were in course of supplying it. Now, the Government was entirely opposed to that. They thought the proper course—and it was a leading feature of their measure—was to establish immediately a school board not only in every burgh, but in every parish, and to enable the Government to apply a spur to the local bodies if they were negligent in their duties, and dilatory in supplying local deficiencies. The Government always being amenable to the jurisdiction of Parliament, could not at all consent to abandon their scheme in order to allow it to be superseded by one so essentially opposed to it in principle as that of his hon. and learned Friend, although they knew it was consistent with his preference for denominational education.

MR. M'LAREN rose to Order, and observed that the Lord Advocate was discussing 20 clauses all in one. He wished to know what they might expect if other hon. Members of the Committee were allowed to adopt the same course?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was impossible to discuss the Bill satisfactorily, or even intelligibly, without comparing the two schemes. His hon. and learned Friend had referred to what he had termed "the multitude of signatures" to the Petitions against the Bill. He should have thought that his hon. and learned Friend had more knowledge of the real value of signatures of that sort than to refer to them as of significance in the matter now before the Committee. They could all imagine how "multitudes of signatures" had been obtained, and how multitudes of names had been subscribed by the same hand, in many instances on the statement that there was a proposal to drive the Bible from the schools. Let them get a servant-girl to write the names of her brothers and sisters to the statement which his hon. and learned Friend knew to be false, and this was taken as the opinion of the "people of Scotland" in favour of a statutory Board. Indeed, to talk on this matter at length would be simply idle. An overwhelming majority of the towns of Scotland had petitioned in favour of the Bill, and the number of signatures thus appended were many-fold more than those against it. He knew the manner in which the Petitions against the Bill were hawked about the country, and how it was said—"Oh! this is petitioning for the Bible;" but he did not intend to waste time by considering the matter any further. His hon. and learned Friend took the case of Ireland as conclusive in favour of his proposal; but was he aware that the Irish system did not exist by Act of Parliament? There were no school boards in Ireland. There was only one Board, consisting of 20 members, of whom 10 were Protestants and 10 Roman Catholics, each holding office at the will of the Lord Lieutenant. Would his hon. and learned Friend be content with such a system in Scotland? Were they to have a Board nominated by the Government, and consisting of Roman Catholics and Protestants, making allowance for the difference in the ratio of the Roman Catholic population. Considered with reference to Scotland, did his hon. and learned Friend think that that was preferable to the proposal in the Bill now before the Committee? He must here express his thanks to the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Grieve) for refraining from pressing his own view on this matter; and he could only say that if it was in accordance with the opinions and feelings of the Representatives of Scotland that there should be a Board there, not to administer the public money, but to perform those duties which would be necessary on the first introduction of that new system, to consult with the local boards in regard to the establishment of schools, he should have no difficulty in assenting to such a proposal. But when he spoke of the administration of the public money he did not apprehend that that money would be embezzled or misappropriated by those to whom it was handed over; but he maintained that the money voted by Parliament for a particular purpose should be administered by a body responsible to Parliament and in the manner most calculated to promote the interest of the country. His hon. Friend had said the Privy Council was not to be trusted; and his reason for saying that was, because the Privy Council, in deference to what he represented to be the wishes and opinions of the people of Scotland, had abstained from applying to Scotland the Revised Code which they made applicable to England. He (the Lord Advocate) must say he proposed to make it more Scotch than now, for he proposed to constitute a Scotch Department in the Privy Council, which would act with reference to Scotland particularly, and be guided by the feelings and the reasonable wishes and opinions of the people of that country. For these reasons, he should oppose the Amendment.

MR. M'LAREN said, he must acknowledge that he had all along been one of a small minority who thought that the Privy Council would manage matters better than a Scotch Board of Education would be likely to do; but he now found that at least nine-tenths of the people of Scotland were in favour of the establishment of a Scotch Board at Edinburgh, and, in deference to that opinion, therefore, he should support the Amendment. He was opposed to the 3rd clause of the Bill, which authorized the Privy Council to appoint such officers in Scotland as they might deem necessary to perform the duties connected with the Department which might be deemed proper and convenient to be performed there, subject to the control of the Department. As far as expense was concerned, such officers would cost the public quite as much as a central Scotch Board at Edinburgh, of which only the chairman and the secretary would be paid members, and those gentlemen, whoever they might be, would carry about in their pockets the whole power of the Privy Council, and would do their work quite as efficiently as the mysterious representatives of the Privy Council. He had always stated his belief that a Local Scotch Board would never be intrusted with the expenditure of public money; and, indeed, the example that had been furnished by the administration of a sum of £416,000, which was intrusted last year to an Irish Board, ought to be a warning to that House not to fall into the error again of intrusting large sums of public money to local bodies. He had no desire that the measure should be rejected — on the contrary, he had accepted it in good faith, and all the Amendments that he had placed upon the Paper were such as were calculated not to alter its nature, but merely to improve it in matters of detail. He would remind the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that he had made a mistake when he stated that the vast majority of the Petitions presented in reference to this measure were in its favour, as the exact contrary was the fact.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he must maintain that the proposed Board would be sufficiently responsible to Parliament. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate objected so strongly to a statutory Board administering public funds that one would think no such thing as a statutory Board, having the administration of public funds, existed in Scotland; there were, however, such Boards, one of which—the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor—expended £10,000 a-year for the medical relief of the poor; yet that appeared to be the great objection to the Amendment. At that side of the House, he must say that they were not wedded to any particular constitution of a Board, and they would be satisfied with an intermediate Board between the people of Scotland and the Privy Council, or a board analogous to that proposed in the Bill of 1869. Their anxious desire was, that the standard of education in Scotland should not be lowered; and with regard to that, they had not faith in the administration of the Privy Council with respect to Scotch education. It was a subject of great disappointment to him that the Government had met the proposal in so hostile a spirit; for if he could trust the rumours which were heard out-of-doors, the carrying of the Amendments would be held to be fatal to the Bill, and that he regarded as a threat which ought not to have been used.

MR. CARNEGIE said, there was an old saying, that "he who paid the piper had a right to call the tune;" and for his part, he did not think they could constitute a Board so entirely above everything else that it could be allowed to spend the public money without the intervention of the Privy Council. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Graham Montgomery) seemed to be in favour of an intermediate Board, while the hon. and learned Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) spoke at one time of a Board which should be independent of the Privy Council, and at another of a Board which should be subject to it—in fact, there seemed to be some confusion in the mind of the hon. and learned Gentleman. For his own part, he thought the proposal that an independent Board should be intrusted with the spending of such large sums of money was one that ought not to be listened to. He thought that such a Board was unnecessary, as the people of Scotland would have their local Boards to come between them and the Privy Council, and they did not want a central Board at Edinburgh to do as all Edinburgh Boards did—try to bring all Scotland to the level of Edinburgh. If they were asked whether they would be ruled from Downing Street or from Princes Street, they would say the former—for they disliked the interference of Edinburgh and the Parliament House party in their local affairs. Moreover, if the proposed Board were appointed what would it do? It would try to make business for itself. And how would it do so? By perpetually quarrelling with the local Boards. At the same time, if there was to be a sort of intermediate Board, as the hon. Baronet opposite called it, he did not think it would be able to do much mischief. He must say it was a matter of some surprise to him to hear so much praise from the other side of the Bill of 1869, considering who the people were who took part in throwing it out. Probably, if the present Bill were defeated, they would hear next year, or the year after, what an excellent Bill that of 1872 was. He hoped the cause of education in Scotland would not be allowed to suffer by reason of a wrangle about a Scotch Education Board.

Sir Graham Montgomery

MR. M'LAGAN said, he believed that if there was one thing more than another in which the people of Scotland were agreed it was this—that if they were to have a national system of education for Scotland, it should be managed and administered by a body of men who should be resident in Scotland, and not in London. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had treated very lightly the Petitions which had been presented; but he (Mr. M'Lagan), as a Member of the Committee by which the Petitions were examined, could state that he had gone through the Petitions, and found that they were all but unanimous on the subject of having a Scotch central Board. It was said by his hon. Friend who had just spoken (Mr. Carnegie) that such a Board would create duties for themselves by quarrelling with the local Boards. It would have no need to do so, as his hon. Friend would see if he read the Bill. There was ample work for the board to do, and those duties could be far more efficiently performed by a body resident in Scotland than by a section of the Privy Council. A London Board, moreover, would not for one thing be amenable to the public opinion of Scotland; for a section of the Privy Council would be entirely under the influence of those Members of the Privy Council who had to do with English education. He had himself written letters to the Privy Council, and received replies stating that "My Lords" desired this, and "My Lords" thought that; and he afterwards found out that "My Lords" had never desired or thought either this or that, never having seen the letters at all. He hoped, therefore, they would not have the conduct of Scotch education handed over to some supercilious subordinate or consequential official, and against such a course he, for one, should protest. He was, therefore, prepared to support the Board intimated in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Glasgow, if the Government did not give them a distinct promise—far more distinct than the Lord Advocate had given them—as to the nature and character of the Board of which he had spoken; that it would be appointed immediately; and that it would not be a permissive Board, but a Board that should be appointed to carry out the Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that the question really lay between the choice of the authority of the Privy Council or the local Board, and he had no hesitation in saying that he should be very much afraid of the infliction of such a body as that proposed by his hon. and learned Friend opposite. What he wanted, however, was that Her Majesty's Government should give to Scotch Members, who were deeply and really interested in this question, a more definite explanation than they had yet had of the proposal they were making—a more exact definition of the functions which it was proposed the ruling body should exercise, and upon that point Government ought certainly to give the Committee satisfaction. Why, if schools were to be established all over the country, should their direction not be subjected to the local authority or the authorities of the place? In the Bill there ought to be more consideration for the great difficulty, and, at the same time, the great importance of managing local affairs; and therefore he should in Committee, when those local authorities came to be constituted, endeavour to make them as efficient as possible, in order to the due discharge of their duties. With respect to the powers proposed to be conferred upon the Privy Council, he looked upon them as most dangerous; and, besides that, there were other provisions in the Bill—especially those as to the size of parishes—which were most absurd. Then there was a most delicate question as to how educational grants were to be given in aid of individual schools. The Scotch Members had a right to look to that, and it was for the Representatives of Scotland to stand between the people and the Government on a great educational question like that. He could not conceal from himself the fact that when this Bill was first introduced into the House there was a great and sensitive feeling of uneasiness that Scotland should suffer in this education scheme. He, however, trusted that Her Majesty's Government were fully alive to the great cause of education which really lay in their hands, and that in anything they might do with respect to the public schools of Scotland they would not lower, but, on the contrary, elevate them. Above all, let them maintain the standard of the schools.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the proposal of his hon. Friend, if carried out, would ensure plenty of work for the Board to do, even if it was only in complying with the recommendations of the Commissioners of Education. There was no doubt that the whole people of Scotland desired that there should be a local Board to administer the Act proposed to be passed, and it was not intended that the Board should interfere with the duties of the Privy Council in reference to the Parliamentary grant. He therefore trusted that the House would accede to the wishes of the people of Scotland, and adopt the Amendment proposed.

MR. GRAHAM said, he could not understand what was the difficulty which surrounded the matter. As far as he could understand the point, what they had to decide was not whether there was to be a Scotch Board, composed of different bodies, but whether there was to be a Scotch Department of Education in the Privy Council; for if the Amendment were carried, it would altogether abolish the Scotch Department of the Privy Council, a result he could by no means approve. And however reluctant he might be to oppose the progress of the Bill, yet if the Amendment had simply affirmed the necessity for a Scotch Board he should have voted for it. He believed this Scotch Education Bill was the best Bill ever brought forward by any Government for the improvement of Scotch education, for although nine or ten Bills had been brought into Parliament in the last 20 years, yet no Bill had commanded such universal support as the present one. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had underrated the feeling in Scotland with respect to the local Boards, because the feeling of Scotland was in favour of their maintenance. He should be very sorry to interfere with the Bill, because he believed it was framed with a view to the best interests of Scotland; but still, he thought that there ought to be some central point of communication between the various local Boards and the Privy Council, and therefore he hoped the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would give an assurance that the institution of some central Board of that kind would be conceded.

MR. MACFIE said, that there was almost a universal feeling in Scotland in favour of a Scotch Board of some kind, and of an efficient character, and the people there would not be satisfied with the Privy Council having the predominant influence in respect to Scotch education. The first objection he had to the appointment of Privy Councillors to administer education in Scotland was that such appointments would virtually be life appointments, because anyone who was made a member of the Privy Council for a particular purpose could not be put aside without casting a stigma on his character. The management of education by means of a Privy Council was totally at variance with the theory on which the Scotch people conducted education, for they held that the proceedings of the managers of education should be in public, and be subject to every sort of investigation. Another serious objection to the administration of education in Scotland by means of Privy Councillors was that, meeting at a distance, it could not be easily consulted, and thus the benefit of a Department within reach of the people and placed in Edinburgh would not be enjoyed. Again, such a Department would naturally acquire narrow London or provincial views, the officials would be supreme, and there would be a predominance of the Episcopalian element. He contended that the 25th clause of the Treaty of Union provided that the body directing education should remain within the kingdom of Scotland; and, therefore, if this change were carried out, by the same justice they ought to transfer the Irish Board to London. This proceeding would cause estrangement between the people of Scotland and the Liberals of the Empire, and end in a result he should deeply regret.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he should most certainly vote against the Amendment, and must express a hope that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would state very clearly what he intended to do with regard to an Education Board for Scotland. He could assure his right hon. and learned Friend that he had no sympathy with the plan proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon), or rather with such a Board as he had indicated. Indeed, he (Mr. Crum-Ewing) would rather have no Bill at all than accept such a Board, for he believed it would be most detrimental to Scotland. But he thought that such a Board as the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had indicated would have the approval of Scotland. There could, however, be no doubt that a strong feeling existed in Scotland in favour of a Scotch Board: it had met with the support of most of the Scotch Members, and he himself had received a resolution passed by the corporation of the burgh which he represented, approving generally of the Bill, but strongly praying for a Scotch Board.

Mr. Graham

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that in answer to the appeal which had been made to him, he wished to state more explicitly than he had done what he intended with reference to a temporary Board to aid in organizing the new system in Scotland. What he had intended to state was that he should be prepared, if it appeared to be in accordance with the general wish of the Scotch Representatives, to assent—not, however, without qualification—to the proposal which was embodied in the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan). In the Amendment, his hon. Friend had inadvertently put upon the temporary Board all the duties which by the Bill were put upon the Scotch Department of the Privy Council. His hon. Friend stated that his intention was not to interfere with the Government in the administration of the Imperial money, but to leave that duty entirely to the Government, to be performed according to the rules and regulations made by the Government under its ordinary Parliamentary responsibility. With that explanation, and referring to Clause 3 of the Bill upon which the Amendment of his hon. Friend was proposed, he understood that Amendment to be—and it was in this sense that he was prepared to assent to it—that instead of the merely permissive language which was used in the clause—

"It shall be lawful for," there should be substituted imperative words—

"The Scotch Education Department shall, with the consent of the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury, immediately after the passing of this Act, appoint such officers in Scotland, two at least of whom shall hold or shall have held the office of Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools, to perform the duties connected with the said Department which it shall be deemed proper and convenient to perform there."

Then his hon. Friend's Amendment proceeded to state that they should continue in office for at least five years, and for such longer time as may be deemed expedient, and should be called the Board of Education in Scotland. The object of a temporary Board was, of course, to perform those duties which arose at the first starting of the measure. Those duties would be found specified in clauses from 24 to 31 inclusive, and again to a considerable extent in Clause 23. The Government thought that they might all be performed within a period of three years, and he should therefore propose that this temporary Board should be constituted, in the first instance, for a period of three years. With regard to the question upon which they were immediately asked to vote, he wished to say that the Amendment was to prevent the constitution of the temporary Board, and instead thereof to constitute a statutory Board.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he must confess that the announcement which had just been made by the Lord Advocate that he would allow a temporary Board to be appointed for three years, after having, in the first instance, altogether declined to have one in Scotland, had taken him by surprise, and thought that tactics of that sort in regard to so important a matter were discreditable to Her Majesty's Government. Hon. Members opposite who represented Scotch constituencies knew that the whole voice of Scotland was against them in the matter, but they were divided between their allegiance to the Ministry and their duty to their constituents. The concession, such as it was, seemed to be both a condemnation of the original scheme of the Government, and a confession that Scotchmen in Scotland were the proper persons to administer the Bill; but if the Privy Council were to be entrusted with it ultimately, it would be better and more consistent that they should undertake it from the beginning. Her Majesty's Government ought not to take an issue like that, and make a compromise, but a distinct issue, upon which they might test their strength, and secure a majority if they could.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN said, he did not think that there was anything in the conduct of the Lord Advocate of which there was reason to complain. He did not know what would be the full effect of the concession now made; but, at the same time, he thought it would have been more graceful if it had been made at an earlier period. They were told that if they voted for this Amendment they must do so for all the other Amendments of the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved it, but he did not see how that followed, because he agreed with the hon. and learned Member in this Amendment; but did not in the others. The Lord Advocate appeared to ridicule the Petitions sent to the House from Scotland on this subject. He (Mr. S. Aytoun) did not think the right hon. and learned Lord was justified in doing so, because, unquestionably, the Scotch people felt strongly on this point. They had a firm conviction that, contrary to the practice in England, under their own system it was possible for the poorest boy to rise in life and attain eminence in the learned professions on account of the facilities which existed, allowing him to pass from one school to another of a higher grade, and that those facilities would cease to exist if a Scotch Board were not vested with the control of education in that country. They must be careful how they interfered with that impression. Although he did not coincide with the hon. and learned Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen in respect to his other Amendments, he should vote with him on this.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, the hon. Member who had just spoken had argued in one sense and intended to vote in the other, thereby imitating the conduct of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), who, after having strongly supported the proposal of the Lord Advocate, finished by saying he should vote for the Amendment. There was some comfort in that, however, for if all who spoke against it by the same rule voted for it, the Bill would receive more support than it deserved. The right hon. and learned Lord was very reasonable in granting the concession he had, for he was awkwardly situated, being taunted by hon. Members on his own side for refusing to grant any concession, while if he did, he was immediately set upon by hon. Members opposite for having granted too much. He would remind the noble Lord (Lord Henry Scott) that the right hon. and learned Lord had distinctly stated early in the evening that he would assent to the establishment of a temporary Board in Scotland—though not for the purpose of administering finance—if that were the wish of the Scotch Members generally. He (Sir Robert Anstruther) did not, however, share the feeling of some hon. Members who appeared to think that the Privy Council was some monster which would swallow up the whole educational system of Scotland, and make the Scotch people subject to pains and penalties which for 300 years Scotland had escaped; and if the Privy Council framed rules obnoxious to the Scotch people, it would be easy for their Representatives in Parliament to object to them and insist on their being modified. The Bill, as it stood, would leave the people free to manage their schools as they liked by means of local Boards; whereas the tenor of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Glasgow University was hostile to the principle of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that what he wanted was that the people of Scotland should manage their own affairs; but the fact was, that he was afraid to give the Scotch people the management of their own affairs—he wanted to manage their affairs for them by means of a central authority at Edinburgh. Now, he was not very fond of Edinburgh Boards, which often worked unsatisfactorily, and had no one responsible for them in that House, and after the liberal spirit manifested by the Lord Advocate, he hoped the Government would be strongly supported in resisting the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend opposite.

MR. ELLICE said, he believed nine-tenths of the Scotch people, deeming themselves entitled to credit for the way in which they had managed their educational affairs, objected to the transfer of that management to a central authority in England, a country which had been much less successful educationally. He was glad, therefore, the Lord Advocate had yielded to the preponderance of Scotch opinion, and though, on coming down to the House, he was told the success of the Amendment would be fatal to the Bill, he had had too long a Parliamentary experience to set much value on such threats. The Lord Advocate's concession, for granting which he had been taunted by hon. Members opposite, altered the whole character of the Bill, for, as he understood—though understandings were not much in favour just now—a Board was to be created for three years to put the machinery of the measure into operation. He wished to know, whether in the 32 clauses relative to the chief authority this new body was to be inserted? If so, of what use would the Education Department for Scotland be? Moreover, the new body, he presumed, if it was to be efficient, must be paid. Now, the Bill already provided for salaries for the Education Department, and he should object to the country being saddled with two paid bodies. In financial matters the Privy Council ought to be paramount; and except when it interfered with educational machinery and insisted on unreasonably expensive schools and buildings—matters with which, from its necessary ignorance of the customs and circumstances of localities in Scotland, it was not competent to deal—the existing arrangement worked satisfactorily. He saw no reason, therefore, why any alteration should be made on this financial point. As regarded the new Commission proposed by Government, he gave no opinion as to its constitution; he could not approve the machinery proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon); and he presumed the Lord Advocate would intimate at the proper time the manner in which he would carry out the understanding which had been come to. In the meantime, he could not agree to a clause which set up an Education Department which, under the altered circumstances of the case, seemed to be unnecessary. He must, therefore, vote with the hon. and learned Gentleman as regarded the omission of the clause, but against him as regarded the words which he proposed to substitute. He should tell the Government to go on with their Bill—to alter the subsequent clauses in accordance with the new plan of a Commission, and then, upon the Report being brought up to adapt the clause now under discussion to the new machinery.

Sir Robert Anstruther

MR. ORR EWING said, he was not surprised at the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate making the concession he had done after the meeting of Scotch Members that had been held recently to consider this Bill; and he was pleased to find that the right hon. and learned Lord's attempt to pass this measure through the House must have taught him not to be too high-handed, but willing to grant concessions. The right hon. and learned Lord had made a great mistake in departing from the rule of his predecessor, who invariably called together hon. Members from both sides of the House to consult respecting Scotch Business, and the result was that he had succeeded in passing through Parliament many very useful Scotch Bills. The right hon. and learned Lord, moreover, should not ignore the fact that hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House were just as anxious to pass a good Scotch educational measure as were those who sat on the Liberal benches; and although there were differences of opinion as to dealing not only generally with the question itself, but with its branches, yet he should have consulted them on the subject. They must have—and he trusted they would have—a central Board sitting in Scotland, in order that the good old system of education by which the schools in Scotland had been managed successfully for the last 300 years might be preserved, and, if possible, amplified into a national system that would in its turn last a considerable time longer than the old one ever had. If their wishes should be defeated in that House, they must go to “another place,” where he trusted there would be found sufficient patriotism to give to Scotland a good sound religious education.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that in consequence of the concessions that had been made that night by the Lord Advocate, he intended to vote for the Government on this question. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House must have been perplexed by the term Scotch Education Department which the clause before them was intended to establish. For his own part, he could not say whether that body was to be a reality or a myth. Viewed by the light of the 7th clause, under which they were empowered to merge half the boroughs of Scotland in the parishes, they would certainly appear to be a most formidable body. In other respects in which the action of this body might be looked for it was a myth. He was thoroughly puzzled as to what this Education Department was. Did it mean an ordinary Committee of Council on Education like that applied to England? No doubt it did; and if it did, the Bill ought to have said it. Such a Committee scarcely interfered with the responsibility of the Minister of Education, who was directly responsible to the House. There were 80 distinct parts of the Bill in which this department came in as a buffer between this House and the Minister of Education. There had been in Scotland several centuries of education; traditions, habits, and standards had grown up which were unknown to the Committee of Council; Scotch interests and wants ought therefore to be represented. He saw advantage in a central administration in London directly responsible to the House, if it were regulated by statutory limitations. That there was a necessity for this could be seen from the 253 Amendments put on the Paper by Scotch Members, while, as the result of months of criticism, the Government had put down only three trifling Amendments. This did not satisfy Scotch Members that their local wants would be considered; but to-night the Lord Advocate had shown himself so conciliatory that they were encouraged to hope he would accept other Amendments. What he wished for, and what the Lord Advocate had offered, was a Board or a Commission which would study local wants in Scotland; it was this representation of their wants which the people of Scotland desired. He was satisfied with the promise given, on the condition that the Commission was not to be constituted under the 3rd clause of the Bill, which did not give Parliament any opportunity of considering what was to be the constitution of the Board. He understood the Lord Advocate to promise a new clause, so as to give Parliament an opportunity of considering the constitution of this Commission; and with that understanding he should have great pleasure in recording his vote for the Government.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the hon. Member who had just down (Dr. Lyon Playfair) had shadowed out a special Scotch Department to be es-established in London, a sort of Committee of Council; and he should like, therefore, to know what this special Scotch Department was to be? According to the Interpretation Clause, "Scotch Education Department" meant any Committee of Council appointed by Her Majesty for Scotland. Now, the Committee of Council really consisted of the President and Vice President, except on rare and special occasions, just as the Local Government Board also consisted of its President. Was it supposed, therefore, there was to be created for Scotland something different from that which existed for England? Was there to be another Vice President who was to be responsible for Scotland? If so, what was to be his position with respect to the Board to be established in Scotland? The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) proposed an Amendment which was practically the same as that proposed by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) — that "Board of Education" should be substituted for "Department," and the hon. Member further proposed that the Board should comprise persons who had been Inspectors, and that they should be paid; but by this vote they were asked by the Lord Advocate to establish the myth, the unreality, described by the hon. Member for the Edinburgh University, which was to have everything taken from it for at least three years, except the administration of funds. At present, the Committee had nothing before them except the promise of the Lord Advocate that if Scotch Members wished it he would establish a Board. What it was to be might be known to Scotch Members on the other side of the House who had attended a secret conclave to which they were exclusively invited; but it was not known to others, and it was the duty of the Lord Advocate to have put on the Paper Amendments which would show clearly what it was upon which they were about to vote. By that conduct the Government were asking their opponents for a degree of confidence which they had no right to demand even from their supporters. The Department which was to have carried out the machinery of the Bill was abrogated in favour of a Board such as was proposed by the hon. Member for Linlithgow.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he adopted the hon. Member's (Mr.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

M'Lagan's) Amendment with the understanding that a temporary Board should not have the administration of Imperial money.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in continuation, said, that the Bill would bring Scotland under the Revised Code. ["No, no!"] Then there was to be a separate Code for Scotland? However that might be, it appeared from what he could gather that the machinery of the Bill was to be carried out by a Scotch Education Department sitting in London, and not by a Board in Edinburgh? ["No, no!"] Clearly, unless he were placed in the position of those who attended the conclave, he could not understand what was proposed. The Board was accepted; what on earth was it to do? There was an "understanding" among hon. Members opposite; but understandings were in discredit at present. The right hon. and learned Lord had said he would strike out "Department" and insert "Board." ["No, no!"] Then he was at a loss as to what he should say with regard to the right hon. and learned Lord's statement. The right hon. and learned Lord, according to his last interpretation, accepted that Amendment, except with reference to laying down the terms of the Code, and the administration of the money. Therefore, there was nothing left for the Board to do except to establish schools in Scotland, and yet when he said that a few minutes ago he was contradicted. He could not help saying that the right hon. and learned Lord ought to have stated on paper what his intentions were. Now, if the administration of the money and the framing of the Code were to be left to the Committee of Council, what need was there of the 2nd clause, which provided that the persons employed in the Education Department should have salaries? Under the present system the Committee of Council had been responsible for the payment of the money to schools in Scotland and for making a Code for Scotland, because that country was under the old Code, and yet they asked Parliament to appoint a salaried Board at Edinburgh to perform the only other work they had to do. This was an extraordinary and anomalous proposition. In the middle of a debate the Government called on the House to take a new step and to trust to them to do something.

at a future period; but in voting for his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment he was practically voting for that which the Government themselves required to carry out this scheme.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford would not have been so doubtful as to the scheme which was before them if he had referred to the exact terms of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon). He proposed to substitute for the Committee of Council a Board of Education; and the Committee would have first to consider whether they would like to have established a Scotch Education Department. It was not the fact that the Committee of Council on Education was a myth or sham. No doubt the Lord President and the Vice President were responsible to Parliament for the distribution of the money; but when any very important question had to be considered, they called the Committee together, and took their opinion and acted upon it. Such Committee was a very different one from any Committee of the Local Government Board. They thought that it would be more satisfactory to have a separate Committee of Council for Scotland, and they proposed that the Scotch Education Department should distribute the Imperial fund for Scotland through the Lord President and Vice President. It was also proposed that the work of putting the Act into operation should be done by that Department. The Amendment now before them, however, proposed that all this work should be done by a statutory Board, and that the Board should distribute the Imperial fund. He did not think, however, that it would be for the advantage of education in Scotland that it should be placed under the control of an irresponsible body; and, therefore, the Government had endeavoured to ascertain the feeling of Scotch Members upon the point, and it appeared to them that the majority of them did not wish that Imperial money should be distributed by a Board in Edinburgh; but that there was a feeling that the machinery of putting the Act into operation should be entrusted to a body of Scotchmen sitting in Scotland. He thought that what the Government now proposed to do would be a very reasonable way of meeting the wishes of Scotch Members. They proposed, first, to ask the Committee to assent to the appointment of a Scotch Education Department to assist the Lord President and Vice President in the distribution of the money, and afterwards they would provide that the putting the Act into operation should be delegated to a board of Scotchmen having an office in Scotland.

MR. GORDON said, he must express his surprise at the proceeding which had taken place in reference to the Amendment, for when they had become cognizant of the feeling of the people of Scotland in favour of a Scotch Board, the Government should have taken the earliest opportunity of saying that they would make concessions; but now they had been told that the fate of the Bill depended upon this Amendment not being passed, and hon. Members having come down under the influence of that threat, the opportunity was taken of making an apparent concession. He thought, however, that that was a concession to which Scotch Members ought not to assent; and he ventured to say that the Scotch Department of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman had spoken would be a myth—a phantom Board altogether, and it would have no existence except so far as the Privy Council would exercise some control with reference to Money Votes made by Parliament. Instead of that, however, there should be a Board of Education for Scotland, for that was what was involved in the terms used in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, and what he proposed was, that there should be a Board for Education in Scotland, leaving it to the Committee to determine how that Board should be constituted. In 1855 there was such a Board—a representative Board proposed by the Government—and so also in 1869. The Committee would, therefore, observe the difficulty of ascertaining what were the precise limits of this power that was to be created by some subsequent clause of the Lord Advocate, for it appeared to him that they ought not to commit themselves to any proposition on the subject until they saw what kind of Board the Government intended to create for Scotland. Seeing, therefore, that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had now come forward with a new proposal, without affording them a definite notion of what it was to be, he (Mr. Gordon) would submit that his Amendment ought to be adopted, unless the Government agreed to report Progress until they were prepared to introduce a distinct clause upon the subject.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) seemed now only to awaken to the folly of his proposal. Were they going to give the management of Scotch education to an unknown Board, or to a special Board connected with the Government? He (Mr. Craufurd) urged the principle now recognized by the Government in 1869, and the hon. and learned Gentleman, in supporting that principle, entertained a different opinion upon the matter from that which he had at present. There was no foundation for the assertion that had been made, that the Lord Advocate had endeavoured to dictate to the Scotch Members as to what they ought to do upon this subject, for his conduct in the matter had been the reverse of dictatory. He should have preferred a Commission instead of a Board, for the simple reason that he thought in two years it would have little to do; but he had no hesitation in supporting the proposal of the right hon. and learned Lord, as the first advance made by Government to give to the people of Scotland a really responsible administration of its own affairs.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was now proposed by the Government to have a Minister for Scotland to manage Scotch education, and that was what the Scotch people objected to, for they wanted to manage their own system of education. He should therefore vote for the Amendment, because he thought that it would establish that direct control which was so much desired by the people of Scotland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 253; Noes 197: Majority 56.

MR. GORDON said, he would suggest that the Chairman report Progress.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not wish to go beyond this clause to-night; but he hoped it would be assented to before that course was taken.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was also in favour of reporting Progress, as it would be desirable to insert some words defining the constitution of the proposed Board in Edinburgh, and the Committee should have an opportunity of seeing that definition on the Notice Paper.

Mr. Gordon

MR. GLADSTONE said, the noble Lord was under a misapprehension. The clause under consideration was an interpretation clause, and not an enacting clause, and it would be impossible to constitute a Board in such a clause.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he would move that Progress be reported, and wished to point out that the wording of this clause in some respects depended upon the constitution of the Board, and therefore it was necessary before settling it to be in possession of the provisions constituting the Board.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Lord Henry Scott.)

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 168; Noes 233: Majority 65.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought, as they were to meet again to consider that question at 2 o'clock that day, it was necessary that the Government should embody the decision they had come to in some intelligible form. He did not understand legislation by "understandings," nor did he understand our Government being the political agents of President Grant—["Question!"]—but he did understand common sense embodied in plain language, and that he called upon the Lord Advocate to produce to them at 2 o'clock that day for their consideration.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, without reference to the somewhat singular reasons assigned by the hon. and gallant Baronet, he felt it impossible to press the matter further that night, and therefore he would move to report Progress. The proposal he had to make, and which he had endeavoured to state quite distinctly, with respect to the managing Board would not interfere with the progress of the measure in the meantime.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY AMENDMENT

BILL—(Lords)—[BILL 136.]

(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

MR. RYLANDS said, he begged leave to move the adjournment of the debate, in order to enable the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock another opportunity of asking the House to consider his Amendment to the Preamble of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought it would be inconvenient and not in accordance with the custom of the House to accede to the Motion of his hon. Friend, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock had ample opportunity of giving Notice of his Motion if he intended to bring it forward.

MR. BOUVERIE said, there was plenty of time to take the opinion of the House upon his Amendment—Notice of which he had given when the Bill was in Committee, but which was by an oversight omitted from the Paper—if the Motion for Adjournment was withdrawn. When that was done, he should be perfectly willing to move the re-committal of the Bill, with a view to amending the Preamble in the way he proposed.

MR. RYLANDS said, in that case, with the permission of the House, he would withdraw the Motion for adjourning the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would now move that the Bill be re-committed, for the purpose of striking out of the Preamble the recital that the Reports made to Her Majesty by the Commissioners had been referred to the Convocations of York and Canterbury, who had reported to Her Majesty thereon. That was the first time for 210 years that such a recital had appeared in an Act of Parliament; but it seemed to be desired by a minority of the Church to get the principle established that nothing was to be done affecting the property, the dignity, or the interests of the Church without the previous assent of Convocation. That minority was very able, very active, very noisy, and very turbulent. Against this attempt the House ought to set its face. That was not a question of Conservative or Liberal, Whig or Tory, but of the laity against the clergy—the question of the right of the great body of the English laity to legislate as they pleased on Church questions. The clergy, moreover, had not the same ground now that they once had for demanding that Convocation should have something to do with these matters, for although up to the time of Charles II. they had no votes for Members of the House of Commons, yet that was no longer the case, and they now had their fair share of representation; and as the House of Commons represented them as well as all other classes, it was the business of Parliament to legislate on these matters as well as on other matters—a business which they had hitherto executed. This, he must further say, was an attempt on the part of a section of the clergy to have a sort of veto on the decisions of Parliament on matters affecting the clergy. For instance, a very distinguished clergyman, whose fame was co-extensive with the English language, the late Mr. Keble, wrote these words—

"I cannot get it out of my head that it would be justice and good statesmanship to state in the Preamble of the Church Subscription Act that the change had been approved by the Convocations of both Provinces. That might be very useful to us if Parliament should take to altering the Prayer Book."

That meant that the clergy would like to procure a precedent for settling these matters as they thought best, instead of as Parliament thought best. He presumed that Convocation had made a Report on the subject, but it was not known to anybody out of Convocation. If it had, however, such a Report ought to have been placed on the Table of the House, so that they might see for themselves whether it was wise or prudent to be guided in their legislation by Convocation. The passage in the Preamble which he opposed was contrary to precedent, and it would introduce a very bad practice; and he must repeat that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was changing the practice of upwards of 200 years in introducing the words to which objection had been taken into the Preamble, and which he believed had been introduced without reference to the Archbishop of Canterbury, but solely on the right hon. Gentleman's own authority. He thought that the less they had to say to Convocation, and the less they recognized it, the better; and he, therefore, hoped that the House would support him in re-committing the Bill.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he had placed a Notice on the Paper to the effect that the Bill be read a third time that day three months, in the absence of his right hon. Friend who had just spoken, because he thought the House had been treated rather sharply by the rapid manner in which the Bill had been pressed forward. He, however, should not have taken that step did he not entirely sympathize with the observations of his right hon. Friend. He, like him, was opposed to the Bill, as well as to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who on a previous occasion put the Act of Uniformity in the same category with the Bill of Rights. Every fresh enactment, he contended, such as that with which the House was now dealing, only tied the hands of the clergy still tighter than they were bound before; for the House was, he might add, asked to legislate for the small number of the clergy who held daily services, and the matter was one in which the laity had little concern, inasmuch as those daily services had not yet, he believed, taken much hold upon them; indeed, in many cases it was admitted that the congregation was confined to the clergyman's family. Convocation, too, had treated one of the recommendations of the Ritual Commission about the Athanasian Creed in a manner which, in his opinion, did not entitle them to very great respect; and, that being so, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his right hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "re-committed, in respect of the Preamble," — (Mr. Bouverie,) — instead thereof.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he thought the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), as well as his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), put the matter at issue much higher than the nature of the case required. As the Preamble was originally drawn, it consisted of two parts. The second part contained a recognition that the House was about to alter the existing law, in pursuance of a Report made by Convocation, and so long as that constituted a portion of the Preamble, there was no doubt great force in the observations of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock. As, however, it had been withdrawn from the Bill, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman no longer applied. For what was it the House was now asked by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to do? One of the most reasonable things he thought to which its sanction could be required. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock said that if the Bill were passed in its present shape Convocation would actually have a veto on the legislation of Parliament. There was, however, nothing in the Bill to justify that remark. All that was asked was, that as Parliament was the only body which could legislate at the present time, either with reference to the Established Church or with reference to any other subject, it should give the ministers of that Church, in a case most vitally affecting their obligations and the discharge of their duties, an opportunity so far of stating their opinions as to give their consent to such a proceeding as the House was asked to sanction. Could anything be more reasonable? The clergy, as the law now stood, were bound to use the services of the Church in a particular manner, and could be released from doing certain things only by the action of the Legislature. That being so, the question resolved itself into the reasonableness of the change proposed—namely, that the clergy should be enabled to shorten the services on week days and to separate the services on Sundays. If that were done with the full concurrence of the people of the country, was it not well to have the full concurrence of the clergy also, without whose willing consent legislation would not have that effect which it was desirable it should produce?

Under the circumstances, he for one thought the proposal of the Government a most proper one.

MR. HORSMAN said, his right hon. Friend who had just spoken had omitted to take any notice of the real practical difficulty which had been raised by the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock. A Report, it appeared, had been made by the Commissioners, and their Report had been referred to Convocation, who reported to Her Majesty. But what, he should like to know, did the House know of the Report of Convocation? Who had seen it? He, for one, was not aware that there was any such Report, and he declined, on conscientious grounds, to affirm in the Preamble of a Bill the existence of a document of which he had no personal knowledge and of which there was no record.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was not at all desirous to enter again into a discussion of the subject, but after the pointed—he might say the invidious—appeal which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, he had no choice but to reply to his observations. He would first, however, in answer to his right hon. Friend who had just sat down, remark that the statement of a responsible Minister of the Crown was, in his opinion, amply sufficient to establish the fact of the existence of the Report in question. He would, however, add that his right hon. Friend had based his opposition to the Preamble on a ground totally different from that which had been taken by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, in whose speech the fact that there was no Parliamentary record of the Report of Convocation formed an entirely secondary feature. From what his right hon. Friend who spoke last had said, he (Mr. Gladstone) had inferred that if that Report had been placed on the Table, and he saw no objection to it, he would not support the opposition which was offered to the Bill. But the opposition of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock would by no means be removed by the production of the Report, for he had based his opposition on much broader grounds, contending that it was wrong there should be any reference at all to the proceedings of Convocation. If this had been a Government Bill, the Report would have been laid upon the Table; but it had been introduced by and on the part of the Church, with the consent of the Government, although not by their agency. Having passed through the House of Lords, and the Church having no official means of passing it through the House of Commons, it became a question whether the Government should take it up. They looked at it upon its merits, which he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had done—and he must add that if the language and tone of the right hon. Gentleman were to be introduced into debates upon Church matters, it would be much better not to introduce Church matters at all. He did not think he had shown an undue disposition to meddle with Church matters—[“Oh, oh!”]—unless in the case of the Irish Church. The Government had proposed no Bill touching spiritual matters in the Church, and the only Bill they had introduced on the pecuniary arrangements of the Church, was the Bill with regard to the resignation of Bishops intended to meet a practical grievance and deficiency, and by no means partook of a party nature. Not only that, but they had reached a time when legislation in relation to the Church was extremely difficult, and one of the modes of retaining some degree of practicability in that kind of legislation was to forswear the introduction of angry and irritating topics; and, accordingly, the Government thought the less they meddled with Church affairs the better. This Bill had been introduced into the House of Lords upon the recommendation of a Commission, with the assent of the clergy in Convocation and the Prelates in the House of Lords, and it had passed with the special recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, after receiving the unanimous assent of the House of Lords. And yet against that they were told that the Preamble was the product of the action of a party in the Church, described in language which could not be agreeable to them. He (Mr. Gladstone) never had used and never would use expressions to hurt any religious body, and he regretted that the right hon. Member had not adopted the same rule. That, however, was not a question of a party in the Church. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not the Bill of the Archbishop but the Bill of the Prime Minister, whose office was such a sinecure that, using the Primate as his instrument, he could find opportunity to concoct a scheme involving the elements of a conspiracy against the freedom of Parliament. [Laughter.] No doubt, the intentions of his right hon. Friend were honest, but there was not a word of truth in that representation. All he knew of the Bill had been communicated to him by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Government were not responsible for its origin; but having regard to the mode in which it reached that House they had thought it right to take charge of the Bill. He must say, further, that he knew of no claim on the part of the clergy to be consulted in these matters; for instance, the Government had legislated pretty stringently upon Church property without waiting for the assent of the clergy. It was a mistake, moreover, to suppose that in framing that Bill an intermediate period between this time and the time of the Act of Uniformity had been overlooked. Since that Act there had been no Bill affecting the services of the Church or strictly affecting the relations of the clergy to those services, until the Act relating to the Subscriptions of the Clergy. Successive Governments had encouraged the clergy to give their opinion upon this sort of legislation, but the reference to Convocation in the Preamble did not bar the power of Parliament to proceed without its assent any more than a reference to a Royal Commission prevented legislation without the approval of the Commissioners. His right hon. Friend felt probably, as he (Mr. Gladstone) did, that the less they had of this ecclesiastical legislation the better; but when it could be shown that it had been that all the parties interested desired the step proposed, it would have been churlish to have refused to assist in passing this measure into law.

MR. LOCKE KING said, one would have supposed from the speech of the Prime Minister that his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock had objected to the enacting part of the Bill. That was not so. What his right hon. Friend objected to was, that an entirely new precedent should be established by stating in the Preamble that the sanction of Convention had been obtained.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he deprecated as much as anyone the introduction into the Preamble of the reference to Convocation; but he could see nothing objectionable in recording the assent of a body whose dissent they could ignore.

Mr. Gladstone

DR. BALL said, whatever the result of the Motion might be, he must hold it to be a serious precedent that the House of Commons should act in a matter of this importance without having on the Table Papers which would show that the proceedings were regular, and that the statement in the Preamble was justified.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 89: Majority 71.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (CERTIFICATED TEACHERS).

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire whether by a deduction from the Parliamentary Grant in aid of Public Elementary Schools, or by any other like means, a provision can be made for granting annuities to the Certificated Teachers of such Schools upon their retirement by reason of age and infirmity.—(Mr. Whitwell.)

And, on June 10, Committee nominated.—[Which see.]

EAST INDIA (BENGAL, &C. ANNUITY FUNDS) BILL.

Resolution [May 31] reported;

"That it is expedient to make provision for the Transfer of the Assets and Liabilities of the Bengal and Madras Civil Service Annuity Funds, and of the Annuity Branch of the Bombay Civil Fund, to the Secretary of State for India in Council."

Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. GRANT DUFF and Mr. AYETON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 182.]

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS ACT (1871) SUSPENSION BILL.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to suspend the compulsory operation of the Chain Cables and Anchors Act, 1871.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE and Mr. ARTHUR PEEL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 183.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 4th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Marquess of Ailsa, after the death of his father.
PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Charitable Loan Societies (Ireland)* (124); Cattle Diseases (Ireland) Acts Amendment* (125); Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment* (126); Charitable Trustees Incorporation* (127).
Committee — Report — Juries Act Amendment (Ireland)* [109]; Isle of Man Harbours* [83].

PRIVILEGE.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE : My Lords, seeing the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his place, I wish to ask a Question on a matter affecting the Privileges of your Lordships' House. I beg to call attention to the following paragraph which appeared in The Times of this morning. It is as follows :—

“THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.—The publication of this celebrated document seems to have given rise to as much misunderstanding as the document itself. Lord Granville has been frequently importuned to lay it upon the table of the House of Lords, but has consistently declined to produce it. It was quoted by Mr. Gladstone last night, and Mr. Bouverie thereupon claimed, as a matter of right, that it should be produced. In the course of the evening a single copy of it was accordingly laid on the table. But this very document, so anxiously sought for and so tardily produced, was actually sent by the Foreign Office to, we believe, all the morning papers on Friday, May 17, together with the correspondence between Lord Granville and Mr. Fish, and was published in The Times, at least, on Saturday, May 18.”

EARL GRANVILLE: Is there any more?

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE : I have not the rest of the paragraph with me, but it states that even the publication on the 18th was not the first publication of the Article, because The Times had received it from their Philadelphia correspondent on the 16th instant. The noble Earl, in his statement last evening, adverted in strong language to the publication of the papers, which he explained had been obtained in a surreptitious manner. I wish to know from him whether he thinks it the duty of the Foreign Office to communicate to the Press Papers of importance, though he refuses to lay them on the Table of your Lordships' House?

EARL GRANVILLE: I am not quite sure that I understand the noble Lord. What breach of privilege is there involved in this case? I believe myself there is none. Last night I personally presented the Supplementary Article, saying that I do so at the repeated request of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns): I at the same time presented other Papers which I thought it would be useful to the public service to lay on the Table. I will now give an explanation with reference to the communication of this Article to the Press. There is nothing more common than for our public Departments to communicate official documents to the Press; but in this case the Supplemental Article was not communicated until a copy of it had already been telegraphed from America and published in The Times. The publication of the Article in the English newspapers—it having been, as I yesterday stated—surreptitiously obtained by an American paper—gave me a discretion—your Lordships will remember that my great objection to producing it was that it had not been presented by the American Government to the Senate—but as there were one or two errors in the wording of the Article as it appeared in The Times, I thought it well to let the public have the text of the document in a completely correct form, and consequently an exact copy was sent to the Press. Certainly I can see no breach of privilege in that—but I leave it to the House to judge. There is another point to which I should like to call attention for a moment. Last evening the noble and learned Lord (Lord Westbury) distrusting an opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown upon a case which he naturally supposed had been drawn up by interested persons, declared that he did not want to see the Opinion—he wanted to see the Case submitted to the Law Officers. I have since informed him privately that though it is not a usual course to adopt I had no objection in this instance to produce the Case. I may now say the Case consisted entirely of that part of The Times report of the noble and learned Lord's speech in which he advised me to take the opinion of our legal advisers. The report in The Times of the points on which the noble and learned Lord recommended me to obtain legal advice appeared to me to be so entirely correct that I adopted it in the Case to be submitted to the Law Officers. Indeed, those who knew the clearness of the noble and learned Lord's enunciation would know the reporter was not likely to be mistaken.

LORD WESTBURY: Do you produce the Case now?

EARL GRANVILLE: I shall be very glad to give the noble and learned Lord the extract from The Times report or I will have it copied for him.

LORD WESTBURY: Am I to understand that there was no question put in consultation, but that what was submitted for the opinion of the Law Officers was simply a speech made by Lord Westbury? Is that so? If it be, it is a melancholy proof of the inanity of the proceedings of the Government. With very great respect I bow before the oracle; but it appears to me that the oracle has been consulted in such a manner that it could give none but an oracular response—that is, a response that can be interpreted in any way according to the wish of the person who consults it.

EARL GRANVILLE: I only vouched for what I believe to be the correctness of The Times report. Does the noble and learned Lord disavow it, or has he changed his opinion? The noble and learned Lord seems to hold very lightly the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown—judging, perhaps, by his own experience; but I must be permitted to continue to consult them when it appears to me that there is occasion to do so. The noble and learned Lord has completely changed his ground—yesterday he would have nothing but the Case—but as that does not answer his purpose he now falls back upon the Opinion. He talks of the inanity of the Government, but if he has not changed his opinion he cannot complain of the course I took in submitting the Case as he stated it.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I am about to move an important Address which has been for some time on the Notice Paper, but which I have often postponed and not brought under your consideration. I suppose no one of your Lordships will doubt that this House, as one branch of the great Council of the nation, is fully justified when sufficient cause has arisen to address Her Majesty on any subject. With respect to the general right I maintain there can be no doubt. There is only one thing further which I wish to say by way preface, and that is—that I conceive this kingdom is fully equal to any nation in the world, and that in all matters of negotiation we have no reason to yield to the United States of America or to any other country. And now, my Lords, to come to the reasons which I think justify me in bringing before your Lordships this very urgent question. Your Lordships will recollect that within a few days of 12 months ago I brought under your Lordships' consideration the question of the ratification of the Treaty of Washington. That Treaty was the result of a Commission sent across the Atlantic with great "pomp, pride, and circumstance;" but, unfortunately, it was composed of Commissioners not equal to the persons with whom they had to negotiate. In a speech made now nearly a century ago—in 1775—Mr. Burke remarked that the educated men of America are particularly versed in the science of law, and that this study renders men acute, makes them ready with all kinds of arguments, prompt in reply to objections, always ingenious in proposing the schemes which they desire to carry out. Unhappily, I say, those persons whom we sent on that Commission across the Atlantic were not equal in these respects to those with whom they had to deal. Accordingly, when the Treaty came home and was brought under consideration in this House, there were various defects to be found in it, and various doubts were raised upon it. A noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) pointed out that what are called the Indirect Claims could be put forward under it as well as under the Convention signed by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) with Mr. Reverdy Johnson. What was the course taken on that occasion? The noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs stated that these Indirect Claims, which were of a very extraordinary nature, had entirely disappeared, and that by no chance could there be any question of them under the Treaty.

Earl Granville

Afterwards, in Her Speech from the Throne, Her Majesty was advised to declare these Claims were understood, on her part, not to be included in the Treaty. Notwithstanding, we had a speech from the First Lord of the Treasury, full of argument, full of illustration, and of rhetorical invective. Beyond that there has been a letter published by Mr. Reverdy Johnson, who had been engaged in the negotiation of the previous Treaty. The argument of Mr. Reverdy Johnson is a very able one, and together with the declaration of the noble Earl the Secretary of State and the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury appeared to be very convincing, and to be sufficient to show that, there being no express rule to the contrary, this Treaty ought, as Mr. Reverdy Johnson says, to follow the course of precedent, and particularly the precedent of what is known as the Jay Treaty, which was negotiated in 1794 at the request of Lord Grenville, and was approved by the President, General Washington—one of the greatest men who have lived in modern times. It was also negotiated under the auspices of Mr. Jefferson, a most able man, who was then Secretary of State to the United States. On questions of this kind there could be no greater authority than those whom I have named. But, unhappily, in spite of all this, and in spite of what has been declared by my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, in spite of all precedent in Treaties, the American Government put forth in their Case which is to be submitted to the Arbitrators at Geneva a series of Claims which seem to me even now almost incredible. They ask compensation not only for the Direct Losses occasioned by the action of insurgent cruisers, and for the national expenditure occasioned since the commencement of the war in pursuit of these vessels, and the loss of trade and commerce; they ask, moreover, an indemnity for the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, which they said had been continued by the captures at sea made by the Alabama and other ships. Hence arose what are now called the Indirect Claims. But Mr. Reverdy Johnson has shown in his pamphlet that the war by sea was of small importance, and that after the Battle of Gettysburg, when, according to the American Case, the war on land had ceased, there were battles in which hundreds of thousands of citizens of the United States were killed or wounded. It is too much, therefore, to pretend that the war had virtually ceased at that time, and that it was prolonged only by the exertions of a few privateers; that appears to me to be utterly absurd. But then I should have thought that when Her Majesty's Government had declared so positively that these Indirect Claims were no part of the Treaty, and when Her Majesty had sanctioned that declaration in Her Gracious Speech from the Throne, there could be no doubt whatever that the Government would be completely justified in declaring that they would not negotiate on the basis of a Treaty to which they were not parties; that they never had agreed to the Treaty in the sense it was understood by the Government at Washington, and that therefore they could not go on with the Arbitration. It seems to me to be perfectly clear that to enter into negotiations to carry into effect a Treaty, to the making of which they were not parties, is something so extravagant that it could not for a moment be admitted. I think, therefore, the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary would have acted quite right in writing a short note asking that these Claims should be erased. I cannot very well conceive that a great Power such as Great Britain should persist in saying that it was not a party to the Treaty, while another Power persists in saying that Great Britain was a party to it. It appears to me that it would be more consonant to the amity of nations, and more consonant with the good faith of nations, to make such a declaration once for all, and act upon it without delay, without doubt or equivocation. But that was not the course which Her Majesty's Ministers pursued. Strange to say, we are now in the month of June—the same month in which last year the Treaty was brought forward here, and its ratification was considered—and we are now in the same state of doubt and uncertainty as we were when these questions were originally raised. Two reasons were urged against my persisting with the Motion which I then made, asking Her Majesty not to ratify the Treaty. It was said that the negotiations had gone too far, and the Commissioners had acted too precisely in pursuance of their powers to make it right for this House to address Her Majesty to uphold her ratification without exciting much irritation and hostile feeling in the United States. When, therefore, I heard those reasons, and the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns), and the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), expressed a wish that I would not divide, I willingly agreed not to do so. The Treaty was ratified, and I conceive that it is your Lordships' duty, and that of every subject of Her Majesty, to endeavour to carry that ratified Treaty into effect, consistently with the honour of the Crown and consistently with the real meaning of the stipulations which it contains. That is undoubted; but it is an equally undoubted fact that we are not bound, and no party in England is bound, to comply with these Indirect Claims, these being Claims made without foundation or justification, and which the Secretary for Foreign Affairs declared, and which Her Majesty afterwards declared, were no part of the Treaty. My Lords, the Government of the United States did not concur in that view. They argued that these Indirect Claims were clearly part of the Treaty. Your Lordships will recollect that in the Correspondence on the subject, which has already been laid before Parliament, the arguments on both sides are urged with great force; and I confess that I agree with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and I agree with Mr. Reverdy Johnson, that the only fair interpretation of the Treaty is to leave out the Indirect Claims, and to understand the Treaty as if they did not belong to it. Well, my Lords, there has been other Correspondence — Correspondence not laid before Parliament, but which has nevertheless, so recently been laid before the public that I may refer to it—in which it is argued over and over again by Mr. Fish, who is confirmed by General Schenck, the American Convoy at Her Majesty's Court, that the Indirect Claims having been laid before the Arbitrators at Geneva, and having formed part of the Case that was officially placed before them, cannot be withdrawn; that the Case so stated is in possession of the Arbitrators, and must form part of the Case when they meet together again at Geneva. I confess it appears to me that that interpretation is extravagant and absurd. But if that is the case—since Her Majesty's Government cannot be called on to assist at the Arbitration when the Case put forward by the other side is not contained in the Treaty—I ask what is their course to pursue? I confess it appears to me not to be doubtful. The British authorities—Her Majesty herself, Her Secretary of State, every person belonging to the Cabinet, and I may say the great majority of the whole nation—have stated that these Claims form no part of the Treaty; and a public man who certainly is not inspired by any antipathy to the United States has given his opinion that Great Britain will never pay a farthing of the damages required on that ground. It appears to me that the United States have said—and they are not apt to flinch from any Claim they think it right to put forward—they have said they will go to the Arbitrators with these Indirect Claims contained in the document now before the Arbitrators. Her Majesty's servants would say as firmly and decidedly—"We shall never attend at Geneva, or before a tribunal to which these Indirect Claims are presented." Let your Lordships consider what would happen if they were to take the course of appearing before the Tribunal of Arbitration. It would be in the power of any of the Arbitrators—the Swiss Arbitrator or the Brazilian Arbitrator—to say—"These Claims with regard to the Alabama, asking for compensation for direct losses, are not the whole of the Claims laid before the Tribunal; there are Claims for the prolongation of the war, and various other Claims made by the United States, and I ask you to consider these Claims." Well, my Lords, it appears to me Her Majesty's representative would be placed in a very unfit and a very ignominious position if he found himself before a tribunal which insisted on taking these Claims into consideration. I am told there is some ingenious project in agitation; that the First Minister of the Crown, with the great abilities for which he is distinguished, is going to frame some scheme by which these Indirect Claims would be withdrawn, and yet not withdrawn—not to be brought into consideration and, at the same time, form the subject of numerous debates—consigned to eternal silence, and yet be kept to the memory of all future generations. Such a contradiction may be reconciled by the extreme ingenuity of the person who is supposed to be the author of the project to which I am referring; but, for my part, I think it is not becoming the dignity of this or the other House of Parliament to listen to such logical refinements. It is our duty to speak plainly. The honour of our Government requires that we should speak in clear language, and say that until these Claims are withdrawn no representative of Her Majesty shall appear at Geneva. My Lords, there has been a great deal of mystery made—a great deal of needless mystery, as I think—with regard to the production of these Claims. We have been told that Parliament—this House and the House of Commons—must not be trusted with this secret, as it has not been laid before the Senate of the United States. My Lords, I think it was in November or December last year that I met in the South of France a gentleman much experienced in diplomacy. I stated to him that I hoped there was no truth in the report I had read in one of the English papers of the extravagant nature of the Claims—which might amount not only to millions, but to hundreds of millions—laid before the Arbitrators at Geneva, and that the Claims were not real. My friend immediately said—“You are quite wrong in that supposition, because in the Journal de Genève—a paper as much read as any on the Continent of Europe—the whole Case of the United States is put forth at length, and there is no extravagance you could mention which is not set forth in the printed report of that Case.” My Lords, to debar the Houses of Parliament and debar the British nation from knowing what these claims were while they were paraded over Europe is an amount of prudence which I cannot understand. Well, then, may I now ask what followed from such a course? Every sort of logical subtlety, every sort of metaphysical refinement. But if we had said plainly—“We will not negotiate on the grounds of a Treaty to which we never were parties; we shall only agree to an Arbitration founded on what we knowingly, persistently, and willfully agreed to”—I believe if we acted in that way the United States would give us credit for more sense than they now suppose us to possess. They would say that, as we had not been caught—as we had not chosen to fall into the trap—the matter must be arranged in another manner. Recollect, my Lords, that we are not asking something of America. We are not complaining that we have been wronged and asking for a large reparation in the shape of a money compensation. On the contrary, it is they who are coming to us and asking for a redress of wrongs; and we who are replying—“Let us have an examination of the case, and if we are wrong we shall cheerfully pay an indemnity.” I remember a case in which is not of very old date; I spoke to one of the actors in it only very recently—I allude to the case of the Southern Commissioners who were taken out of the Trent, a British packet. That Trent case occurred when Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister. A representation was made to the Government of the day, and they considered the matter very fully, though they did not deliberate very long. Lord Palmerston said that before a demand was made that the Commissioners should be delivered into the custody of the British Government, the opinion of the Law Officers must be taken—though for himself he was of opinion that a demand of that nature should be made. The opinion of the Law Officers confirmed that of the Government—that the Commissioners had been wrongfully taken out of an English ship, and that the American Government was bound to hand them over to the custody of the British Government. Lord Palmerston took all the proper measures, and I, being Foreign Secretary, wrote a despatch—as civil a one as I could—on the subject. That despatch having been revised by the Prince Consort, was sent to our Minister, Lord Lyons, who was directed to convey an intimation that if immediate redress were not given the matter might assume a very serious aspect. Well, as your Lordships know, in the course of two or three days the Commissioners were allowed to come back. A short time ago I had an opportunity of meeting my old Friend Lord Lyons, and I asked him whether, in consequence of our action in the Trent case, he had found himself treated with bitterness or with more distance or reserve at Washington. He told me it had been quite the contrary—that there might have been some bitterness at first, but that in consequence of the former course we had followed the Americans respected us very much more than they had before, and that the manner of the American Government had become more friendly to him than it had been before. Now, my Lords, my opinion is there is one thing American statesmen and the American nation do respect and do like, and it is that quality which in vulgar English is called "pluck." When they see that quality exhibited by the English people they respect and like us much more than they would if they saw anything on our part like a pusillanimous submission to unjust demands. I think, if they refuse to withdraw these Indirect Claims, and we refuse to go on with the Arbitration unless they are withdrawn, the result will be that no proceeding will be taken on this Treaty. The Correspondence which is stated to have come to light surreptitiously, but which I believe to be genuine for all that, shows that the two parties to the Washington Treaty are as wide asunder as the poles—Why not acknowledge the fact? Why not acknowledge that what we desire is in direct contradiction to what the American Government desires? That being so, if it were at once acknowledged, the present Treaty would lapse; but a time would probably arrive when the United States' Government would permit itself to be governed by those maxims which have guided the Governments of all other nations in corresponding circumstances, and which, even in recent as well as in past times, have guided American statesmen—such as guided Lord Grenville and General Washington in 1794, such as guided the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) and Mr. Reverdy Johnson when they were framing their Treaty, and as subsequently influenced the Earl of Clarendon when at the Foreign Office. My Lords, I agree with Mr. Reverdy Johnson that for the prolongation of the war we could under no circumstances be made answerable; but there is the question whether in respect of the Alabama and certain other vessels there was any negligence, any want of due diligence on the part of those who had the conduct of our affairs during the American War. My Lords, this question is not quite new to me; because Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State during the war, interrogated me as to whether I was prepared to refer the matter to Arbitration. I took no notice of that proposal at the time; but some time afterwards I informed Mr. Adams that it did not appear to me that that proposal would be acceptable to Her Majesty's Government. I had consulted Lord Palmerston previously to making that reply to Mr. Seward. There were two objections to the proposition. One was that the Americans could scarcely have made their case without throwing imputations on the honour of the English statesmen who had examined into the case of these vessels. The next objection was that the opinions of the Law Officers might be set aside. My Lords, what I then foresaw distinctly was what has since come to pass. You find that the American Government heap imputations on the persons whose duty it was to make inquiries for Her Majesty's Government in respect of those vessels. They allege that, so far from acting with the bond fide view of discovering whether those ships were being fitted up as fighting ships to make war in favour of the Southern Confederacy, they carried their carelessness so far that it amounted to evil intent, and that they did not act impartially. Now, my Lords, I do not think it consistent with the amity of two great nations that the Government of one should accuse the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State of the other of being so hypocritical and so unfair as to pretend to obtain opinions and evidence to convict persons engaged in an illegal proceeding, while in point of fact they were conniving at the illegal practices. That was one reason why I did not like the notion of Arbitration. Another reason was that I thought the opinion of the Law Officers would not be duly respected. Well, so far from respecting the opinion of the Law Officers, the negotiators of the Treaty of Washington have made new rules. Some of these are rather obscure—and one of them is particularly so. From this one, words have been left out which, in my opinion, ought to have been put into it. I will state what the omission is. In all authorities on the Law of Nations, and in all official documents of the Courts of Great Britain and those of America, it is stated that in the case of ships, such as those of which the United States complain, there are two questions for those who would interfere with them. First, you have to consider whether the ships are being built with the view of being fitted out as ships of war; and the second question is, whether you have grounds for believing that when so fitted up they are to be employed in warlike operations against an ally. Now, in a new rule contained in this Treaty the first consideration is inserted; but the second, whether the vessel is being fitted up, the words "with the intention of making war on a friend or ally" are omitted. It is said that a great authority—I believe Sir Roundell Palmer—is of opinion that the rule is sufficiently explicit, and that notwithstanding the omission of these words the meaning is clearly conveyed. But where there has been so much refinement, and such a different sense has been given to words from that which one would suppose them to bear, I think that there should have been no such omission in the new rule. Indeed, the very evils I foresaw when the proposal for Arbitration was made have occurred. My Lords, I believe they might have been guarded against. I believe our negotiators at Washington might have made the terms of the Treaty so clear that it would have been impossible to set up those Indirect Claims under them. But our Commissioners were not what Mr. Burke described the educated Americans of his time to be—they were not particularly versed in the science of law, that study which makes men inquisitive, makes them ready with all kinds of engagements, prompt in reply to objections, and always ingenious in proposing schemes—and, unhappily, they omitted to put in the Treaty of Washington plain, precise words which would have prevented any such misunderstanding as that which has arisen. My Lords, there is another topic—the last one with which I have to trouble your Lordships, but one which I must not omit to mention before I conclude what I have to say in introducing my Motion. It has reference to Canada. Your Lordships are aware that the Claim made by the Americans is for loss of property—the Americans complain that ships of which they were owners had been captured, and that they had lost much property in consequence—I do not think that the proceedings of the Alabama or of any other of the vessels resulted in bloodshed. It is not so, unhappily, in the case of Canada. There was a raid into that colony of which Sir John Macdonald speaks in a speech of four hours, delivered by him in the Canada House of Commons. He says that in the raid many Canadians lost their lives, and that there was a great destruction of property as well. He says he had been blamed for not having obtained reparation; for that American citizens had lost property, but they immediately went to their Government and obtained redress. I know how their Government acted, because the whole time this destruction of property continued I constantly received from Mr. Adams demands for compensation on account of loss of property in respect of which complaints had been sent in by American citizens. Sir John Macdonald says that knowing of these raids, and knowing of the loss of life and property incurred by means of them, and knowing that Canada could not obtain redress from the United States, he applied to the Government of Great Britain—he applied to his own Government, and asked them to demand from the Government of the United States some indemnity for the loss—to demand reparation to the families of persons who had been killed or who had suffered wounds in those hostilities. The American Government had listened favourably, and had listened faithfully, to the demands which the American citizens had made. But what did our own Government do? Nothing whatsoever. The statement comes with the authority of Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister of Canada. He complained of this as a great injustice; but that a Member of the Canadian Parliament, seeing the defect in the reference, said to him—"You cannot get redress from the Commissioners who are negotiating the Treaty, because the English Government has never referred this Case as one requiring redress, and, therefore, you cannot press your Claims." That being so, it has been said—I do not know on what authority—that when everything had been settled except the question of the Fenian raids the Government sent directions to our negotiators at Washington not to press the Claims put forward. Sir John Macdonald entirely disposes of that, because he says that the reason they were not pressed was they never had been referred at all; that the British Government never having asked in a formal manner for a recognition of those Claims, the Canadians were entirely out of court in consequence of that neglect. My Lords, I say that I feel humiliated at the negligence — the great negligence — which was shown in not urging those claims. I am of opinion that, as Sir John Macdonald says, we ought to consider Canada as the right arm of this Empire. Nothing can be more loyal, nothing more faithful, than the conduct of the Canadians. They ought to be met with a corresponding generosity. I do not think it would be wise to show an indifference to that great colonial possession. It is by treating all the various portions of the British dominions well—by acting faithfully in the interests of all, and not by armies and fleets, that we can bind together all parts of the Empire and make them loyal and affectionate to the Crown and the Government of the Empire. My Lords, it is with these sentiments, and trusting that by the interposition of this House this question may receive a fitting solution, and that on this and on every other occasion we may show a due regard to the honour and dignity of the Crown, I submit to your Lordships the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

Earl Russell

Earl Russell

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the Arbitrators appointed to meet at Geneva pursuant to the Treaty of Washington be suspended until the claims included in the Case submitted on behalf of the United States, and understood on the part of Her Majesty not to be within the province of the Arbitrators, have been withdrawn.
—(The Earl Russell.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise under a sense of grave responsibility involved in following the noble Earl who has just made this Motion of Want of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government. I think that the noble Earl has somewhat failed in explaining to your Lordships that which appears to me to be difficult to understand—namely, his proceeding with regard to this particular Motion. Your Lordships are aware that on two occasions, either spontaneously or at the advice of his Friends, the noble Earl postponed his Motion. He postponed it a third time, very kindly, in reply to an appeal which I made to him before the Whitsuntide holidays. After the Supplemental Article had appeared in the newspapers, as I stated to your Lordships yesterday, nothing ever gave me greater pleasure than to hear my noble Friend say that he approved the course I had taken; and he at the same time added some kind phrases of which I knew I was undeserving, but which I accepted with pleasure as a token of our long-continued friendship. I heard nothing more until 2 o'clock yesterday, when, in the course of a conversation which I then held with the noble Earl, he informed me that he did not intend to move a Vote of Censure upon the Government, but that he purposed confining his Motion to a request for the production of Correspondence. I was therefore astonished when, at 5 o'clock, three hours afterwards, he stated it was his intention to proceed with his Motion as it appeared on the Notice Paper. It is true that he gave as his reason for adopting that course the publication of the Correspondence surreptitiously communicated to the New York paper. Now, my Lords, the noble Earl during the whole of his speech has, with regard to recent transactions, very naturally spoken and inferred things from facts with which he is not well acquainted, and therefore I am not surprised—although I think I gave some explanation of that Correspondence yesterday—that the noble Earl does not see that it is not in the slightest degree applicable to the present state of things. That Correspondence occurred during a time when the discussion between ourselves and the United States' Government was carried on upon the basis of an interchange of Notes; and I explained yesterday exactly what the United States' Government held—which was, that although the President had the power to desire his agents to follow a certain procedure before the Arbitrators, he had no power by the Constitution of the United States either to withdraw or to do anything equivalent to a withdrawal of the Indirect Claims from before the Tribunal, or further to enter into any engagement with us by which we should mutually bind ourselves for the future to maintain the principles we had already advanced. But all this Correspondence occurred before we signified our consent to negotiate on the basis of a Treaty Article. That Treaty Article entirely changed the nature of things. No one can pretend that the United States' Government have not the right to put their own construction upon the Treaty. Putting that construction upon the Treaty, they believed they had a right to prefer these Indirect Claims; and believing that, their contention was that these claims can only be got rid of by a fresh Treaty, sanctioned by the Senate, or by referring them to the Arbitrators and leaving them to deal with them as they should think fit. So that, as far as the Correspondence is concerned, there is absolutely nothing to be found in it which can justify my noble Friend's change.

Earl Russell

My Lords, there are, of course, some things in my noble Friend's speech with which I agree; much with which I should be sorry to express any concurrence in detail, and much from which I entirely disagree. As far as my memory will serve me, I will touch upon some of the points on which the noble Earl dwelt.

I think he began by stating that the composition of the British Commission was not sufficient for the purpose. I am bound to say—although this sentiment has been already expressed this year—that it comes somewhat late; because when the composition of that Commission was announced, I did not hear one single word of objection to any of the Commissioners appointed—on the contrary, the noble Earl himself, speaking in his place in Parliament, said he entirely approved the composition of the Commission. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) complained the other day that we had not appointed diplomatists. I had not the right of reply then, but I was unable to understand the accusation—for one of the members of the Commission was Sir Edward Thornton, one of the most experienced Members of the Diplomatic Body, and a man especially selected by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) to occupy the difficult position of Minister at Washington; and, as both he and your Lordships know, Sir Edward Thornton enjoyed to a great extent the confidence of the late Earl of Clarendon.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I beg to explain that what I said was that I regretted that the President of the Commission had not been an experienced diplomatist:—because there were three or four distinguished diplomatists—I will not name them, because some of them are present in the House this evening—who had had 30 or 40 years' experience, and who ought to have been the men selected to preside over a body appointed to conduct so important a negotiation.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have mentioned a Member of the Commission who is not only a most experienced diplomatist, but who is one of the persons best acquainted with the present state of America; and that, I think, is a sufficient answer to the objection. But I will go further—I will say that, in my opinion, it was a great object to have a political element in the Commission, and that a statesman of high political character should be included in it. In that respect I believe that the high official position of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) was an advantage; and although I do not like to say a word about a Colleague in his presence, I will say that I should like to refer to the Commissioners who were with him—and I should not fear to include the American Commissioners—to know whether, in their opinion, anything was wanting on his part in care, or in knowledge, or in firmness, in conducting this negotiation. An hon. Friend of mine, who is very apt to hit the right nail on its head with a joke, observed in "another place" that a sharp attorney would have settled the matter in five minutes. I do not believe that; I do not believe that the sharpest of attorneys would have settled the matter in five minutes, or in five months, or in five years; but what I feel sure of is this—that nothing would have induced me to have been a party to a negotiation of this sort being carried on between two great friendly countries on any such principle as seems to be implied in that epithet. With regard to the charge that the Commission was entirely deficient in law, I utterly deny it. One Member of the Commission, Sir John Macdonald, to whom the noble Earl (Earl Russell) has paid such a high tribute, was not only eminently fitted for the office by his position as Prime Minister of Canada, but by the fact that he was Minister of Justice for that country. Again, Mr. Mountague Bernard was selected from one of our Universities for his intimate acquaintance with International Law, and as the writer of one of the best books on the subject. I venture to say that this was another high legal element in the Commission. Then the Secretary to the Commission,

Lord Tenterden, who was trained in the Foreign Office, was—as I mentioned the other day—absolutely recommended to me by the noble Earl opposite as one of the three best International lawyers in this country. And then there was my right hon. Friend Sir Stafford Northcote, to whom I am deeply grateful for having joined the Commission. I am glad he did so, because it gave a more national character to the Commission; and even if that right hon. Gentleman had not had the qualification of being one of the leaders of the Conservative party, he had other personal qualifications of the highest order. Sir Stafford Northcote was many years ago called to the Bar; and when, some 25 years since, I first met him at the Board of Trade, he was then engaged in one of the branches of the permanent Civil Service, where the responsibility of drafting Treaties rested almost entirely upon him, and where he had the reputation of being one of the most accurate draftsmen in the whole Civil Service. I say, therefore, that that was a proper Commission to select; and on that point I agree with the observations made by my noble Friend last year—that no objection was to be made to it—instead of with the opinions he holds this year. Now, I quite agree that it was no use having a number of good workmen unless the work was well done; that it was of no use having a number of good cooks unless they cooked a dinner that was fit to eat. But I say, also, that the Commissioners did their work well, and I say also it is all very well to pick holes in a Treaty now which was generally approved last year—as was shown even in the proceedings of your Lordships' House. For when my noble Friend says that he consented to withdraw his Motion last year, my noble Friend is incorrect. So far from withdrawing his Motion, my noble Friend insisted upon having it negatived by your Lordships' House. [EARL RUSSELL: I did not divide.] No, my noble Friend did not divide—he only abstained from dividing because it was evident that he would have been left in a very small minority. The proceedings at that time in the House of Commons also showed that the feeling of the country generally was in favour of the Treaty. I think I have never concealed—I believe I have already several times expressed my regret at the omission from the Treaty of any demand on account of the Fenian raids; but when my noble Friend complained that in the original letter these Claims were not included, I must refer a little further back. I rather think my noble Friend was Secretary of State when they occurred, and yet I am not aware that any Claim in respect to them was ever made against America either by my noble Friend, or that the Conservative Government ever took such a course. But besides the question of expediency, other reasons were given for not pressing these Claims, as that they were partly indirect, and had not arisen at the time of the Civil War; and I hold that we adopted the most discreet policy in regard to them. It is to be regretted, and it is the one omission in the Treaty which I am ready to admit. The noble Earl (Earl Russell), in the course of his speech, said the one point on which the whole misunderstanding exists is whether my noble Friend and his Colleagues did or did not exclude the Indirect Claims from the Washington Treaty. At the beginning of his speech the noble Earl said they were so excluded; and if that is so, I, for one, cannot see how any great blame can attach to the Commissioners—they could only be blamed for not having excluded the Indirect Claims; and, therefore, I cannot reconcile the inconsistent statement which the noble Earl made at the beginning of his speech with the general tenour of his observations. As I have often said in this House, Her Majesty's Government had no intention to include the Indirect Claims in the Treaty, and we had reason to believe that the American Commissioners had no such intention; and that they were, in fact, included.

Earl Granville

My Lords, in the observations I am now about to make I wish to avoid anything at all of a criminary or recriminatory character with regard to the American Government or the American Commissioners, because I think we have arrived at that point where, practically, the Indirect Claims have been abandoned. But I may, without any want of kindly feeling towards the American Government, defend the British Commissioners and Her Majesty's Government upon the three points which I have mentioned. I will not trouble your Lordships at any length upon the first of these points, because I do not think there is anyone of your Lordships who believes that Her Majesty's Government or Commissioners ever attended to include these Claims in the Treaty. With regard to the ground we had to suppose that such was the intention of the American Commissioners, I need only mention two facts. One fact is that on a particular day—I forget precisely which—we received a simple statement from the British Commissioners that the American Commissioners had waived the Indirect Claims. The other fact upon which Her Majesty's Government grounded their belief is the Protocol, which is open to your Lordships equally with myself. It appears to me clear as the day that the Indirect Claims were waived by that Protocol. The Americans say that the waiver was contingent upon a particular settlement—an “amicable settlement”—involving the payment of a large gross sum of money. All I can say is that we have never entertained the payment of a sum of money. We all know the noble Earl's opposition to the principle of Arbitration, and we must have all thought it somewhat inconsistent with that opposition when, in the autumn of 1870, the noble Earl published a suggestion for the payment of a gross sum of money to the Americans, and so, as it seemed to me, gave up the very principle which had been maintained by each succeeding Government since there was any question of these claims at all. If noble Lords will look at the Protocol I think they will agree with me that there is no connection between this waiver on the part of the American Government and the settlement of these Claims by the payment of a sum of money. The words there used are “an amicable settlement,” and are as general in their meaning as any words can possibly be, and the same words are repeated both in Mr. Fish's letter, written in January, 1871, in our despatches, in our instructions, and in the Preamble of the Treaty itself. I therefore say that, as far as we can judge by language, the waiver of these Indirect Claims is complete.

My Lords, I now come to the question of whether they are excluded under the Treaty itself. With regard to this point we certainly have the authority of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), that the terms of the Treaty would admit the introduction of the Indirect Claims; but surely that opinion cannot, under the circumstances, be considered decisive, however high the noble and learned Lord's reputation as a lawyer. But even if I waive the authority of the professional advisers of the Government which I am not prepared to do—there is other authority to which I may appeal. Several Judges of the highest position and character in this country have expressed to me very strongly their opinions that the Claims are excluded by the Treaty; but as I have not the authority of those learned Judges I cannot name them. There are others, however, whose authority I may quote. Some days ago I had the pleasure of meeting the highest Judge in Chancery who has not a seat in this House and who may therefore be supposed to be the more free from political bias; and that learned Judge told me that, having spent 40 years of his life in drawing legal documents and construing legal documents drawn by other persons, his deliberate conviction was that the Treaty of Washington was admirably well drawn to effect the purpose of the British Commissioners. On my asking the learned Judge's authority to quote his opinion, he replied—“I have not the slightest objection, for I have expressed the same opinion to everyone with whom I have conversed on the subject.” And it so happens that half-an-hour ago I met a member, I believe the eldest member of the Judicial Bench at Common Law—who told me that, in his opinion, the plain reading of the Article in the Treaty was to exclude the Indirect Claims, and, further, that he had never met a man who held a contrary opinion. These are very eminent authorities; but, in addition, I might quote the greatest American jurists, and among others, Mr. Beech Lawrence, editor of Wheaton's great work on International Law; Professor Wolsey, the venerable ex-President of Yale College; Mr. Ticknor Curtis, the author of The Constitutional History of the United States; and Mr. Reverdy Johnson—all of whom have publicly stated their concurrence with us in the opinion that the Treaty of Washington does not include the Indirect Claims. But I do not wish to rest upon authorities upon this matter. I will ask your Lordships, if you have not already done so, to read the arguments contained in the despatch and in the Memorandum of the 20th of March sent by us to the much more than they had before, and that the manner of the American Government had become more friendly to him than it had been before. Now, my Lords, my opinion is there is one thing American statesmen and the American nation do respect and do like, and it is that quality which in vulgar English is called "pluck." When they see that quality exhibited by the English people they respect and like us much more than they would if they saw anything on our part like a pusillanimous submission to unjust demands. I think, if they refuse to withdraw these Indirect Claims, and we refuse to go on with the Arbitration unless they are withdrawn, the result will be that no proceeding will be taken on this Treaty. The Correspondence which is stated to have come to light surreptitiously, but which I believe to be genuine for all that, shows that the two parties to the Washington Treaty are as wide asunder as the poles—Why not acknowledge the fact? Why not acknowledge that what we desire is in direct contradiction to what the American Government desires? That being so, if it were at once acknowledged, the present Treaty would lapse; but a time would probably arrive when the United States' Government would permit itself to be governed by those maxims which have guided the Governments of all other nations in corresponding circumstances, and which, even in recent as well as in past times, have guided American statesmen—such as guided Lord Grenville and General Washington in 1794, such as guided the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) and Mr. Reverdy Johnson when they were framing their Treaty, and as subsequently influenced the Earl of Clarendon when at the Foreign Office. My Lords, I agree with Mr. Reverdy Johnson that for the prolongation of the war we could under no circumstances be made answerable; but there is the question whether in respect of the Alabama and certain other vessels there was any negligence, any want of due diligence on the part of those who had the conduct of our affairs during the American War. My Lords, this question is not quite new to me; because Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State during the war, interrogated me as to whether I was prepared to refer the matter to Arbitration. I took no notice of that proposal at the time; but some time afterwards I informed Mr. Adams that it did not appear to me that that proposal would be acceptable to Her Majesty's Government. I had consulted Lord Palmerston previously to making that reply to Mr. Seward. There were two objections to the proposition. One was that the Americans could scarcely have made their case without throwing imputations on the honour of the English statesmen who had examined into the case of these vessels. The next objection was that the opinions of the Law Officers might be set aside. My Lords, what I then foresaw distinctly was what has since come to pass. You find that the American Government heap imputations on the persons whose duty it was to make inquiries for Her Majesty's Government in respect of those vessels. They allege that, so far from acting with the bond fide view of discovering whether those ships were being fitted up as fighting ships to make war in favour of the Southern Confederacy, they carried their carelessness so far that it amounted to evil intent, and that they did not act impartially. Now, my Lords, I do not think it consistent with the amity of two great nations that the Government of one should accuse the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State of the other of being so hypocritical and so unfair as to pretend to obtain opinions and evidence to convict persons engaged in an illegal proceeding, while in point of fact they were conniving at the illegal practices. That was one reason why I did not like the notion of Arbitration. Another reason was that I thought the opinion of the Law Officers would not be duly respected. Well, so far from respecting the opinion of the Law Officers, the negotiators of the Treaty of Washington have made new rules. Some of these are rather obscure—and one of them is particularly so. From this one, words have been left out which, in my opinion, ought to have been put into it. I will state what the omission is. In all authorities on the Law of Nations, and in all official documents of the Courts of Great Britain and those of America, it is stated that in the case of ships, such as those of which the United States complain, there are two questions for those who would interfere with them. First, you have to consider whether the ships are being built with the view of being fitted out as ships of war; and the second question is, whether you have grounds for believing that when so fitted up they are to be employed in warlike operations against an ally. Now, in a new rule contained in this Treaty the first consideration is inserted; but the second, whether the vessel is being fitted up, the words "with the intention of making war on a friend or ally" are omitted. It is said that a great authority—I believe Sir Roundell Palmer—is of opinion that the rule is sufficiently explicit, and that notwithstanding the omission of these words the meaning is clearly conveyed. But where there has been so much refinement, and such a different sense has been given to words from that which one would suppose them to bear, I think that there should have been no such omission in the new rule. Indeed, the very evils I foresaw when the proposal for Arbitration was made have occurred. My Lords, I believe they might have been guarded against. I believe our negotiators at Washington might have made the terms of the Treaty so clear that it would have been impossible to set up those Indirect Claims under them. But our Commissioners were not what Mr. Burke described the educated Americans of his time to be—they were not particularly versed in the science of law, that study which makes men inquisitive, makes them ready with all kinds of engagements, prompt in reply to objections, and always ingenious in proposing schemes—and, unhappily, they omitted to put in the Treaty of Washington plain, precise words which would have prevented any such misunderstanding as that which has arisen. My Lords, there is another topic—the last one with which I have to trouble your Lordships, but one which I must not omit to mention before I conclude what I have to say in introducing my Motion. It has reference to Canada. Your Lordships are aware that the Claim made by the Americans is for loss of property—the Americans complain that ships of which they were owners had been captured, and that they had lost much property in consequence—I do not think that the proceedings of the Alabama or of any other of the vessels resulted in bloodshed. It is not so, unhappily, in the case of Canada. There was a raid into that colony of which Sir John Macdonald speaks in a speech of four hours, delivered by him in the Canada House of Commons. He says that in the raid many Canadians lost their lives, and that there was a great destruction of property as well. He says he had been blamed for not having obtained reparation; for that American citizens had lost property, but they immediately went to their Government and obtained redress. I know how their Government acted, because the whole time this destruction of property continued I constantly received from Mr. Adams demands for compensation on account of loss of property in respect of which complaints had been sent in by American citizens. Sir John Macdonald says that knowing of these raids, and knowing of the loss of life and property incurred by means of them, and knowing that Canada could not obtain redress from the United States, he applied to the Government of Great Britain—he applied to his own Government, and asked them to demand from the Government of the United States some indemnity for the loss—to demand reparation to the families of persons who had been killed or who had suffered wounds in those hostilities. The American Government had listened favourably, and had listened faithfully, to the demands which the American citizens had made. But what did our own Government do? Nothing whatsoever. The statement comes with the authority of Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister of Canada. He complained of this as a great injustice; but that a Member of the Canadian Parliament, seeing the defect in the reference, said to him—"You cannot get redress from the Commissioners who are negotiating the Treaty, because the English Government has never referred this Case as one requiring redress, and, therefore, you cannot press your Claims." That being so, it has been said—I do not know on what authority—that when everything had been settled except the question of the Fenian raids the Government sent directions to our negotiators at Washington not to press the Claims put forward. Sir John Macdonald entirely disposes of that, because he says that the reason they were not pressed was they never had been referred at all; that the British Government never having asked in a formal manner for a recognition of those Claims, the Canadians were entirely out of court in consequence of that neglect. My Lords, I say that I feel humiliated at the negligence — the great negligence — which was shown in not urging those claims. I am of opinion that, as Sir John Macdonald says, we ought to consider Canada as the right arm of this Empire. Nothing can be more loyal, nothing more faithful, than the conduct of the Canadians. They ought to be met with a corresponding generosity. I do not think it would be wise to show an indifference to that great colonial possession. It is by treating all the various portions of the British dominions well—by acting faithfully in the interests of all, and not by armies and fleets, that we can bind together all parts of the Empire and make them loyal and affectionate to the Crown and the Government of the Empire. My Lords, it is with these sentiments, and trusting that by the interposition of this House this question may receive a fitting solution, and that on this and on every other occasion we may show a due regard to the honour and dignity of the Crown, I submit to your Lordships the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

Earl Russell

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the Arbitrators appointed to meet at Geneva pursuant to the Treaty of Washington be suspended until the claims included in the Case submitted on behalf of the United States, and understood on the part of Her Majesty not to be within the province of the Arbitrators, have been withdrawn.
—(The Earl Russell.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise under a sense of grave responsibility involved in following the noble Earl who has just made this Motion of Want of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government. I think that the noble Earl has somewhat failed in explaining to your Lordships that which appears to me to be difficult to understand—namely, his proceeding with regard to this particular Motion. Your Lordships are aware that on two occasions, either spontaneously or at the advice of his Friends, the noble Earl postponed his Motion. He postponed it a third time, very kindly, in reply to an appeal which I made to him before the Whitsuntide holidays. After the Supplemental Article had appeared in the newspapers, as I stated to your Lordships yesterday, nothing ever gave me greater pleasure than to hear my noble Friend say that he approved the course I had taken; and he at the same time added some kind phrases of which I knew I was undeserving, but which I accepted with pleasure as a token of our long-continued friendship. I heard nothing more until 2 o'clock yesterday, when, in the course of a conversation which I then held with the noble Earl, he informed me that he did not intend to move a Vote of Censure upon the Government, but that he purposed confining his Motion to a request for the production of Correspondence. I was therefore astonished when, at 5 o'clock, three hours afterwards, he stated it was his intention to proceed with his Motion as it appeared on the Notice Paper. It is true that he gave as his reason for adopting that course the publication of the Correspondence surreptitiously communicated to the New York paper. Now, my Lords, the noble Earl during the whole of his speech has, with regard to recent transactions, very naturally spoken and inferred things from facts with which he is not well acquainted, and therefore I am not surprised—although I think I gave some explanation of that Correspondence yesterday—that the noble Earl does not see that it is not in the slightest degree applicable to the present state of things. That Correspondence occurred during a time when the discussion between ourselves and the United States' Government was carried on upon the basis of an interchange of Notes; and I explained yesterday exactly what the United States' Government held—which was, that although the President had the power to desire his agents to follow a certain procedure before the Arbitrators, he had no power by the Constitution of the United States either to withdraw or to do anything equivalent to a withdrawal of the Indirect Claims from before the Tribunal, or further to enter into any engagement with us by which we should mutually bind ourselves for the future to maintain the principles we had already advanced. But all this Correspondence occurred before we signified our consent to negotiate on the basis of a Treaty Article. That Treaty Article entirely changed the nature of things. No one can pretend that the United States' Government have not the right to put their own construction upon the Treaty. Putting that construction upon the Treaty, they believed they had a right to prefer these Indirect Claims; and believing that, their contention was that these claims can only be got rid of by a fresh Treaty, sanctioned by the Senate, or by referring them to the Arbitrators and leaving them to deal with them as they should think fit. So that, as far as the Correspondence is concerned, there is absolutely nothing to be found in it which can justify my noble Friend's change.

Earl Russell

My Lords, there are, of course, some things in my noble Friend's speech with which I agree; much with which I should be sorry to express any concurrence in detail, and much from which I entirely disagree. As far as my memory will serve me, I will touch upon some of the points on which the noble Earl dwelt.

I think he began by stating that the composition of the British Commission was not sufficient for the purpose. I am bound to say—although this sentiment has been already expressed this year—that it comes somewhat late; because when the composition of that Commission was announced, I did not hear one single word of objection to any of the Commissioners appointed—on the contrary, the noble Earl himself, speaking in his place in Parliament, said he entirely approved the composition of the Commission. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) complained the other day that we had not appointed diplomatists. I had not the right of reply then, but I was unable to understand the accusation—for one of the members of the Commission was Sir Edward Thornton, one of the most experienced Members of the Diplomatic Body, and a man especially selected by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) to occupy the difficult position of Minister at Washington; and, as both he and your Lordships know, Sir Edward Thornton enjoyed to a great extent the confidence of the late Earl of Clarendon.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I beg to explain that what I said was that I regretted that the President of the Commission had not been an experienced diplomatist:—because there were three or four distinguished diplomatists—I will not name them, because some of them are present in the House this evening—who had had 30 or 40 years' experience, and who ought to have been the men selected to preside over a body appointed to conduct so important a negotiation.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have mentioned a Member of the Commission who is not only a most experienced diplomatist, but who is one of the persons best acquainted with the present state of America; and that, I think, is a sufficient answer to the objection. But I will go further—I will say that, in my opinion, it was a great object to have a political element in the Commission, and that a statesman of high political character should be included in it. In that respect I believe that the high official position of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) was an advantage; and although I do not like to say a word about a Colleague in his presence, I will say that I should like to refer to the Commissioners who were with him—and I should not fear to include the American Commissioners—to know whether, in their opinion, anything was wanting on his part in care, or in knowledge, or in firmness, in conducting this negotiation. An hon. Friend of mine, who is very apt to hit the right nail on its head with a joke, observed in "another place" that a sharp attorney would have settled the matter in five minutes. I do not believe that; I do not believe that the sharpest of attorneys would have settled the matter in five minutes, or in five months, or in five years; but what I feel sure of is this—that nothing would have induced me to have been a party to a negotiation of this sort being carried on between two great friendly countries on any such principle as seems to be implied in that epithet. With regard to the charge that the Commission was entirely deficient in law, I utterly deny it. One Member of the Commission, Sir John Macdonald, to whom the noble Earl (Earl Russell) has paid such a high tribute, was not only eminently fitted for the office by his position as Prime Minister of Canada, but by the fact that he was Minister of Justice for that country. Again, Mr. Mountague Bernard was selected from one of our Universities for his intimate acquaintance with International Law, and as the writer of one of the best books on the subject. I venture to say that this was another high legal element in the Commission. Then the Secretary to the Commission,

Lord Tenterden, who was trained in the Foreign Office, was—as I mentioned the other day—absolutely recommended to me by the noble Earl opposite as one of the three best International lawyers in this country. And then there was my right hon. Friend Sir Stafford Northcote, to whom I am deeply grateful for having joined the Commission. I am glad he did so, because it gave a more national character to the Commission; and even if that right hon. Gentleman had not had the qualification of being one of the leaders of the Conservative party, he had other personal qualifications of the highest order. Sir Stafford Northcote was many years ago called to the Bar; and when, some 25 years since, I first met him at the Board of Trade, he was then engaged in one of the branches of the permanent Civil Service, where the responsibility of drafting Treaties rested almost entirely upon him, and where he had the reputation of being one of the most accurate draftsmen in the whole Civil Service. I say, therefore, that that was a proper Commission to select; and on that point I agree with the observations made by my noble Friend last year—that no objection was to be made to it—instead of with the opinions he holds this year. Now, I quite agree that it was no use having a number of good workmen unless the work was well done; that it was of no use having a number of good cooks unless they cooked a dinner that was fit to eat. But I say, also, that the Commissioners did their work well, and I say also it is all very well to pick holes in a Treaty now which was generally approved last year—as was shown even in the proceedings of your Lordships' House. For when my noble Friend says that he consented to withdraw his Motion last year, my noble Friend is incorrect. So far from withdrawing his Motion, my noble Friend insisted upon having it negatived by your Lordships' House. [Earl Russell: I did not divide.] No, my noble Friend did not divide—he only abstained from dividing because it was evident that he would have been left in a very small minority. The proceedings at that time in the House of Commons also showed that the feeling of the country generally was in favour of the Treaty. I think I have never concealed—I believe I have already several times expressed my regret at the omission from the Treaty of any demand on account of the Fenian raids; but when my noble Friend complained that in the original letter these Claims were not included, I must refer a little further back. I rather think my noble Friend was Secretary of State when they occurred, and yet I am not aware that any Claim in respect to them was ever made against America either by my noble Friend, or that the Conservative Government ever took such a course. But besides the question of expediency, other reasons were given for not pressing these Claims, as that they were partly indirect, and had not arisen at the time of the Civil War; and I hold that we adopted the most discreet policy in regard to them. It is to be regretted, and it is the one omission in the Treaty which I am ready to admit. The noble Earl (Earl Russell), in the course of his speech, said the one point on which the whole misunderstanding exists is whether my noble Friend and his Colleagues did or did not exclude the Indirect Claims from the Washington Treaty. At the beginning of his speech the noble Earl said they were so excluded; and if that is so, I, for one, cannot see how any great blame can attach to the Commissioners—they could only be blamed for not having excluded the Indirect Claims; and, therefore, I cannot reconcile the inconsistent statement which the noble Earl made at the beginning of his speech with the general tenour of his observations. As I have often said in this House, Her Majesty's Government had no intention to include the Indirect Claims in the Treaty, and we had reason to believe that the American Commissioners had no such intention; and that they were, in fact, included.

Earl Granville

My Lords, in the observations I am now about to make I wish to avoid anything at all of a criminary or recriminatory character with regard to the American Government or the American Commissioners, because I think we have arrived at that point where, practically, the Indirect Claims have been abandoned. But I may, without any want of kindly feeling towards the American Government, defend the British Commissioners and Her Majesty's Government upon the three points which I have mentioned. I will not trouble your Lordships at any length upon the first of these points, because I do not think there is anyone of your Lordships who believes that Her Majesty's Government or Commissioners ever attended to include these Claims in the Treaty. With regard to the ground we had to suppose that such was the intention of the American Commissioners, I need only mention two facts. One fact is that on a particular day—I forget precisely which—we received a simple statement from the British Commissioners that the American Commissioners had waived the Indirect Claims. The other fact upon which Her Majesty's Government grounded their belief is the Protocol, which is open to your Lordships equally with myself. It appears to me clear as the day that the Indirect Claims were waived by that Protocol. The Americans say that the waiver was contingent upon a particular settlement—an “amicable settlement”—involving the payment of a large gross sum of money. All I can say is that we have never entertained the payment of a sum of money. We all know the noble Earl's opposition to the principle of Arbitration, and we must have all thought it somewhat inconsistent with that opposition when, in the autumn of 1870, the noble Earl published a suggestion for the payment of a gross sum of money to the Americans, and so, as it seemed to me, gave up the very principle which had been maintained by each succeeding Government since there was any question of these claims at all. If noble Lords will look at the Protocol I think they will agree with me that there is no connection between this waiver on the part of the American Government and the settlement of these Claims by the payment of a sum of money. The words there used are “an amicable settlement,” and are as general in their meaning as any words can possibly be, and the same words are repeated both in Mr. Fish's letter, written in January, 1871, in our despatches, in our instructions, and in the Preamble of the Treaty itself. I therefore say that, as far as we can judge by language, the waiver of these Indirect Claims is complete.

My Lords, I now come to the question of whether they are excluded under the Treaty itself. With regard to this point we certainly have the authority of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), that the terms of the Treaty would admit the introduction of the Indirect Claims; but surely that opinion cannot, under the circumstances, be considered decisive, however high the noble and learned Lord's reputation as a lawyer. But even if I waive the authority of the professional advisers of the Government which I am not prepared to do—there is other authority to which I may appeal. Several Judges of the highest position and character in this country have expressed to me very strongly their opinions that the Claims are excluded by the Treaty; but as I have not the authority of those learned Judges I cannot name them. There are others, however, whose authority I may quote. Some days ago I had the pleasure of meeting the highest Judge in Chancery who has not a seat in this House and who may therefore be supposed to be the more free from political bias; and that learned Judge told me that, having spent 40 years of his life in drawing legal documents and construing legal documents drawn by other persons, his deliberate conviction was that the Treaty of Washington was admirably well drawn to effect the purpose of the British Commissioners. On my asking the learned Judge's authority to quote his opinion, he replied—“I have not the slightest objection, for I have expressed the same opinion to everyone with whom I have conversed on the subject.” And it so happens that half-an-hour ago I met a member, I believe the eldest member of the Judicial Bench at Common Law—who told me that, in his opinion, the plain reading of the Article in the Treaty was to exclude the Indirect Claims, and, further, that he had never met a man who held a contrary opinion. These are very eminent authorities; but, in addition, I might quote the greatest American jurists, and among others, Mr. Beech Lawrence, editor of Wheaton's great work on International Law; Professor Wolsey, the venerable ex-President of Yale College; Mr. Ticknor Curtis, the author of The Constitutional History of the United States; and Mr. Reverdy Johnson—all of whom have publicly stated their concurrence with us in the opinion that the Treaty of Washington does not include the Indirect Claims. But I do not wish to rest upon authorities upon this matter. I will ask your Lordships, if you have not already done so, to read the arguments contained in the despatch and in the Memorandum of the 20th of March sent by us to the on account of the Fenian when my noble Friend comes in the original letter these not included, I must refer her back. I rather think and was Secretary of State occurred, and yet I am not any Claim in respect to them do against America either Friend, or that the Government ever took such a besides the question of other reasons were given for these Claims, as that they indirect, and had not arisen from the Civil War; and I hold that the most discreet policy was to exclude them. It is to be regretted, that the omission in the Treaty was ready to admit. The noble Earl Russell, in the course of his speech, made the one point on which the understanding exists is whether the Government and his Colleagues did exclude the Indirect Claims from the Washington Treaty. At the close of his speech the noble Earl said that he was so excluded; and if that be the case, one cannot see how any one can attach to the Commission they could only be blamed for having excluded the Indirect Claims; therefore, I cannot reconcile the inconsistent statement which the noble Earl made at the beginning of his speech with the general tenour of his observations. As I have often said in this House, Majesty's Government had no intention to include the Indirect Claims in the Treaty, and we had reason to believe that the American Commission had no such intention; and that fact, I think, is included.

In the observations I am making I wish to avoid anything of a crimimatory or recriminatory character with regard to the Government or the American Commission, because I think we have reached a point where, practically, no Claims have been abandoned. I may, without any want of regard towards the American Commission, defend the British Commission and Her Majesty's Government on the three points which I have mentioned.

I will not trouble your Lordships any length upon the first point, because I do not think it is anyone of your Lordships who believes that Her Majesty's Government or Commissioners ever attended to include these Claims in the Treaty. With regard to the ground we had to suppose that such was the intention of the American Commissioners, I need only mention two facts. One fact is that on a particular day—I forget precisely which—we received a simple statement from the British Commissioners that the American Commissioners had waived the Indirect Claims. The other fact upon which Her Majesty's Government grounded their belief is the Protocol, which is open to your Lordships equally with myself. It appears to me clear as the day that the Indirect Claims were waived by that Protocol. The Americans say that the waiver was contingent upon a particular settlement—an “amicable settlement”—involving the payment of a large gross sum of money. All I can say is that we have never entertained the payment of a sum of money. We all know the noble Earl's opposition to the principle of Arbitration, and we must have all thought it somewhat inconsistent with that opposition when, in the autumn of 1870, the noble Earl published a suggestion for the payment of a gross sum of money to the Americans, and so, as it seemed to me, gave up the very principle which had been maintained by each succeeding Government since there was any question of these claims at all. If noble Lords will look at the Protocol I think they will agree with me that there is no connection between this waiver on the part of the American Government and the settlement of these Claims by the payment of a sum of money. The words there used are “an amicable settlement,” and are as general in their meaning as any words can possibly be, and the same words are repeated both in Mr. Fish's letter, written in January, 1871, in our despatches, in our instructions, and in the Preamble of the Treaty itself. I therefore say that, as far as we can judge by language, the waiver of these Indirect Claims is complete.

My Lords, I now come to the question of whether they are excluded under the Treaty itself. With regard to this point we certainly have the authority of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), that the terms of the Treaty would admit the introduction of the Indirect Claims; but surely that opinion cannot, under the circumstances, be considered decisive, however high the noble and learned Lord's reputation as a lawyer. But even if I waive the authority of the professional advisers of the Government which I am not prepared to do—there is other authority to which I may appeal. Several Judges of the highest position and character in this country have expressed to me very strongly their opinions that the Claims are excluded by the Treaty; but as I have not the authority of those learned Judges I cannot name them. There are others, however, whose authority I may quote. Some days ago I had the pleasure of meeting the highest Judge in Chancery who has not a seat in this House and who may therefore be supposed to be the more free from political bias; and that learned Judge told me that, having spent 40 years of his life in drawing legal documents and construing legal documents drawn by other persons, his deliberate conviction was that the Treaty of Washington was admirably well drawn to effect the purpose of the British Commissioners. On my asking the learned Judge's authority to quote his opinion, he replied—“I have not the slightest objection, for I have expressed the same opinion to everyone with whom I have conversed on the subject.” And it so happens that half-an-hour ago I met a member, I believe the eldest member of the Judicial Bench at Common Law—who told me that, in his opinion, the plain reading of the Article in the Treaty was to exclude the Indirect Claims, and, further, that he had never met a man who held a contrary opinion. These are very eminent authorities; but, in addition, I might quote the greatest American jurists, and among others, Mr. Beech Lawrence, editor of Wheaton's great work on International Law; Professor Wolsey, the venerable ex-President of Yale College; Mr. Ticknor Curtis, the author of The Constitutional History of the United States; and Mr. Reverdy Johnson—all of whom have publicly stated their concurrence with us in the opinion that the Treaty of Washington does not include the Indirect Claims. But I do not wish to rest upon authorities upon this matter. I will ask your Lordships, if you have not already done so, to read the arguments contained in the despatch and in the Memorandum of the 20th of March sent by us to the United States, in which it is, I think, clearly shown that the Claims could not go beyond what were generically known as "the Alabama Claims," which have been clearly ascertained and shown. The whole correspondence that has passed between Lord Clarendon, Mr. Adams, Mr. Fish, and Mr. Seward, shows clearly that the "Claims" as understood by them related only to what we know as the Direct Claims. It is never satisfactory to hear one side of a question, however; and I therefore ask your Lordships to read the reply made to a portion of the statements, contained in the Memorandum to which I refer. If your Lordships do this you will see it nowhere contended that the Indirect Claims were included. In no spirit of recrimination against the American Government—for I fully admit their right to put their own construction upon the Treaty—but, in justice to the British Commissioners, and to ourselves who appointed and sanctioned the acts of those Commissioners I desire to point out that neither they nor we have ever used a word which could imply even a doubt upon the point of the exclusion of the Indirect Claims for the Treaty of Washington—and that is the only point on which misunderstanding has arisen. I think, then, that the terms of censure which have been bestowed upon my noble Friend and his Colleagues in some quarters, and even the mild reproach of the noble Earl that they were not equal to the occasion, are perfectly unfounded and unjust. The noble Earl has told us that we ought to have put forward this question of the Indirect Claims at the very beginning of our proceedings in reference to this question, and he told us a story, part of which I knew, but part of which was certainly not within my knowledge. I believe Her Majesty's Government were perfectly justified in taking the course they did in the Trent affair; but I was altogether unaware of the fact that my noble Friend took the personal course, apart from the sanction of the Sovereign, and, as it would seem, without the consent of his Colleagues, of sending a private threat of a very serious character to the American Government. Threats, unless you are perfectly prepared to execute them, are not certainly the wisest way of carrying on negotiations, and we should have been in a very awkward position if the American Government had been in a position not only to demand the extradition of Mr. Mason and Mr. Slidell, but to accompany the demand with a very marked threat in the event of non-compliance. When the noble Earl says that his is the way to make the Americans civil, I entirely deny it. The result of what has occurred in reference to that matter has been a feeling of the greatest bitterness in the minds of the people of the United States, and which has not tended to create harmony between the two countries. The noble Earl then went on to discuss the Treaty of last year; but I protest against the only inference I can draw from what he said—which was that because he is opposed to the principle of Arbitration we should take no means to get rid of what he admits to be a bad Treaty. I am perfectly convinced that should this Treaty unfortunately fall to the ground—which is not yet certain—we shall stand better before the whole world if we exhaust every means of coming to a favourable end of the misunderstanding which has unfortunately arisen. We have done this to the best of our ability. I think it would be very extraordinary if your Lordships were not able to detect some slight flaws here and there in a negotiation of extraordinary difficulty, and particularly when a portion of that negotiation was conducted by means of the telegraph, which is one of the most imperfect agencies for negotiation that could be devised. The noble Earl has referred to some contrivance upon which he says Mr. Gladstone is engaged—but the description of which I cannot repeat—for the purpose of appearing to do one thing, but in reality doing another. I can only say with regard to this, that I am perfectly unaware of any facts which in any way agree with the noble Earl's description, and I should like to know the authority on which the noble Earl makes the accusation. Yesterday we were reproached for going so far as to state what the present position of affairs is; but I did go so far as to state some facts, and I think that I then showed that with regard to the Supplemental Article we were ready to adopt a course which would be attended with no difficulty on America doing that which was equivalent to a withdrawal of the Indirect Claims, and that the only difficulty which now exists is with regard to the use of words relating to the action of both countries for the future. Some of your Lordships may, perhaps, be of opinion that what the Americans engaged provisionally to do would not be sufficient for the object we have in view. Now, it appears to me that it would be perfectly sufficient—and I will tell your Lordships why—we have both interests in common—we are both commercial and maritime nations—it is only the mode of expression that they object to in the Supplemental Article. They think that our proposals are too limited. This engagement, if made, would be communicated to the Arbitrators by both parties to the negotiations either by a joint Note or identic Notes, before or at the time of their meeting to receive the written or printed arguments, or summary of arguments, under Article 5 of the Treaty, and to proceed with the business of the Arbitration. The written or printed argument of each party to be then delivered is to show the points, and to refer to the evidence on which each Government relies. Now, the United States could not, without a direct breach of the agreement not to make any claim in respect of these Indirect Losses before the Tribunal of Arbitration, have relied upon any point, or referred to any evidence, in respect of such Indirect Losses, in their written or printed argument delivered under this Article of the Treaty. Under Article 2 the Arbitrators are to “examine and decide all questions that shall be laid before them” on the parts of the Governments respectively; and your Lordships are aware that under Article 6 they are to be governed by certain rules “in deciding the matters submitted to them.” When, before the preliminary proceedings are closed, or the arguments under Article 5 delivered, they are informed by an identic Note from both Governments that the United States “will make no claim before them in respect of the Indirect Losses” mentioned in the Supplemental Article, they will have distinct notice that no question in respect of those losses is “laid before them” or “submitted to them” for their decision, by either Government. It appears to me, therefore, perfectly unreasonable and extravagant to say that the Arbitrators, because these Claims have been advanced in the Case and Counter-Case of the United States, will be bound or entitled to treat them as among the questions laid before them on the “part of the Government of the United States,” after it has been formally notified to them by the United States themselves that they have agreed “not to make” and “will not make” them. The very suggestion of such an equivocation upon these words would deprive them of all practical meaning whatever, and would make the agreement for the future “in consideration whereof” the President agrees to “make no claim,” &c., wholly illusory and gratuitous. The words “he will make no claim in respect of” Indirect “Losses as aforesaid” as much preclude a claim to have such Indirect Losses taken into account, in arriving at a lump sum to be awarded by the Arbitrators, as they would preclude a claim for a separate award by them on that account. Indeed, no such separate award by the Arbitrators is possible under the 7th Article of the Treaty. The waiver, therefore, can only be of any claim to have these Indirect Losses taken into account in awarding a sum in gross. My Lords, I am no lawyer; but it appears to me to be perfectly plain that if in a private arbitration the parties have sent in claims in writing, and afterwards, before or during the arguments, agree that one of those claims “shall not be made” by the party who had previously made it, and jointly inform the arbitrator of that agreement, the arbitrator would very grossly miscarry in his duty if he did not treat that claim as if it had never been made. I think that this is a perfectly simple statement of the force of the Supplemental Article, and that Her Majesty’s Government have been well advised that it is perfectly sufficient for the purpose we have in view.

Earl Granville

And now I must say a word or two respecting the course which the noble Earl has adopted in proposing this Resolution. If the noble Earl the late Secretary for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Derby), who was so full of friendly feeling towards the United States, and who had endeavoured by Arbitration to come to some settlement with them, had brought forward this Motion, there might not have been so much objection to it as there is now that it is brought forward by my noble Friend, for I apprehend that he would not deny that if there is one man in public life whom the Americans look upon almost as entertaining an almost personal enmity it is the noble Earl himself. Not that I think they are justified in holding this opinion, for I know from personal association that during the anxious time of the Civil War my noble Friend did his best in a friendly way to maintain our neutrality in the fairest manner. That, however, is not the opinion of the people of the United States, and I do not think that some recent speeches—including that which he has delivered to-night—are calculated to convey to the American people the impression that his Motion is a mere assertion of our national rights, and not something like a triumphant defiance to a great and kindred nation. I think this Vote of Censure is at the present moment—so critical in respect to the Treaty—perfectly uncalled for; and after the declaration which I made as recently as last evening, it will throw an immense responsibility on this House. The adoption of the Motion by your Lordships will destroy all chance of maintaining the Treaty, and if the Treaty fails it will certainly envenom the failure. It would be felt on both sides that an unfortunate misunderstanding had arisen between the two nations, but this is far preferable to causing in the United States a feeling of enmity and hostility towards England. If your Lordships adopt this Motion by the enormous majority which you can command, you will be insisting that the President of the United States should do that particular thing which the head of the Conservative party, at his recent visit to Manchester, stated that it was impossible for him to do. And, my Lords, when I refer to the declaration of Mr. Disraeli, I am bound to say that, although he has been watching Mr. Gladstone all this Session like a cat, he has observed a statesmanlike reticence on this subject, and seems fully to understand the importance of the relations between these two great countries. Nevertheless, this great statesman tells you that it is impossible for the President of the United States to do that which you are demanding. If, my Lords, you insist on carrying this Motion you will be taking a grave responsibility upon yourselves. My Lords, you will be going further even than that—you will be arrogating to yourselves the power which the Senate alone constitutionally possesses, and making yourselves a party to what the Americans call the treaty-making functions of the State. I trust your Lordships will not be carried away by clap-trap about “pluck.” I have never seen any real courage, sitting quietly at home, in using language which might involve this country in the calamities of war. The best policy for this country is to remain as firm and as calm as possible—not to give up one jot of that which belongs to the dignity and honour of the country; and, on the other hand, to avoid as much as you can, whether as a Government or as a legislative body, irritating expressions and irritating Resolutions.

Earl Granville

EARL GREY: My Lords, my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary has appealed to your Lordships not to adopt the Resolution of the noble Earl (Earl Russell) which he terms a Vote of Censure—on the ground of the immense responsibility your Lordships would take upon yourselves if, in consequence, the Treaty should drop, and the feeling in the United States become more embittered against us; and he warned your Lordships not to arrogate to yourselves the treaty-making powers which the United States’ Senate possesses by the American Constitution. My Lords, in regard to the power possessed by the Constitution by either House of Parliament in this respect, I think no point can be more completely settled by precedent and long practice than this—that it is perfectly competent to either House, when there is a fear that an indiscreet use may be made of the power of the Crown, to interpose its advice. I agree that that power is not to be lightly used. I have no desire to concur in any Motion which shall have even the appearance of hostility to the Government. But let your Lordships consider what is the situation in which we are actually placed. Your Lordships will remember that for some five or six months the question has been before the world whether this country shall allow to be submitted to the Arbitrators at Geneva a claim involving very many millions of money for what have been termed the Indirect Claims. The very first moment it was known that these Claims were brought forward they were unanimously repudiated by this country. My noble Friend who has just sat down (Earl Granville) took up no small part of his speech in proving that these Claims were entirely unfounded. I agree with him; I think the arguments irresistible. Under the Treaty the United States have no just right to put forward these Claims. But the more my noble Friend proves this, the more completely he shows that the Commissioners did not neglect their duty—that the Treaty was properly framed, and was not intended to give the Americans any right to put forward these preposterous Claims against us—the more completely he also proves this second proposition, that because these Claims are unjust—as my noble Friend states them to be—it is the duty of the Government, and it is the duty of Parliament, to take care that these Claims are not brought forward against us. When these Claims were brought forward we were told by Her Majesty's Government that they were not admitted to fall within the scope of the Treaty. We subsequently learnt that the Americans adhered to a contrary view of the case. From February up to this time negotiations have been going on which have not yet come to a conclusion, as to whether these Claims are to be considered by the Arbitrators at Geneva or not. Time is going on, and we are now within a very few days of that date when, unless some decisive step is taken by Her Majesty's Government, we shall be concluded to have admitted these Claims by default, and the whole Case will be before the Arbitrators. That being the case, is it unreasonable—is it unnatural that this House of Parliament should ask Her Majesty's Government for some declaration of their intentions which will re-assure us—which will convince us that we are not really to have these Claims brought against us, and an award given against us by the Arbitrators in respect of them? I assure my noble Friend I have no wish to vote for this Resolution, even at this late moment; and I think my noble Friend (Earl Russell) would do quite right to withdraw the Motion, if Her Majesty's Government on their part would give us a clear and distinct assurance that we might trust to them that they would decline proceeding any further in the arbitration if the Indirect Claims were not entirely withdrawn from the cognizance of the Arbitrators. But is that the case? As the matter now stands, will any man who will take the trouble of carefully considering it, venture to affirm that these Claims are withdrawn? The Americans have steadily adhered to their interpretation from the first. We now have the Supplemental Article before us; and I ask whether, among those who have considered its words, there is not an almost unanimous concurrence of opinion that this Article, as it stands, does not contain anything which will prevent the Arbitrators from taking these Claims into consideration in their award? We want security not merely against some preposterous award of £200,000,000—we want more than that—we ought to be sure that the Arbitrators in awarding, perhaps, a lump sum against us, may not say—"Here are these Indirect Claims; we do not think they warrant so large a claim as the Americans put forward, but there is a great deal in them, and the British Government have not on their side offered any argument whatever against them." I cannot approve that line of conduct; but the fact remains—there are the Claims, without any answer to them, before the Arbitrators, and, as a consequence, it is in their power to say—"In consideration of these Claims, though we won't allow them as a whole, we will increase considerably the lump sum which we otherwise award under the terms of the Treaty." On a rough calculation, it is quite possible they might double the award in consideration of these Indirect Claims, and I am at a loss to discover any words to prevent their doing so. But, my Lords, I must go further than that. If Her Majesty's Government and the Government of America are really agreed that these Claims are to be effectively and entirely taken out of the cognizance of the Arbitrators, what is to prevent them saying so—saying that these Claims are not to be considered by the Arbitrators at all in deciding what may be due from Great Britain to the United States? If you intend to act upon that policy, what is the object of concealing it? When we find that a simple declaration of that kind would at once remove all difficulty, and that declaration is not made, it seems to me that that circumstance affords ground for grave doubt. My noble Friend (Earl Russell) on introducing the Motion referred to the remarkable correspondence between Mr. Secretary Fish and General Schenck, which has appeared in the newspapers. Throughout the whole of that correspondence there appears to be the most positive determination on the part of the American Go-

Is it a matter of indifference to the American Government how they should withdraw Claims which they have made in the face of the whole country? Is it a matter of indifference whether they withdraw these Claims directly, or whether some means cannot be found by which their submission to arbitration may be avoided? If the noble Earl is of that opinion he differs from the Leader of the Conservative party, who, as my noble Friend behind me has already observed, said at Manchester it was impossible that the American Government should in direct terms withdraw these Claims. The meaning of this Resolution, therefore, can be nothing but a determination that the Treaty shall fall to the ground. If it were intended as a party attack against the Government it would be comprehensible enough; but when the noble Earl says that the matter is too serious to be treated in that way, I am surprised that he should think of supporting the Resolution. I am not so much surprised at the course adopted by my noble Friend who brought this Motion forward (Earl Russell). He is perfectly consistent, for he never has been in favour of arbitration on this subject; and when the subject of arbitration was mentioned by Mr. Seward, my noble Friend replied that it was open to great objection, and would probably lead to considerable embarrassment. My noble Friend, in desiring that this Treaty should not continue, is, therefore, perfectly consistent; but I beg to remind the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) that he was the first to make a proposal of the kind embodied in this Treaty. I fairly admit that when I saw the noble Earl had made that concession to the United States, I doubted whether he had acted wisely; but I never felt any doubt about this—that the proposal having been made, this country would have to consent in some form or another to go to arbitration. I will go further, and say that I think the noble Earl was justified by the feeling of the country in the step which he took. Now, the noble Earl, in common with many others, has found fault with the Government for the misunderstanding which has arisen as to the meaning of the Treaty. He says that no one on the other side of the water could have two opinions on the matter. Last year, at all events, the noble Earl was of a different opinion.

The Earl of Kimberley

We may have been blind not to have foreseen this misunderstanding, but we have, at all events, the satisfaction of knowing that the noble Earl did not see one inch further than we did. Here is what he said about this time last year—

“The only concession of which I can see any trace upon the American side is the withdrawal of that utterly preposterous demand that we should be held responsible for the premature recognition of the South as a belligerent Power, in company with that equally wild imagination, which I believe never extended beyond the minds of two or three speakers in Congress, of making us liable for all the constructive damage to trade and navigation which may be proved or supposed to have arisen from our attitude during the War. It is not conceivable that pretensions of that nature would have been maintained for a moment, and I must be excused if I decline to treat the abandonment of them as a serious concession.”—[3 Hansard, civi., 1864.]

That does not, of course, excuse us in the smallest degree; but it might make the noble Earl more lenient in those censures which he has bestowed upon us with such lavish hand. Her Majesty's Government have laid upon the Table Papers which, in their view, contain the arguments which sustain their interpretation of the Treaty. We have always stood upon the meaning of the Treaty, and no other understanding has been either come to or attempted. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) seemed to think that we had some means by which we might satisfy the House as to the Motion which is now before us. He said that, if he could clearly understand that the Arbitrators were not to give any award upon the Indirect Claims, and were not to consider those Claims when giving their award upon the Direct Claims, he would be satisfied and would ask the House not to divide upon the Motion of the noble Earl. We are very much of the opinion of the noble Earl; but I can scarcely go with him to the full length of what he desires in reference to the matter. The Resolution calls upon the House to say that there is only one satisfactory mode of settling this question—that the Indirect Claims must be withdrawn eo nomine, and that no other arrangement must be permitted. To that Her Majesty's Government object. It is their position as much as that of any of your Lordships, that these Indirect Claims must not be submitted to arbitration; but we do not think it right that we should be bound by a Resolution of that kind. Her Majesty's Government feel the importance of bringing this business to a satisfactory and friendly close, and I ask your Lordships whether, after all that has taken place, it would be wise to lose any shred of a chance of attaining the object at which we aim. Considering the friendly temper which the American people have shown in the whole of this business—remembering how they have shown themselves prepared to take a reasonable view of this matter—it would be an undoubted misfortune if while there is the slightest chance of bringing them to a successful issue, negotiations which have been commenced with the view of bringing about friendly relations between two great nations should be allowed to fail.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, in commencing the few observations which I shall have to address to your Lordships, it is my first pleasing duty to congratulate the noble Earl who has just sat down upon the restoration to him of the confidence of the noble Earl the Leader of the party among whom he sits. It has been a painful circumstance to us on this side, who sympathize with the difficulties of noble Lords opposite, that during all the discussions and interrogations that have taken place on this subject, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would trust nobody but himself to say a word upon the subject. The noble Earl has, I am happy to say, recovered from that distrustful state of mind, and now consents to allow the Secretary for the Colonies to make an observation on the subject of the Alabama Claims. I trust that this happy change in his feelings will not be without result. I hope it may even extend—I hope it may lead him to take a more mild view of the necessities of his position, and that in some happy moment he may permit the noble Marquess the President of the Council to tell us something about the negotiations that have taken place. I feel that we owe every sympathy to the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley), for whose talents I have the greatest possible respect, for the silence that has been enforced upon him during discussions that must have been exceedingly interesting to him. The only possible consolation I can offer to him is that his Colleagues in the other House of Parliament have not fared any better, and that the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary are equally jealous of the assistance of their subordinates or Colleagues—whichever you like to term them—in discussions upon this subject. But I should be sorry if any observation of mine were interpreted into throwing any special responsibility—or I might even say any responsibility at all—upon my noble Friend the Lord President or his Colleagues with respect to these negotiations. I was sorry to trace in the speech of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary a tendency—skilfully veiled as only he could veil it—to throw upon the Commissioners the whole responsibility for these negotiations—a responsibility which I am bound to say the Prime Minister, in the other House, manfully assumed for the Government of which he is the head. I must say that I think the Commissioners have been very hardly used in reference to this matter. Against the selection of the Commissioners I have not a word to say. There are no doubt many qualities for which my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council and his Colleagues would be highly commendable in any diplomatic negotiations they might undertake. No doubt, Her Majesty's Government were bent, above all things, upon conciliating the American people, and in that point of view they could not have made a happier selection. But if I may be permitted a criticism upon the selection, I should say that whenever the Government feels a desire in the future to employ the diplomatic talents of these Commissioners, it should be in some country other than America. I do not at all impeach their discretion in selecting one of their own body as the head of this band of negotiators; but I think that, considering the special country to which they were about to send an embassy, they might have made a more judicious selection. If I had been permitted to advise them I should have suggested that the Chancellor of the Exchequer—or, still better, the First Commissioner of Works—would have been the most fitting person to have sent on this mission. I earnestly hope my noble Friend opposite will not think these observations are in any derogation of his own qualities; on the contrary, I rather think that in many points of view, as we hear that some people are too good for this world, he was too good for this negotiation. Having said that, I confess that I approach the discussion of this subject without any very active prejudice in favour of this Treaty. I quite agree with the observations of the noble Earl (Earl Russell), that a Treaty once ratified by the Sovereign must receive the loyal co-operation of all Her Majesty's subjects, and that co-operation I am prepared to give as long as the Treaty is interpreted within its proper limits; but I do not see in this Treaty anything that is so valuable to be cherished that I would consent to part with one iota of the strict rights of the people of this country in order to maintain it. I confess that this feeling has grown upon me by what has happened since this question was discussed last year. Since last year we have had a publication of a very remarkable Canadian correspondence, in which we were informed that we were really paying for the Treaty. Summing up the balance sheet, it came to something like this—During the Civil War depredations were committed by the Southerners upon the Northerners, and by the Northerners upon the Canadians. By these depredations the people have suffered and somebody must pay. Who shall that be? Why—naturally the answer came—England must pay for both. The Southerners have committed depredations upon the Northerners—the former obtained assistance which we had no intention of giving, for they contrived to convey some ships out of our ports against our will; and now the Northerners have got the Southerners absolutely in their power, they decline to exact from them a single farthing; but both agree to say that as the Southerners contrived to steal a ship from the English, the English shall pay the whole damages of the Civil War. It is very like an arrangement between a creditor and his debtor that the latter should go scot free and his surety should bear the loss. But that is not all. The Northerners, in their turn, committed depredations on the Canadians; and one would have thought that here, at any rate, England would have been safe. Not a bit of it. Having had the privilege of paying for the damage which the Southern States inflicted upon the Northern, she is to have the further privilege of paying for the depredations committed by the Northerners upon the Canadians, and to guarantee the Canadian Railway in order to induce Canada to give up her claims upon America in consequence of the Fenian raid. I confess that when my country is presented to the world as the general paymaster of all damages which anybody may commit on anybody else, I do not feel any enthusiasm for the Treaty by means of which this charge is made. I confess the difficulty we have in assenting to this Treaty; but I feel that there is another, and a far more serious danger, which arises out of the special circumstances of this case, and it is because of this danger that I am anxious to support the Motion of the noble Earl, which I regard as being specially fitted for the occasion, and worthy of our fullest sympathy. The Motion put into plain language expresses the opinion of the noble Earl that he will have plain English—that he objects to ambiguity and equivocation. It expresses an opinion that the plainest and least ambiguous words are always the best, and that he who wilfully employs a “less accurate” term when a more accurate one is available, is guilty of tampering with the purity of truth. But we must now withdraw any such opinion, for a learned Oxford Professor—a man of undoubted character and probity, a Professor of Jurisprudence at Oxford—himself one of these Commissioners—has recently told us that it is permissible for diplomatists sometimes to employ “less accurate” rather than “more accurate” language in drawing up treaties. The Commissioners, it must be admitted, have at least this merit, that they fully acted up to the doctrines professed by Mr. Bernard. This is a danger on which I venture to insist. It is in consequence of this doctrine and the danger it involves that I urge the House to approve the present Motion. Just consider the experience we have had of this “less accurate” language which Professor Bernard approves. It was employed with reference to Indirect Claims. Now, my noble Friend Lord Derby passed a judgment which I think was at once fair and judicial—like everything which proceeds from him—on the question whether the Protocol did or did not include Indirect Claims. His opinion was—and it seems to me that it will commend itself to most impartial readers of the document—that there was extreme ambiguity in the language used—that though one might well interpret the Protocol and Treaty in favour of England, there was still extreme uncertainty in the language employed. The Foreign Secretary, on the other hand, maintained that it was as clear a document as could possibly be drawn up. But it seems to me that the document reads as though both parties were resolved to use words which should commit to nothing, but which would give them a loophole of retreat in the event of any objection being raised. The history of theology records many a formula concordie which left the parties to a controversy more violently antagonistic than before. Now, there is a simple test to apply to this formula concordie, as I venture to term it. I am told that the agreement was plain and clear, and that there was no ambiguity about it; but allow me to refer to the parallel case of the Fenian Claims. No doubt they stood on much the same footing as the Alabama Claims; but I ask whether anybody can say, after reading the Protocols of the Treaty, that the Alabama Claims were repudiated with the same clearness and distinctness as were applied to the Fenian Claims. Not a bit of it. Directly you come to the claims against England nothing can be more trenchant or clear or precise than the language employed. One extraordinary instance of the "less accurate" language of which Professor Bernard spoke is found in that part of the Treaty which refers to "claims generically called Alabama Claims growing out of" the depredations of certain vessels. Nobody defined what these vessels were—and, indeed, this extraordinary claim is absolutely unexampled in diplomacy. The phrase "claims generically called Alabama Claims" is not English, it is incapable of definition, and it is thoroughly characterized by that want of accuracy to which Professor Bernard referred. These "claims generically called Alabama Claims" were left to include the depredations of one, two, three, or any number of vessels you please. The British Commissioners, it appears, believed that only four vessels were included; but the Americans did not take so limited a view of the case; and the result of our ambiguous phraseology is that each party presses it to the utmost limits in their own interests. I believe the Americans found out 11 or 12 vessels instead of four. I must say that great credit is due to the ingenuity of the Americans in this matter, and for the elasticity which they have imparted to the word "generically," when we examine the grounds on which some of these vessels are included in the indictment against Great Britain. England is actually asked to pay for the depredations of one of these vessels, because it had contrived to land its cargo unknown to the authorities on the coast of some British island, and to sell the cargo to some of the inhabitants. Nor is that the only instance of this ambiguity. My noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) pointed out in the debate of last year, the fearful consequences that might accrue to England from the use of the strange phrase "due diligence." The phrase really placed in the hands of the Arbitrators, without any reservation or restriction, the absolute determination of the whole international law by which England should be guided. Anybody who refers to the American Case will see I am justified in making this remark, for the definition of "due diligence" on the part of the Americans actually amounts to this—that they ask for damages because the English Government did not condemn vessels on evidence which would not have been fit to produce to a jury. Their contention was that "due diligence" actually included the punishment and the confiscation of the property of subjects of this realm on evidence which could not be presented to a jury. I feel, my Lords, that all this ambiguity is of special importance to us when we consider the nature of the Treaty in which we are engaged. It is delicate ground to enter upon—I know it is a delicate matter to discuss the tribunal before which we are to go; but the policy of the Government is to be blamed for the fact that it is a delicate matter to discuss freely the character and the qualifications of the men to whom our fortunes are to be committed. But it is no slight matter. The liberal estimate has been formed across the Atlantic that we may be held liable to the extent of £200,000,000 or £300,000,000, while even Professor Bernard says that £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 may not impossibly be awarded against us. Well, the British taxpayer does not take in these large sums very readily; but if the matter assumes the form of a sixpenny income tax for one year he will perceive its importance. Somebody in the spring made some calculations as to the average fortunes of Members of this House. I do not know whether they are correct or not; but if they and the statement of Professor Bernard are correct, the sum of £250,000 will be levied on your Lordships' fortunes. We may, I think, be excused for feeling some anxiety under those circumstances; and now I ask who are the people who will have to decide this question? Happily, I know nothing of them, and therefore it is impossible for me to say anything against them; and I am delighted to be able to assume everything in their favour. We know, however, that the Governments of Italy, Switzerland, and Brazil are to appoint the Arbitrators, two of whom will practically decide this issue. Now, what do we know of those Governments? What do we know of the men at present composing them? What do we know of their motives, their habits, their juridical education? Still more, what do we know of the men they have selected? What we have done is this—You have asked people, of whom you know practically nothing, to select other people, of whom you know less, to decide whether you shall or shall not pay in the worst contingency £200,000,000, or in the best £6,000,000. Consider for a moment how among ourselves such matters are managed. To whom are private persons in this country accustomed to submit the decision of questions affecting our fortune and our future prosperity? To the Judges of England. We know what are our securities. Their learning, character, and uprightness are known to all—they are brought up in a system with which we are all acquainted—they decide questions in the full glare of that publicity which searches out the inmost recesses of the motives of public men—we know why it is they have been selected for the judicial Bench, and the confidence to be placed in their uprightness and integrity is our proudest boast. Such are our securities in our private affairs. But though in your individual capacity you would justly resist any proposal to subject yourself to any tribunal less respected and less upright, you allow foreign Governments to appoint foreign persons of whose antecedents, honesty, and juridical attainments you know absolutely nothing, to decide whether or not you should pay an enormous sum. There are commercial men who, if it were proposed that they should pay £10,000 as their individual share of the indemnity on the determination of foreigners whose names they never heard of, and of whose qualifications they were absolutely ignorant, would resist such a proposal as the grossest outrage on the liberty of a British subject. If it is so bad to be placed at the discretion of such men on such a matter—if it is so bad to be placed at another's discretion under any circumstances—how does the matter stand when what you put before them is ambiguous and doubtful in the last degree? You are asking them to decide things which the most upright and most able Judges in the world would find it difficult to decide upon. They have to decide, in reference to the ships, whether due diligence includes the obligation of knowing that a man who buys a ship is brother-in-law of the manager of a firm which is supposed to be connected with the Confederate States. That is the question which you put before these men to decide; that is the issue on which you call upon them to say whether we ought to pay this large sum or not. Worse than that, is that the issue which you consent, under rules which will for all time bind this country, shall be decided by a tribunal from which you will be allowed no appeal. I feel that the danger of ambiguity, the danger of this "less accuracy" which Professor Bernard has impressed upon us, has been pressed upon our minds in a manner which will not suffer the most careless and the most ignorant to ignore it. It is our business to declare that this "less accuracy"—or, as I prefer to say, these equivocal phrases—shall disappear from our diplomacy for ever. We are told that the American Government cannot be asked to do plainly that which they are content to do in substance. Last year I said the United States was the spoilt child in the nursery of nations. I had no notion that noble Lords opposite would give such a confirmation to my observations, and that they would represent the Americans as children not only in the indulgence with which they are to be treated, but also in the irrationality with which they may be supposed to conduct their affairs. If they are really willing to withdraw these Claims, they are men of too much common sense to object to be asked to do so in direct words. That is the issue the noble Earl has placed before us to-night. We do not ask you to decide for or against the Treaty; we ask you to put it aside from your minds. You have one thing to determine, and that is—whether the honour, interests, and dignity of England shall depend upon honest and straightforward language, or upon vague diplomatic “understandings.”

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, when I found last night that the noble Earl (Earl Russell) intended to propose to-night the Motion of which he had given Notice, I felt that he was taking upon himself a very grave responsibility indeed; but I did not anticipate that that responsibility would be so great as it appears to me now to be after the two last speeches which we have heard from noble Lords opposite. My noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies has pointed out the support which the noble Earl the late Foreign Secretary (the Earl of Derby) has given to views which bear on some portion of this controversy with the Government of the United States. I should have thought one so cautious as the noble Earl opposite would have abstained from taking such a course—entertaining, as no doubt he does, a full sense of the responsibility which attaches to what he may say upon a question of this description. But the noble Earl was moderate indeed compared with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), who did not content himself with describing the language of this Treaty as so ambiguous that it was equally capable of either interpretation; but—to my great sorrow and surprise—he thought it consistent with his duty and with that which is due to the country in the position in which this matter now stands, to make an elaborate attack upon the Tribunal of Arbitration to whom under the Treaty this question is to be referred. I do think—and I say it with great regret—that my noble Friend has incurred a responsibility the weight of which it is difficult to estimate, when he permitted himself to be carried away by that zeal for criticizing his opponents for which we know him to be so formidable into forgetting that when he was endeavouring to strike at those who sit on this side he was seriously imperilling the interests of the country. From one point of view it is easy for my noble Friend to take the course he has taken this evening, because no one doubts he has always thought that it would be a good thing to get rid of this Treaty altogether.

That is a perfectly fair opinion to entertain; but if my noble Friend thought, as I doubt not he did think last year, that the constitution of this Tribunal was so bad that no man would trust it to decide upon any question affecting his private fortune, it was the duty of my noble Friend, and of those who agree with him in this and the other House of Parliament, to take that course which alone would be consistent with such an opinion, and to call upon Parliament to censure those who had concluded a Treaty open to criticism of that description. Yet even my noble Friend, with his opinion of this Treaty, will not deny it would have been one thing to have attempted to prevent the Treaty being ratified and a different thing now to destroy the Treaty if it can, consistently with the honour and interests of this country, be maintained. The speech of my noble Friend, going forth with the weight which attaches to his authority, is one which will throw upon him the greatest responsibility if the result of this debate should be that your Lordships adopt the Motion, and that it should, as I fear is too possible, bring these negotiations to an abrupt conclusion, and perhaps even put an end to the possibility of the friendly settlement of these differences. That is the main question which your Lordships have to consider to-night. It is whether it is right, patriotic, and wise for you to interpose at this moment in these critical negotiations, and attempt to tie down the Government who are engaged in them by a Resolution such as this, the effect of which your Lordships have been reminded more than once from this side of the House—and it is a significant fact that no notice has been taken of it by those who have spoken from the other—it has been declared by Mr. Disraeli, is to ask the American Government to take a course which it is impossible for them to adopt. I turn now to the observations with which my noble Friend commenced his speech, when he began by congratulating my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies upon being emancipated from silence, and by expressing a hope that I also should be permitted to take part in this debate. My Lords, if I have abstained from taking part in former discussions upon this subject it has been because I have been determined, as I am determined now, that not a word shall fall from me in respect of these transactions which can in the slightest degree impair the possibility of a friendly settlement of the differences between the two countries. If I had consulted my own feelings I should long ago have desired to give the fullest explanation of all these matters to your Lordships. But there are duties far higher than the defence of any individual, or even than the defence of the Colleagues with whom I had the honour of being associated with at Washington. Therefore if I have not taken part in these debates, it has not been owing to the iron rule of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary—a rule which, if it be iron, is exercised in the gentlest manner—but to the conviction that the course I have followed was the course best calculated to promote the public interests. I must say, on behalf of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, to whose speech I listened with the utmost attention, that sensitive as I should have been to any imputation of blame to the Commission, I drew from the speech a conclusion totally different from that of the noble Marquess, who said that my noble Friend endeavoured, in a covert and indirect manner, to cast the blame of these negotiations upon the Commission. With respect to the Treaty, opinions of a singularly contradictory character have been expressed by those who have preceded me in the debate. The noble Earl who opened the debate (Earl Russell) told us distinctly that in his opinion the Indirect Claims did not come under the Treaty. The noble Earl on the cross-benches who followed him was of the same opinion. My noble Friend the late Foreign Secretary (the Earl of Derby) made a statement of a different character; but I think the weight of that statement must be considerably modified by the recollection of the language he employed on this subject last year, which has been referred to by my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley). In short, the views taken by most of your Lordships with regard to the admissibility of these Claims have been in accordance with those contended for by the Government—that they cannot be admitted under the Treaty. The noble Earl who made this Motion (Earl Russell) told you there was scarcely anybody in this country or elsewhere who did not think the language of the Treaty so vague that it was impossible to say whether the Claims were admissible under it or not. But certainly that was not the opinion of the noble Earl when he, last year, took the unusual and extraordinary course of interposing himself between the signature of the Treaty and its ratification by the Crown. In the whole of the speech which he then made the noble Earl never intimated the slightest indication of an opinion that there was any doubt on the point which he says now is so very ambiguous. He was distinctly told by the Foreign Secretary what were the views of the Government on the question, and in his reply he never made any objection to the statement so made. But it is not only the opinions expressed in this country, but the opinions expressed in America, to which I would ask your Lordships' attention for a moment. My noble Friend the Foreign Secretary has alluded to some of the most distinguished men in the United States who take the view of this Treaty which the Government have consistently maintained. I will not further refer to that subject except to point out that one gentleman, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, who is well acquainted with this whole subject, who has had a large part in the transactions, and knows the matter from the top to the bottom, has given two opinions, but both to the same effect, that these Indirect Claims are not within the Treaty. The one opinion was given last year in a pamphlet, and the other this year in a letter to a Member of the House of Representatives, in which he repeats very firmly the strong opinion he had previously expressed. My Lords, there seems to have got abroad an opinion that Her Majesty's Commissioners at Washington last year relied on what has been described as a secret understanding subsisting between them and the American Commissioners that these Indirect Claims would not be brought forward. I should entirely agree with an opinion which I believe was expressed a day or two ago by a noble and learned Lord who generally sits behind me (Lord Westbury), that if Her Majesty's Commissioners had been induced by any such understanding to employ language which in their judgment admitted these Claims, they would be liable to just and severe blame. But I distinctly deny on the part of those who were engaged in these negotiations that that was the case. We may have failed, or we may have succeeded in employing language which excludes these Claims. I will not detain your Lordships now by entering into any elaborate argument on that subject, so fully dealt with in the Correspondence on the Table; but whether we failed or whether we succeeded, we were not induced to employ language which we considered would admit those Claims by any consideration of that kind, which in this Correspondence is described as a "waiver." For what occurred? On the 8th of March, as referred to in the Protocol, these Claims were mentioned by the United States Commissioners—mentioned in a manner which in substance is described in that Protocol on your Lordships' Table; and throughout the course of the subsequent negotiations these Claims were not again brought forward. We took note, and we recorded the waiver, as we held it to be, of these Claims, on the 8th of March; but we did consider it to be our duty, and we endeavoured to fulfil it to the best of our ability, to see that the language of the Treaty was not such as to include them. The noble Marquess who has just sat down (the Marquess of Salisbury) alluded to the different manner in which these Claims were dealt with in the Protocol from those which are called the Fenian Claims. No doubt the Protocol did not deal with the two classes of Claims in the same way. Why? Because the Indirect Claims were mentioned on the first day we discussed the Alabama Claims, and then disappeared from the negotiations, and were not again brought forward; while the Fenian Claims were pressed by us on various occasions on the American Commissioners. They were brought forward on three separate occasions at least—there may have been more than three occasions—and it was only at last, after discussion and frequent reference home upon the subject, that we were authorized by the Government to say that we should not press the inclusion of those Claims in the Treaty. Therefore, this argument of the noble Marquess rather turns the other way, as we persistently pressed the Fenian Claims up to a certain point when we were authorized to withdraw them; while the Indirect Claims were mentioned only once. The noble Marquess has spoken disparagingly of the language in which these Claims are defined as "Claims generically known as the Alabama Claims." The noble Marquess said that was phraseology wholly unknown to diplomacy. Now, I can, at all events, say that the phrase "Alabama Claims" had obtained, long before we ever thought of going to Washington, a technical meaning, and those Claims were under that designation included in the Treaty signed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) opposite and also in that negotiated by Lord Clarendon. Whether, therefore, the phrase was known to diplomacy or not, the Alabama Claims were perfectly well known throughout the whole of the Correspondence. The noble Marquess also spoke of the phrase "want of due diligence." Now, that is a point that may very well be urged if these negotiations should break down, and it should be your Lordships' pleasure to censure those who have been connected with them; but it does not seem either wise or prudent, in the present position of matters, to engage in that discussion at present. I now turn, my Lords, to that which is the question before you to-night. I trust I have made it clear to your Lordships that Her Majesty's Commissioners and Her Majesty's Government have not relied in this matter upon secret understandings, or any understandings at all, and that we have succeeded in framing a Treaty which, in the opinion of the noble Earl who introduced this discussion—in the opinion, also, of the noble Earl (Earl Grey) on the cross-benches, and of many eminent jurists and international lawyers both in this country and in America—exclude these Claims. But whether that be so or not, it is not true to assert or to suppose that we ever thought it would be safe or justifiable to rest upon secret understandings in a matter where it was unquestionably our duty to see that the Claims we did not intend to be included in the Treaty should to the best of our judgment be excluded from it. The noble Marquess who has just sat down has stated that the present Motion does nothing but state in plain and simple language that which this country requires, and that nothing is safer than to express one's meaning in plain and unequivocal language. Well, Her Majesty's Government have repeated, over and over again, that it is not their intention that these Indirect Claims should be submitted to arbitration. But it is not always the best way to obtain what you desire from anyone with whom you may have some dispute to ask him in a point-blank or harsh way to retire from the position he has assumed, and not to endeavour to find some mode by which the views of both parties may be reconciled in a mode consistent with the honour and position of each. I do not think it inconsistent with the honour of an individual or of a country, if either has taken up an erroneous position, to retire from it; but in a private or public transaction it would be unwise, if you desired to arrive at a friendly solution, not to make the least possible claim upon the forbearance of those you have to deal with. If your Lordships have no confidence in the Government or in the declarations they have made, then you would do well not, indeed, to pass the proposed Resolution, but to adopt an honest Vote of Want of Confidence; but if you do not wish to remove from the conduct of the negotiations at the most critical moment in their whole history those charged with the grave responsibility of carrying them on, then do not, by passing this Resolution, tie their hands in a manner which would relieve them from responsibility in respect to the negotiations, and thereby throw the responsibility which ought to belong to the Executive Government on your Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I had not intended to address your Lordships on this occasion; but I do so for two reasons. First, because I am greatly disappointed at the speech just delivered by the noble Marquess, from whom the House and the country expected with great anxiety some explanation of the extraordinary management that has characterised this transaction; and, secondly, I have another reason of a personal character for trespassing on the House, as I should be sorry to be supposed to have made on a former occasion any observations derogatory to the noble Marquess's qualifications for the position of Commissioner which he had occupied, which I am not equally prepared to repeat in the noble Marquess's presence. What I meant to say, when the appointment of the Commission was paraded with so much pomp and circumstance by the Government, was that the noble Marquess was not the person I should have thought best acquainted with that line of diplomacy for which he was selected, or with the subjects he would be called upon to treat, but that there were many men in this country highly distinguished in diplomacy on whom the weight of conducting the negotiations might more fitly have fallen. When I made that remark on a former occasion, the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs reminded me that Sir Edward Thornton was one of the Commissioners; and now I would ask whether a rumour which I have heard on good authority is correct. Sir Edward Thornton was subordinate to the Commissioners sent out; but it is said that Sir Edward Thornton pointed out to the Government the laches in the wording which made the Treaty ambiguous.

The Marquess of Ripon

EARL GRANVILLE: I should like to know on what authority the noble Earl speaks of a rumour which is entirely without foundation. When such a statement is made the noble Earl ought to be prepared to give his authority.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I do not think it necessary to name the person from whom I received the information. It is a general rumour. It is sufficient that the noble Earl says that the rumour is incorrect. The noble Marquess who has recently addressed the House (the Marquess of Ripon) spoke of the Treaty and the mode of its management. I have felt great disappointment as to the information the noble Marquess has given us. He has argued the question in just the same manner as those who preceded him. But he never informed the House of the reason of the extraordinary difference of opinion between the two Governments, and of the confusion arising out of the terms of the Treaty. Nothing can be more at variance than the understanding of the two nations with respect to the meaning of the Treaty. Sir Stafford Northcote has at a public meeting stated that the understanding between the English and American Commissioners was that the Indirect Claims would not be put forward; but now the noble Marquess who was at the head of the English Commission shrank from that point—and yet that is the very point on which the whole nation was waiting to hear something from him. We want to know what the American Commissioners said to the noble Marquess and his brother Commissioners to induce them to believe that they would not go forward with the Indirect Claims. Now, I ask how would the noble Marquess or any of your Lordships proceed in making a covenant with one of your tenants? You would begin by laying down what is not to be done—such as taking the game and cross-cropping the land, and then you proceed with the covenants. It is the same with diplomatic agreements, and such is the way in which anyone of our experienced diplomatists would have managed the matter. I feel certain the noble Earl's father (the late Earl Granville) would have proceeded in that way. It is impossible to suppose that the American Government ever believed we should pay the Indirect Claims, and the best argument against those Claims is the absurdity of them. Would Mr. Sumner or President Grant have allowed such Claims to be made upon America by any country in the world? It is impossible to suppose it. Would they have run even the slightest risk of £200,000,000 or £300,000,000 being imposed as a fine on them—thereby almost destroying their existence as an independent nation for a quarter of a century? It is so ridiculous to imagine that any free, independent, and powerful country should submit to such a peril that we cannot believe the Americans ever from the first intended that these Indirect Claims should be included. I say this with sorrow, because it shows the animus of the American Government—I hope not of the American people. If they believed the Claim was an honest one, they would have expected a decision in their favour, and they must have known that such a decision would be almost the annihilation of this country. It shows, therefore, the spirit of hostility with which they met the advances of this country. Such being their animus, your Lordships are bound to step in—not in the way of a Vote of Censure on the Government, but in the way of assisting the Government—by showing the American Government the unanimous feeling of this country, represented by both Houses of Parliament, as to our determination not to pay or even to consider these outrageous Claims.

LORD WESTBURY: My Lords, I never rose with less hope of effecting any good by the observations I may make; but still I beg your Lordships to weigh the gravity of the Motion now under your consideration. When Notice of this Motion was originally given, no one foresaw the introduction into the negotiations of what has been called the Supplemental Article. I believe that at the time it was a valuable mode of strengthening the hands of the Government; the Notice has been postponed from time to time, and in the meantime a new negotiation has been opened with the United States, for the purpose of adding an Article to the original Treaty, for the purpose of enabling the United States to withdraw the Indirect Claims that have been the subject of so much controversy and, on the part of this country, of so much just indignation. We are told that this negotiation has proceeded thus far—it is agreed between the two Governments that the President and Senate of the United States shall withdraw, and they are in effect bound to withdraw, the Claims they have made; but inasmuch as the Supplemental Article took the form of an additional Treaty, to gratify the people of the United States, a new consideration was raised for that additional Article—namely, a rule which shall prevail in future on the subject of Indirect Losses. We are told that the form of that rule—the words and expression of it—which I may remark are more a matter of American than of English concern—have not yet been finally agreed on, and that this question only suspends the additional Article, and prevents its coming into operation. [EARL GRANVILLE: Hear!] Now, my Lords, I am not here to modify anything that I have found myself obliged to say on former occasions, but it is unnecessary to repeat it now. If we have to go into the conduct of the parties who prepared the original Treaty and the conduct of the Government since, there might be much to say probably of a personal and stinging character, but certainly not of a profitable nature. I abstain, therefore, from that. But I wish your Lordships to feel that if you accept the Resolution its immediate operation must be to destroy the pending negotiations on the subject of the additional Article. Is it wise to do that? You have been contending with the United States that the Claims shall be withdrawn, and there is an Article drawn up for that purpose—no doubt one not framed so as to please me, or, what is of more consequence, the majority of the people. That Article, however, in its language, imperfect and insufficient as it is, is of English manufacture, and I do not think, therefore, it is just or honourable that we should quarrel with the United States for being willing to adopt the language that we have presented to them. I do not wonder that there may have been a difficulty on the part of the Government in the selection of their language. We have heard to-night one of the Commissioners who negotiated the Treaty asserting one thing—another Commissioner, Sir Stafford Northcote, has been asserting another—and a third Commissioner, a Professor at Oxford, has been reading a lecture on the use of language, particularly diplomatic language, which I think we should all repudiate, leaving it as a peculiarity of the learned Oxford Professor. I never remember our being placed in such a difficulty—but I repeat that if you destroy the Article now in progress of negotiation, this Resolution, in its destructive effects, will not rest there; it will destroy the original Treaty. Because the effect of it will be to impose on the United States a condition which it is impossible for them to comply with, and suspend the proceedings indefinitely until that impossible condition is fulfilled. Now, is this a time when, consistently with honour, reason, and profit, we can smash the original Treaty? I have no love for the introduction of uncalled-for novelties. I have no love for the authority on which the Treaty was founded. I have no love for the manner of proceeding which is pointed out in it. Remember, however, that it proceeded from yourselves. It is a twelvemonth since you received it. You received it with general acclamations. It has been hailed as inaugurating a new era in jurisprudence and in the mode of disposing of the quarrels of nations. Do you think you can now turn round and say you have found out that the Treaty is unwise, and that you will adopt a by-mode of annulling it, and escaping the fulfilment of our obligations? I, for one, am not prepared to go so far. A time may come when we shall have to criticize the making of the Treaty; but it is at present, and has been for 12 months, an accomplished fact between the two nations, and I think it is a foundation on which we may build, so as to conduct what remains to be done to a useful and profitable issue. I think, therefore, the time has not yet come when we are bound to repudiate, or are justified in repudiating, the Treaty altogether. That, however, will be the result of the Resolution. Now, go for a moment into the history of the past, in order that we may do justice both to the English and American Governments, and may see that the nature of things has in a great measure led to the difficult position in which we now are, and that there has been, and I believe exists, an honest attempt on the part of both Governments to relieve themselves from that difficulty. We accepted the Treaty. We were told by the Government that the Indirect Claims were not included in the Treaty as a subject of reference to the Arbitrators. In one sense we were told that they were, because we were assured that in consideration of our being parties to the Treaty the American Government had agreed to waive or abandon the Indirect Claims. That was the position in which things stood last year, and we remained under the conviction, until that conviction was rudely shaken, that these preposterous Claims would not be pressed. When they were put forward in the American Case, our Government remonstrated against such a proceeding, and it was, I believe, desirable to give them the assurance at that time, which your Lordships readily gave, that nothing would induce the people of this country to consent to the prosecution of the Arbitration until the power of having the Indirect Claims submitted to the consideration of the Arbitrators was distinctly and entirely relinquished. We took that course not by way of impediment to the Government, but for the purpose of strengthening their hands. I think the Government negotiated with the United States honestly and fairly in reference to that point, and they were met by the American Government, who pointed out the construction which they put upon it, and who said that they were of opinion that under the terms of the Treaty the Indirect Claims might be made the subject of reference to the Arbitration. Some confirmation was given to that view of the case by an expression which was used by my noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Cairns), in which, undoubtedly, I never could concur. If it was now the time, or if your Lordships would have patience enough—which it would be unreasonable to expect—it would be easy, I think, to demonstrate that under the terms of the original Treaty the Indirect Claims never could be brought as a subject of reference to the Arbitrators. The American Government were called upon to concur in that view; but the President of the United States said he had no power to withdraw these Claims without the aid of the Senate. Further communication between our Government and the United States convinced our Government that it was impossible to obtain a complete and valid repudiation of these Claims except by an additional Article, binding the President and Senate to consent to their being withdrawn. Therefore it was that this Supplementary Article was framed with the view of at length putting an end to the difficulty. The manner in which it is sought to do this is—I do not know to whose ingenuity the proposal is due—that the United States appear to have been brought to consider whether such Claims as those set forth in their own Case might not be pressed against themselves at some future time in an inconvenient manner, and whether it would not be well that a new rule should be laid down with reference to such Claims which would preclude these being put forward hereafter. The mode of meeting the difficulty thus suggested is, no doubt, very ingenious. I do not quarrel with it; but I quarrel with the unfortunate manner in which the proposal has been carried into effect by our Government. The great difficulty in this part of the Case is, that if we complain of the insufficiency of the language of the Supplementary Article it will be open to the American Government to say—“Why, it is your own composition; it is the work of your own advisers. We have taken it as you presented it to us.” Now, it costs some little labour and time to set out the meaning of this Article; but if your Lordships will follow me in the few observations with which I shall trouble you, you will find that the Article has reference to the statement with respect to the Indirect Claims contained in the Case of the American Government. After stating that the objections to the Indirect Claims were involved in the two propositions set forth by the English Government—firstly, that they were not included in fact in the Treaty of Washington, and, secondly, that they should not be admitted in principle as “growing out of the acts” committed by particular vessels, the Article goes on to say—

Lord Westbury

“The Government of Her Britannic Majesty has also declared that the principle involved in the second of the contentions hereinbefore set forth will guide their conduct in future, and whereas the President of the United States, while adhering to his contention that the said Claims were included in the Treaty, adopts for the future the principle contained in the second of the said contentions so far as to declare that it will hereafter guide the conduct of the Government of the United States, and the two countries are therefore agreed in that respect. In consideration thereof the President of the United States, by and with the advice of the Senate thereof, consents that he will make no claim on the part of the United States in respect of indirect losses as aforesaid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva.”

Now, I beg your Lordships to observe that this last sentence—which appears to have very little weight—derives great force if, in place of “in respect of indirect losses,” we were to read these words—“the President makes no claim on the part of the United States in regard to indirect losses in the American Case laid before the Arbitrators.” That gives to the mode of expression more point and meaning. But, unfortunately, even there there is a deficiency—because the effect of all this, even if it were passed into law in the most perfect manner, would simply be that the Arbitrators would be discharged from the duty of making any award in respect of the indirect losses contained in the Case, but that the Claims in respect of those losses would not be affected. The Arbitrators would be discharged, as I have said, from the duty of adjudicators; but instead of the indirect losses being treated as altogether abandoned, they might remain as a sore subject of controversy hereafter. Now, two or three words proceeding from an intelligent mind added to this clause would have closed the door against all future difficulty; whereas Her Majesty’s Government, in closing the door against one difficulty, have opened the way for another. The Arbitrators, I admit, will be discharged from the duty of making the adjudication under the Article; but, unfortunately, this country will still remain exposed to the liability of answering this demand at any future time in whatever different form it may be brought forward. Still I recognize in this Treaty so much good that I should be very sorry if this House should interfere so as to prevent its coming into force. It is probable that if the United States withdraw—as I have no doubt they will bond fide withdraw—these Claims, we shall never hear of them again, and that the danger which I have pointed out is, after all, but an imaginary danger. We must, however, take into account that the Government of the United States have their own peculiar difficulties to contend with, and, whilst condemning the course they have pursued, confess that we are ourselves by no means free from fault, and that the ambiguity of the language of the original Treaty was not their work alone. We must recollect that this was owing to our own incapacity; and, having regard to that consideration, I think we are likely to obtain from the United States as much as, under the circumstances, we can reasonably require; and I entreat of your Lordships not to destroy this prospect, but rather to give the Government what I think they are entitled to—some further scope and opportunity of completing these negotiations. Your Lordships have already received the declaration of the Government—made, I believe, in all sincerity—that the bringing forward of these Indirect Claims is what they will never assent to. In that I believe them thoroughly, and I should believe them if it were only out of the natural instinct of self-preservation, because they know, and it is unnecessary to repeat it, that if there were the smallest kind of a vestige of trembling or hesitation in their conduct, or if a notion were to be entertained in England that they meant to give way to any further demand of America, the existence of the Government as a Government would not continue for 24 hours. What, my Lords, will be the consequence of your adopting the Resolution proposed by the noble Earl? The result will be to shut up this Treaty? How will it be possible to get on? The Ministry did their utmost to get on, and they found it impossible to do so without adding a new Article to the Treaty. In fact, that which the Commission ought to have done at first by inserting a few words excluding those Indirect Claims, after months of anxiety and labour they now propose to do by the substitution of this additional Treaty. My Lords, I am glad that we have arrived at something definite; for up to the present time we have had a series of understandings in which nothing has been understood—a series of explanations in which nothing has been explained. I welcome, therefore, any sign of certainty in our position. That position I have attempted to define. You have now, I think, a reasonable assurance that what ought to have been in the original Treaty is now effected by the Supplementary Article. Better late than never:—but now that it is to be added, and added in honesty, I think it would be unreasonable, I think it would be impolitic, I think it would be—I can hardly call it dishonourable, but, at all events, scarcely a creditable thing—to refuse to wait and see what is to be done by this Supplementary Article. If, however, your Lordships should take a different course you will do so with the full knowledge of a great responsibility, and that you will be putting off to an indefinite period of time a settlement of a question which, for the sake of the commercial interests of both countries, I believe it to be all-important to settle. I think the American Government will be then fully authorized in treating the violent irruption of this House as an unfortunate circumstance in the present position of the relations of both countries. I cannot, therefore, bring my mind to vote for this Motion. The Motion may, no doubt, in its strict sense be regarded as an innocent one, because it leaves the Government still at liberty to continue the negotiations; but the words are sure to be taken as implying more than they would usually imply, and I think, if this Motion is carried, that it will be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to conduct further proceedings in this matter with any chance of guiding them to a profitable conclusion. I therefore hope your Lordships will abstain from passing the Motion of the noble Earl. What you wanted to get, and what was properly required at the time the Notice was given, was a declaration by the Government that nothing should induce them to be forgetful of the honour and interest of this country, so far as to entertain these Indirect Claims. Of that you are now well assured, and therefore no necessity exists for the Motion, unless you are satisfied that the proceedings between this country and America are a sham, and that they are conducted by the Government in such a manner as to afford no reasonable chance of a prosperous and successful conclusion. If your Lordships pass this Motion, I believe it can have but one effect—namely, be productive of mischief to the real interests of the country, and of unnecessary embarrassment to Her Majesty's Government in the settlement of this question.

Lord Westbury

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he must apologize to their Lordships for venturing to interpose between the House and the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns); but he was anxious to remind their Lordships how momentous in its consequences was the vote which they were called upon to give. The noble and learned Lord who had just spoken (Lord Westbury), in the course of those precious balms with which he was accustomed to break the head of Her Majesty's Government, while he was of opinion that the time might come when the Treaty itself and the conduct of the Government in the negotiations could be fully criticized, nevertheless expressed his opinion that their Lordships were bound on that occasion to support Her Majesty's Government. On the other hand, the noble Earl (Earl Russell) proposed a Resolution, by the acceptance of which their Lordships would not only pass a Vote of Censure on the Government, but, in point of fact, they, a legislative Body, would intervene between two high contracting parties in the course of negotiation, and would dictate in a most imperative manner the course each party should take. They would, in effect, say to Her Majesty's Government—"You are not to proceed to the Arbitration at Geneva under certain circumstances," and to the American Government—"We will not meet you there unless you take the particular course we point out." That was the position he desired to bring distinctly before their Lordships before they went to a division. Was that the way to treat a high-spirited nation? Let any one of their Lordships imagine himself under such circumstances in the place of an American citizen—and, to make the case more extreme, in the place of an American citizen who disapproved these Indirect

Claims, and of President Grant's administration. Would he not say—"I cannot approve the course our Government has taken; but if you ask me whether we will submit to the dictation of another Government—and not even to another Government, but to a single House of Legislature—if we are to have a pistol held at our head, and then ordered to give up these Claims—I say rather let us insist on every jot and tittle of the Claims rather than withdraw them." The dictation which this Resolution contained could only have the effect of depriving us of sympathy and assistance; for all Americans, whether they believed the Claims to be just or not, would feel themselves bound to uphold them if it was attempted to procure their withdrawal at the dictation of a foreign Power; and he trusted that under similar circumstances there was no Member of their Lordships' House sufficiently unpatriotic not to pursue the same course. Let him remind the House that in 1858 the Conspiracy for Murder Bill was brought forward by the English Government. Its provisions were not objected to, but it was thrown out by the mere rumour that it had been introduced at the suggestion of a foreign Power, and that it would be acceptable to the Emperor of the French; and yet it was now proposed that we should take a somewhat similar course, and attempt to dictate to another nation the course they should pursue: and he felt certain that it would produce a similar effect upon the Americans that the hint of French dictation then produced upon us. It would be remembered by many of their Lordships that the present Leader of the Conservative party, in reference to a measure under his charge, once said to the House of Commons—"First pass the Bill—then turn out the Ministry." That he firmly believed to be the feeling of Her Majesty's present Government. What they desired, he felt convinced, was that the Treaty should first be passed and then that the Government should take its chance. He did not admire the position of the noble Earl who had brought forward this Resolution with regard to this question. Considering that the acts of the Alabama and other vessels, out of which these Claims arose, took place while the noble Earl (Earl Russell) was Foreign Secretary, this Motion would have come with a better grace from anyone rather than him. No one knew better than himself the difference in their relative positions. He well knew the humble position he occupied in their Lordships' House. He well knew that the noble Earl addressed them with all the weight of his great experience, all the lustre of his historic name, with all the prestige of a former Prime Minister. But, knowing all this, he could honestly say on this occasion, and as regards this debate, that he preferred his own insignificance to the eminence—the mischievous eminence of the noble Earl. It was easy enough to pass Votes of Censure. During the few years he had sat in that House, the annual Vote of Censure had come round as regularly as the hands of the clock. But it was not every day they had an opportunity of destroying a Treaty. They should make no allusions as to the course they were preparing to adopt. If they passed this Motion, they might, or might not, affect the position of the Ministry. That, he believed, the Ministry, in face of the greater danger, would be the first to consider of little consequence. But the Treaty could not exist another instant. They, by their votes, would have done that, of which it was easy, though painful, to see the beginning, but almost impossible to see the end. They would have stamped out the last vestige of a Treaty; they would have blistered instead of healing an open sore; they would have disturbed, perhaps permanently, the good relations between the two countries. He implored, then, each noble Lord, as he recorded his vote, to pause in face of the responsibility—the tremendous responsibility—which he was about to assume.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, I am sure there is not one of your Lordships who thinks any apology was due from the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Rosebery) for interposing in this debate. With much that he has said I cannot agree; but I am confident there is nothing which can add greater weight and acceptability to the debates in your Lordships' House than that we should have partaking in them from time to time Members who have the advantage of being younger than those who sit upon the front benches. The noble Earl will, however, excuse me for saying that I think he has somewhat misunderstood the situation of the case

The Earl of Rosebery

when he speaks of "dictation" on the part of your Lordships to the United States—when he assimilates the present question to a question with regard to the enactment of a municipal law in 1858—and, above all, when he speaks of the vote of your Lordships' House to-night as a vote which could possibly endanger the cordial relations of the two countries. My Lords, it is now about six months since the people of this country became thoroughly alive to the gravity of the question of these Indirect Claims, and we are now here discussing the manner in which, after this lapse of time, these Claims are to be dealt with. Up to the present time there has been great reticence—the Government admits it—very great reticence on the part of your Lordships. I think it can be easily explained. Declarations on the subject have from time to time been made by Members of the Government—statements were made at the commencement of the Session, and more than once since then, in answer to Questions put to the Government—I do not profess to have before me the words which have been used by Members of the Government; but I think I am right in saying that the impression which the declarations of the Government conveyed to the mind of the country was this—that the Government were prepared, in their negotiations with the United States, to maintain the position that the Indirect Claims must be withdrawn from the Arbitration at Geneva. As long as this state of things continued—as long as we were invited to rest on these assurances—as long as we were in ignorance of the process or the precise form the negotiations were taking—it was the constitutional duty of your Lordships' House to remain silent and to wait for the regular and constitutional occasion which would arise for pronouncing an opinion upon the result of the negotiations, as soon as that result was made known. But the position of things is now altogether changed. It is no longer a matter of obscurity with regard to these negotiations—but by a singular series of circumstances such as have probably never occurred before, we are now told that the negotiations upon a point which interests us most particularly have come to an end. We have had laid upon our Table a draft Supplementary Article which is to regulate the position of the Arbitration at Geneva, and we were informed last night by the Prime Minister that there was at this moment no controversy between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States with regard to that part of the Supplementary Article which provides that the President of the United States will make no claim before the Arbitration at Geneva in respect of the Indirect Claims. I ask your Lordships to consider the position in which you are placed. Under ordinary circumstances you would not have been told of any agreement with the Government of the United States until it had been signed in the ordinary way; but now we are told what is the exact proposition that has been made to the United States by Her Majesty's Government, and that with regard to this proposition there is now no negotiation pending. If you are satisfied with the bearing of this Supplementary Article upon the Indirect Claims, and the immediate arbitration pending at Geneva, by all means express your approval of it by your vote; but if you are not so satisfied, then I warn your Lordships that this is the only opportunity of expressing your opinion to that effect. Once you let the Article be duly signed, you cannot in fairness, as between man and man, turn round upon the Government and express disapproval of it. I do not look upon this Motion as a vote of confidence, or of no confidence in the Government, or as an attempt to interrupt the cordial relations between England and America:—it is an appeal to your Lordships—the result of accidental information and facts that have come to be known—to say whether you approve of the Supplementary Article or not. I must also say that I demur entirely to the view of the noble Earl who has just sat down when he said that the Motion was an attempt to break down the Treaty. On the contrary, it is an opportunity open to you of informing the Government of your views on this Article; the Article can fall or stand independently of the Treaty, and if it fall—or if it should not be ratified—it will lead to no other result than the substitution for it of another Article more clear, more satisfactory, and free from the danger and reproach cast upon this one even by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Westbury), when he said that if it shut the door on one source of quarrel, it was only by opening the door to another.

And now I desire to make a few remarks which it appears to me ought to be borne in mind when we are forming an opinion on the great subject of these Indirect Claims. I am not going to say a word about the composition of the Commission or the acts of the Commissioners; for I think the Prime Minister took a just view of the case when he deprecated the idea that responsibility rested on any one except the Members of the Government. Indeed, it is perfectly well known that the Commissioners were in constant communication with the Government by means of the telegraph, and that every word and every sentence which found its way into either the Treaty or the Protocols was duly and properly laid before the Cabinet. There are, however, two subjects which I ought to refer to before I pass from this part of the question. My noble Friend behind me the late Foreign Secretary (the Earl of Derby) has more than once stated in this House that he thought it was a mistake to send a Commission to Washington at all, and I think that circumstance will explain much of the difficulty which has arisen with regard to the Treaty. I remember one sentence of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) in which he described the position of the Commission at Washington. He was speaking of the course taken in the United States under the Commission, and he said on the 12th of June last year—

“In considering several of those questions, Her Majesty's Government felt that there would be a great responsibility in breaking off the negotiations, and that in such an event ridicule, almost, would be brought upon the Commissioners and ourselves. Nevertheless, we at once declined to yield in every case where we deemed it our duty not to yield.”—[3 Hansard, cccv. 1847.]

There can be no doubt of the peculiar and intense difficulty in which the Government was placed by the necessity of preventing, at almost all hazards, the Commissioners returning home without having effected some purpose. Another point worthy of attention is the view of one of the Commissioners, Professor Bernard, who has since told us that the position of the negotiators of a Treaty is very peculiar, and he implies that when we deal with any ordinary subject in daily life we may have the benefit of professional advice, and can use precise and accurate language, but that when we make Treaties we must consider ourselves almost destitute of advice, not having even the family solicitor—by which I presume he means the Law Officers of the Crown—to consult, and that, consequently, we are at liberty to use “less accurate” language than we otherwise should do. Well, in my judgment, these two circumstances account for a great deal of what afterwards occurred. Now, let me point out what did afterwards occur in regard to this Treaty. I quite agree with the noble Earl the Secretary of State that it is an unfair thing to pick holes in a Treaty after it has come into operation, and to raise objections to it which were not advanced when it was first presented to the country. Therefore, I shall make no objections to the Treaty which I did not make before it was ratified. There is an Article in this Treaty with reference to arms and munitions of war—it is the second Article—and the moment the Treaty reached this country, I pointed out in your Lordships’ House that this Article might be fairly considered as prohibiting a neutral from allowing dealings in contraband of war. It happened that at that particular time a controversy was going on with the Government of North Germany as to whether this country had discharged its duty sufficiently in preventing the export of contraband of war. Well, this view of the Treaty with the United States did not strike me alone, for on the same evening Sir Roundell Palmer interrogated the Prime Minister on the subject in the other House. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has since asserted that our Government never proceeded upon “understandings” with regard to the Treaty, and I wish, therefore, to call your Lordships’ attention to what he said in reply to Sir Roundell Palmer’s Question. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had communicated with Lord De Grey, Sir Stafford Northcote, and Mr. Bernard, who all gave the Government the fullest assurance that the “understanding” was that the United States did not understand the Article to refer to contraband of war, that this “understanding” was shared in by General Schenck, but that Mr. Fish thought the two Governments should make a joint declaration in order to place the meaning of the Article beyond all chance of misconception. Almost, therefore, before the ink of the Treaty was dry, it occurred to everyone who saw it that the second Article was open to the gravest doubt—that it could not mean what the words apparently signified; and the Prime Minister rose in his place and signified that by these “understandings”—by the “understanding” of the Government, of the United States representative, and of the President—by this triple understanding, the meaning of the words was to be arrived at; and that Mr. Fish was so impressed with the ambiguity of the matter that a joint declaration on the subject was highly desirable. I took the liberty of suggesting that the opinion of the Senate should also be obtained; but I am not aware that that has been done.

Lord Cairns

Well, let us pass to the next point in the Treaty. When Her Majesty’s Government sent this Commission to the United States, they furnished them with certain Instructions, and told them—“There is one thing you must do. There are many British subjects who have claims arising out of the war, and we have made it essential that any settlement of our disputes with the United States must include those claims.” Accordingly an Article was inserted in the Treaty to the effect that British subjects were to be entitled to bring their claims arising out of the Civil War under the arbitration provided for by the Treaty, if the claims arose prior to the 9th of April, 1865. Now, what happened under that Article? There was a firm of British subjects who came to me and said—“We have a claim arising out of the Civil War, and we are required to assert our claims under the Treaty;” but when they came to examine the Treaty they found that the Treaty said that the claim must have arisen before the 9th of April. Their claim, they said, was for the burning of a certain warehouse on the 11th of April, 1865. I said to them that probably that was after the war was over. They replied—“Nothing of the kind.” I asked them if they were quite sure. They replied they were quite sure, because the Supreme Court of the United States had declared that the war did not terminate until the month of August; and not only that, but there was an army of General Johnson in the field till the end of April or beginning of May, when the Convention was made under which it surrendered. I asked the Foreign Secretary a question on the subject, and he said that the arrangement with General Lee in the month of April had been taken as the termination of the War. But it was not the termination of the War. Yet this date was fixed as the necessary term for filing the claims of British subjects arising out of the War. So that the moment the Treaty was made known it was seen that there were claims of British subjects not provided for.

Well, what comes next? We are told by the Government that there was one great thing accomplished by this Treaty—that rules had been provided for the future which were to define the duties of neutrals, and to govern controversies which might arise with regard to the performance of those duties. And we were told that these rules were not to stop as rules between us and the United States, but other Governments were to be asked to adopt them. It is not necessary to refer to these rules, because the whole of the rules turn upon these words, and were all governed by this general expression—"A neutral is bound to use due diligence" in doing certain acts. That is the governing clause of the whole of the rule—everything depends upon it—everything turns upon it. I took the liberty of saying to the Government that the rule will not define anything. "A neutral is bound to use due diligence"—it expresses nothing; it explains nothing. I dare say many of your Lordships have read an amusing part of a very dry book, written by the late Archbishop of Dublin—Archbishop Whately. It is the part of his book on "Logic" in which he treats of "Fallacies." He says there is nothing so fallacious in argument as using sentences in which you define one expression by using its equivalent; and he adds there is no language so calculated to lead one into these kinds of traps as the English, because, coming from the Saxon and the French, you can easily get two words which are nearly equivalent. Examples might readily be given, as "Every man ought to have the liberty to which he is entitled." That does not say much—but "A neutral is bound to use due diligence." What does that mean? Does it mean more than this—"A neutral is bound to use the diligence he is bound to use?" That is the great rule incubated upon by the Commissioners for three months at Washington, and that is the sum total of it! A neutral is bound to use the diligence he is bound to use! You cannot make much of that rule when you come to apply it. And what has happened? The result has been as ludicrous as it could have been imagined to be. The British Government and the United States Government are as wide as the Poles asunder regarding the meaning of the rule. Here are two great countries, both speaking the English language, who have exerted their ingenuity to compose this small sentence, and there is not an approximation to agreement as to what the effect of it is. The United States Government understands that the diligence which is called for by the Treaty of Washington is due diligence—that is, they say, diligence proportioned to the magnitude of the subject, or commensurate with the emergency—diligence commensurate with the magnitude of the evil which is created if the diligence is not used. The English Government, on the other hand, say—and I consider it to be a much more reasonable proposition—that due diligence means that kind of diligence which the neutral Government can use consistently with its own laws and constitution—that is—all that you can require of a neutral is that it should have reasonable municipal laws, and that it should enforce them. I agree with that; but it is as different from the proposition of the American Government as two propositions can be. Observe the consequences of the different meanings attributed to the rule. You may go to Geneva—and you will not get a definition as to the meaning of the rule—the next arbitration you have under this rule will give rise to exactly the same difficulty. But that is not all. I should like to see the Foreign Government to whom you would go and present this rule for adoption. You and the American Government will go together—for example, to the Government of Germany—and tell that Government that here is an excellent rule for the conduct of neutrals, and ask them to adopt it. Well, I suppose the Germans would say, "We do not understand English, but you do—tell us what it means." The Americans will give one definition, and we will give another. The German Government will then say—"The rule, no doubt, is a very good rule; but you had better go home and agree about the meaning of it—when you have, come back and we will see about it.”

But I must mention another subject, and a very serious one. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) said he regretted very much that the Fenian raids were not provided for. But the Instructions to the Commissioners were that they were to be provided for. Accordingly, our Commissioners proposed to the American Commissioners that they should be dealt with. If the noble Earl regrets they were omitted, why were they omitted? If he regrets their omission, he is of opinion they ought to be included. The only information we have with regard to their omission is found in the Protocols. If ever there was a case in which insult was added to injury, it was in the treatment of these Canadian claims. The American Commissioners were not instructed to entertain them; we simply expressed our regret; and the Commissioners did not feel justified in entering upon the consideration of any claims not contemplated by the instructions of the United States Commissioners. What followed? “The British Commissioners would not urge further that the claims should be admitted, and had the less difficulty in doing so as a portion of the Claims were of a constructive and inferential character.” A slur was thus thrown over the claims of Canada by the English Commissioners, who say they have the less hesitation in throwing them over, “because a portion of them was of a constructive and inferential character.” The matter does not end there. The Dominion of Canada, when the time came for applying to Canada to pass the necessary Legislative Acts to give effect to other parts of the Treaty—the Dominion said “We will not do that”—they considered themselves so badly used in not having their claims provided for; and then they say this—in which the British taxpayer has no slight interest—the Dominion say “There is a mode by which our hands will be strengthened, and we shall be able not only to abandon our claims on account of the Fenian raids, but to pass the measures necessary to give effect to other parts of the Treaty—that is, by your giving us an Imperial guarantee to enable us to procure the construction of certain public works which will be highly beneficial to the United Kingdom as well as to Canada.” The result of the whole is, this country is to be asked to guarantee a Canadian loan of £2,500,000—a guarantee which, of course, implies the giving to Canada the advantage of £50,000 a-year in raising a loan at lower interest, an advantage which will be duly counterbalanced by its effect on our own National Debt; that is, we not only run the risk of paying the United States sums we ought not to pay, but we absolutely undertake to pay Canada what ought to be paid to the Dominion, not by us, but by the United States.

Lord Cairns

This leads me, my Lords, to the consideration of these Indirect Claims. Let me first, in order to avoid misunderstanding, state my own opinion as to the merits of these Claims. I consider them, my Lords, to be absolutely preposterous. I cannot conceive that any Tribunal would for one moment entertain them. They are, as a ground for demanding a money payment, wholly without precedent or reason. I believe that the people of this country never for one moment believed that they were included in the scope of the reference to Arbitration. I believe that the Government—I accept their assurance implicitly—never intended that they should fall within the scope of the reference to Arbitration. But, my Lords, that is not the question. The question is, are they excluded from the reference so clearly that the Tribunal of Arbitration will be unable to pass judgment upon them; and are we to be left to the chance of whether the Arbitrators will decide that they are within the scope of the reference or not? The noble Earl (Earl Granville) asked me last night whether I adhere to the opinion I expressed last year?

EARL GRANVILLE: What I asked was whether the noble and learned Lord would rest his judicial character on the statement he then made?

LORD CAIRNS: I will accept the challenge of the noble Earl; but I must first ask him whether he has one view of the construction of a document in one place, and another view of it for another place. My Lords, I do not pretend to have any judicial character—as the noble Earl terms it—to be rested on any foundation but the honest expression of an honest opinion; but, on the other hand, I know no view as to the construction of a document to be taken on the judicial bench which should differ from that to be expressed in your Lordships' House. I know the great and inestimable advantage which a Judge has of having a case argued before him. That advantage we have had on the present occasion. We have had conflicting views as to the construction of the Treaty fully before us; and now I tell the noble Earl that I can accept no compliment as to judicial character, accompanied, as it is, with a sneer that I am capable of making a construction of a document in one place differ from that I should give in another. My Lords, I will tell the noble Earl something more. He says he talked with a very learned Judge—a man, he says, of great reputation—half-an-hour before he entered this House, who said that the Indirect Claims were clearly inadmissible. My Lords, I have no doubt they should not be admitted—I believe no Judge would say that these Indirect Claims could be admitted for a moment:—but that is not the question—the question is, whether the hands of the Tribunal at Geneva are sufficiently tied and bound so that they are not the Judges to say whether these Claims are to be admitted or not? That is what we want to know—that is what my noble and learned Friend who spoke last but one (Lord Westbury) put very fairly. He said, with regard to the Supplementary Article, that we have now to do what the Commissioners ought to have done if they had understood their business—that is to say, to have added an Article to exclude these Claims. I agree that the Claims are preposterous, and that the country and the Government never meant to entertain them. But the question is, should we be satisfied with this Treaty, that it has left nothing in doubt? The noble Marquess the President of the Council taunted the noble Marquess behind me (the Marquess of Salisbury) with having thought it consistent with his duty to make observations which were highly in favour of the American view of the case. I dare say I shall be taunted perhaps in the same way. But I will tell the noble Marquess what I consider consistent with my duty. I consider it consistent with my duty to speak the truth, and I do not care whether it chimes in with the views of the Government of the United States or the Government of this country. I go further and say that in my belief our best course with the United States would have been not to insist, as the Government have insisted, that the construction of this Treaty is free from all ambiguity—the Government never made a greater mistake than when they went to the United States in the first instance and said to them—"You are making claims not only against all principle, but in flagrant opposition to the Treaty." I say generous and high-spirited men could not have endured language of that kind without making a contest and struggle against it. Now, I tell the noble Earl my view about the construction of this Treaty. The Prime Minister says there is no ambiguity—that no sane person could have ever entered into a Treaty which had such a construction as America had put on it. The noble Earl himself, I believe, in his despatches uses language equally strong in regard to the construction of the Treaty. One of the Commissioners has told us they were responsible for having represented to the Government that they understood a promise to be given that these Claims would not be put forward by the United States; and to-night the noble Earl said that on a particular day the Government received a communication from the Commissioners saying that the Claims were not to be put forward. What is the meaning of this? Why were the Commissioners to write to the Government and say that a promise was given that these Claims would not be put forward if the Treaty was free of ambiguity? The two things cannot stand together. Take which you like—the Treaty is unambiguous—or admit that it is not clear and rest on the promise given by the Commissioners; but you cannot have both. I hold it to be a general principle that if you refer any breach of duty to the decision of a tribunal, as a matter to be atoned for by damages, that tribunal, unless you tie up its hands, will have a right to say what is the amount and what is the nature of the damages which can be claimed. Reference has been made to the Convention concluded with Mr. Reverdy Johnson, and as that document throws a light on the matter, I ask your Lordships' attention to it. I ask, what was the Convention which Lord Clarendon and Mr. Reverdy Johnson agreed to? The leading sentence is very remarkable. It states that the High Contracting Powers agreed that all claims on the part of citizens of the United States on the Government of Her Majesty, including those generically called the Alabama Claims, should be referred to four Commissioners. The Convention spoke of all claims on the part of "citizens" of the United States; but there was not a word about the claims on the part of the Government. However, considerable dissatisfaction was manifested across the Atlantic with the Convention, and on the 25th of March, 1869, Mr. Reverdy Johnson wrote to Lord Clarendon, stating that the Treaty, the carrying of which into effect was important for the tranquillity of the relations between the two countries, could not be put in operation without the consent of the Senate of the United States. He then went on to say that his Government believed that it had claims of its own, on account of the fitting out of the Alabama and other similar vessels, and, as the Convention would not meet those claims, he proposed that the Treaty should be altered so as to include all claims on the part of the Government as well as on the part of the citizens of the United States. That is to say, Mr. Reverdy Johnson intimated that it was considered in America that the claims of the Government were not included in the Convention, and he therefore suggested that the Convention should be altered.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL here handed a document to the noble and learned Lord, and asked him to read the second paragraph of the first Article of Mr. Reverdy Johnson's Convention.

LORD CAIRNS: The second paragraph says—

"The Commissioners so named shall meet in London at the earliest convenient period, and shall before proceeding to business make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially examine into all such claims as shall be laid before them on the part of the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, and on the part of the Government of the United States."

Is the noble Duke so simple as to suppose that, after a specific and limited reference to Arbitrators of the claims of individuals eo nomine, the form of the declaration of office, to be taken by the Arbitrators, can enlarge the scope of the reference? Heaven preserve the country from such negotiators! Lord Clarendon submitted the proposal of Mr. Reverdy Johnson to his Colleagues; but they repudiated the idea, and the matter dropped. If ever there was a beacon to avoid a rock, surely that was one. All these documents were before the Commissioners, and what did they do? This is the reference they agreed to—

Lord Cairns

"In order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States"—not a word of individuals here—"and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims which are not admitted by Her Majesty's Government the High Contracting Parties agree that such claims shall be referred to a certain tribunal."

There the very thing is done which Lord Clarendon would not do. I have read between 20 and 30 pages in The London Gazette of the noble Earl's argument to show that the Indirect Claims are excluded from the present Treaty; and I think that the noble Earl will agree that I am summing up the case fairly when I state that the points on which he relies are three. He says, first, that in the process of diplomatic correspondence there have grown up a certain number of difficulties, which have become known as "the Alabama Claims;" that they never were understood to include the Indirect Claims, but were confined to direct claims, and the reference of the Treaty was to all the claims generically known as "the Alabama Claims." Now, against that you must set the change in the form of reference to which I have referred. May not the Americans say, very naturally in, their arguments—"What was the reason for this change in the form of reference if it was not meant to extend the scope of reference with regard to the Claims?" But besides this, the noble Earl himself last year in this House described the Alabama Claims as having come to include the wildest and most untenable claims which had been made by the United States. And, further than this, the Treaty confessedly goes beyond the claims of individuals, for the Protocol of the 4th of May specifies the expenses of the American cruisers in pursuit of the Alabama. The next argument of the noble Earl is, that the Protocol of the 4th of May contains a waiver by the American Government of the Indirect Claims. I wish I could find it to be so; but I do not find that the American Government waived anything. The American Commissioners simply said they wanted us to give them a lump sum, and in the hope of our doing so, they would not estimate for the present the amount of the Indirect Claims. After referring to the indirect injury accruing from the transfer to the British flag of a large part of the American mercantile marine, enhanced rates of insurance, the prolongation of the War, and the large sum necessarily required for this and for the suppression of the rebellion, the Protocol says—

“In the hope of an amicable settlement (meaning the payment of a lump sum) no estimate was made of the indirect losses, without prejudice, however, to the right of indemnification in the event of no such settlement being made.”

In this I can see no waiver whatever. I have no fault to find with the manner in which the noble Earl conducts the argument on this point in his correspondence—the whole of his case on this subject is stated by him with great fairness. The noble Earl's argument is that the waiver of the Indirect Claims in the event of the “amicable settlement” referred to by the American Commissioners was a waiver which applied to any form of amicable settlement, and therefore applied to the form proposed by the British Commissioners and accepted by the United States. That is the whole argument on this part of the case. The American Commissioners, in the hope of an amicable settlement by the payment of a gross sum, made no estimate of the indirect losses; the British Commissioners declined such a mode of settlement, and Her Majesty's Government maintain that the Americans were bound not to put forward those Claims, whatever the form of settlement. Now, I must say that this is an argument on which I, for one, hold that we cannot safely rely. The third argument struck me much at first, and I was disposed to think it was conclusive. It is this:—The Treaty provides that the Commissioners at Geneva are to take up the case of each particular ship, and say as to each whether the British Government was or was not guilty of negligence; and then, if the Commissioners do not award a gross sum they are to send the whole question of damage to another Commission at Washington, which is to deal with each particular ship and find the damage arising in each case. Consequently, argue the Government, how would it be possible to deal with claims for the prolongation of the War, the enhanced cost of insurance and so on, and to allocate a particular portion to each particular ship? I thought that first a very good argument; but, unfortunately, the Prime Minister has cut it from under our feet. He has said we have admitted that there must go before the Arbitrators at Geneva the question whether we are liable for the cost of the American Navy—that is to say, the cost of the pursuit of the various cruisers which are said to have left this country, which, I believe, is pretty much the cost of the whole American Navy, for the Navy was not doing anything else. I was appalled when I heard that statement. I have read the Treaty, and the Protocols, and I do not see a word in either which amounts to an admission on our part that this is a claim which ought to be entertained by the Arbitrators. What I find is this—that in one of the Protocols the American Commissioners said on their own authority that they thought the expense of the Navy in pursuit of the cruisers was a direct claim, which ought to be recognized as such. No notice was taken of that; it was not assented to by our Commissioners. I believe these Claims to be just as preposterous as any other claims. Suppose we were guilty of breach of duty as neutrals—why, after paying 20s. in the pound to every person who has suffered in consequence, should we be called on to submit to pay the expenses of American ships in pursuing cruisers which they never saw? But if the Prime Minister is right—if these Claims are to go to the Arbitrators, there is an end to the argument that nothing is referred to Arbitration beyond the special damage done by each particular ship.

My Lords, let us manfully look the question in the face. Let us admit that these are matters of great gravity. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) wants to know whether I am of the same opinion which I have already expressed with respect to the ambiguity of the Treaty;—and my answer is that I see nothing in it to prevent the Arbitrators from being the Judges whether these Indirect Claims are to be entertained or not. I must express the regret which I feel that the Government did not take the right course in this matter. I think the Government, when this question sprang up, ought never to have raised a controversy as to the construction of the Treaty. I think they ought to have said to the Government of the United States:—“There is not the

ing this demand at any future time in whatever different form it may be brought forward. Still I recognize in this Treaty so much good that I should be very sorry if this House should interfere so as to prevent its coming into force. It is probable that if the United States withdraw—as I have no doubt they will bond fide withdraw—these Claims, we shall never hear of them again, and that the danger which I have pointed out is, after all, but an imaginary danger. We must, however, take into account that the Government of the United States have their own peculiar difficulties to contend with, and, whilst condemning the course they have pursued, confess that we are ourselves by no means free from fault, and that the ambiguity of the language of the original Treaty was not their work alone. We must recollect that this was owing to our own incapacity; and, having regard to that consideration, I think we are likely to obtain from the United States as much as, under the circumstances, we can reasonably require; and I entreat of your Lordships not to destroy this prospect, but rather to give the Government what I think they are entitled to—some further scope and opportunity of completing these negotiations. Your Lordships have already received the declaration of the Government—made, I believe, in all sincerity—that the bringing forward of these Indirect Claims is what they will never assent to. In that I believe them thoroughly, and I should believe them if it were only out of the natural instinct of self-preservation, because they know, and it is unnecessary to repeat it, that if there were the smallest kind of a vestige of trembling or hesitation in their conduct, or if a notion were to be entertained in England that they meant to give way to any further demand of America, the existence of the Government as a Government would not continue for 24 hours. What, my Lords, will be the consequence of your adopting the Resolution proposed by the noble Earl? The result will be to shut up this Treaty? How will it be possible to get on? The Ministry did their utmost to get on, and they found it impossible to do so without adding a new Article to the Treaty. In fact, that which the Commission ought to have done at first by inserting a few words excluding those Indirect Claims, after months of anxiety and labour they now propose to do by the substitution of this additional Treaty. My Lords, I am glad that we have arrived at something definite; for up to the present time we have had a series of understandings in which nothing has been understood—a series of explanations in which nothing has been explained. I welcome, therefore, any sign of certainty in our position. That position I have attempted to define. You have now, I think, a reasonable assurance that what ought to have been in the original Treaty is now effected by the Supplementary Article. Better late than never:—but now that it is to be added, and added in honesty, I think it would be unreasonable, I think it would be impolitic, I think it would be—I can hardly call it dishonourable, but, at all events, scarcely a creditable thing—to refuse to wait and see what is to be done by this Supplementary Article. If, however, your Lordships should take a different course you will do so with the full knowledge of a great responsibility, and that you will be putting off to an indefinite period of time a settlement of a question which, for the sake of the commercial interests of both countries, I believe it to be all-important to settle. I think the American Government will be then fully authorized in treating the violent irruption of this House as an unfortunate circumstance in the present position of the relations of both countries. I cannot, therefore, bring my mind to vote for this Motion. The Motion may, no doubt, in its strict sense be regarded as an innocent one, because it leaves the Government still at liberty to continue the negotiations; but the words are sure to be taken as implying more than they would usually imply, and I think, if this Motion is carried, that it will be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to conduct further proceedings in this matter with any chance of guiding them to a profitable conclusion. I therefore hope your Lordships will abstain from passing the Motion of the noble Earl. What you wanted to get, and what was properly required at the time the Notice was given, was a declaration by the Government that nothing should induce them to be forgetful of the honour and interest of this country, so far as to entertain these Indirect Claims. Of that you are now well assured, and therefore no necessity exists for the Motion, unless you are satisfied that the proceedings between this country and America are a sham, and that they are conducted by the Government in such a manner as to afford no reasonable chance of a prosperous and successful conclusion. If your Lordships pass this Motion, I believe it can have but one effect—namely, be productive of mischief to the real interests of the country, and of unnecessary embarrassment to Her Majesty's Government in the settlement of this question.

Lord Westbury

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he must apologize to their Lordships for venturing to interpose between the House and the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns); but he was anxious to remind their Lordships how momentous in its consequences was the vote which they were called upon to give. The noble and learned Lord who had just spoken (Lord Westbury), in the course of those precious balms with which he was accustomed to break the head of Her Majesty's Government, while he was of opinion that the time might come when the Treaty itself and the conduct of the Government in the negotiations could be fully criticized, nevertheless expressed his opinion that their Lordships were bound on that occasion to support Her Majesty's Government. On the other hand, the noble Earl (Earl Russell) proposed a Resolution, by the acceptance of which their Lordships would not only pass a Vote of Censure on the Government, but, in point of fact, they, a legislative Body, would intervene between two high contracting parties in the course of negotiation, and would dictate in a most imperative manner the course each party should take. They would, in effect, say to Her Majesty's Government—"You are not to proceed to the Arbitration at Geneva under certain circumstances," and to the American Government—"We will not meet you there unless you take the particular course we point out." That was the position he desired to bring distinctly before their Lordships before they went to a division. Was that the way to treat a high-spirited nation? Let any one of their Lordships imagine himself under such circumstances in the place of an American citizen—and, to make the case more extreme, in the place of an American citizen who disapproved these Indirect

Claims, and of President Grant's administration. Would he not say—"I cannot approve the course our Government has taken; but if you ask me whether we will submit to the dictation of another Government—and not even to another Government, but to a single House of Legislature—if we are to have a pistol held at our head, and then ordered to give up these Claims—I say rather let us insist on every jot and tittle of the Claims rather than withdraw them." The dictation which this Resolution contained could only have the effect of depriving us of sympathy and assistance; for all Americans, whether they believed the Claims to be just or not, would feel themselves bound to uphold them if it was attempted to procure their withdrawal at the dictation of a foreign Power; and he trusted that under similar circumstances there was no Member of their Lordships' House sufficiently unpatriotic not to pursue the same course. Let him remind the House that in 1858 the Conspiracy for Murder Bill was brought forward by the English Government. Its provisions were not objected to, but it was thrown out by the mere rumour that it had been introduced at the suggestion of a foreign Power, and that it would be acceptable to the Emperor of the French; and yet it was now proposed that we should take a somewhat similar course, and attempt to dictate to another nation the course they should pursue: and he felt certain that it would produce a similar effect upon the Americans that the hint of French dictation then produced upon us. It would be remembered by many of their Lordships that the present Leader of the Conservative party, in reference to a measure under his charge, once said to the House of Commons—"First pass the Bill—then turn out the Ministry." That he firmly believed to be the feeling of Her Majesty's present Government. What they desired, he felt convinced, was that the Treaty should first be passed and then that the Government should take its chance. He did not admire the position of the noble Earl who had brought forward this Resolution with regard to this question. Considering that the acts of the Alabama and other vessels, out of which these Claims arose, took place while the noble Earl (Earl Russell) was Foreign Secretary, this Motion would have come with a better grace from anyone rather than him. No one knew better than himself the difference in their relative positions. He well knew the humble position he occupied in their Lordships' House. He well knew that the noble Earl addressed them with all the weight of his great experience, all the lustre of his historic name, with all the prestige of a former Prime Minister. But, knowing all this, he could honestly say on this occasion, and as regards this debate, that he preferred his own insignificance to the eminence—the mischievous eminence of the noble Earl. It was easy enough to pass Votes of Censure. During the few years he had sat in that House, the annual Vote of Censure had come round as regularly as the hands of the clock. But it was not every day they had an opportunity of destroying a Treaty. They should make no allusions as to the course they were preparing to adopt. If they passed this Motion, they might, or might not, affect the position of the Ministry. That, he believed, the Ministry, in face of the greater danger, would be the first to consider of little consequence. But the Treaty could not exist another instant. They, by their votes, would have done that, of which it was easy, though painful, to see the beginning, but almost impossible to see the end. They would have stamped out the last vestige of a Treaty; they would have blistered instead of healing an open sore; they would have disturbed, perhaps permanently, the good relations between the two countries. He implored, then, each noble Lord, as he recorded his vote, to pause in face of the responsibility—the tremendous responsibility—which he was about to assume.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, I am sure there is not one of your Lordships who thinks any apology was due from the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Rosebery) for interposing in this debate. With much that he has said I cannot agree; but I am confident there is nothing which can add greater weight and acceptability to the debates in your Lordships' House than that we should have partaking in them from time to time Members who have the advantage of being younger than those who sit upon the front benches. The noble Earl will, however, excuse me for saying that I think he has somewhat misunderstood the situation of the case

The Earl of Rosebery

when he speaks of "dictation" on the part of your Lordships to the United States—when he assimilates the present question to a question with regard to the enactment of a municipal law in 1858—and, above all, when he speaks of the vote of your Lordships' House to-night as a vote which could possibly endanger the cordial relations of the two countries. My Lords, it is now about six months since the people of this country became thoroughly alive to the gravity of the question of these Indirect Claims, and we are now here discussing the manner in which, after this lapse of time, these Claims are to be dealt with. Up to the present time there has been great reticence—the Government admits it—very great reticence on the part of your Lordships. I think it can be easily explained. Declarations on the subject have from time to time been made by Members of the Government—statements were made at the commencement of the Session, and more than once since then, in answer to Questions put to the Government—I do not profess to have before me the words which have been used by Members of the Government; but I think I am right in saying that the impression which the declarations of the Government conveyed to the mind of the country was this—that the Government were prepared, in their negotiations with the United States, to maintain the position that the Indirect Claims must be withdrawn from the Arbitration at Geneva. As long as this state of things continued—as long as we were invited to rest on these assurances—as long as we were in ignorance of the process or the precise form the negotiations were taking—it was the constitutional duty of your Lordships' House to remain silent and to wait for the regular and constitutional occasion which would arise for pronouncing an opinion upon the result of the negotiations, as soon as that result was made known. But the position of things is now altogether changed. It is no longer a matter of obscurity with regard to these negotiations—but by a singular series of circumstances such as have probably never occurred before, we are now told that the negotiations upon a point which interests us most particularly have come to an end. We have had laid upon our Table a draft Supplementary Article which is to regulate the position of the source of quarrel, it was only by opening the door to another.

Arbitration at Geneva, and we were informed last night by the Prime Minister that there was at this moment no controversy between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States with regard to that part of the Supplementary Article which provides that the President of the United States will make no claim before the Arbitration at Geneva in respect of the Indirect Claims. I ask your Lordships to consider the position in which you are placed. Under ordinary circumstances you would not have been told of any agreement with the Government of the United States until it had been signed in the ordinary way; but now we are told what is the exact proposition that has been made to the United States by Her Majesty's Government, and that with regard to this proposition there is now no negotiation pending. If you are satisfied with the bearing of this Supplementary Article upon the Indirect Claims, and the immediate arbitration pending at Geneva, by all means express your approval of it by your vote; but if you are not so satisfied, then I warn your Lordships that this is the only opportunity of expressing your opinion to that effect. Once you let the Article be duly signed, you cannot in fairness, as between man and man, turn round upon the Government and express disapproval of it. I do not look upon this Motion as a vote of confidence, or of no confidence in the Government, or as an attempt to interrupt the cordial relations between England and America:—it is an appeal to your Lordships—the result of accidental information and facts that have come to be known—to say whether you approve of the Supplementary Article or not. I must also say that I demur entirely to the view of the noble Earl who has just sat down when he said that the Motion was an attempt to break down the Treaty. On the contrary, it is an opportunity open to you of informing the Government of your views on this Article; the Article can fall or stand independently of the Treaty, and if it fall—or if it should not be ratified—it will lead to no other result than the substitution for it of another Article more clear, more satisfactory, and free from the danger and reproach cast upon this one even by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Westbury), when he said that if it shut the door on one

And now I desire to make a few remarks which it appears to me ought to be borne in mind when we are forming an opinion on the great subject of these Indirect Claims. I am not going to say a word about the composition of the Commission or the acts of the Commissioners; for I think the Prime Minister took a just view of the case when he deprecated the idea that responsibility rested on any one except the Members of the Government. Indeed, it is perfectly well known that the Commissioners were in constant communication with the Government by means of the telegraph, and that every word and every sentence which found its way into either the Treaty or the Protocols was duly and properly laid before the Cabinet. There are, however, two subjects which I ought to refer to before I pass from this part of the question. My noble Friend behind me the late Foreign Secretary (the Earl of Derby) has more than once stated in this House that he thought it was a mistake to send a Commission to Washington at all, and I think that circumstance will explain much of the difficulty which has arisen with regard to the Treaty. I remember one sentence of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) in which he described the position of the Commission at Washington. He was speaking of the course taken in the United States under the Commission, and he said on the 12th of June last year—

“In considering several of those questions, Her Majesty's Government felt that there would be a great responsibility in breaking off the negotiations, and that in such an event ridicule, almost, would be brought upon the Commissioners and ourselves. Nevertheless, we at once declined to yield in every case where we deemed it our duty not to yield.”—[3 Hansard, cccv. 1847.]

There can be no doubt of the peculiar and intense difficulty in which the Government was placed by the necessity of preventing, at almost all hazards, the Commissioners returning home without having effected some purpose. Another point worthy of attention is the view of one of the Commissioners, Professor Bernard, who has since told us that the position of the negotiators of a Treaty is very peculiar, and he implies that when we deal with any ordinary subject in daily life we may have the benefit of professional advice, and can use

Bristol, M.
Exeter, M.
Hertford, M.
Salisbury, M.
Winchester, M.

Abergavenny, E.
Albemarle, E.
Amherst, E.
Annesley, E.
Bathurst, E.
Beauchamp, E.
Belmore, E.
Bradford, E.
Brooke and Warwick, E.
Brownlow, E.
Cadogan, E.
Cawdor, E.
Coventry, E.
Dartmouth, E.
Denbigh, E.
Derby, E.
Eldon, E.
Essex, E.
Feversham, E.
Fortescue, E.
Gainsborough, E.
Graham, E. (D. Montrose.)
Grey, E.
Harewood, E.
Hillsborough, E. (M. Downshire.)
Home, E.
Jersey, E.
Lanesborough, E.
Lauderdale, E.
Leven and Melville, E.
Lucan, E.
Macclesfield, E.
Malmesbury, E.
Manvers, E.
Minto, E.
Nelson, E.
Powis, E.
Rosse, E.
Sommers, E.
Stanhope, E.
Stradbroke, E.
Tankerville, E.
Verulam, E.
Wilton, E.

Bangor, V.
Combermere, V.
De Vesci, V.
Doneraile, V.
Exmouth, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hawarden, V. [Teller.]
Lifford, V.
Sidmouth, V.
Strathallan, V.

Peterborough, Bp.
Rochester, Bp.

Abercromby, L.
Abinger, L.
Aveland, L.

Blantyre, L.
Bolton, L.
Boston, L.
Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
Cairns, L.
Chelmsford, L.
Clements, L. (E. Leitrim.)
Clinton, L.
Colchester, L.
Colville of Culross, L.
Congleton, L.
Delamere, L.
De L'Isle and Dudley, L.
Denman, L.
De Saumarez, L.
Digby, L.
Dunmore, L. (E. Dunmore.)
Dunsany, L.
Egerton, L.
Ellenborough, L.
Elphinstone, L.
Foxford, L. (E. Limerick.)
Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)
Hawke, L.
Headley, L.
Hylton, L.
Kenlis, L. (M. Headfort.)
Kesteven, L.
Leconfield, L.
Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)
Northwick, L.
O'Neill, L.
Oranmore and Browne, L.
Oriell, L. (V. Massereene.)
Ormathwaite, L.
Ormonde, L. (M. Ormonde.)
Penrhyn, L.
Ravensworth, L.
Rayleigh, L.
Redesdale, L.
Saltersford, L. (E. Courtown.)
Scarsdale, L.
Sheffield, L. (E. Sheffield.)
Sherborne, L.
Silchester, L. (E. Longford.)
Sinclair, L.
Skelmersdale, L. [Teller.]
Sondes, L.
St. John of Bletso, L.
Strathnairn, L.
Thurlow, L.
Vivian, L.
Wentworth, L.
Wigan, L. (E. Crawford and Balcarres.)
Wynford, L.
Zouche of Haryngworth, L.

passed the day in Court, and had now been several hours without refreshment. The debate had wandered from the Motion, and they had been discussing the Treaty, and had thus been guilty of irregularity, which, in "another place," would not have been endured. Under these circumstances, he moved that the House do now adjourn.

Moved, "That the House do now adjourn."—(The Lord Kinnaird.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he understood that the noble and learned Lord was the only Member of their Lordships' House who now desired to take part in the debate, which would have closed with his speech; but at that hour he did not feel it right to persist in asking their Lordships to continue their sitting, and, therefore, he would reluctantly consent to a Motion to adjourn the debate, as he supposed, until Thursday, when he supposed the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would have an opportunity to reply to the speech of the noble and learned Lord who had just addressed their Lordships.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the further debate upon the original Motion adjourned to Thursday next.

House adjourned at One o'clock, A.M., to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 4th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee Resolutions [June 3] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental * [185]; Betting * [186].

Second Reading—Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation [137], debate adjourned; Local Legislation (Ireland) (No. 2) * [27], debate adjourned; Tithe Rent-charge (Ireland) * [70], debate adjourned.

Referred to Select Committee—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2) * [172].

Select Committee—Juries * [114], nominated.

Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.F.

Committee—Report—Court of Chancery (Funds) (re-comm.) * [140]; Sites for Places of Worship and Schools * [2].

LORD KINNAIRD said, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had

The House met at Two of the clock.

ARMY—MILITIA SURGEONS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL CORBETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is now prepared to state how Militia Surgeons are to be remunerated for the losses they will sustain by the new regulations, which transfers those portions of their duties to Army Surgeons, for the performance of which the greater part of their emolument has hitherto been derived?

MR. CAMPBELL (for Mr. CARDWELL) said, his right hon. Friend had nothing to add to what he had previously stated on that subject. If any claims were preferred on the part of Militia surgeons, his right hon. Friend would at all times be ready to give them due consideration, but he had not prepared a general scheme for compensation to those officers.

FRANCE—QUARANTINE IN FRENCH PORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Why all sailing vessels, yachts included, are subjected to quarantine on entering any French Ports unless provided with a clean Bill of health, while steamers are permitted to land their passengers without any restriction?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the French Government enforced again last year a regulation of some years' standing requiring all vessels entering a French port to be provided with a clean bill of health. But in consequence of representations respecting the inconvenience thereby occasioned to the regular mail and passenger steamers, it was relaxed in their favour, but not in the case of other sailing craft.

INDIA—HURRICANE AT MADRAS.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will state to the House the loss of life and ships, and the damage to public and private property, caused by the late hurricane at Madras, specifying the names of the ships and the number of native crafts; and, whether the Government of Madras is in possession of any steam tugs or other appliance by which assistance may be afforded to shipping on such occasions?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that all the information we have as yet received on the subject of the hurricane at Madras is contained in a telegram from the Governor of the 6th of May, which I will read—

"Disastrous cyclone here on 2nd of May. Following ships driven ashore and wrecked:—Sir Robert Seppings, Burlington, Ardbeg, Armenian, John Scott, Hotspur, Misser, Kingdom of Belgium, and Invereshie. Captain Hobson and the chief officer of Ardbeg and six of crew lost. Second and third officers, Morris and Boodle, of Hotspur, and Thompson (here follow two words which are unintelligible) of crew lost. Native crafts in port all sunk or driven on shore. Considerable loss of life feared. Loss of property serious. Madras pier breached. Extraordinary fall of rain reported from North Arcot and Tanjore from 30th of April to 2nd of May. Vellore town inundated from breached tanks. Immense damage to town and great loss of life among native population. Relief measures in progress; ship Isabel Croom dismasted near point Calimere; also ship Orissa, 50 miles east of Madras."

With regard to the second part of the hon. Baronet's Question, I am not aware that the Government of Madras has any steam tugs or other appliance by which assistance may be afforded to shipping on such occasions; but, at the same time, I cannot positively say that it has nothing of the kind.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 31.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

I.—GENERAL MANAGEMENT.

Clause 1 (Interpretation of Act).

Section, Definition of "Parish School."

MR. GORDON said, he desired to draw a distinction between parish schools and schools to be placed under the management and control of the local education boards. He would therefore move to insert words defining Parliamentary schools, as "schools established under the provisions of the Act, 1 & 2 Vict., c. 87."

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to the proposed Amendment, but would himself move an Amendment which he thought would meet the views of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and also of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren.) In the next section, "Burgh Schools" were defined as any school to which that term is now legally applicable—and any public school situate in a burgh, “and now under the management or partial management of the town council thereof.” He proposed to strike out these words.

After short discussion, Amendment agreed to; words struck out.

Then, on the Motion of Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, the word “Schoolmistress” was added to the definition of “Teacher.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Expenses of Scotch Education Department).

MR. ELLICE moved that the Clause be postponed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that if the Committee adopted the view of the hon. Member as being the most convenient, he should not object to it; but he failed to see the necessity of it. The Committee on the previous night decided that a Scotch Department should be created for the performance of certain duties. What those duties would be must, of course, depend upon the form in which the Bill passed; but if officers were to be appointed, they must be paid, and all the clause asked was that provision for such payment should be made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER pointed out that this clause was absolutely necessary, inasmuch as the Committee had already affirmed that there must be a Scotch Education Department to distribute the Education Grant, which was now distributed by the Committee of Council without distinction between Scotland and England.

MR. ANDERSON said, he thought the point aimed at had been missed by the advocates of the Bill. What he wanted to know was whether the Scotch Board was to be a sham—which he was rather afraid was what was intended—or whether it was to be a real working Board. If the latter, it would, of course, be necessary to provide for the salaries of the officers; but he thought they should not make that provision until it was seen what would be required.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was no intention on the part of the Privy Council to interfere with the Scotch Board; and if there was to be a Scotch Board it ought to be paid.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he did not understand the decision of the previous night as being in favour of a Scotch

The Lord Advocate

Education Department of the Privy Council. What he wanted to see was a Scotch Board, managing in Scotland the education of the Scotch people, and not a double set of paid officials performing the same work.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would oppose the appointment of a paid temporary Commission, because he thought such a Commission would be useless, and would be not unlikely to become a permanent burden upon the Exchequer. But he did not understand his hon. and learned Friend to say that the appointment of a paid Commission was intended. As there must be officers to manage education matters in Scotland, he saw no reason for postponing a clause which merely provided for the payment of their salaries.

MR. M'LAREN said, that before the clause was agreed to the Government ought to state what was to be the exact nature of this Board. If the clause defining the Education Board, its duties and requirements, was not yet prepared and ready to lay on the Table of the House, let the present clause be postponed until it was.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he was surprised that the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had asked what was to be the nature of the Scotch Board, because the Lord Advocate stated distinctly last night that he had substantially adopted his (Mr. M'Lagan's) Amendment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman at the same time said that the members of the Board were to be paid. It was expedient that this clause should be postponed until the Government laid before the Committee the clause which they intended to propose instead of his Amendment. He hoped that clause would not disappoint Scotch Members by proposing the appointment of a sham Board.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE also agreed as to the advisability of postponing the clause, although he thought the real question was not so much the payment of the officers as the definition of their duties.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in consenting to the postponement of Clauses 2 and 3, said, he hoped hon. Members had no fear, after the explanation which had been afforded, of anything like a sham Board being constituted under the provisions of this Bill. The Government would consent to the temporary appointment of a body which should exist as long as, and no longer than, necessary to give the measure a fair start, but should have no power to interfere with the mode in which the Imperial Government distributed the Imperial funds.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed, that if the Committee went on postponing clauses in this way the result would be to leave a very small residuum of work. The Bill had been draughted with the intention of placing the whole of these powers in the hands of the Committee of Council in London, and the Government having changed their ground at the last moment, much confusion had naturally occurred. It was impossible to proceed with it until the Government had decided upon the constitution and powers of the new Board in Scotland, and until those points were settled the Committee would be working in the dark, and would be sure to make a most unsatisfactory affair of the Bill.

SIR JOHN HAY trusted that before the postponed clauses were again brought up the Government would find some more appropriate designation for the Scotch Board than "Officers to be appointed in Scotland."

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE attributed the whole of the inconvenience the Committee had to endure in this matter to the fact that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had changed his plan. What the decision of the Government was to be they were, it seemed, not to know before Thursday. In order to enable the Government to amend their Bill as a whole he begged to move that the Chairman report Progress, and that the measure be proceeded with next Thursday.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would not press his Motion, in order that those parts of the Bill which were unaffected by the change in the views of the Government might be proceeded with.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that being just as anxious as his hon. Friend to press the Bill forward, he would not persevere with his Motion to report Progress; but it appeared to him that the Government ought, at the earliest possible opportunity, to state to the Committee what they proposed to do in reference to this clause. He believed the Board in Ireland administered public funds independently, and he thought Scotchmen were quite as competent as Irishmen to do this. The whole amount would be only about £250,000 a-year—not more than the income of many a private gentleman in this country. An attempt was being made to get political capital by degrading his countrymen, by supposing that they could not administer a sum like this in an honest way. [Murmurs.] If Scotch Members said a Board in Edinburgh could not administer a sum like that, they did not give their countrymen a very good character.

Motion, "That the Chairman do report Progress, by leave, withdrawn."

Clause postponed.

Clause 3 postponed.

II. LOCAL MANAGEMENT.

Clause 4 (Election of school boards).

MR. GORDON said, the Amendment he was about to move was one of an important character. His proposal was, that in page 3, line 10, the words "parish and" should be omitted, the result of which omission would be that the establishing of the school boards would be confined to burghs. He admitted the propriety of establishing local boards in the burghs, because, while in the parishes there was provision made by statute for the existence of a school or schools—and in some parishes there were three—there was no such statutory provision made for schools in the burghs. Now, the purpose of his Amendment was to exclude the parish schools from the operation of the Bill. At present, there was at least one school in every parish—while in some parishes there were one or two additional schools provided by the heritors, and the management was vested in those who had property substantially to the value of £100 Scots a-year, and the parish minister. There were also schools voluntarily established and supported by the proprietors, who took a deep interest in the educational requirements of the people. These schools were also supported by the different churches. The Church of Scotland had about 1,200 such schools, the Free Church about 600, and the United Presbyterian Church about 45. These were further supplemented by adventure schools, which would scarcely be affected by the operation of the measure now under consideration. In the course of the discussion last night the principle of the Education Act of 1870 was stated to be that existing schools should not be destroyed, but that they should be supplemented by new schools to be established by school boards wherever there was a deficiency of educational means. This was stated in the most distinct manner by the Vice President of the Council. There could, in fact, be no doubt about that principle, and it was said that it was the only safe and proper principle upon which to proceed. His Amendment was calculated to bring this Bill within the lines of the English Act, and to preserve the parish schools, with certain alterations to which he would afterwards refer. These parish schools had done good service towards education in Scotland; but this Bill would abolish them, and destroy their character in every respect. The parish schools were not only sufficient for the educational wants of many of the parishes in Scotland; but they were also distinguished for their efficiency. Of all others, they were the institutions of which Scotchmen might well be proud, and they had afforded the best education for the humbler classes of people. They had been held up as an example to England and other countries, and distinguished foreigners had stated that such admirable institutions did not exist in any other country in the world. Having such valuable schools, therefore, why should they be destroyed, as he maintained they would be, by this Bill? The proposal was not in accordance with the principle of the English Education Act; but even if it were, he would maintain that they had not had sufficient experience of the working of that Act to justify them in altering it. He appealed to Scotch Members to say whether there was not a strong feeling in Scotland in favour of the parish schools? Why should they not be maintained as they were? Therefore—at least, in the first instance—let them have the two systems working concurrently, so that they might see which worked best, and they would then be able to say whether they would be prepared to bring these schools under the cognizance and management of the local Boards, or whether they would leave them under the management of those who had hitherto proved so efficient in conducting education in Scotland? This was a question involving finance as well as matters of policy. With reference to the management of schools, it was proposed to give to the proprietors—who were at present liable under assessment established in 1696, and which had continued increasing with the requirements of the times down to the present day—a sum of nearly £50,000, which was at present available for educational purposes. That was a kind of bribe offered to the managers of these schools in order to obtain their assent to the sacrifice of the parochial schools; but he ventured to say that the heritors who were liable to this assessment were most willing to continue the present system, and they did not want the gift of this money. They desired that the management should be continued, subject to some enlargement, to which he should hereafter refer. The effect of the Lord Advocate's proposal would be to impose a very heavy burden upon the ratepayers, varying from 1½d. to 8d. in the pound. In return for these burdens to be borne by them, the ratepayers would acquire the privilege of sharing to a very infinitesimal degree in the nomination of the schoolmaster when the office became vacant. He (Mr. Gordon) had recently received a letter from one of the constituents of the hon. Member for Fife (Sir Robert Anstruther) to the effect that whereas he was able to secure education for his three children under the existing system for £4 a-year, including the cost of books, and for this had them instructed in the three Rs', in geography, Latin, and mathematics, he would, under this Bill, have to send them to a burgh school at a cost of £20 or £30, and pay rates in addition. [Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the name of the correspondent.] He had not the letter with him, but believed he could put his hand on it, and would ask for permission to communicate the name of the writer to the hon. Baronet. [The LORD ADVOCATE asked whether he was a tenant farmer?] He (Mr. Gordon) said he was. The recommendations of the Education Commissioners in Scotland seemed to have been utterly set aside by the Government. The Commissioners resolved that no alteration should be made in the existing management of parochial schools, and that they should, as far as possible, be carried on as they stood, subject, of course, to inspection and examination. Now, what were the provisions made by the Bills introduced into that House by the Liberal Government? The Bill of 1869 approved by the House of Commons fresh from the hustings, had acted on this recommendation, except in one particular—namely, that the electors of the controlling body should not be confined to heritors paying £100 Scots, but should include all who paid stipend. There was a general cry in Scotland of “Save us from the local Boards.” It was universally felt that it was dangerous to trust the ratepayers with the management of the schools, and that to do so would imperil the interests of higher education. It was well known that one-half of the students of the University of Scotland were educated in the parish schools, and it was feared this fortunate state of things would not be maintained if the local Boards assumed the control. Under these circumstances, he proposed that the present board of heritors should be continued, but that there should be an addition made to their number. It would be said the Bill did not destroy the parish schools, because there would be a school in every parish. This was so, but they would not be the same schools. The controlling body would be elected by £4 householders; the funds at present at command would no longer exist; the teachers would no longer have a life interest in their appointments, and the advantages resulting from the fact that the teacher held a freehold in his office would not continue; the teachers would not act subject to any regulations such as those made by the heritors; the highest branches of education would not be taught; and he feared religious disputes would be frequent in school boards. These were the objections to the Bill; and he asked that, to prevent the evil consequences which he had described, school boards should be established in those places only where they were proved to be necessary. If his Amendment did not express that, he would gladly assent to its being amended.

Mr. Gordon

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 10, to leave out the words “parish and.”—(Mr. Gordon.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he hoped, in considering this question, the Committee would not forget what the parish schools had done for Scotland. They had proved eminently successful, and had raised the character of Scotch education, and made it known throughout the world. What were they now asked to do? Nothing short of this—to destroy an old and successful system. He could speak from experience, that the parish schools of Scotland had solved the religious difficulty. They would find within the walls of those schools Roman Catholics, members of the Free Church, and the United Presbyterians. They were now, in effect, asked to sow religious difficulties in the schools of Scotland, in which it did not now exist. Under the Act there must be in twelve months a school board elected for every parish in Scotland. Why, the fact was they had already school boards in most of the parishes; they had the heritors and the minister as a board—[“Hear, hear!”]—and under their management an admirable school in each parish. But the proposal in the Bill was to overthrow that which had admittedly worked well. He did not look so much to the higher kind of education; but he held that they ought to give every child an opportunity of obtaining moral and religious instruction. That the existing system had hitherto done, and he trusted nothing would be done to disturb it. If they did, he feared they would create discontent in the minds of the people of Scotland.

MR. M'LAREN was strongly of opinion that the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) would inflict a great blow upon the Bill. The Amendment was, in fact, a new Bill, and a new Bill of a most objectionable character. It was quite true, as had been said by his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), that there was at this moment a school board in every parish in Scotland. That very fact struck at the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman, whose objection was that under the Bill a school board would be established in every parish. There was a school board now; but the question was, whether that school board should not be enlarged and liberalized, or whether it should be confined to the heritors and ministers. Why should not an enlarged constituency provide a better board? For his part, he could not see why the schools could not be in all cases as well, and in many cases better, managed under the boards provided by the Bill than under the existing system; and therefore the words "destroy the parish schools" and "sacrifice the parochial system," which had been so freely used, were altogether inapplicable. He thought the actual result would be analogous to what had taken place under the Scotch Reform Act of 1832. Before that measure, 2,800 freeholders returned 30 Members of Parliament. There were now 70,000 electors—but had the character of the representation deteriorated? He thought just the contrary. The original law of Scotland was that every heritor, great and small, was a manager of his school, and it was not until 1803 that the number was restricted by a fictitious valuation of £100 Scots, and thus the small heritors were deprived of their hereditary right. What it was now asked to do was to reverse that process to give to the small as well as to the great the right of becoming electors and managers. Moreover, they should remember that the great owner, although he might pay the assessment in the first instance, deducted one-half of it from the tenant, and therefore the tenant, paying virtually one-half of the assessment, had an equal right to become an elector as the landlord. Was it, he asked, consistent with the ends of justice that those who paid one-half should have no voice in the election of the board of management of the schools? And when they were going to lay on an additional charge on every kind of property in a parish, surely they had a right to liberalize the board, and by so doing to satisfy the demands of the people of Scotland. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) had offered some calculations as to the expenses that would be imposed for working the Bill. But he (Mr. M'Laren) said that the question of assessment was very little understood. He believed it would be very small in amount, and would nevertheless secure an excellent system of education throughout the country. As to the £50,000 now raised under the assessment of 1696 from the heritors, he thought that should be allowed to stand until the rate came to more than that amount. He believed that the average sum to be provided by the rates would not be more than 8s. or

Mr. M'Laren

10s. a-head. That, he believed, would be a fair average sum, although in some cases the rate would amount to 1s. in the pound instead of 2½d.; but whatever the cost might be, of this he was sure—that the people of Scotland had made up their minds in favour of the Bill, and especially of this—that the parish schools should not be disunited from the board schools.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, he thought that, as a rule, in the country districts of Scotland there was no deficiency of schools, and all that was wanted was a compulsory clause, which should not be a "sham," but a reality. For the burghs, school boards might be admirable; but in the rural districts there was little or no demand for them, and he even doubted whether the materials for electing them existed in many such places. There was great danger in intrusting the interests of education to the control of local Boards of imperfectly educated people. Whatever might be said as to the deficiency of schools in some parts of Scotland, unquestionably there was no such deficiency in country districts—all that was really required in such places was a compulsory clause. He was anxious to point out to the English Members that in the event of local Boards being appointed under this Bill for every parish in Scotland, the same principle would be subsequently applied to England, and thus the most valuable principle in the English Act of 1870—that of letting well alone—would be set aside. The great evil from which Scotland was likely to suffer under this Bill was the sacrifice of everything to symmetrical arrangement. It might save trouble to have a local Board in each district; but he was strongly of opinion that in so important a matter as the present, unless they wished for change merely for the sake of change, some regard should be had to the wants and circumstances and condition of each parish. As he had said, the proposed arrangement would answer for burghs, and he hoped to see it carried out there; but he thought that the Scotch Education Department, or the Commissioners who might be appointed, might look into the condition of the parishes with a view to supplying any deficiency that might be found to exist. By some such means it would be practicable to do all that was required to meet existing necessities, and the establishment of the universal system of school boards need not be enforced.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE observed that there was one point on which he was disposed to agree with his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Gordon), and that was as to the anxiety which existed on the subject of the constitution of the future Board throughout Scotland. That feeling prevailed, too, in that House; and it was not confined to hon. Gentlemen who held Conservative opinions. He admitted that the proposal of the Government to place the management of the parochial school in the hands of an elective board would place the schoolmaster in an uncertain position; and in some places, no doubt, local and religious feeling would be mixed up in their elections. These and other difficulties had to be contended with, and the question was how far the Bill provided a remedy. He was not behind any Member of the House in his desire to reform the present school system, and, in proof, he placed Notices of several Amendments on the Paper which he trusted would have the effect of putting both the managers and schoolmasters on a more satisfactory footing. Other points required attention—such as the arrangement of the religious difficulty, and a more efficient system of instruction. Again, the pecuniary demands upon the people would be heavy, and it was necessary that the assessment should be made upon the present value of property, and not according to the inadequate valuation made more than a century ago; and this was a further reason for improved administration, and for giving the taxpayers a voice in the management of that for which they paid. It was, he thought, imperative upon the Government and the House that they should take these matters into their serious consideration. The only question in his mind was whether they should be dealt with in the manner suggested three years ago, or in the way proposed by the Bill before the Committee. Whilst doing full justice to the active part which the ministers of the Church of Scotland had taken in the management of the schools, it was impossible to deny that they had acted with a natural bias; and, as he considered that the Government had treated this question not only in conformity with the desires of the people of the country, but in the only way in which it could be dealt with, he cheerfully gave his support to this provision of the Bill.

MR. ORR-EWING said, that after the speech of the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) one would have thought that he would have supported the Amendment. Certainly, he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) coincided in everything he said in behalf of the parochial schools, and acknowledged that the great majority of them were well worked, though he himself had had experience of most inefficient teachers, of whom it was impossible to get rid. Most Members of the House—especially those of the Opposition—would willingly join in any effort to reform the existing system of parochial schools; but the arguments adduced went rather in favour of the present system. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had truly said that there was already a school board in every parish in Scotland. It was true that it was not elected; but still it had worked satisfactorily. It was in accordance with the spirit of the age that those who bore the burden of taxation for the support of the schools should have a share in the management, and he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) contended that it was far more reasonable to liberalize and open up the existing system than to seek its complete overthrow. But the hon. Member for Edinburgh said—"No; we prefer to have an elected board, because it will do its duties much better than the present close board." But the Report of the Assistant Commissioners on Education afforded the strongest evidence to the contrary, and showed that the system of management by a board of heritors was efficient, while such a system as that proposed under the Bill would prove inefficient. Whether the Lord Advocate really believed that by this Bill a more efficient board of management would be established, for his (Mr. Orr-Ewing's) part he believed that the working classes of Scotland were not aware that the Bill proposed to tax them at all. He had talked to many workmen on the subject, and he found that they were surprised to be told that they would have to pay 6*d.* in the pound; yet the hon. Member for Edinburgh, who was a great authority on figures, stated that the rate would not be 6*d.* but 1*s.* in the pound. Now, was it right and proper that they should tax a poor man, who was heavily enough burdened already to educate his own children, in order that he might contribute towards the education of the children of others? When the working classes of Scotland discovered that they would be assessed to the extent of 1s. in the pound, they would not thank the Government for this Bill. He hoped the Lord Advocate would agree to the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon).

MR. R. W. DUFF said, no one who had lived so long in the rural districts of Scotland as he had would attempt to deny the benefit the parochial schools had been to Scotland, and he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Glasgow University (Mr. Gordon) in the approval he had expressed of them, but the hon. and learned Gentleman ignored the fact that Scotland was not satisfied with the parochial system. He also ignored the fact that the Bill proposed to establish a system of rate-aided schools—the parochial schools were to be handed over to the school boards. Now, it was impossible to maintain a denominational system when the school became the property of the ratepayers of all denominations. They had been told that there were schools in England left out of the Bill, and hon. Gentlemen opposite had invited them to follow the example of that Bill; but if they were so fond of the English Bill, why did they take a course diametrically opposed to it on the subject of religion, as shadowed forth in the Amendment carried by the hon. and learned Gentleman? They opposed our assistance to remove this ecclesiastical barrier in the way of English education, and they had forthwith proceeded to erect that barrier again in their Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy) who voted against the proposal that the reading of the Bible in schools should be made compulsory, yet voted that religion should be enforced by law in Scotch schools. How they were to teach religion and exclude the Bible he (Mr. Duff) failed to understand. These were the right hon. Gentleman's words—

“There are three parties to be considered—There is the Parent, the State, and the Church. I think the first duty of the State is to instruct in religion as well as in secular knowledge. But having to address a House composed of men of every religious faith, and no longer of that unity which once existed within it, it would be useless to insist that they should as a State teach religion, for if they decided to teach such a religion as they could agree to impose, nothing would be more hostile to my view.”—[3 Hansard, ccii. 519.]

He (Mr. Duff) thought that was a very sensible view, and regretted that the right hon. Member had not adhered to it. He looked on the Amendment as fatal to the Bill, as it re-imposed a denominational system, and hoped the Committee would at once reject it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he had ventured last night to represent to the Committee that one of the great features of the Bill was that there should be one uniform system of management, applicable without distinction to all public rate-supported schools—to those existing before the Act as well as to those established under the Act. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) had, he hoped, exhausted his vocabulary of phrases in lauding the parish schools of Scotland, for these encomiums had become somewhat wearisome. It was undeniable that amongst the parochial schools there were good, bad, and indifferent. Those which were good were represented by the Royal Commissioners as amounting to about 75 per cent of the whole; but that included all varieties of goodness. Those on the other hand which were bad, were not less than 25 per cent, including all degrees of badness. That, he confessed, was not a state of matters of which to boast. Some of the schools were very excellent, but some of them were discredibly and scandalously bad. With reference to the subject immediately before the House, there were no doubt public rate-supported schools already existing, and the question they had to consider was, whether the management under which they were placed ought to be interfered with. His hon. and learned Friend, in the most argumentative part of his speech, contended that the existing schools should not be disturbed. The Bill certainly proposed to interfere with these schools so far as the management was concerned, and he did not think that the House would agree with his hon. and learned Friend that a body of heritors, with the parish minister, constituted the best board of management for public rate-supported schools. The purpose of the Amendment was two-fold—namely, to exclude the parish schools from the operation of this Bill, and to provide for the deficiency in the other schools being supplied by denominational effort, and the schools themselves placed under denominational management. According to the conscientious conviction of his hon. and learned Friend, that was the best system of national education which could be established. That, however, was not the view of the Government in presenting this Bill to Parliament. The Government were of opinion that the existing management of the parish schools was unsatisfactory, and they were of opinion that it ought to be reformed by placing them under the same system of management which they proposed for all public rate-supported schools which it should be necessary to establish in order to provide sufficient education in Scotland. In order to provide a sufficient supply of schools for Scotland, it would certainly be necessary to raise the local rates. The Government proceeded upon the view that the people of Scotland were resolved to have a sufficient number of efficient schools for the education of their children. These schools must be maintained from three sources—from money granted by Parliament for national education in Great Britain; from the fees paid by the pupils; and from the produce of local rates. The amount which the local rates would have to contribute must be determined by the amount of money necessary to meet the expenses in excess of what was met by the Parliamentary money and the fees. The people of Scotland were so resolved to have a sufficient number of good, well-taught schools, that they would, he believed, gladly bear the burden of the expenses which were necessary for that purpose. Now, what was the natural system of management for such schools as existed and were to be created? Why, certainly the management of those who contributed to the expenses. The ratepayers would be too large a body to be managers themselves, and therefore they must resort to the expedient of making the ratepayers the constituency to appoint from their own number, or, without limiting them to their own number, to appoint those in whom they had most confidence to make efficient provision for the respective parishes and burghs. His hon. and learned Friend referred to the English Education Act of 1870, and complained that they were departing from the lines of that Act. Well, then, who were the constituents who elected the managers of the rate-supported schools in England? Why, the ratepayers. The constituents were not confined to landed proprietors who were rated upon a certain rental—generally speaking, a very high rental. Why, he asked, in the language of his hon. and learned Friend, were the people of Scotland not to be trusted to elect good school managers as well as the people of England? Why were they to say to the parents of Scotland—to the parents who had to send their children to the public rate-supported schools of Scotland—"You are not fit to elect school managers. The people of England are, and Parliament has committed to them that duty; but in Scotland we must only look to the heritors—the landed proprietors?" But his hon. and learned Friend said that the principle of the English Bill was not to disturb existing schools, and it was in that particular that he complained that the Government in this Bill had departed from the lines of the English measure. Why—were there any existing public rate-supported schools to disturb? Not one. The English measure proceeded upon the principle of not disturbing schools established and maintained by voluntary effort, and the principle enunciated by the hon. Gentleman to whose speeches his hon. and learned Friend referred about not disturbing existing schools, referred not to existing public rate-supporting schools, for there were none such, but to schools established and maintained by voluntary effort. They had followed the lines of the English Bill in that respect. They did not meddle with any school of the class of which alone there were schools in England at the passing of the Act of 1870. But with respect to existing public rate-supported schools, why was not the Legislature to deal with them as well as with the public rate-supported schools for which it made provision? They were in search of the best system of management. They had existing public rate-supported schools which were not under the best system of management. If they determined that, with respect to the schools to be established under the Act, a popular elected school board was the best system of management, he wanted to know why that principle was not to be applied to the existing schools also.

Mr. Orr-Ewing

Why were they to have a dual system of management? Nothing possibly could be more unreasonable or inconvenient, and the Government must therefore adhere to the proposal of the Bill, and reform the management of existing schools in such a way that under the same management they could be able to place all the schools that were to be established under the Bill. It was conceded—indeed, it could not be disputed—that the multitude of schools to be established under the Bill could not be put under the charge of heritors and the parish minister. The management of the heritors and the parish minister, so as to keep the schools still attached to the parish church, could only be maintained by creating a dual system of management—one applicable to the old, and the other to the new schools. The Government knew of no reason for taking such a course except to exempt the existing schools from the operation of the present Act. This was what was called destroying these schools. Why was it destroying them? The Government said that these schools should be maintained as at present, except in so far as they would be improved. They did not think that all the wisdom in a parish in Scotland was in the heritors rated above £100. There were intelligent tenants whether they paid school rates or not. His hon. and learned Friend said that the Government were throwing away the heritors' money which they were paying ungrudgingly and without any grumbling. Well, he (the Lord Advocate) did not know that the heritors of Scotland ever paid any rates ungrudgingly. But in that respect, if they did grudge and grumble a little, they were only like other rate-payers, for one unpleasant circumstance connected with all rates was—that they had to be paid. The Government did not in the least propose to relieve the heritors of the rates which it would be necessary to impose. He thought the heritors contributed to the cause of education in Scotland between £40,000 and £50,000. He did not speak of their voluntary contributions; but they contributed in rates between £40,000 and £50,000 a-year, and half of that sum was payable by their tenants. His own opinion was that it was paid by the tenants—because, whether they paid it directly or not, they were legally liable. From the accidental circumstance that the valued rent—which was a valuation made some centuries ago—was adopted as the scale of assessment, these rates fell very unequally. The incidence was entirely objectionable, and men, whether proprietors or tenants, did not pay in proportion to the extent and value of their possessions. Now, they should require a much larger rate. £40,000 or £50,000 a-year would not nearly meet the requirements of the Bill, and they could not impose the additional burden upon the valued rent heritors with the present inequality of incidence. But they were not going to make two rates. They were going to make one rate for all the money required for the purposes of the Bill—that was, one rate in each district for so much as was necessary to supply the deficiency arising after the Imperial grant and the fees were applied, and it was proposed to raise that rate by a tax equally imposed upon all landlords and all tenants according to the real value of their possessions. With reference to existing public rate-supported schools, as well as with respect to those which should become so, they proposed that there should be a school board elected in each parish by the inhabitants—namely, by those who were chiefly interested in the matter of education, and they entirely repudiated the object which was proposed to be attained by the Amendment.

The Lord Advocate

LORD GARLIES said, he would not follow the learned Lord in the special pleading of which he had shown himself such a master. He wished simply to remind the Committee that they had been informed by the learned Lord that 75 per cent of the parish schools in Scotland had been reported by the Inspector as good. That being so, he agreed with the hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. C. Dalrymple) that it would be much better to leave well alone. He believed that the proposal of the Government would only tend to sow discord throughout the greater part of Scotland, as there was no wish there for anything of the kind, since there was a sufficiency of education which would render the new system unnecessary. He trusted that the House would not vote for the proposition of the Government, and that they would consent to leave out the few words proposed by his hon. and learned Friend, believing that the adoption of such a Motion would be more beneficial to Scotland than if they were allowed to remain in the Bill.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he could not accept the statement of the learned Lord Advocate that the parish schools in Scotland were rate-supported schools. In England, wherever you had a rate-founded school, you naturally gave representation to the ratepayers. But the landward schools in Scotland were supported out of the rent-charge upon property of very ancient date, and the burden rested on the owners alone. The heritors had not only assessed themselves, but had also given voluntary subscriptions towards the schools; and therefore to describe those schools as rate-supported schools, as that term was generally understood, was calculated to mislead. The greatest proportion of the money which had made the schools such as they were now, and such as would bear favourable comparison with kindred institutions in any other portion of the United Kingdom, had been contributed by the heritors. If these gentlemen had stuck to the mere duty of providing schools only in so far as they were actually compulsorily demanded to do, would they have been in the satisfactory condition in which they were now, or would the schoolmasters' houses have been as they were? If they had had to be furnished out of absolute necessity, both would have been of a wholly different character. He claimed for the heritors of Scotland, in their position as managers of voluntary schools, as well as of those provided by legal compulsion, the most honourable title. Therefore, to shut them out altogether from the advantages of management would be obviously unfair. It was otherwise in England, where rate-supported schools were to be established only wherever the necessity for them existed. If that principle had been carried out by the learned Lord Advocate, he would not have objected. In the landward parishes in Scotland, the learned Lord Advocate could not say so,—it was contrary to the opinion of the Commissioners—that the schools were not adequate to the wants of the district. The real object of this Bill should be to create better schools in burghs. He (Lord Henry Scott) sympathized with him in that object, and should support him in successfully accomplishing it; but the learned Lord Advocate had completely shut his eyes to the fact that in the counties the ground was already covered, and the complaint was, that being so, this Bill stepped in and forced on the people a state of things which was not in the slightest degree required. The change proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) was in the right direction, by giving increased representation to those who now contributed to the schools. For that the greatest possible credit was due. It did not differ from the proposal of the Government in 1869; and, besides, it went a good deal farther. They had a right to ask the Government why they had changed their opinion in three years, making compulsory school boards and altering the whole system of rating for schools. His learned Friend conceded what was required in burghs. There was no difference between him and the Lord Advocate on that point. All the difference was, that the landward schools should be supported in the same manner and enlarged in the sphere of representation of the heritors. After all, those on that side of the House had conceded that one-half of the board should be elected by the heritors and the other half by the ratepayers. What could be fairer than that? But the Lord Advocate said—"No; we must sweep away the heritors altogether." Now, was that fair to use them so, after the admirable way in which they had discharged their duties? Were they going to set, up side by side with a school which might be voluntarily supported by the heritors, another that was founded and maintained out of the rates? Was that likely to promote harmony? School boards were not to be compulsorily established in England where they were not required. Why, then, were they to be forced upon Scotland, where there existed a very superior managing body? Were they to treat Scotland on the principle of Fiat experimentum in corpore vili? Would the Government like to establish school boards all over Ireland? This was an Imperial question, and not one for Scotland only. Let them not overlook the probable effect of the precedent they proposed to set in the case of Scotland. The opponents of the Bill having met the Government half-way, the latter ought to be prepared to make some concession.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, it was only due to the heritors to take the opportunity of acknowledging the services which they had rendered to the cause of education. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Scott) had stated truly that the heritors not only paid the money they had inherited as a burden on their property, but supplemented it in such a way as to arouse the gratitude of all interested in this important subject. But he laid too much stress on the fact. The noble Lord was justified in declining to regard the parochial schools of Scotland entirely as rate-supported schools, because part of their funds came from this voluntary source. But some £40,000 or £50,000 of the money contributed by the heritors was public money, and was, in fact, reported by the Commissioners as one of the largest items of assets available for education in Scotland. That fact placed the parochial schools in a different position from any of the schools in England, because there were none there so supported. If this arrangement was to be continued, the noble Lord had not gone beyond what was fair when he asked that there should be some kind of recognition on the part of the Government towards the heritors. What he (Mr. Parker) wished to point out was that there were two totally different ways, in which some concession might be made. The one was that proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon), to distinguish between the mode of treating those parish schools and the other public schools throughout the country; the other way would be to include in one system the burgh and parish schools, but to provide that where the funds came from the heritors there should be some recognition of it in the management. There was a growing feeling in Scotland that the money derived from the heritors should not be sacrificed, and that feeling was shared in by both political parties, neither of whom were averse to the heritors being represented in respect of their special contributions. If the ratepayers elected a majority of the managers they would have no objection to let the heritors retain their seats on the board. But the issue placed before the Committee by the present Amendment was whether they should set up a duplicate system—namely, one for the burghs, and another for the parish schools. While the Conservatives would leave the schools in the hands of the parish ministers and the heritors, the progressive party would not allow any minister to be a manager simply ex officio, but would liberalize and enlarge the management.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that English Members had a deep interest in the decision of the Committee on this question, because it interfered with the parochial school system of Scotland, which had been avowedly successful. The Lord Advocate pointed to the schools throughout England, and said—"See, we have left you these schools supported by voluntary contributions." But they knew those schools had not been so successful as the Scottish parochial schools. They knew, also, that the system of education in Scotland brought to the schools a larger proportion of children than were brought to the schools in England. He (Mr. Newdegate) remembered that the new President of the Board of Trade had several times intimated that the retention of voluntary schools in England was only a question of time, and that he looked forward to a period when there should be a system of school boards throughout the whole of England. If the Scottish parochial schools were not to be supported—if the system of school boards was to override them—what prospect had they of the continuance of the voluntary system in England? None whatever. And therefore, as an English Member, he deprecated the stern adherence to uniformity which, notwithstanding the acknowledged merits of the Scottish schools—notwithstanding the acknowledgment of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker) of the good conduct of the heritors, was intended to sweep away the system on which the parochial schools were built, although the evidence before the House showed it to be one which the people of Scotland clung to and admired. He (Mr. Newdegate) put this to English Members. The Vice President of the Council had taken to himself immense credit for not having swept away the voluntary system. If they passed that clause striking down the Scottish parochial system, did they think that the system in England would remain? It certainly would not. It appeared to him that they were about to break up the best system of education which existed in Great Britain—which existed in the United Kingdom. And for what reason? To gratify a feeling of small jealousy which wished to establish equality. The Government say—We will have a ratepaying system of school boards. But had they not a ratepaying system in England? Had they not church rates? Was not every ratepayer represented in the vestry? And yet what had been the end of that system? Why, the same jealousy crept up; that system had been swept away, and no provision had been made for the maintenance of the Church. It was simply sacrificed to that small jealousy which would establish equality, and which ended in spoliation. There was another thing to be considered. The heritors of Scotland were men of many different religious persuasions—but they had always maintained a religious education. They knew from the experience of England that religious education was very much put aside in the rate-paying schools—it was not enjoined, it was only permitted; and they knew that there was a constant study in the school boards to get rid of religious teaching altogether. They had that experience before them. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced the House had decided that religion should still form an essential part of the education of Scotland, and in doing so it had represented and reflected the feelings of the Scottish people. But if they swept away from these heritors the control which they had maintained over religious education, and adopted their uniform system of rate-paying schools, they would introduce into the Scottish school system the struggles that were going on in the English boards, and would lay the foundation of disturbing, and, he believed, of destroying that religious education which they had decided ought to be maintained in Scotland.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE also supported the Amendment. He considered that it was a scandalous imputation upon the people of Scotland to say that an Educational Board in that country could not be entrusted with the expenditure of £250,000 a-year, and that it was necessary to delegate the duty to the Privy Council. He should do all in his power to oppose the clause in the Bill and render it nugatory.

MR. GORDON, in replying, said, he objected to the payment made to the parochial schools under the present system being called a rate, because a rate was a payment made by all classes upon an assessment. It was not a charge upon the proprietors of the land; whereas at present there was always a special charge upon the land for the parochial school whenever it changed hands. The Lord Advocate said that he was sick and tired of hearing so much about the parochial schools. No doubt, when he proposed to destroy them, it was very disagreeable to him to hear so much said in their praise from all sides of the House. Some stress had been laid upon the deficiency in the education in burgh schools; but even in respect to them, although 20 were reported indifferent, only seven were reported bad; while in the country districts the parochial schools were admitted on all hands to be excellent. And those were the schools which were to be destroyed! He recollected that last year two Professors of English Universities and one from a Scotch University urged upon the Vice President of the Council and the Lord Advocate the necessity of proceeding with the greatest caution in reference to these parish schools, and expressed great doubts as to whether the schools which would be established under the new system would equal them, because, as they said, they had never seen them excelled. That was not the opinion of Scotchmen only, but of English Professors, who had no prejudice on the subject. The Lord Advocate was a great master of the use of adjectives, and he said that the system proposed in opposition to the Government scheme was utterly unreasonable and incorrect. If so, his (Mr. Gordon's) excuse was that his Amendment was in the terms of the recommendation of the Commissioners who reported on Scottish Education. But he had a still higher authority under which he could shield himself—namely, the authority of the present Ministry; for in 1869 they produced a Bill which contained provisions with reference to the parish schools, which were almost identical with those he proposed, because they proposed a scheme under which there would be a dual management. [The LORD ADVOCATE said, that they were exempted under that Bill.] He (Mr. Gordon) was under the impression that the dual system was proposed under it, and therefore he considered that he was only following in the footsteps of the present Ministry when he moved the present Amendment, which he trusted would be accepted by the House.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 177: Majority 45.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

BISHOPS RESIGNATION ACT (1869)
PERPETUATION BILL—(Lords)—[BILL 137.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. DICKINSON, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said, the Bill provided for the case of a Bishop resigning his bishopric, and also of a Bishop who from mental infirmity had become unable to perform the duties of his office. In the case of resignation the Bishop was to receive either a third of his salary or £2,000 a-year; whichever of those sums was the larger. There were 28 Archbishops and Bishops, one of whom received £15,000 a-year, two £10,000, one £8,000, one £7,000, one £5,500, eight £5,000, seven £4,500, and six £4,200 a-year. He apprehended that the same principle was applicable to Bishops as to other officials; and it appeared to him that if they were to have legislation of a permanent character to provide for a Bishop not able to discharge the duties of his office, there ought to be some provision for the purpose of securing that the public should have an efficient person to perform the duties for which that person was paid. There should be some provision that in case of incompetency the Bishop should be made to resign, instead of having it left to his own will and pleasure. He would ask, did it answer to hold out a bribe to an official to induce him to resign? The bribe was insufficient, because the truth was, that persons in office who had attained a considerable age would be rarely found willing to admit that they were incapable of discharging their duties. Another portion of the Bill was also unsound and vicious in principle—he referred to that part which provided that when a Bishop resigned the successor appointed to him should not receive the whole of the episcopal income fixed for that diocese, but should defray a charge out of that income for the benefit of the late holder of the office. That principle, although it had been acted upon in the Army here and in India was an unsound one. The scheme in the Bill was that, in case of resignation from age or physical or mental infirmity, provision was to be made for the Bishop's successor by paying him £2,000 a-year, or one-third of the income of the retiring Bishop. It was said as a reason for a large allowance to Bishops, that they had great claims upon them for social status, charities, and on other accounts; but there would be all those claims upon the new Bishop with the smaller income; whilst the previous Bishop retiring into private life would have no demands upon him beyond those of an ordinary clergyman. In the case of the retirement of ordinary incumbents of livings there was a different rule to be adopted from that which prevailed in the case of Bishops and Deans. For an ordinary incumbent to retire with an annuity he must have been seven years an incumbent, and, practically, the Bishops had some power to force an incapacitated incumbent to resign. Again, in case any Archbishop of Canterbury became subject to permanent mental infirmity, the new Archbishop would receive only £4,000 a-year, while the committee of the estate of the retiring Archbishop would receive £11,000 as an accumulating fund for the benefit of the family. Surely that would not be just. Bishops had large allowances, and therefore it was in their power to make provision for old age and incapacity. The statute, which had hitherto been only temporary, it was now proposed to make permanent, and therefore it behoved them to see that it was a sound one. He believed that the sound principle was that Bishops, as well as other public servants, when they were unable to perform their duties should be got rid of and other persons appointed in their stead. The public interests required that the country should pay only for work done. Pay and work should be commensurate, and it was no part of the duty of the public to provide in old age for a person who received sufficient pay while he was in the public service to make that provision for himself. He hoped the House would consider the case of retirements generally. There was a Bill now before the House to increase the superannuation allowance to retiring Colonial Governors. The whole subject should be investigated, for they were now spending to an enormous extent on ineffective services in every Department.

Mr. Gordon

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Dickinson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. GLADSTONE observed that if his hon. Friend objected to the details of the measure the proper place to deal with that measure would be in Committee; or if he thought that the present was not a convenient time to consider those details, then the proper course would be not to move the rejection of the Bill, but simply that it should be a Bill to continue the existing measure for a term of years, instead of making a permanent arrangement. He agreed with his hon. Friend that some of the details now or at a future time might receive further consideration, though he did not agree precisely with all the remarks which had been made. He should also be quite willing either to try to improve the details of the Bill, or, if the hands of Parliament were too full just now, he was perfectly willing to make the present Bill simply one for continuing the existing law for three, five, or seven years. The case of Bishops was not, however, to be dealt with in the lump along with those of Colonial Governors and other Civil servants. It was distinguished by a multitude of specialities from the case of Civil servants, and nothing would be gained by the endeavour to mix together things which were entirely and absolutely heterogeneous. Nor did he agree that a Bishop was to be considered as a person whose duty it was to lay by large sums out of his income with a view to provide for his old age. He believed it was the practice of Bishops to insure their lives, with a view to some provision for their families. But it would not have a good moral effect upon the position or influence of Bishops to set forth on the authority of this House, the doctrine that it was their business to make considerable reservations, independent of a provision for their families, in order to lay by for themselves in their old age. It was true that no fewer than five cases had been or would have been brought under this Bill had not death supervened; but although it was that accumulation of particular cases which brought home to the mind of Parliament the necessity for a provision of this kind, it was obvious, apart from those cases, that something must be done. The administrative duties of the Bishops had of late years undergone an enormous increase. The episcopal office was now a more laborious one than it used to be; and it must be expected that, if dioceses were to be efficiently administered, cases would from time to time occur in which, through the weight of duty and of years, it would be necessary to provide for the resignations of Bishops. He submitted that there was no necessity for taking the judgment of the House as to whether this Bill should or should not go forward. The only question was whether an attempt should be made to improve its details, or whether its operation should be limited.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought that a case had been made out by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Dickinson), and that, as the Bill was imperfect, and was admitted to be so by the Prime Minister, it ought not to be pushed on to the detriment of other important measures. He could not conceive why a difference should be made between Bishops and Deans. Was it that Deans consumed more than Bishops? There was no urgent necessity for legislating on the subject. He thought that Bishops, Deans, and Incumbents should all be dealt with in the same manner.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate was adjourned till this day.

And it being now Seven of the Clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the Clock.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. RAIKES rose, pursuant to Notice, to move a series of Resolutions on this subject. The first Resolution was—

"That during those Sittings of the House which are limited as to time no Motion for the Adjournment of any Debate be put from the Chair within half-an-hour of the time fixed for the conclusion of Opposed Business."

An incident occurred one Wednesday in the month of April last which was a sufficient proof of the necessity of some such rule as that which he was desirous of seeing adopted. On that occasion the House, after full and long debate, was prepared for a division upon the second reading of an important Bill—the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill—when an hon. Member (Sir Frederick W. Heygate) thought fit to move the adjournment of the House at about 25 minutes before six o'clock. The result of that was that a division was necessarily taken on the Question of adjournment, and the very numbers of those who opposed and rejected that Motion constituted the real reason why the adjournment became the inevitable consequence of the Motion being made. That was a practical absurdity the repetition of which ought to be prevented. He wished to see the principle already recognized by the House, in fixing a quarter before six on Wednesday or 10 minutes before seven at Morning Sittings extended, so as to make the limit within which the adjournment might be moved half-an-hour before the time fixed for the conclusion of Opposed Business.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That during those Sittings of the House which are limited as to time, no Motion for the Adjournment of any Debate be put from the Chair within half an hour of the time fixed for the conclusion of Opposed Business." — (Mr. Raikes.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, all Rules which tended to complicate Parliamentary procedure were not beneficial, and should only be adopted when they could be proved to be effectual for the attainment of the object contemplated. So far as he had observed, the method of adjourning the debate on occasions when their Sittings terminated at a fixed time was not the favourite method of obstructing business. The method much more frequently resorted to was what was known as "talking the measure out." A distinguished Member whom he now had in his mind's eye had vaunted himself for having performed an achievement of that kind in the course of the present Session. This was like a case in which they had two vents open, a large vent and a small one, and they wanted to keep the vessel watertight. The hon. Member (Mr. Raikes) appeared to him to shut the small vent and to leave the large one open. The proposal would not be effective for its purpose, while it tended to complicate the Rules of the House.

Mr. Raikes

MR. DENMAN supported the Resolution. No doubt, on Wednesdays attempts might be made to obstruct Business by talking questions out; but occasionally that process was exhausted, and then the second method was resorted to, of moving the adjournment at an hour when the division must occupy so much time as practically to put an end to the matter in hand. The Resolution would at least destroy that second method of obstruction.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought they had all experienced the complicated process resorted to on such occasions, under the cover of moving the adjournment of the debate or of the House; and he was of opinion that the proposal of his hon. Friend should be tried as an experiment.

MR. M. CHAMBERS believed in the sincerity of the Members of that House, and had heard an hon. Gentleman opposite move the adjournment of a debate on the ground that there were several Members on their side who wished to speak. It was a very curious thing, that although the Motion for the adjournment of the debate on that occasion was negatived by a very large majority, the result desired by the hon. Member who made the Motion was attained, because before the division was concluded the time had arrived when by the Rules of the House the debate stood adjourned. He was afraid that if the proposal of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) were adopted, half-an-hour instead of five or ten minutes would be lost on all occasions when the Rules of the House required a debate to stand adjourned at a particular hour.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he could scarcely tell from the very lucid speech to which they had just listened which side the hon. and learned Gentleman had taken on this question; but, at all events, he was mistaken in assuming that half-an-hour would be lost on the occasions to which he referred; because that time would be occupied in discussing the subject before the House.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present, LORD ROBERT MONTAGU proceeded to say that if he could see the slightest use in moving the adjournment of a debate within half-an-hour before it would stand adjourned by the Rules of the House, he would be willing to vote against the Amendment. But what was the use of making such a Motion when the event must naturally take place without its being made? It was done merely to evade the inconvenient responsibility of Members. To quote a case in point, he might refer to the Motion made for the adjournment of the debate on the Permissive Bill on a recent Wednesday by an hon. Member below the gangway on the other side of the House, with the sole object of enabling hon. Members to evade committing themselves by voting on the Main Question.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON rose to correct the noble Lord's statement. The Motion for the adjournment of the debate on the occasion to which he referred had been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate) who sat immediately behind the noble Lord himself.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON doubted whether it would be advisable to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Chester. He thought a question of so great importance as the Business of the House ought to be dealt with as a whole by the Government, instead of being left to the fragmentary fancies—if he might say so—of different Members. If the House dealt with the question of the Business of the House in small scraps, as indicated by the string of Motions relating to that question, they would hopelessly complicate, instead of facilitating, the carrying on of the Business of the country.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he thought 40 or 50 Members sitting in the House could deal with this subject quite as well as any Committee sitting up-stairs. The Motion of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) was a small step in the right direction.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, after the House had been engaged five hours on one of the most important Bills of the Session, and after a short Recess the House was necessarily thin. About one-twelfth of its Members were asked to consider the important question of the future conduct of the Business of the House, and he believed that if the propositions on the Paper were adopted to-night, they would not approve themselves to the common sense of hon. Members to-morrow. On those grounds, he should vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Chester.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) and the hon. Member opposite (Mr. A. Johnston) were both young Members of the House, and they had fallen into the trap which had been laid for them by the front benches. The hon. Gentleman opposite seemed totally to have forgotten the antecedents of this question. A few years ago the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) devised a plan, by means of a new arrangement of Morning Sittings, for further limiting the opportunities of private Members; but he was not present on this occasion. And the right hon. Gentleman who now led the House followed in the course begun by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. In fact, it was the desire of every Government to limit the rights and privileges of private Members as far as they possibly could. He (Mr. Bentinck) protested against Members of the House getting up one after the other to air their own little crotchets without any attempt to deal with the whole subject in a comprehensive and satisfactory manner. The present Leader of the House moved last Session for a Committee to inquire into this matter. The right hon. Gentleman was able after that by a small majority to take away that constitutional right which every Member had of stating the grievances of his constituents before going into Committee of Supply. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who represented Her Majesty's Government on the Committee, proposed still further to curtail the rights of independent Members by preventing them from making Motions on going into Supply on Thursdays as well as Mondays. In such circumstances, and with the disastrous Resolution of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire in operation, what was to become of the rights of private Members? Her Majesty's Government would have no motive whatever for keeping a House at the Evening Sittings, and without the Government no private Member could do so. Under all the circumstances, and considering the state of the House, he thought it would be improper to come to any determination on the question to-night, and he would, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

MR. GLADSTONE wished to show how the course of Business since 9 o'clock had altered the position in which the House stood. The hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) made a very brief speech—two or three remarks merely—in support of his Motion. When the hon. Member sat down he (Mr. Gladstone) did not rise at once. He thought it his duty to wait until the subject had been discussed; but as no hon. Gentleman offered to address the House, when the Speaker was about to put the Question, he rose and made one or two observations. When he sat down various Members addressed the House, and a great many new points were raised. In the meantime, there was no one on the part of the Government to discharge the duty of speaking to those new points until he was rescued from his difficulty by the Motion of the hon. Member who had just sat down. It was obvious that the Motion of the hon. Member for Chester could not be adopted, and what was really wanted was a preliminary conversational discussion upon each of the propositions which had been placed upon the Paper, which could not be dealt with in set speeches, as the points involved were of a comparatively minute order, and could better be dealt with by a Committee than by the House itself. He had already pointed out that the Motion for adjournment was only one of the methods adopted for obstructing business, and did not touch the chief method. A large portion of the business of Morning Sittings, indeed, nearly all of it which was Government Business, was conducted in Committee; but the Motion of the hon. Member did not touch Committees at all. The analogous Motion in Committees to the Motion for the adjournment of the debate was the Motion to report Progress, or that the Chairman do leave the Chair. The Motion of the hon. Member, therefore, did not touch the peccant part of the proceedings, if there was a peccant part. But the fundamental objection to the Motion was that it assumed that all Motions for adjournment were necessarily factious, which was not the case; and if they were, the only result of carrying this proposal would be that a factious opponent would make his Motion a little earlier, and therefore cut off a little more of the time at the disposal of the House. But there were occasions where a minority were justified in pressing for an adjournment, or where an adjournment was wished for on both sides of the House; but if this Motion were carried—they would be placed in this preposterous position—that where every man in the House wished for an adjournment it would be impossible to adjourn.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

MR. CLAY remarked that it had been felt that the Business of the House had outgrown its forms, and the various Motions which hon. Members proposed to make on the subject must be taken as evidence of an earnest desire for a more practical discharge of Public Business. That being so, it would be rather hard if the discussion was not allowed to proceed, especially as the House was getting more and more full. The Prime Minister had spoken of a Committee as the best place for this discussion, and if the right hon. Gentleman would reappoint one, he would be perfectly content.

LORD JOHN MANNERS pointed out that to refer these questions to a Committee would be nothing more than proceeding in a vicious circle. When the Committee which sat before had reported in favour of certain Resolutions and the subject was brought before the House, when one of those Resolutions was adopted, the Government found that there was so much dispute about the others that they dropped them like a hot potato. And now it was suggested that another Committee should be appointed. But if that were done, any Resolutions that the Committee might adopt would come back to the House, where the greatest opposition would be offered to them; the same forms would be gone through as before, and the Resolutions would be suffered to drop. Only part of the proposal of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) was being discussed; but the very next branch of that proposal would, if adopted, remove some of the objections which had been urged. The former discussion upon the Government proposals had been suddenly terminated, and therefore hon. Members had a right to express their opinions upon the present occasion; and he should have thought that his hon. Friends the Members for Whitehaven and the University of Cambridge would have sustained, instead of attempting to stop this discussion. Their having been for five hours engaged in discussing the Scotch Education Bill was surely no reason why they should not now go on with the present discussion. If that were so, it would be better that there should be an end to the 9 o'clock Sittings altogether. He was surprised that hon. Members who pretended to be vindicators of the rights of private Members should place the matter upon such a footing.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE did not complain of the 2 o'clock Sittings, but contended that after a five hours' debate on an important Government question, the House was by physical laws incapacitated at 9 o'clock from entering into other questions as important. The question was not one between the privileges of private Members or of the Government. The plain common sense was that the House was now neither in numbers, in good humour, nor in serious attention to business capable of discussing the matter before it. Such a subject should be the first Business of the night. The Government ought to give a night for it, and was seriously to blame for the burlesque of to-night through having tried to cram into one Session this and other subjects which there was no time properly to discuss. With a view to the dignity of the House, and in order that their proceedings might be wisely regulated by some of their best heads, and in an ample House, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought that the House violated all the principles of common sense, and all the rules for transacting Business by the way in which important matters were disposed of after 12 o'clock at night. This arose not from their being overcharged with work; it was only an attempt to prevent the action of independent Members. The system of sitting after 12 o'clock at night was framed for the deliberate purpose of carrying out, in spite of the House of Commons, the policy, good, bad, or indifferent, of the Government. Under such circumstances, it was impossible for independent Members to discharge their duty to their constituents. Those who remained after 12 at night were mainly the followers of the Government, or those who had particular interest in some of the Orders of the Day; and the system had never been so illustrated as it had been since the present head of the Government had been in office. No proper reports of their proceedings after 12 at night, were published; and he had intended to move that the editor of one of the journals—say, The Times—should be called to the Bar of the House, because they at that late hour gave what was practically a false report of the proceedings of the House. What was stated was that "the other Orders were disposed of." They knew how admirably the gentlemen of the Gallery discharged their duties; they were not responsible; but still the most important questions were raised, discussed, and decided at those hours when either those gentlemen were away, or when what took place could not be reported. When it was said—"the other Orders of the Day were disposed of," it was deceiving the public. If the newspapers were to say that they could give no report, that would be intelligible. Nothing could be more unconstitutional or inexpedient than their way of doing Business at late hours; and as to the supposition that their legislation, under these circumstances, represented the House of Commons, nothing short of the terms "fraudulent" and "false pretences" could characterize it. The debate had better be adjourned to enable the Government to take the subject into their consideration, and then appoint a time for its consideration when it could be properly discussed.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN said, the House had drifted into a discussion of the subject from not attending to the Rules of the House for the transaction of ordinary Business. The present discussion was in some degree to be attributable to the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman as Chairman of the Committee which had charge of the Report, brought forward one of the Resolutions adopted by that Committee for expediting the Business of the Government; but from that time to this they had never heard one word of the other Resolutions that were agreed to by the Committee, and he suggested that it would be far better for the right hon. Gentleman to bring forward the remainder of the Resolutions, and for the House to discuss them, instead of debating the numerous Motions on the subject that were on the Notice Paper for that night, and also on the Order Book for discussion on some future occasion.

MR. ANDERSON remarked that the fact of these Motions having been placed on the Paper was sufficient to show that the recommendations of the Committee were deemed insufficient, and no wonder they were so, considering how the Committee was constituted. It was a mistake to suppose that Members who had not sat in the House for 20 Sessions were incompetent to give an opinion on the question, especially when it was remembered that the older Members had gained their experience under a state of things which had been entirely changed by the adoption of household suffrage. He, therefore, hoped that if the matter were again referred to a Committee it would not be to the old one.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he thought the right course would have been to have had another Committee to go fully into the whole of that subject of the Business of the House, as was originally proposed at the beginning of the Session by the Government. He hoped that discussion might result in a real effort being made by the House to grapple with the difficulty which was growing upon them every day, and which could only be fairly and satisfactorily met by their having a complete scheme before them, instead of a series of isolated and fragmentary proposals.

MR. MONK said, he should not have pressed his own Motion relating to the Business of the House if the Government had persevered in their proposal to appoint another Committee on that whole subject. Many of the Motions standing on the Notice Paper for that and subsequent nights in reference to this question had never been brought before the Committee of last year, or considered by any previous Committee on the Business of the House. The present Motion for the adjournment of the debate was one really in derogation of the rights of private Members, and he hoped that the House would reject it.

MR. DENMAN looked upon what had passed that night as clearly proving that the proposal made at the commencement of the Session by the Government to send that entire matter before a new Committee was a right one, and that it was unfortunate they should have abandoned it at the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). Notices had been given of very considerable importance, which had never practically been considered by any Select Committee, and he rather thought this was one.

MR. J. LOWTHER ascribed the whole of the difficulty in which they were placed to the extraordinary conduct adopted on that matter by the Government. That movement for the alteration of the Rules of the House had proceeded from the mistaken notion that what was required was more legislation at the hands of Parliament. For the last 40 years, however, the great curse of the country had been not a want, but a surfeit of legislation. The Committee which had sat upon this subject last year might with advantage be re-appointed, in order to more fully consider the whole matter; but he trusted the House would hesitate before it allowed this great question to be dealt with in the piecemeal manner in which it was proposed to trifle with it that night. He hoped the hon. Member (Mr. C. Bentinck) would save the House the trouble of dividing by withdrawing his Motion.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought the present Rules of the House with regard to Public Business worked very well indeed. It had been urged as a reason for not taking Opposed Business after 12 o'clock at night that the speeches of hon. Members were not reported in the newspapers; but he regarded that as an additional reason why Public Business ought to be proceeded with after that hour, because hon. Members would then make speeches to convince the House, instead of to be read by their constituents. He did not approve the Report of the Committee which sat last year to consider this question, because it appeared to him to be made in the interest of the Government and against that of private Members.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought it desirable that the whole question should be re-considered by a fairly constituted Committee.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN submitted that the recommendations of the Committee ought to be considered by the House; and, if they were not adopted, he thought another Committee should be appointed.

MR. LIDDELL said, his experience was that there was always more talking in the Morning and less work in the Evening Sitings. There was no occasion for appointing a Committee on the subject, because there was no information required respecting the conduct of the Business of the House. If the questions were relegated to a Committee, the Report of that body would find them just where they stood at present.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, as an instance of obstruction and delay, said, he had a Bill of his own in Committee on the 20th February, and where it was on that date it stood precisely now. The Government not only possessed the initiative of legislation, but also a power of putting a veto on everything that came up from independent Members, as was witnessed in the progress or want of progress of the University Tests (Dublin) Bill. In his opinion, it was not unreasonable to ask that private Members should be allowed the opportunity of carrying through measures of which they had a special knowledge.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he thought the great fault was with those hon. Members who wanted to ventilate their own opinions, and were much charmed with their peculiar powers of expression. He suggested that the progress of the Business of the House would be greatly facilitated if a rule were adopted that, except in the case of a Minister of the Crown or of an independent Member introducing a question necessarily involving a long statement of facts, the speeches of Members were limited to half-an-hour.

MR. SCOURFIELD remarked that the whole question resolved itself into whether the House meant business or whether they merely meant to let off their superfluous steam. Until that cardinal point was settled they might appoint 50 Committees without any result.

MR. RAIKES said, he could not accept the proposition for adjournment. The Motions which he and other hon. Members had put upon the Paper were intended as Amendments to the Resolutions to be moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but no opportunity for their discussion was given. There had been a general expression of opinion that the old Committee should not be re-appointed, but that a new one should be named; and unless the Government gave a promise that should be done, or that a night should be given for the discussion of the Resolutions now on the Paper, he should take the sense of the House upon his Resolution, in order that hon. Members who came after him might be in no way prejudiced.

MR. VANCE said, that the Government had brought forward one or two of the Resolutions of the Committee which assisted them in the conduct of their own Business, but they had neglected all the other recommendations. He thought it the duty of the Government to bring the other recommendations of the Committee before the House; and, unless they undertook to do so, he should support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DALGLISH observed that it was quite evident when the Committee met that there were certain Members of it who were determined to carry out their pre-conceived opinions. He would suggest, as one way of getting out of the difficulty, that the Speaker should, in consultation with the Clerk at the Table, produce some programme for facilitating the transaction of Business, that this programme should next year be submitted to the House, and the whole or such portions of it adopted as might seem desirable.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Select Committee of last year was composed of Gentlemen of great experience and knowledge who were most entitled, on the whole, to the consideration of the House. They paid great attention to the subject, and made several recommendations. The Government considered those recommendations, and selected four or five which they proposed to the House, every one of which was in accordance with the evidence of the late Speaker and of their most able and experienced Clerk at the Table. The first step which the Government took this Session was to move that the Committee should be re-appointed to consider certain other important matters; but hon. Gentlemen of great weight and influence immediately got up and objected, and as no one rose to defend the proposal of the Government, and a great deal of opposition had been given, it was withdrawn. No sooner, however, did that happen than a number of Gentlemen got up and said they were entirely in favour of the proposal of the Government. Then the Government took a contrary course, and brought forward three propositions which the Committee had agreed to. One of these was with regard to the expulsion of Strangers; but the opinion of the House was so unfavourable that the Government withdrew their proposal, and the consequence was that on an occasion when most hon. Members regretted it—the debate on the Civil List—Strangers were taken notice of, and the reporters were obliged to withdraw. The second Resolution, with regard to Supply, was carried; but the third, which was entirely for the benefit of private Members, giving them time to assemble at the Evening Sittings, was for some reason or other refused. The Government, therefore, did not think it necessary to go further with the question. Of course, it would be easy enough to appoint another Committee; but until the House made up its mind that it could select a Committee to whose opinions it would be prepared to adhere, it would be a mere waste of time to appoint one. The recommendations of the Committee in this instance did not seem to have had much influence with the House, though they were made by men of experience and authority. The Rule as to Opposed Business after half-past 12 had been adopted, but that was supported by independent authority. As to the Business now before the House, it was quite evident that the House was not prepared to go into the question. He thought, therefore, that the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. C. Bentinck) was right in advising the adjournment of the debate until the House had made up its mind, and he should, therefore, certainly vote for the adjournment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 63: Majority 27.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday 18th June.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — CONSOLIDATION STATUTES.
RESOLUTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU wished to know what course the Government intended to adopt with regard to the various Resolutions on the Paper affecting the Business of the House? Would they appoint a Committee, or would they consider the whole subject themselves, and make a proposal to the House upon it? As the Government did not seem inclined to give him an answer, he would move the Resolution which stood on the Paper in his name. Although he agreed with a previous speaker, that it might not be wise to expedite legislative business and promote changes in the law, yet he thought that there could be no difference of opinion with regard to the object of this Motion—namely, to facilitate the passage of Consolidation Bills and to promote the consolidation of the law. A consolidated law was merely an authoritative declaration of the existing law upon any subject. It was true that the existing statutes were contradictory; it was therefore necessary, in every Consolidation Bill, to take only one member of those opposites. As the Standing Orders then were, one of two things always happened—either a Consolidating and Amending Bill was introduced, and it then consisted of some 500 pages, like the Merchant Shipping Bill, and was introduced Session after Session, and always lay like a log in the way, to be ultimately withdrawn; or else, a Bill was introduced with the sole object of amending the existing law, and then the Members of the House who desired to vote intelligently, had to thumb some 20 or 30 conflicting Acts of Parliament, and study until they could make up their minds what was the existing law on the subject. Such Bills were always unduly hindered, or else were passed in ignorance. The Sanitary Bill of this year was an example of that kind. If the present Motion became a Standing Order, the draftsman would in future have to write his Bill with a pair of scissors, choosing out such clauses of existing Acts as he thought proper, and writing between them, in red ink, whatever he thought necessary to explain or amalgamate them. Such a Consolidation Bill could then not be delayed at the second reading, nor on going into Committee; and it would pass rapidly through Committee, as the only Amendments permitted would be to insert, or else substitute, some clauses of existing Acts which the draftsman had thought better to omit. The amending Bill could then be brought in during the same Session, and the House could easily legislate intelligently upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That whenever a Bill for the consolidation of existing Statutes, and containing only Clauses of Acts in force, be on its passage through the House, no Amendment shall be moved at any of its stages except in Committee; and the only Amendments which may then be moved shall be to insert other Clauses of any Acts in force on the same subject, and verbal Amendments rendered necessary by the amalgamation of the Clauses of different Acts."—(Lord Robert Montagu.)

MR. NEWDEGATE believed that the House would not adopt such a Resolution, as by so doing they would simply express distrust of themselves.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that if they adopted the Resolution they would unwisely tie up their hands; and he believed that all attempts to fetter the free action of the House were mischievous, and such a Resolution would be simply making a general law to meet a particular case.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU consented to withdraw the Motion.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN said, that, in his opinion, this question as to the Business of the House was in an unsatisfactory position. He believed that Business might be very much facilitated by proper regulations; and he thought that the recommendations to the Committee should have been discussed. If the Government did not adopt some course, it should surely be open to private Members to do so.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that four of the recommendations of the Committee had already been considered by the House, and there was one which it would be obviously improper for the House to consider, because it dealt with the discretion of Ministers and the Prerogative of the Crown; he referred to the proposal to call Parliament together in November, a proposal to which he was very favourable. The Resolutions which remained were of a secondary character, and if it were thought proper they should be considered with any new suggestions by a fresh Committee, it would be necessary at this period of the Session to postpone the appointment of that Committee until next Session.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

METROPOLIS—QUEEN SQUARE, WESTMINSTER, AND BIRDCAGE WALK.

RESOLUTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it would conduce to the inconvenience of the public if a carriage communication were opened between Queen Square, Westminster, and the Birdcage Walk."

The hon. Gentleman said, he had brought forward the subject on that day week, when the discussion was abruptly cut short by a "count out." His proposal on that former occasion was wider in its scope than the Motion as he now intended to move it. He now limited himself to proposing that a carriage communication should be opened between Queen Square and Birdcage Walk. He would postpone for the present the other part of his original Motion. He hoped the Chief Commissioner of Works would concur in the opinion of his predecessor in office in 1869, and also in the opinion of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, that the improvement might be effected by private subscription. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it would conduce to the convenience of the public if a carriage communication were opened between Queen Square, Westminster, and the Birdcage Walk."—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

MR. AYRTON said, he had not been aware that it was the hon. Gentleman's intention to alter the terms of his Resolution in that way. It was highly inconvenient to adopt one section of a plan at one time, and leave the rest of it till a future day. It was a very serious proposal to make a public thoroughfare from Queen Square to St. James's Street, across St. James's Park, as was suggested by the Motion brought forward by the hon. Member last week. When Lord Llanover first suggested that such a communication might be made it was referred to a Select Committee, and the result was that his Lordship withdrew his original proposition, and prepared a report which condemned the proposal, and which was unanimously adopted by the Committee. From that time to this no one had had the courage to suggest such a scheme to the House of Commons; and furthermore, when Lord Llanover submitted to the House a Vote of money for carrying out a plan interfering with the Park it was rejected by a large majority, and he had to reconsider the proposal he had made. Steps had already been taken by which Members of both Houses of Parliament were enabled to cross the Park from Marlborough Gate to Storey's Gate, and thus to reach Westminster without unnecessary delay, and without impeding the ordinary traffic between Charing Cross and Westminster. The hon. Member, however, proposed to go further, and to enable a public carriage communication to be opened between St. James's Street and Queen Square. If such a communication were to be opened, it would be desirable that it should be by means of a continuation of St. James's Street, through a portion of St. James's Palace, straight across the Park to Queen Square. Were such a road to be on a level with the rest of the Park the enjoyment of the Park by the public would be materially interfered with; if it were carried beneath the Park by means of a tunnel, it would not only be an unpleasant thoroughfare, but it would be very expensive to construct; if it were to run over an embankment the Park would be cut in two by a hideous object, it would be converted into a couple of squares resembling Russell Square, and would be entirely deprived of its present character; and if it were carried over the Park by a handsome and airy viaduct, although the enjoyment of the public would not be interfered with, the cost of such a structure with its approaches, would be nearly £200,000. The first question, therefore, to be decided was, whether the metropolis would undertake the construction of such a structure at such a cost, or whether it was to be made at the expense of the National Exchequer. If once Her Majesty's Government undertook to provide the necessary funds for works which the metropolitan authorities would not construct, pressure would be brought upon them by all the local authorities in the metropolis to execute improvements in other parts of London. Of course, Her Majesty's Government had no right to insist upon the Metropolitan Board of Works executing the work in question. All, therefore, that could be done was to make a carriage way for the use of the inhabitants in the immediate neighbourhood of Queen Square. It could not be made a public thoroughfare, because it would only admit one carriage at a time, leaving a very moderate footway for those who had to enter the Park; and as it would be merely a limited local convenience the inhabitants in the immediate neighbourhood who would profit by it had come forward to bear the expense of making it. But while the grand schemes for making a roadway through St. James's Park, of which the hon. Member for Whitehaven and other hon. Members had given Notice, were under consideration, he did not think it would be right for him to carry out the arrangement. On the understanding, however, that none of those schemes were recognized by what might now be done, he was quite willing to carry out the arrangement.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was surprised the right hon. Gentleman should have spoken to a Motion which was not before the House. To him it was a most extraordinary thing that a work which had been recognized as an improvement and a necessity, and one moreover which would not have entailed any expense upon the Government, should have been delayed for so long a time as it had. He was glad, however, to learn that the work was at last to be carried out. So far as his constituents were concerned they had great reason to complain of the delay. Whatever might be the view of the question as to the approach from Marlborough House to Birdcage Walk, he hoped the Chief Commissioner of Works would see that no further delay took place in carrying out the plan which he had suggested.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that this Session, at all events, he would not renew his proposition for a carriage way across St. James's Park, and he hoped the desire of the inhabitants in the neighbourhood of Queen Square would be accomplished without further delay.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 55: Majority 12.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE, Bill to confirm Provisional Orders under "The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863," and the Acts amending the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE and Mr. BAXTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 185.]

BETTING BILL.

On Motion of Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, Bill to amend the Law relating to Betting, ordered to be brought in by Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, and Mr. BOWRING.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 186.]

JURIES BILL.

Select Committee on the Juries Bill to consist of Seventeen Members:—Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. LOPES, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Mr. RAIKES, Mr. JAMES, Mr. KENNAWAY, Mr. WATKIN WILLIAMS, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Mr. LAWRENCE, Mr. AMPHLETT, Mr. PEASE, Mr. FLOYER, Mr. DENMAN, Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH, Mr. STRAIGHT, and Sir WILFRID LAWSON:—Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 5th June, 1872.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — Trade Partnerships [No. 228].

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Defamation of Private Character * [99]; Queen's Bench (Ireland) Procedure * [126].

Committee—Registration of Borough Voters [15], put off.

Report—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * [158-187].

Withdrawn—Middlesex Registration of Deeds * [52].

REGISTRATION OF BOROUGH VOTERS
BILL—[BILL 15.]

(Mr. Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Whitbread, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Collins, Mr. Henry Robert Brand, Mr. Rathbone.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.'—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

Mr. MATTHEWS, in rising to move "That this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," said, that the Bill proposed to mix up the municipal registration with the Parliamentary registration, which ought to be kept wholly separate from each other; and that the changes which it was proposed to make in Parliamentary registration by it were such as, in his opinion, would be far from improvements upon the present system, and were not likely to be satisfactory to the country. He would remind the House that under the present system the lists were made up roughly by the overseers, who by means of their intimate acquaintance with the rateable premises in their parish, and with the persons whose names were on the rate books, were well acquainted with the qualifications of the individual voters; and that the present law provided against any mistake being made to the prejudice of the voter, for both these lists and the lists of freemen, which were prepared by the proper corporate officer—the town clerk—were then revised by revising barristers, who were so selected as to be quite free from local prejudice and partiality. Although there might have been instances when the revising barristers had failed in discharging their duties satisfactorily, in the main their work had been admirably performed; and precautions might be taken in future to prevent Judges being influenced in making these appointments rather by kind feeling and friendship than by the fitness of those whom they selected to fill them. But under the Bill the persons selected to prepare the "borough list" might be violent partizans, appointed with the view of giving an unfair advantage to one party over their political adversaries, for the Bill proposed the appointment of a new officer, to be called the registrar, who would supersede the persons on whom at present devolved the making the preparatory list. He would also have to exercise a large share of the appellate and judicial authority at present discharged by the revising barristers. He would be empowered to revise the lists in secret, and he would have to affix to them his own judgment on any point raised with reference to the qualification of the several voters, and besides that he was made objector general and notice server, and taxing master as well. The office was to be filled by the clerk to the guardians, or the clerk to the assessment committee, a man not only unqualified to discharge the duties, but whose time was already too much occupied to be able properly to undertake and discharge the additional duties it was proposed by the Bill to cast upon him, for the clerk to the Board of Guardians usually had the whole of his time occupied in conducting the business of his office; and even were he to find time to look after his duties as registrar under the Bill, he would be unfitted for the post, in consequence of his want of that individual knowledge of the voters which the overseers now possessed. The Bill went on to direct that the registrars should make up their lists from materials to be furnished them by the overseers, the very persons who it assumed were incompetent to make them up; and the list of lodgers was to be prepared by information collected by letter-carriers and rate collectors, who were, to say the least, wholly irresponsible persons. How would it be possible, for instance, in a borough like Westminster, where there were 3,000 lodger votes on the register for the registrar to ascertain that the lodgers on the existing list were still qualified? When he came to make out the list, or to know who were qualified to be put on the new list, even with the power to be conferred on him of employing letter-carriers and rate collectors to assist him—thus relying on the worst form or hearsay evidence—an immense expense would be inflicted on the borough for a house-to-house visitation to inquire into the lodger claims. If the registrar were a political partizan the lodgers put on the list would, in all probability, be of one complexion of politics; but the practical result would be that the register for the time being would be taken, and all the names he found there would be transferred to the new list without inquiry. Then, the secret powers to be given to him were most objectionable and wholly unprecedented, and were powers that ought only to be exercised by the revising barrister in his revision Court, for here they had an irresponsible officer giving judicial decisions in private, and they were binding unless an appeal be made, and even in that event no costs were to be given against the registrar, however partial or unsatisfactory his decision might have been. On the other hand, no one could appeal to the revising barrister against the registrar's decision without being liable to pay costs to the registrar, and those costs could be allowed on each ground of objection, so as to swell the expenses to which the objector would be exposed. He believed the real object of the Bill was to substitute the registrar for the revising barrister, and that these discouragements in the way of appeal to the latter were deliberately framed for that purpose; but he doubted whether the House would consent to such a transfer of duties without any security for the fitness of the persons who were to perform them. Again, there was to be no appeal from the revising barrister without giving security for costs, and he might be required to state a case on facts as well as on law. As to the expense of the machinery, overseers and town clerks now supplied preliminary lists gratuitously, though in some cases they were helped by the assistant overseer who was a salaried officer; but under the Bill overseers and town clerks were to be paid for the work, while the registrar was to be paid such sum as the local authorities might think fit, and he was empowered to employ and pay letter-carriers, assistant overseers and others, whose assistance, indeed, he would probably require, especially in the preparation of the lodgers' list. All these expenses were to be charged on the local rates, a fact which he commended to the notice of hon. Members who urged the pressure of local taxation. The Bill also gave large powers to the Home Secretary and the Privy Council to vary the regulations for the conduct of the registrar and to alter the dates of the publication of lists and notices, powers to which he objected, for the provision that that the Orders in Council or the Rules of the Home Secretary should be laid before Parliament was generally a mere form. It might be said that the Bill followed the Report of a Committee of that House; but useful and valuable as that Report might be, it did not hint—at least to any ordinary mind—that judicial powers were to be conferred on the registrar, and the analogy of the Scotch system on which it relied was inadmissible, there being no local official in England of the standing and competency of the valuation assessor in Scotch burghs. The Bill, in short, was an attempt to do that which no machinery was in existence to accomplish. He had received various communications, which showed that the Bill was viewed with dissatisfaction in English boroughs; and admitting that every person qualified should be placed on the register with as little trouble and expense as possible, he deprecated facilities which would be likely to lead to the registration of unqualified persons. In conclusion, he could not say that the present system was perfect; but he did not think the Bill was the best calculated to introduce effective amendments, and should therefore move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Matthews

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he must object to judicial powers being conferred on local officials, who were frequently selected for the purpose of promoting party interests. The Select Committee had argued, indeed, that a responsible position would make them superior to party considerations, but he could not concur in that sanguine expectation. At the election of 1868 in his borough, both the late and the present clerk to the guardians were election agents, and though the Bill might prevent such officials from being agents again, how could they be divested of party bias, or how could the opposite party have confidence in their management of the registration? In fact, he was afraid the Bill would make the election of these officials keen political contests, as involving the control of the borough registration, and that it would likewise augment the cost of registration associations, for the preparation of the list by the registrar, as well as its revision by the barrister, would have to be watched over. Were, however, the registrar appointed by the Government at a sufficient salary, and his impartiality as little open to suspicion as the revising barristers, the Bill might be useful, but the expense of an independent officer being deemed too great, he preferred the retention of the present system. It was true overseers and vestry clerks might be partizans, but their powers were limited, and there being several of them they were probably divided in opinion, whereas the registrar would have larger powers and would belong to a particular party. In conclusion, he must say that he would rather see the present law on the subject maintained, than have it amended as it was now proposed, and for that reason, he would second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Matthews,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, that it was a very great satisfaction to him to find that the person by whom the opposition to the Bill was led was a representative of the sister country, although the measure itself only referred to England. He, however, believed that had the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) devoted his attention to the Bill at an earlier stage of its existence he would have avoided misapprehensions both as to the Bill and the existing law, for with regard to clerks to the guardians, they were already the registrars in Ireland, where the hon. and learned Gentleman's denunciations of them would probably excite some surprise. The Bill was based on the Report of a Committee, for which he (Mr. V. Harcourt) moved in 1869, and which was agreed to without objection, and that Committee reported unanimously in favour of the scheme proposed by this Bill. In 1870 a Bill was drawn by an able draftsman in accordance with that Report; but it was thought desirable that that Bill should not be proceeded with until people in the country had had an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. They were favourable to the Bill, and in 1871 it was read a second time and passed through Committee, and that part of the Bill which the hon. and learned Member had criticized was sifted by the Committee, and was settled by them after a careful discussion. The Bill too had been largely discussed in the country, and he had received numerous deputations from most of the large towns urging him to proceed with it; in fact, only yesterday, the town clerk of Manchester, together with some experienced overseers of Manchester, expressed to him a great desire that the Bill, with some Amendments to be proposed by the hon. Member for Manchester, should pass into a law. They were anxious that it should become law for this reason among others—that it would greatly diminish the cost of registration in that town, for the present mode of making out borough registration lists were most defective. Take the case of a borough containing 18 or 20 parishes. In every parish there was an overseer, who was nominally responsible for making out preliminary lists of persons in his parish entitled to vote; but as a general rule the overseer took no part in making out the list; he neither directed nor oversaw anything at all in the matter, and knew nothing about it. It was the rate collector that made out the preliminary list after communication with the election agents on both sides. The consequence was that the preliminary list contained the names of many persons who ought not to be in it, and also omitted several who had a right to be inserted in it. Hundreds of objections were then sent in, on the chance that the parties objected to would not attend the revising barrister's Court and support their franchise, and thus numerous good votes were struck off at great expense to the parishes and the county, and vexation to the parties concerned. This Bill would remedy another grievance—namely, that relating to the registration of lodgers in the list of borough voters. He should not be surprised if the House doubted it, but he was informed that the number of lodgers on the register was under 5,000, and from having seen the very small number of lodgers on the register in some places, he believed that was a correct representation. The explanation was, that the overseer did not go about from house to house as the rate collector did, and therefore he did not obtain the names of lodgers who ought to be put on the register; but with a view to afford a remedy, the Bill provided that the registrar might employ postmen who were going about the streets all day long to obtain the names of lodgers entitled to be put on the register. Another object they had in view was to combine the municipal with the parliamentary register. At present everyone knew that the municipal register was a farce, and that no one cared anything about it. But if they could combine the two the result would be that they would obtain at once a good Parliamentary and a good municipal register, and at the same time effect a considerable saving. With reference to the person who should be chosen to superintend the registration, the Bill proposed that he should be the clerk of the guardians, as was the case in Ireland and in Scotland, in both of which countries the arrangement worked perfectly well. He cared, however, very little what officer was selected for the work, provided that the duties were concentrated in a single person and not divided among a number. Objection had been taken to the powers proposed to be vested in that officer under the Bill, especially to his proposed power of putting lodgers on the register. Well, but was it not universally admitted—indeed, had he not shown it—that the present condition of the lodger franchise was most unsatisfactory, the fact being that the difficulties of getting on the register as a lodger were so great that very few of them were able to avail themselves of that franchise? That was an evil that could only be remedied by appointing an officer, like the registrar, whose duty it should be to put qualified persons on the register as lodgers, and to keep them there so long as they were entitled to remain. He admitted that one of the main objects of the Bill was to get rid of the expensive form of working the registration by registration associations and election agents, and he was convinced that if they could substitute the Scotch for the English system it would be an immense improvement. In regard to the revising barristers, to whom his hon. Friend had referred in such severe terms, he would say that, though he had not a word to say against them, yet it was well known that the greater part of what they had to do was to correct mere clerical errors that had crept into the preliminary list, and that voters were kept hours, and sometimes days, in Court in order to secure that correction and save their vote. The Bill proposed that the registrar should correct such errors, without compelling the voter to go before the revising barrister for the purpose. There was, however, no intention to arm the registrar with judicial powers in the matter, and if any one was aggrieved by his decision he had his appeal to the revising barrister as now. He admitted, with his hon. and learned Friend, that if there was a strong opposition to the Bill, he, as a private Member, and at that period of the Session, could not hope to see it passed; but he would observe that half the time of the House was allotted to private Members, and the question was, could they not make use of it? If private Members were resolved that they never would allow a private Member's Bill to pass, then the time allotted to them was virtually thrown away. He must repeat that the Bill was based on the recommendation of the Select Committee; that it had passed the second reading and gone through Committee last year; that the alterations then made were now found in it, and that the second reading of it this year had been agreed to unanimously; and he did therefore hope that the House would not now refuse even to go into Committee on it, for if they did it would appear to be almost impossible for a private Member ever to hope to pass a Bill.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought that the Bill was one that ought to be rejected; and, if so, the sooner it was done the better. He confessed that though his experience had not been small, he was unable to understand the measure, the changes it would introduce being so numerous and intricate. He considered that the overseers now did the work fairly and carefully, and that the clerical errors left by them in the list were few; and he strongly objected to the proposal that the clerk of the assessment committee should have the power of correcting the list—of correcting it when he chose—for it did not appear that he was to be liable to any penalties if he failed to do so. [MR. V. HARCOURT: No, no!] Well, however that might be, another objection to the appointment of that officer for such duties was, that a political aspect would in consequence be imparted to the elections of guardians, which would be most undesirable. It would be much wiser, therefore, for the promoters of the Bill, considering that it was much longer and much more difficult than the Ballot Bill, to admit the hopelessness of their being able to pass it that Session, withdraw it, and bring it forward in an improved form next year.

MR. BRISTOWE said, he highly approved of the new system of lodger franchise, which he would do his utmost to facilitate; but where he disliked the Bill was, that it increased the cost to the ratepayers to a very serious extent. Another objection to the Bill was, that it would reduce the cost of registration to intending candidates. It proposed, too, to place excessive authority and power in the hands of persons utterly unfit to discharge the duties—not that the registrar would be unfit himself, but that in vast number of cases where they decided objections they would be thought to exercise a political bias. There could be no doubt also that the appeals from the registrar to the revising barrister would become more numerous under its provisions.

MR. PELL said, that if the Bill did get into Committee, the Amendments sure to be proposed would be fatal to it, and, therefore, it would be better for the House, instead of wasting time, to devote itself to some other and better legislation. He should like to know who wanted the Bill. It was true it had been read a second time, but rather in a perfunctory way, and after a statement by the Home Secretary that the Government would support it, provided Amendments were introduced to make it less unacceptable. He hoped, however, they should never come to the time when those Amendments would be moved. If the Bill were carried, the work of registration would be more embarrassed than ever, for the proper officer was empowered to employ assistants, such as the assistant overseers, and the rate collectors, and even to apply to the Post Office for aid. All that varied assistance would only lead to greater embarrassment. This, he thought, was an attempt to legislate for England in the same terms as Scotland, whereas the position of the two countries was entirely different. The effect of the Bill would be to relieve candidates of expenses at the cost of the ratepayers, and the man who claimed the vote and whose business it was to substantiate his claim of the trouble of doing so. In effecting that, however, it should be borne in mind that there was nothing worth having that was not worth taking some trouble about.

MR. RATHBONE said, he thought it a strong argument in favour of the Bill that it would reduce the expenses of candidates, for one of the great dangers of the day was the evil of Plutocracy, and that was a danger which hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to be as anxious to lessen as those on the Ministerial side of the House. The fact was, this Bill had been introduced in consequence of practical evils felt by the electors. In the town which he had the honour to represent (Liverpool), one of the two parties into which the constituency was divided took, previous to the last election, no fewer than 6,000 objections, principally to the claims of working men, of which only 2,000 could be sustained. Was that a system which could be said to work well, which subjected the electors to such hardships? It was said that the registrar would be a political personage; but that would not be the case, because he was an officer upon whom the eyes of everybody would be fixed, and if he did his work badly it would be known at once by the number of appeals to the revising barrister. In conclusion, he must say he thought that the objections to the Bill were most unsubstantial, and he hoped that the House would assent to the measure being considered in Committee.

MR. WHARTON said, he moved last year in Committee the rejection of the 16th clause, providing for the appointment of a registrar by the corporations, on the ground that he would be a political partizan. To that belief he still adhered. The Bill would increase expense, and on that very ground he was surprised it should have been brought in by an avowed economist like the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt). It was proposed to create double expense, because, in addition to the revising barristers, who by-the-by would be reduced to nonentities, and be paid for doing nothing, there were to be registrars who were to do their work, and there were to be two sets of lists, which at present were not required. In the interests of the ratepayers, therefore, he protested against the Bill.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he must contradict the assertion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, and must maintain that the Bill was in no sense of the word the Bill of the Committee upstairs, and that many of its provisions were directly in the teeth of the feelings and opinions of that Committee. The moment the measure came down to the House it became, by some mysterious manipulation, utterly changed in its character, with the view of placing in the hands of the Town Council the appointment of an officer who, above all others, ought to be kept utterly independent of municipal feelings or opinions.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he thought the Bill contained some very important improvements on the present system, and therefore he was in favour of going into Committee upon it, in order that they might render it as efficient as possible for its objects, and get rid of those provisions which were admittedly objectionable. If it did nothing else, the measure would effect a very large reduction in the expense of registration, which in his mind would be a great advantage to the ratepayers. Under those circumstances, he hoped that the House would never assent to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews), which, if carried, would throw out the Bill altogether.

MR. RAIKES said, he was surprised that no Member of the Government had as yet condescended to express his opinion upon the merits of the Bill. He believed that the Government approved of the measure, and he therefore thought that the House ought to have some explanation from the Ministerial Bench as to their views upon a question of considerable importance before they proceeded farther with the Bill. He hoped that if no Member of the Cabinet was present before the close of the debate the House would show its sense of the course pursued by the Government by refusing to go into Committee upon the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON said, they had already been assured that the Bill was not the Bill recommended by the Select Committee which sat to consider the subject, but that it had been altered in many of its material particulars. The present system certainly had this merit—that it suited all boroughs alike, whether they were large or small; and he was convinced that the system which they were now asked to substitute for that would not suit all boroughs. He thought, therefore, that the sooner they got rid of this Bill the better.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he must express his regret that other and important engagements had prevented the Home Secretary, who had been present during the earlier portion of the debate, from remaining and replying to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Matthews); but he believed that he himself could state the position of the Government with some exactitude. The Bill was brought in last year based upon the recommendations of a Select Committee, and it received considerable attention at the hands of Her Majesty's Government, so that it was hardly fair to suppose that they had not carefully considered it. He strongly repudiated the notion that a measure of that kind should not be brought in by a private Member of the learning and experience of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. The Bill had received the approval of the Government, although they reserved to themselves the right of criticizing its details in Committee, and no one could deny that, at all events, many of its proposals were in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee. If the hon. and learned Member for Oxford proceeded to a division upon the Bill he (Mr. Winterbotham) would support him.

Mr. Rathbone

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that inasmuch as the Government had declined to deal with the question of rating dockyards in accordance with the hope which they had held out to that effect, on the plea that the whole subject, after the result of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) required consideration, it was scarcely fair that they should accede to any proposal which would have the effect of increasing the burden of local rates.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he wished to save the time of the House, and as he had all along recognized the fact that it would be impossible to carry the Bill unless with the assent of both sides of the House, he should not persist in his attempt to carry it further in the face of the strong opposition which it encountered.

MR. SPEAKER said, that before the Bill could be withdrawn, it was necessary that the Amendment should be withdrawn. Would the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan consent to withdraw his Amendment?

MR. MATTHEWS said, he thought the most convenient course would be for his Amendment to be carried.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he did not care which way it was.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Committee put off for three months.

DEFAMATION OF PRIVATE CHARACTER BILL—[BILL 99.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Cross, Mr. Denman.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RAIKES, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the necessity for providing some better protection for private character had only been too largely shown in recent times. He did not wish to refer to any recent incident which had impressed the public with the deficiencies of the law in regard to this matter; but the facts to which he made this passing allusion would be sufficiently fresh in the minds of hon. Members to enable them to appreciate the necessity for providing some more stringent protection against the taking away of private character. The only statutory penalty for a defamatory libel which existed now was one year's imprisonment where the libel was true, and two years' imprisonment where it was not true; in both cases without hard labour. The first object of the present Bill was to accompany those penalties with hard labour at the discretion of the Court before which the offender was convicted. With regard to the even greater offence of endeavouring to practise upon the fears of any person, and to extort money either by the accusation, or by the threat of accusation, of some odious and disgraceful offence, that was at present punished by the very severe penalty of penal servitude for life; but he confessed that, judging from the operation of the law, that penalty did not seem to have a sufficiently deterring effect, and persons had been found willing to run the risk of such a penalty, believing that they were sufficiently protected by the natural fears of their unfortunate victim. Another form of punishment would, perhaps, be more deterrent, and might be tried as an experiment in these particular cases, and he had therefore incorporated in the Bill those clauses which formed the body of an Act passed a few years ago for the better punishment of robbery with violence, and which provided that an offender might be flogged. The House, justly and properly, was always unwilling to resort to severe personal penalties; but it was the law at present that a person who extorted money by the threat of an abominable charge might, if under 16 years of age, be punished by whipping, and no one would consider that an adult offender preying on society in that way was deserving of a less disgraceful punishment than that applied to a juvenile criminal. He therefore merely proposed by the Bill to extend to any person found guilty of extorting money by threats of accusation the penalty which was now inflicted on young persons who did the same thing. The third feature of the Bill was to subject to these penalties any person found guilty of extorting money by a threat to accuse the chastity of a woman, and whatever might be the opinions of hon. Gentlemen with regard to flogging offenders, there would be little difference on this point—that a man who endeavoured to extort money from a woman's fear by threatening to rob her of that character which was of greater value than anything to her deserved a very severe punishment indeed. But he would ask any hon. Gentleman who objected to the flogging clauses of the Bill not to move the rejection of the measure at this stage, but to move the omission of those clauses in Committee. There was one other point to which he wished to call attention. Many gentlemen interested in the operation of the criminal law had noticed that prosecutions for this class of offences only too frequently failed, or were not brought forward at all, from the natural reluctance of the victim to expose himself to the torture of cross-examination on such matters as those which formed the body of the charge. He would have been glad if he could have embodied in the Bill any proposition which would have exempted the prosecutors in these cases from a torture which was so great as practically to defeat the operation of the law; but he felt that if he did so he should encounter an additional opposition, and he had therefore refrained. At the same time, if any other hon. Member proposed such a clause in Committee it would have his support. Hoping, therefore, that any opposition that might be offered to the Bill would be reserved for the Committee, he would conclude by moving the second reading.

Motion made and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Raikes.)

Mr. Raikes

SIR WILFRID LAWSON, on behalf of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), said, that hon. Gentleman intended to oppose the flogging clauses of the Bill; but he did not know that he entertained any objection to the principle of the measure.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he trusted the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) would withdraw the flogging clause in Committee, or, at all events, that the House would pause before it adopted such sensational legislation. It was thought proper to flog garrotters because it was justly considered that acts of brutal violence should receive punishment in kind; but such offences were of a very different kind from those which would come under the Bill. Flogging was a description of punishment which should be reserved for habitual offenders, who were dead to every sort of penalty except that which went home to their physical feelings. By adopting the flogging clauses of the Bill Parliament would run a great chance of brutalizing our criminal code without giving any compensating advantage.

MR. STRAIGHT said, he would also express a hope that the flogging clauses would be withdrawn from the Bill, for he did not see how flogging would be likely to lessen the number of these offences. The other clauses of the Bill were, however, of considerable importance; and, with regard to them, he had often heard the Judges express regret that persons convicted of most objectionable libels could not be sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. He did not hesitate to say that something ought to be done to prevent the repetition of a class of offences, of which there had lately been an instance in one of the metropolitan police courts; and although the 4th clause might require alteration, he hoped the Bill would be read a second time.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he was unwilling, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, to take upon himself the responsibility of opposing the Bill; but he must reserve liberty to oppose it, if necessary, at a later stage. He agreed in much that had been said by the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) with regard to the flogging clauses; and he felt also that there were very grave doubts as to whether the penalty of flogging was applicable simply as a means of increasing the intensity of punishment. The Preamble declared that the law at present was found to be insufficient; but those clauses materially changed its character. The 4th clause seemed to be open to greater objections than had been stated, because it must be remembered that the analogous crimes for which this punishment was now inflicted were criminal offences.

MR. DENMAN said, that although his name was on the back of the Bill, he must not be held responsible for all it contained. He thought its main principle a very good one, believing that there were certain offences, such as those mentioned in the 4th clause, which at present were not regarded with sufficient severity by the law, and that they were of an analogous character to certain other offences now punished very severely, so that there was no reason why the same punishment should not be applied to the analogous crimes. He did not assent to the principle that the punishment of whipping could only be applied to offences of violence. On the contrary, he thought that the infliction of that punishment for such offences might suggest the idea of lex talionis, and he was not sure, when that view was taken, that the brutality they wished to prevent would not be increased. But it was well worthy of the consideration of the House whether whipping might not be advantageously inflicted for offences which were disgraceful, shabby, or morally brutal.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he reflected with gratification that he had induced the House to attach the punishment of whipping to garrotting, for he believed that the result had been most satisfactory. What the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Denman) had said as to the fitness of this punishment would not quite serve as its true test, because the law already punished with flogging very different crimes, such as attempts upon the life of the Queen, and also wilful destruction of works of art. In both cases it had been as successful as in the case of garrotting. There were two points to be considered in attaching any punishment to a crime. First, it should be asked whether the punishment was the one most likely to prevent a repetition of the crime; and the general recommendation of flogging was, that few people were likely to incur that punishment a second time if they could avoid it. It was, moreover, undesirable to multiply needlessly punishments by which a great number of men were maintained at the public expense in prison because they had violated the public interests; and if a more rapid mode of punishment could in every case be found which would be equally effective, great economical advantage would be gained. There was also another consideration as to whether the punishment was suitable to the probable motive of the crime and to the character of the criminal upon whom it was meant to operate; and, in that respect, he would instance the successful manner in which the classes of cases he had before referred to had been treated. A morbid vanity of the lowest description generally led to these crimes, and an equally vulgar castigation by bodily pain was their best deterrent. Whether these rules applied to the offences dealt with by this Bill he had not had time to consider; but he thought the subject might fairly be discussed, and would suggest that the Bill should be considered with the Bill already before the House, proposing to inflict flogging for some other crimes.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he was glad it was understood that, by assenting to the second reading, the House did not commit itself to the provisions of the 3rd clause; but, at the same time, he hoped that the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) would persevere with that clause providing for flogging, and that he would take the sense of the Committee upon it, for he (Mr. Talbot) was of opinion that if flogging were to be inflicted for any crime it should be inflicted for attempts to extort money by odious accusations. It would be only a permissive penalty, to be inflicted at the discretion of Judges of Assize; and he thought they might trust to the Judges of the land, backed by public opinion, not to inflict the penalty except in extreme cases. He believed, also, that the lower classes would be in favour of this penalty.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 2nd July.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION OF DEEDS
BILL—[BILL 52.]

(Mr. Gregory, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Goldney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GREGORY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time, said, it was identical with one introduced by him last year for the abolition of the registration of deeds in Middlesex. His Bill was read a second time last year, and there was an express understanding that the Government would bring in a measure on the same subject this Session. Unfortunately, the Government had been unable to redeem this pledge, and he had, therefore, felt it his duty to re-introduce the Bill. Having explained the provisions of the Bill last Session, there was no occasion to repeat them, and he would conclude by moving the second reading of it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. M'MAHON said, he strongly objected to the Bill, for the reason that the measure would put an end to a system of registration which had existed in Middlesex since 1709, and had been productive of nothing but good. Soon after its introduction here it was adopted in Yorkshire, and subsequently was extended to Ireland, where the titles of estates would, but for its operation, be far more difficult of investigation than they now were. For the last 10 years a good deal had been heard about Land Transfer Acts, and it was understood that a comprehensive measure would be proposed by the Government next year. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member would withdraw this Bill and wait to see what were the proposals of the Government.

MR. R. TORRENS said, he would remind the hon. Member who had just sat down, that there was a marked distinction between the system of registration which existed in Middlesex and that existing in Ireland and Scotland. In Ireland and Scotland registration was treated as notice to every person dealing with the land; but that was not the case in Middlesex, the result being that, notwithstanding the most careful search, purchasers and mortgagees there were not protected in their titles. Having been for many years employed as registrar, he could say that such a system was quite useless, and only added to the cost of conveyancing. He should therefore support the Bill.

MR. A. H. BROWN said, he had in his hand a memorial signed by 209 solicitors in London who deprecated the discontinuance of the registration. He was willing to admit that reforms were necessary, but should certainly oppose abolition. The object should be rather to establish other registries in counties where they did not now exist.

MR. LEEMAN said, he did not think it right that a private Member should bring on a question of this importance, really affecting owners of property not only in Middlesex but in Yorkshire, until the Government had the opportunity of bringing the whole subject before the House and dealing with it generally. He hoped that the hon. proposer of the Bill would withdraw it, and wait for the introduction of a general measure to be brought in by the Government.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, that there was almost a unanimous feeling in Yorkshire in favour of the system of registration; and, in his opinion, an improved system of registration would greatly facilitate the transfer of land. He, therefore, deprecated any measure which would tend to weaken the principle of registration.

MR. DENMAN said, he could testify to the assistance afforded by the Registry of Middlesex in preventing frauds which would otherwise have been triumphant, and in detecting frauds. The Bill, in abolishing that useful system, would also lead to a considerable expenditure of money; and, moreover, its abolition was not in accordance with the intentions of the Commissioners. He also thought the hon. Gentleman who had brought in the Bill must by this time be convinced that it was hopeless to attempt to pass the Bill this Session, and therefore he (Mr. Denman) hoped he would withdraw it, leaving the House to wait for a comprehensive measure on the subject being introduced by either the Government or a private Member. He would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Denman.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

COLONEL BERESFORD opposed the second reading of the Bill.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought the Bill was devised in the interest of certain professional men; but he was very jealous of anything which would in any shape or form destroy the principle of county registration, and he was in favour of a system of county registration in every part of the United Kingdom. He recommended the promoter of the Bill to study the system in operation in Yorkshire and to endeavour to extend it to all other parts of the kingdom. He objected also to the mode in which retiring allowances were provided for.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must oppose the second reading of the Bill on this short ground, that registration was a good thing in itself, but the Bill did not deal with existing abuses. The proper mode of dealing with this question was to keep the good, which was the registration, and get rid of the abuses in the administration of the office. The Bill, moreover, proposed to deal with the question in a crude and unsatisfactory manner, and he would therefore vote against it.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 6th June, 1872.

MINUTES]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, nominated.
PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Baptismal Fees* (128).

Third Reading—Isle of Man Harbours* (83), and passed.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE RESUMED.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, before the Order of the Day is called on, I may be allowed to trespass on your Lordships' attention for one moment. I have received, since the debate of the night before last, a letter from my right hon. Friend Sir Stafford Northcote, one of the Commissioners who negotiated the Treaty of Washington, which, as it involves a matter of personal explanation respecting a statement which had been made by him and referred to in this House, I have been requested to read to your Lordships. It is as follows:—

"88, Harley Street, W., June 5, 1872.

"Dear Lord Derby,—I observe that in your speech in the House of Lords last night you referred to a recent statement of mine with regard to the negotiations at Washington in a manner which shows me that you, as well as many other persons, have misunderstood my meaning.

"It has been supposed—and you seem to have supposed—that I said that an understanding existed between the British and the American negotiators that the claims for Indirect Losses should not be brought forward; and it has been inferred from this that we, relying upon that understanding, were less careful in framing the Treaty than we should otherwise have been.

"This is incorrect. What I said was, that we had represented to our Government that we understood a promise to have been given that no claims for Indirect Losses should be brought forward. In so saying, I referred to the statement voluntarily and formally made by the American Commissioners at the opening of the Conference of the 8th of March, which I, for one, understood to amount to an engagement that the claims in question should not be put forward in the event of a Treaty being agreed on.

"I will not enter into a discussion of the grounds upon which I came to that conclusion; but will simply say that we never for a moment thought of relying upon it, or upon any other matter outside of the Treaty itself. We thought, as I still think, that the language of the Treaty was sufficient, according to the ordinary rules of interpretation, to exclude the claims for Indirect Losses. At all events, we certainly meant to make it so.

"I remain, yours very faithfully,

"STAFFORD H. NORTHCOTE.

"The Earl of Derby.

"Perhaps you will kindly read this in the House of Lords to-morrow."

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, your Lordships will remember that on Monday evening I made a statement as to the position of the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States. It was to this effect—that we were in active communication with the American Government, but that there was one portion of the Supplemental Article—of which your Lordships were already somewhat irregularly in possession—as to which there was no difference of opinion, and that the only difference which existed was with regard to the wording of the engagement which would bind the two parties in the future. During the debate on Tuesday that portion of the discussion which had reference to the misunderstanding involved in the statements made in the American Case turned in a very great degree on that part of the Supplemental Article which it was thought by many of your Lordships — though quite contrary to the opinion of Her Majesty's Government—to be insufficient for the purpose. That being the case, I cannot help feeling, though entirely disagreeing from noble Lords, that some of them spoke with so much authority as would necessarily excite some anxiety on the part of the public of this country. I therefore took the opportunity of a conversation with the American Minister to ask him whether he still retained the opinion which he and I had always had as to the effect and sufficiency of this particular part of the Article. I am glad to find that he agrees with me: but I am perfectly aware that, though your Lordships might be perfectly satisfied with my report of an incidental conversation with the United States Minister, he might not be supposed himself to have sufficient authority to make any explanation on the subject. I am, therefore, very glad indeed to have received a letter from him, which, with your Lordships' permission, I will now read—“ Legation of the United States, “ London, June 6, 1872.

“ My Lord,—In the conversation we had yesterday, and which was resumed this morning, you stated to me that Her Majesty's Government have always thought the language proposed by them in the draft Article as it stands sufficient for the purpose of removing and putting an end to all demands on the part of the United States in respect to those Indirect Claims which they put forth in their Case at Geneva, and to the admissibility of which Her Majesty's Government have objected; but that there were those who doubted whether the terms used were explicit enough to make that perfectly clear, and to prevent those same claims from being put forward again. I concurred with you in your view as to the sufficiency of the language used in that clause of the proposed Article, and which the Government of the United States had accepted; and I repelled the idea that anybody should think it possible that the Government of the United States, if they should yield those claims for a consideration in a settlement between the two countries, would seek to bring them up in the future, or would insist that they were still before the Arbitrators for their consideration.

Earl Granville

“ I am now authorized in a telegraphic despatch received to-day from Mr. Fish to say that the Government of the United States regards the new rule contained in the proposed Article as the consideration for and to be accepted as a final settlement of the three classes of the Indirect Claims put forth in the Case of the United States to which the Government of Great Britain have objected.—I have, &c., “ ROBERT C. SCHENCK.

“ Right Hon. Earl Granville.”

My Lords, I read this letter for the purpose of giving satisfaction to those of your Lordships who were disquieted as to the sufficiency of the Article. I think it shows also that we have not been such dupes as some had supposed; and, further, I think it is an honourable testimony to the straightforward manner in which the United States are conducting these negotiations. I beg at the same time to say that it is not an Article yet agreed upon; it is proposed—but it is impossible for me, under the difficulty of the present circumstances, to give any positive assurance as to the manner in which the negotiations may still tend.

Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the Earl Russell's motion, viz.,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the arbitrators appointed to meet at Geneva pursuant to the Treaty of Washington be suspended until the claims included in the Case submitted on behalf of the United States and understood on the part of Her Majesty not to be within the province of the arbitrators have been withdrawn, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose, and was about to resume the debate, when—

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I rise to a point of Order. I think, after the announcement that has been made by the noble Earl the representative of the Government in this House, although, on the one hand, matters seem undoubtedly to have a satisfactory appearance, and I sincerely hope that appearance may be borne out by the results, still, on the other hand, it is an announcement which places us in a position of some difficulty; because it calls upon us practically to decide the question whether we desire this debate to be continued and the opinion of the House to be taken on the matter in dispute:—it calls upon us practically to decide that question at a moment's notice, and upon the faith of an announcement which we have only heard read, and which we have not had an opportunity of deliberately considering. At the same time, I do not hesitate to say that, in my own view and that of my friends, the statement which has been made by the American Minister, and made, as I understand, by the express authorization of his Government, does place the matter in a position considerably different from that which it occupied on the last occasion of our meeting. I confess, for my own part, that I think—and I believe this is the feeling of many on both sides of the House—that there is strong reason to doubt whether the Supplemental Article would have the effect which, I cannot doubt, it is the intention of the Government it should have—namely, to withdraw, put an end to, and set at rest those Indirect Claims. The matter has now passed into a new stage, and although it is for the noble Earl who originated this Resolution (Earl Russell) to say what course he intends to take with regard to it, still I think it a very grave question whether, under these altered circumstances, it would be advisable to go to a division. If we did, it might give an appearance of disunion and difference of opinion upon a matter where obviously it is the interest of this House and the country—and I am sure that it is the desire of all of us—that we should, if possible, be united. If, as appears probable, this debate is not followed up to a division—if the matter rests where it now stands—we, of course, do not in any way waive our right to weigh, examine, and criticize with that care which is eminently necessary in a matter of so grave importance the language of the Supplemental Article.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I think we are placed in rather difficult circumstances. In the absence of my noble Friend who made the Motion (Earl Russell), I am not aware that any of us possesses authority to take any positive course in the matter. I cannot help thinking that in the absence of my noble Friend the best course would be to adjourn this debate. ["Hear, hear!"] I certainly concur in the opinion expressed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), that a great change has been brought about in the position of affairs by the announcement which has just been made by my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I wish to point out that we only have the assurance in the language of a Note not yet before the House, and which, therefore, I will not attempt to criticize, of one half the Executive of the United States. It must, therefore, be understood that in any course we may take we reserve to ourselves full power of action in case the other half of the treaty-making power does not prove to be in full accord with what now appears to be the opinion of Mr. Fish.

EARL GRANVILLE: Of course in that event the Supplemental Article would be useless.

In the meanwhile Earl RUSSELL had entered the House, and Earl GRANVILLE handed to him the Letter of the United States Minister. Having perused the Letter, and after conference with Lord CAIRNS—

EARL RUSSELL said: My Lords, I am very glad the Minister of the United States has made the declaration of which my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has given me a copy. I think the Indirect Claims are withdrawn by it. ["No, no!"] I therefore propose that your Lordships should not continue the debate on the Motion I have made: but of course I reserve to myself the right of bringing it forward again, if necessary, on a future occasion.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I wish to express my acknowledgments to my noble Friend: but, at the same time, in order to avoid misconception, to say that the Indirect Claims are not withdrawn, because that portion of the Article is conditional on the rest of the Article being agreed to.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, I think the understanding of your Lordships is that the Government of the United States, or Mr. Fish, and Her Majesty's Government are quite in accord on this point—that if the other questions which are pending with respect to this Article are adjusted, the Article is to be taken as a final and complete settlement of the three classes of Indirect Claims, which are no more in any shape or at any time to appear. Of course, when the matter comes to be put in the shape of an elaborate Treaty before the Senate, that body may express dissatisfaction or dissent from that form. Then would be the time to assert the right which the noble Earl reserves to himself to express—an opinion as to whether the final Treaty has a less complete effect than has been stated.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Will the noble Earl (Earl Granville) tell us what are the three classes of Indirect Claims that are referred to in the letter of General Schenck? In the American Case they stand as follows:—First, for loss by the transfer of the mercantile marine to the English flag; second, for the enhanced premiums for marine insurance; third, for the prolongation of the war; fourth, for the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war.

EARL GRANVILLE: The last two are taken as one.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, I think it would be better to adjourn the debate till to-morrow or Monday rather than finally to withdraw the Motion. I do not see what possible objection there can be to the course I propose.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I venture to say that I entirely differ from my noble Friend who has just made his suggestion. There is one reason—one cogent reason I think—why it is better to accept that proposition of the noble Earl whose Motion is before us, and it is this—that if the debate were only adjourned we should not have the advantage, were it ever resumed, of again hearing the noble Lords who have already spoken.

EARL GRANVILLE: I entirely agree with my noble Friend the noble Duke; but I think it is possible that the readiness of noble Lords opposite to accede to the withdrawal of the Resolution may be attributed to the fact that they have had the advantage of the long legal speech of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns), and of some remarks, mixed up with kind and useful advice to the Government, from another noble and learned Lord (Lord Westbury), while both of those noble and learned

Lord Cairns

Lords are unanswered by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870.

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

M. Salisbury.	L. Brodrick.
E. Portsmouth.	L. Somerhill.
E. Belmore.	L. Wenlock.
E. Bandon.	L. Lurgan.
E. Kimberley.	L. Chelmsford.
E. Dartrey.	L. Meredyth.
V. Lifford.	L. Greville.
L. Steward.	L. Kildare.
L. Digby.

And, on Friday, June 7, The Earl of Longford and The Earl of Charlemont added.

BAPTISMAL FEES BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to render it unlawful to demand any fee or reward for the celebration of the sacrament of Baptism, or the registry thereof—Was presented by The Lord Bishop of WINCHESTER; read 1st. (No. 128.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 6th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—John Morgan Cobbett, esquire, for Oldham.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension * [183]; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental * [185].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Pawnbrokers * [173].

Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.P.

Committee—Report—River and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) (re-comm.) * [158].

Third Reading—Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) and Act (No. 2, 1864) Amendment * [163]; Alteration of Boundaries of Dioceses * [170], and passed.

IRELAND—LANDED PROPRIETORS.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland questions relative to the "Return relating to Landed Proprietors" (Ireland) recently presented to the House; What is to be considered as constituting residence; whether he considers the Returns in columns 3, 4, and 5 as to residence "Elsewhere in Ireland" "usually out of Ireland," and "Rarely or never resident in Ireland," to be reliable, and capable of any proof; in column 6, relating to "Public or Charitable Institutions or Public Companies," whether the estates of Trinity College, Dublin, of the Bishops, Deans, and Chapters of the late Church of Ireland are included; and, whether the estates of those of the London Companies in the county of Londonderry in which the chief beneficial interest has been sold or leased to private individuals are also included?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, with regard to the first part of the Question, he would best satisfy his hon. Friend by laying upon the Table a copy of the instructions sent to the Poor Law Inspectors, and if the hon. Baronet would move to that effect he should be happy to produce it. With respect to the second part of the Question, the Inspectors had great facilities for obtaining accurate information, and he had no reason to doubt that they exercised due care and diligence in the matter. The properties referred to in column 6 were, as far as he had been able to ascertain, included in the nominal list. As to the estates of the London Companies, where those Companies were represented in the valuation lists as owners, they were included in the Return. With regard to such of the properties, however, as were sold in perpetuity or at small chief rents, and where the names of the Companies did not appear in the valuation lists in connection with them, the names of the proprietors to whom they were sold appeared in the nominal list.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, VIENNA, 1873.—QUESTION.

MR. BOWRING asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission for the promotion of the International Exhibition to be held at Vienna in 1873, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to propose to Parliament the grant of such a moderate sum of money (to be expended upon the responsibility of the Commissioners) as may be sufficient, with the assistance expected to be voluntarily rendered by British Manufacturers, to insure an adequate representation of the products of British industry at that exhibition? He wished to add that he had been informed that the French Government—and, indeed, almost every Government in Europe—had made grants for a similar purpose.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my hon. Friend has the advantage of me, for I have no information as to the action of other Governments. There is a precedent which may be considered in point, that of the French Exhibition of 1867, when we did give no less a sum than £116,000. That was a very serious matter, and I hope my hon. Friend will excuse me if I say that the Government has not made up its mind on the subject, and I can, therefore, give no answer at present.

IRELAND—CUSTOMS CLERKS AT DUBLIN.—QUESTIONS.

MR. PIM asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the improved scale for the salaries of the Dublin Customs Clerks will be issued, the London Customs classification having been finally settled by Treasury Minutes of 8th of March and 8th of May; and, whether the new scale of salaries will be retrospective from the 1st of April, 1869, as in the case of the Customs Clerks in London; and, if so, when the arrears will be paid?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, since the final settlement of the new classification for the London Custom House, the Treasury has had under consideration the case of Liverpool, and the proposed scale for that port will be issued in a few days. No Report has yet been received on the Dublin establishment, and therefore I am not yet in a position to answer the Questions of my hon. Friend.

PAROCHIAL REGISTERS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. PIM asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the Government have considered respecting the Parochial Registers formerly kept by the Clergy of the late Established Church in Ireland, but which being now under no care or guardianship, are rapidly being lost or destroyed; and, whether they are prepared to take any and what means for the preservation and future custody of these important records?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, in reply, that the matter had for some time been and still was under the consideration of the Irish Government. Several communications had been received from the Church representative body on the subject. He did not think his hon. Friend was right in stating that there had been any serious loss or destruction of these documents, though the remark might, perhaps, apply to some remote parishes.

POLICE—CRUELTY TO ANIMALS—THE 12TH AND 13TH VICT.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the police constables on duty have distinct orders to take into custody persons offending against the second Clause of the Act 12 & 13 Vic. called an Act for the more effectual prevention of Cruelty to Animals; and, whether he will give instructions to the Chief Commissioner of Police to see that they are more active in carrying out the provisions of the said Act?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, the orders of the police, on which they have always acted, have been in all cases of serious cruelty to animals to apprehend the offenders, and in less serious cases to summon them. My hon. Friend seems to think that there has been a falling off in diligence on the part of the police of late years; but the statistics of the last three years will show that such has not been the case. In 1869 the number of persons apprehended was 487; of persons summoned, 96—total, 583; in 1870 the number apprehended was 463; summoned, 101—total, 564; in 1871 the number apprehended was 650; summoned, 90—total, 740. That shows that there is no want of diligence on the part of the police. The magistrates have not power to order the destruction of animals brought before them in a bad state. I cannot say, without further consideration, that it would be wise or expedient to undertake additional legislation on the subject.

TICHBORNE v. LUSHINGTON—PROSECUTION OF THE "CLAIMANT" FOR PERJURY.—QUESTION.

MR. J. D. LEWIS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is any foundation for the report that the Treasury has refused to allow the expenses of any witnesses required from abroad in support of the prosecution against the person styling himself Sir Roger Tichborne?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, this is one of four Questions on the Paper upon this subject. I cannot pretend to be surprised that hon. Gentlemen who placed these Questions on the Paper should feel so great an interest in the matter. But another question arises, and a very serious and important question—namely, how far it is desirable that this House should be made the theatre of discussion as to the preliminary arrangements for the trial. The Government have seriously considered this subject, and I have now to state, with every respect for the Gentlemen who have put down these Questions, and without at all questioning their right to do so, that Her Majesty's Government mean to consult the interests of the public by declining to answer these Questions.

Afterwards—

MR. WHALLEY said, that as he could not acquiesce in the views just expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to this case he was desirous of eliciting a reply from Mr. Attorney General; because if the hon. and learned Gentleman should refuse to give the information required he should call attention to the subject to-morrow evening on the Motion for going into Supply. He would therefore ask Mr. Attorney General, with reference to the Tichborne case, Whether, assuming the evidence as to the tattoo marks is reliable, it is necessary to incur the delay and cost of bringing witnesses from Chili and Australia; and, whether, in advising the Government to pay the costs of this prosecution, consideration was given to the allegation that this tattoo evidence was known to members of the family at the time that the offence of perjury was committed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Concurring as I do most entirely in the views which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has lately expressed, I trust the hon. Gentleman and the House will excuse me if I follow my right hon. Friend's example.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has received from Dr. William Massey Wheeler, late surgeon of the Victorian Exploring Expedition, a statement respecting his knowledge of Arthur Orton, whom the claimant to the Tichborne Estates is alleged to be; and, whether in consequence of the facts therein stated he will direct the said Dr. Wheeler to be examined by the Treasury Solicitor before any further expenditure of the Public Money is incurred in connection with the contemplated criminal prosecution?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that for the reasons he had already given he must decline to answer the Question.

LOCAL TAXATION—THE RESOLUTION. QUESTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government have determined on the course they intend to take with reference to the opinion expressed by the House on the subject of Local Taxation on the 16th of April last; and, if so, when he will be prepared to announce the result of their deliberations?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Motion which the hon. Baronet prevailed upon the House to pass by very considerable majority embraces matter of a very great importance, and it was supported by him in a speech of great length, and, if he will accept a tribute from me, of great ability. But, important as was the Motion, and extended as was the statement, there are, in the opinion of the Government, many other matters inseparably associated with the points to which the hon. Baronet called the attention of the House, and embodied in his Motion. The Government will not make any announcement of its policy with respect to the points embraced in the Motion—I will not say till they have considered them, for that they have to a great extent done, but until they see an opportunity of calling the attention of the House in an effectual manner to those other collateral matters which they think inseparably connected with the subject raised by the hon. Baronet.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS—CRICKHOWELL UNION.—QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he would state to the House why the guardians of Crickhowell Union have not been relieved from the cost of maintaining John Gwynne, a criminal lunatic in Broadmoor Asylum, whose friends are incapable of defraying the cost of his maintenance, inasmuch as the guardians of Wells Union have been relieved from a similar charge?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, the cases to which the question referred were not analogous. In the one the lunatic was sentenced to penal servitude for life; in the other no sentence of penal servitude had been passed. By the law, therefore, the duty of supporting the lunatic in the latter case was cast upon the Union, and he saw no reason to relieve it.

TERMINABLE ANNUITIES, 29 VICT. C. 5. QUESTION.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he concurs in the opinion expressed by the Solicitor General on Thursday last, in answer to a Question, that it is not accurate to say that £7,000,000 have been converted into a Terminable Annuity under section 4 of the Act 29 Vic. c. 5, the conversion having been made to the extent of £5,000,000 under section 1, and to the extent of the balance only under section 4; and, if he concurs in the opinion expressed by the Solicitor General, if he would be so good as to explain who is responsible for the erroneous statement in the Finance Accounts for 1870-71, page 55, that £7,000,000 was cancelled in exchange for a Terminable Annuity, per Act 29 Vic. c. 5, s. 4?

MR. BAXTER: Perhaps, Sir, it will be most satisfactory to my hon. Friend if I inform him exactly what has occurred. The Act 29 Vict. c. 5, empowered the Treasury (section 1) to cancel any amount they think fit of Stock held on account of savings banks not exceeding £2,500,000, and it empowered them to cancel a like amount of Stock held on account of Post Office savings banks, or £5,000,000 in all, and to substitute Terminable Annuities for the Stock so cancelled. In virtue of the power so conferred, the Treasury by warrant dated the 15th of February, 1867, cancelled £2,500,000 of Stock standing in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of Post Office savings banks; and by warrant dated the 24th of May, 1867, they cancelled £2,500,000 of Stock standing in the same names on account of savings banks. Further, the Act by section 4 empowers the Treasury from time to time, when they consider it advantageous for the public service, to cancel such further amounts of capital Stocks held by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt for Post Office savings banks, as they shall consider expedient, substituting Terminable Annuities for such capital Stocks. In virtue of the power thus conferred upon them, the Treasury by warrant dated the 19th of May, 1870, cancelled £7,000,000 of Stock standing in the name of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of Post Office savings banks, and substituted Terminable Annuities for the amount so cancelled. The statement in the Financial Accounts is therefore correct.

ARMY—APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS—THE ROYAL WARRANT.

QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Warrants regulating the first appointments and promotion of officers in the Engineers, Artillery, and Household Brigade will be published; and, whether any further regulations are to be issued with regard to promotion in the Militia; and how soon they may be expected to appear?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Royal Warrant with regard to the Artillery and the Engineers has been sent for the consideration of the Treasury. As soon as it is returned it will be submitted for the sanction of Her Majesty, and after receiving that sanction it will be published. The Warrant with regard to the Household Brigade is ready, but has not yet been sent for the consideration of the Treasury. It is about to be so sent, and will be there treated in the same way that I have mentioned in reference to the other Warrant. The Warrants with regard to the Militia have been already published.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Are there any further regulations to be published?

MR. CARDWELL: The further regulations have been published already.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Indirect Claims do not still form a part of the American Case to be presented at Geneva; and, if so, if he would inform the House how the assurance of the President,

"That he will make no claim on the part of the United States in respect of indirect losses as aforesaid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva," can bar the Arbitrators from recognizing the Indirect Claims as part of the Case presented to them, and from even possibly adjudicating upon such Claims?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, that I can give an answer to the hon. Gentleman's Question which will be most satisfactory if I refrain from following the argument which his Question contains. If, however, he is not satisfied with the answer which I shall give I will, on his signifying the fact to me, take care to take up the line of argument. I think, however, my answer will do away with the necessity for any such course. The purport of the Question of the hon. Gentleman is quite obvious, and forms the subject of an inquiry very proper to be addressed to Her Majesty's Government. His meaning evidently is that the words he has quoted as the assurance of the President, namely—

"That he will make no claim on the part of the United States in respect of indirect losses as aforesaid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva,"

—are insufficient to procure the practical abrogation and extinction of the Indirect Claims. I do not use the word "withdrawal," because, as I have before ventured to observe, it appears to me that if we go upon the question of mere verbal criticism the word "withdrawal" is quite as open to such criticism as any other word that could be applied to the Indirect Claims included in the Case submitted by the American Government. I am not aware of any power provided under the Treaty by which that Case, or any part of it can, in technical accuracy, be withdrawn; but I think I perfectly understand the meaning of the hon. Member. I understand him to conceive that the words embodied in the Supplemental Article do not secure the final extinction for all practical purposes of the Indirect Claims, or that there shall be no proceeding taken or any award given upon them. Since I spoke on a recent day I have received the highest authority for giving this assurance—an assurance, be it observed, which is entirely contingent upon the conclusion of the Supplemental Treaty, because the American Government do not recede from their contention with respect to the meaning of the original Article—that the United States Government regards the new rule contained in the proposed Article, if it shall be agreed upon, as the consideration to be accepted as a final settlement of the three classes of the Indirect Claims which were put forth in the United States Case, and to which Her Majesty's Government have objected.

Mr. Baster

FRANCE—QUARANTINE IN FRENCH PORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Why all sailing vessels, yachts included, are subjected to quarantine on entering any French Ports unless provided with a clean Bill of health, while steamers are permitted to land their passengers without any restriction; and, whether any remonstrance has been made to the French Government on the subject of this regulation?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I am glad, Sir, to be able to inform my hon. Friend that by a notice in the French Journal Officiel of yesterday's date vessels coming from the British Isles will no longer be required to produce a Bill of health in the Channel and Atlantic ports of France. This applies equally to all craft.

METROPOLIS — COMMUNICATION BETWEEN QUEEN SQUARE AND BIRDCAGE WALK.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the Chief Commissioner of Works, Upon what conditions, and subject to what restrictions, Her Majesty's Government will carry into effect the pledge given in 1869 by the Office of Works, and recently renewed, to open a carriage communication between Queen Square and Birdcage Walk?

MR. AYRTON said, it was his wish that the arrangement referred to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman should be carried out. The arrangement was that the few persons who desired this communication should, at their own expense, construct the necessary road and pay the gatekeeper. As soon and as long as they did this the roadway should be kept open to be used for the limited purpose for which Birdcage Walk was at present used.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked if he was to understand that a gatekeeper, who was the servant of Her Majesty, should be paid by Her Majesty's subjects?

MR. AYRTON: The gatekeeper will be engaged by the Office of Works. The question is, whether all Her Majesty's subjects should pay his wages or whether he should be paid by the particular subjects who desire and would alone benefit by his services?

PARLIAMENT — REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What steps, if any, he proposes to take to bring under the consideration of the House those recommendations of the Select Committee on Public Business which have not as yet been submitted to its judgment; and, whether in case he does not think it desirable to take any further steps in this matter, he will object to the appointment of a Select Committee to reconsider the Rules of the House regarding the transaction of Public Business?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, at that period of the Session, and with the state of feeling on the subject which existed in the House, the Government would not be prepared to take that course.

ARMY—COMMISSIONS—UNIVERSITY CANDIDATES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has yet drawn up any Regulations with respect to the manner of selection of candidates from the Universities for commissions in the Army; and, if he has done so, whether he has any objection to state the substance of them?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, that the Regulations had been drawn up, and he had sent a copy of them to the hon. Member, who would therefore excuse him from reading them.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked whether there would be any objection to lay the Regulations on the Table?

MR. CARDWELL: No.

PERSIA—FOREIGN JURISDICTION ACT.
QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it has been decided that the Foreign Jurisdiction Act can be put in force in Persia?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: It has been decided, Sir, that the Foreign Jurisdiction Act can be put in force in Persia, and Sir Philip Francis, Her Majesty's Consul General and Judge in the British Consulate Court at Constantinople, has been instructed to place himself in communication with Colonel Pelly, the British Resident at Muscat, with the view of framing an Order in Council and the rules necessary for giving effect to the Jurisdiction Act, founded on the Levant Rules. As, however, the Levant Rules are now in course of revision, Sir Philip Francis will probably delay framing Rules for Persia until the revision of the Levant Rules is completed.

LOCAL TAXATION.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT asked, Whether it was the intention of the Government to deal with the subject of Local Taxation during the present Session?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that although the Government fully recognized the importance of the subject, it was not their intention to bring forward any measure dealing with it during the present Session.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
RESOLUTION (Viscount Bury).

QUESTION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: I wish to put a Question to the noble Viscount (Viscount Bury), of which I have given him private Notice—namely, as to what course he intends to pursue to-morrow with reference to the Notice of Motion he has given for that day relative to the Treaty of Washington?

VISCOUNT BURY: I am obliged to my hon. Friend the Member for West Kent for giving me an opportunity of stating the course which I propose to adopt with regard to my Motion which stands on the Paper for to-morrow; and especially after the announcement that has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, I think it would be for the convenience of the House if I terminated my answer with a Motion. The right hon. Gentleman himself can hardly be surprised at that course, because the Motion which I have on the Paper is identical with that which is now being debated in "another place," and that Motion has been declared by the Leader of the House of Lords to be a Vote of Censure. It was not my intention—and I said so at the time—to convey any censure on Her Majesty's Government by my Motion; and I feel satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman himself does not view it in that light, for if he did it would have been in accordance with Parliamentary precedent, and I am sure in accordance also with his own feeling, to hasten to give a day for its discussion. But, as such has not been the case, I can only conclude that he accepts the construction which I myself put on that Motion, and does not regard it as a Vote of Censure. But the question arises whether or not it would be advisable to discuss the matter at this time; and I firmly believe that it would be for the advantage and the dignity of this House to enter upon that discussion. However, it is perfectly true that a private Member finds it very difficult to bring on a Motion like that which stands in my name for to-morrow unless it is facilitated by the Government, which the Prime Minister finds it quite impossible to do. As the Motion, from its position on the Paper, cannot come on to-morrow, I shall reserve to myself the right of acting according to circumstances, and of bringing it on at some other time, if the House considers it necessary that it should be done. But will the House allow me to ask the right hon. Gentleman for a little additional explanation of the statement which he just now made to us? I understood him to say that the acceptance by the American Government of the Supplemental Article in satisfaction of the Indirect Claims was contingent upon something else that we were to do. I would ask the House to remember for a moment the position in which we now stand. All the voluminous Papers that are on the Table of this House are so much waste paper save for the purpose of reference, except the Supplemental Treaty lately laid before us. This country, we are all agreed, has decided that the Indirect Claims shall not be urged at Geneva, and the only question that we have to decide is, whether the Supplemental Treaty that is now before the House does or does not bar those Claims. We must revert to the last time when we touched firm ground in this discussion. That was on the 3rd of February, 1872, when Earl Granville addressed to General Schenck a communication, in which he said that, under no circumstances, would we discuss the Indirect Claims. Mr. Fish immediately replied that if he had known that the Indirect Claims were barred, the President would not have entered at all into the negotiation.

MR. SPEAKER called the noble Lord to Order. It was not consistent with the Rules of the House for the noble Lord to discuss a Motion which stood on the Paper in his name for to-morrow.

VISCOUNT BURY: I will entirely desist from making the remarks which I was about to offer, and shall conclude by moving that the House do now adjourn; but, in doing so, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman to state whether we are to depend upon the text of the Supplemental Article, or are to depend upon some gloss outside of that Article for our security that the Indirect Claims will not be pressed at Geneva. If we are to depend upon something outside of the Treaty, then it will affect the course which I, for one, shall feel it my duty to take on the Resolution that I have placed on the Notice Paper.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."—
(Viscount Bury.)

MR. OSBORNE: I do not rise to take any advantage of the Motion for the adjournment of the House, because I look upon the answer given by the Prime Minister as being, as far as it went, satisfactory. But I only wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman this question—whether, in accordance with his answer, there will be any postponement of the meeting of the Arbitrators, fixed for the 15th instant; and, if so, to what date?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is only necessary for me to say a very few words, after the becoming and considerate manner in which the noble Lord has contracted the course and scope of his remarks. I would just make one observation on what the noble Lord said about the construction to be put on his Motion, because I do not wish to be held bound even by silence to the doctrine that every Motion to be made in this House which the Government may regard as involving a Vote of Censure is therefore to receive precedence of all other business, and is to be made the subject of immediate discussion. There are various qualifications to be attached to that doctrine—qualifications according to the circumstances of the case; qualifications according, also, to the intention of the Member by whom the Motion is made; qualifications according to the support which that Motion receives from large portions of the House; and, finally, let me add, qualifications according to the bearing of the Motion upon the public interests at the time. Because it is perfectly conceivable that a vote might be moved, not like that of my noble Friend, to which he disclaims attaching the character of a Vote of Censure, but one intentionally carrying the character of a Vote of Censure, and which might receive considerable support, but for the immediate discussion of which, nevertheless, it might be contrary to the duty of the Government to give extraordinary means, if in their conviction and knowledge it was likely to be injurious to great public interests. But I will answer the question of my noble Friend in a manner as distinct as possible. He asks, are we to depend for the exclusion or the extinction of the Indirect Claims—although I do not dwell on any word, that is, perhaps, as good a word as one could find—are we to depend for the extinction of the Indirect Claims upon the words of the Supplemental Article, or upon some gloss extraneous to the Article itself, and put upon it by the parties? Our answer to that is as follows:—Always bearing in mind that the Supplemental Treaty is not yet adopted or decided on in all its parts, the words of the Supplemental Article—I mean those words in the closing clause which bear on the treatment of the Indirect Claims—are in our view perfectly sufficient for their purpose. We are supported in that view by those upon whom we are accustomed to rely for the construction of legal and formal documents. But as there have been some who have thought that they were not sufficient for the purpose—it was material, while we are considering the matter, that we should apprise the House that the very same view is taken by the other party in the case as is taken by us with regard to the effect of those words. In speaking on a former occasion, wishing to observe the rules of caution, and on no account to lead the House on to ground that might not be perfectly safe, we spoke of what we had reason to believe. I can now go beyond that. We know, and are assured from the highest authority, not merely from the representative of the American Government in this country, but from the American Government itself, that such is the case in the words which I have referred to; and these words being perfectly clear it is not necessary that I should repeat them. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) has likewise asked me whether the postponement of the meeting of the Arbitrators from the 15th of June has been agreed upon, and if so, to what date? I am not able to say, at this moment, that such a postponement has been agreed upon; and with reference to the 15th of June, all I will venture to say is—and I trust it will be sufficient to satisfy the just expectation of the House—that we hold ourselves absolutely bound to this effect—that neither on the 15th of June, nor on any other day, shall there occur at Geneva anything that, according to our best judgment, is inconsistent with the honour and credit of this country, or with the explicit declarations which, from time to time, it has been our duty to make on the subject of the bearing of the Treaty of Washington on the Arbitration at Geneva.

Motion, "That this House do now adjourn," by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Gladstone

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[Bill 31.]
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 4th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

II.—LOCAL MANAGEMENT.

Clause 5 (Area of a parish and a burgh).

MR. GORDON asked, what would be the duties of the Commissioners which the Lord Advocate had inserted in his own clause in reference to the fixing of the areas referred to in this clause which was placed under the Scotch Education Department. He also doubted whether the understanding which had been come to the other night had been carried out by the Government.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the statement which had been made the other night was quite distinct, and in the clause itself he had endeavoured to express the duties of the Commissioners in conformity with the statement which he then made to the House. The duties of the Scotch Commissioners would be to aid in the establishment of schools under the Bill and in starting the new scheme. He thought it would be found by the clause, of which he had given Notice, that the duties put on them under the Department of the Government were those expressed in the clauses of the Bill, to which he had formerly referred. In regard to the fixing of the areas, it was very well known that questions about boundaries frequently gave rise to acrimonious and expensive litigation; and the decision had been left to the Education Department as a means of avoiding expense in determining matters of small importance in themselves; and the Commissioners referred to were to be appointed to assist the Education Department in the execution of its duties.

MR. GORDON said, that the settlement of the area of parishes and burghs in reference to the formation of school boards was so essentially a local question that he would move to omit the words "Scotch Education Department," with a view to insert "the Board of Commissioners."

MR. ELLICE said, he thought the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend to substitute a Board of Commissioners for the Scotch Education Department in reference to this matter, which was of a purely local character, was right. For his own part, he should be satisfied if the matter were left to the sheriff; but a Board of Commissioners being evidently a better body to deal with such questions than the Scotch Education Department, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice). In the new clause there was an allusion to the Scotch Education Department. It might save time if the learned Lord Advocate would inform the House what the Scotch Education Department really was—it having been alluded to so frequently.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could best answer the question by referring the hon. Member to the Interpretation Clause. The Committee had resolved that the definition of the Scotch Education Department should mean the Lords of any Committee of the Privy Council appointed by Her Majesty on education in Scotland. In the course of the discussion, he (the Lord Advocate) stated that the principle to which the Government was prepared to adhere was, that upon the Government the responsibility of seeing that the Act was properly executed would rest, subject to direct Parliamentary control. He stated that upon the people of the various districts, through school boards of their own election, would be cast the duty in the first instance of providing sufficient accommodation in public schools in their districts; but the Government would not attempt to put a statutory Board or any other body over them, and throw upon it the responsibility which should rest upon the Government alone, both in reference to the proper expenditure of local rates and the Imperial money voted by Parliament, and which was only voted on the understanding that it would be expended in a manner calculated to produce the best effects in the shape of extended and improved education in Scotland. For that reason he declined to put forward any statutory Board, whether temporary or permanent. The Board he proposed was a Board to aid the Government, and to be responsible to the Government—the Government being responsible to Parliament. Their duty, therefore, was to aid in starting the Act, and in forming local school boards. The Scotch Education Department was simply the name given to the Department entrusted with the carrying out of the Act, just as in England it was entrusted to a Committee of the Privy Council, nominated for the express purpose, and called the Education Department—not only of England, but England and Scotland. It appeared to him that it would be more right and proper that instead of retaining that machinery, there should be a Scotch Committee appointed, which would have the charge of Scotch education; and it was to some extent proposed to establish a new department of the Privy Council, which would be nominated by Her Majesty in Council, and not by Parliament, and which could not be nominated by Act of Parliament. But although Parliament could not nominate the Committee of Council on Scotch Education, it could provide that there should be a Member of the Government in this House responsible to Parliament connected with it. Then the Government would, through that Committee, nominate the Commissioners for Scotland, who would be responsible to the Committee. He therefore could not consent to give to the Commissioners any powers by force of statutory enactment, or indeed any powers which were not derived through Government, for that would be creating a statutory commission, which he had already said would be extremely objectionable.

MR. ORR EWING said, that certainly the whole views of the Members for Scotland were against what the Lord Advocate proposed in the 3rd clause, and the majority of them were only prevented from voting against him by his promising to bring in a clause in accordance with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan). What was the use of this new clause? Clause 3, to which hon. Members objected, would have answered the purpose quite as well as this. It was simply a sham, and it would be incumbent upon hon. Members opposite to declare whether they were satisfied with it or not. This clause would not at all satisfy the people of Scotland. What was understood was, that although there was not to be a Board administering education in Scotland, there would be a Board charged with carrying out the local wants of Scotland, but be placed under the Privy Council directly. He must say this clause was not satisfactory.

MR. M'LAGAN objected to this clause because it was almost entirely permissive. It was of no greater use than the 3rd clause was, and it was not what he expected. The powers given to the Board in Scotland were too limited, and the clause would not give satisfaction in Scotland. He should support the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice).

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, having listened attentively to the Lord Advocate, he must say that it might fairly be inferred that the Scotch Board would only be a sham board. The Lord Advocate had completely disappointed the expectations of the Scotch Members.

MR. MACFIE said, that the people of Scotland had no objection to the administration of the funds being entirely under the control of Parliament; but they did not wish the management of the education itself to be under that control. What they desired to avoid was, the Education Department in Scotland being part of the Government. The Articles of the Union distinctly recognised that the Scotch educational system was to be independent of control in London, and he regretted that more respect had not been shown by the Government for the immemorial habits and feelings and wishes of the people of Scotland.

MR. ANDERSON said, that having read the new clause, he thought it did not do what Scotch Members were led to expect when the learned Lord Advocate told them that he would substantially accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan). It now appeared that what was proposed was to be of a permissive character, and nothing was said as to what the duties of the Commissioners were to be. It might be that there would be no Board in Scotland to carry out the powers of the Act.

MR. BOUVERIE said, it was unfortunate that such an important question should be raised on a question of area or boundary. It would be better to defer the discussion on the new clause until it was formally before the Committee.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he regarded the appointment of the Commissioners under the words before the House as imperative. Although the word "shall" was not used, practically it would be imperative, for it would be quite impossible for any Government, after the House had required the Government to appoint Commissioners, to say that it would not confer the necessary powers.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE suggested that it would be better, as the clause had been postponed in regard to the appointment of a Commission, to let the words stand as they were, because the Committee would always have the power when they came to the enacting clause to say what powers should be given to those Commissioners, and under what conditions they should be conferred. He thought, too, that if the Government were to make some such declaration to the Committee as that which they made in 1869 as to the character of the persons they intended to appoint, much of the alarm which seemed to pervade the minds of hon. Members would disappear.

MR. M'LAREN believed the best plan to adopt with reference to the areas would be to adopt the Parliamentary boundaries as fixed after the Reform Act of 1832. With regard to the powers of the Commissioners, seeing there was an appeal to the Privy Council, it would be better to commit to the Commissioners the whole of the administrative duties.

MR. CRAUFURD deprecated the further discussion of the question of the Commission until it came fairly before the Committee, and suggested that it should be postponed without prejudice.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, the new clause of the Lord Advocate was nothing more than carrying out the machinery of Clause 3, and it was most unsatisfactory to be discussing a clause which was not before the Committee. In fact, it was difficult to ascertain what was the question before the Committee.

MR. ELLICE understood that the Lord Advocate was willing to leave out the words objected to by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Gordon). It was clear that the Commissioners ought to be the persons to deal with the subject of boundaries. He should prefer to substitute in the latter part of the clause "the Commissioners in Scotland" for "the Scotch Education Department," always understanding that their proceedings as Scotch Commissioners should be subject to appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. Orr-Ewing

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that to avoid the [possibility of misunderstanding with regard to the language of the new clause, he regarded it as practically inoperative, and no Government could decline to grant to the Commissioners all the powers necessary to enable them to perform their complicated duties; but, as he had said before, when they came to consider the words of the clause, he would see if the language might not be altered, as had been suggested.

Amendment (Mr. Gordon) withdrawn.

On Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the words—

“unless the Scotch Education Department shall, by order issued by them, have otherwise, for the said purposes, determined the area thereof,” —struck out.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 (United parishes) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Burghs may be united with parishes in certain cases).

MR. GORDON moved in page 3, line 32, leave out “five,” and insert “two.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (First election of school boards).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved, in page 3, after line 40, insert sub-section—

“In every parish the School Board shall consist of the owners of lands and heritages of the yearly value of one hundred pounds and upwards, and of such number of elected members as may be determined by the Scotch Education Department.”

The qualification he proposed was well known in Scotch local administration, and he believed the addition of such members would give great confidence in the Board, and in especial would encourage teachers to come forward. This proposition was not a new one. It had been before the country for some years, for the Commission on Education proposed that one-half of the Board should consist of proprietors, and the proposal was embodied in the Bill of three years ago. He believed his proposal would give more satisfaction than the proposition of the Government made at that time. It was useless to deny that there was great alarm throughout the country as to the proposed constitution of these boards.

MR. M'COMBIE said, he would give his most unhesitating and firmest support to the Amendment. He had no very great confidence in the Scotch Education Department, and believed that the proposal would have the effect of excluding all the tenant farmers of Scotland.

MR. MILLER opposed the Amendment; but at the same time he thought that members of the school board should have some connection with the parish.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would take the sense of the Committee upon his Amendment. In some parishes there were so many electors that the choice of a school board would virtually amount to a contested election.

MR. MAXWELL knew that in some parishes there would be a difficulty in getting properly qualified persons selected, and that the schoolmasters felt great anxiety at the prospect of inferior men finding their way on to the board. The limit of £100, perhaps, was too high, and he would suggest that it should be put at £50.

MR. GRAHAM believed the disposition of the people of Scotland invariably would be to elect persons of wealth and position, where those were found willing to serve; and, accordingly, he thought it better to trust the people of Scotland than to establish any principle of selection.

MR. CANDLISH said, there was no such restriction in the English Act, and wondered how the new plan would work across the Tweed.

MR. FORDYCE said, the Amendment appeared to be founded on a distrust of the tenant farmers.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, the Amendment simply provided that a certain number of the present managing bodies should be connected with the managing bodies of the future. A similar proposition was made by the Government in 1869, and the Lord Advocate himself said that the heritors had been an excellent managing body. There was another reason for their connection with the managing body in future—namely, that many schools were largely dependent upon their voluntary contributions. He agreed that a £50 qualification would be better than a £100 qualification, and this was one of the points on which concession by the Government might be reasonably expected. He thought the Amendment a reasonable one, and would vote for it.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he hoped the Committee would not be divided on the Amendment, or that the Amendment would be decisively rejected. It was entirely reactionary, and opposed to the spirit of the Bill, and also that of the English Bill. The English people were allowed to elect their own school boards freely, and why should there be an ex officio element on the Scotch boards? The Scotch people elected their own religious ministers, and were they any less fit to elect the managers of their schools? It would be infinitely more satisfactory to the heritors themselves to be placed on the school boards by the free votes of the people than in virtue of the value of their property; and there was no fear but that the heritors would be elected. Any fear that the electors would elect bad managers was absurd.

MR. ELLICE said, he thought there was much to be said on both sides of the question. No doubt, in one half of Scotland boards would be easily composed of a superior class of people, who would undertake the management with alacrity; but in the other half of Scotland there would be difficulty in obtaining good members. The Poor Law machinery of one half of Scotland was conducted by heritors or their agents. The distinction proposed was an invidious one, and it was an unanswerable argument against it that there was no such distinction in England. If heritors accepted it they must also consent to a continuance of their exceptional assessment. On the whole, he would recommend the withdrawal of the Amendment.

MR. M'LAREN concurred in the recommendation to withdraw the Amendment, but not in one of the reasons assigned for it, because the question of the payment of the heritors had still to be discussed, and he regarded those payments as national property. The remark that had been made by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) as to the absence of any distinction in the English Act ought to be conclusive.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he thought school boards quite unnecessary in small parishes, except when there was a deficiency of educational means, and then he would approve of them. He would cordially support the Amendment.

MR. M'COMBIE maintained that, as the tenant farmers paid half of the salaries of the schoolmasters, it would be unfair not to give them a voice in the election of the schoolmasters.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had lived in the county of Aberdeen for very nearly as long as his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Combie), yet he had never heard of a tenant farmer paying a shilling of the schoolmaster's salary. There was one point which ought not to be lost sight of—more especially as the heritors had been attacked in the manner they had been. In his own recollection, there was not a school or a school-house in that county which had not been rebuilt at the expense of the heritors, and increased accommodation given. He wished to say a word on behalf of the schoolmasters, who were in a state of terror on account of this Bill, because they believed they would be subject to the domination of an illiterate body, who were perfectly and utterly incompetent to control them. The schoolmasters were at present a most respectable body of men, many of them Masters of Arts, and many also preachers of the Gospel. If, however, the Committee gave power to every collier who paid £4 rent to control the election of the schoolmaster, he pitied the poor schoolmaster. He would support the Amendment, believing that the clause as it stood would cause a serious deterioration of the education in Scotland.

MR. MACFIE suggested that the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) should amend his Amendment by adding after "owner" the words "and occupier" so as to meet the view of the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. M'Combie). If that alteration were made, he should support the hon. Baronet's proposal.

MR. GORDON said, that undoubtedly there was a very great anxiety throughout Scotland with reference to the constitution of school boards under this Bill, and also with reference to the position which schoolmasters would hold. If the hon. Baronet went to a division, he would certainly go into the Lobby with him. It had been asked why they should make a rule for Scotland which did not exist in England. The reason was that in Scotland the parochial schools possessed a higher style of education than in England. He was of opinion that for the sake of the future prosperity of the country that higher style of education should be maintained, and if possible extended. What they were apprehensive of—and the apprehension was not confined to parish teachers alone, but was maintained by many connected with the Universities—was that the Bill would have the effect of deteriorating education. The electors, they feared, would be satisfied with what was commonly and popularly known as “the three R’s.” He did not think the hon. Baronet ought to be exposed to taunts with respect to the exclusion of the tenants, because he had stated his willingness to add to the body of electors tenants who paid a certain rent.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was impossible for him to consider an Amendment proceeding from the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) otherwise than with sincere respect, but he must oppose the present one. He had listened with some surprise to the reasons advanced by the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), and by his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Gordon) for supporting the Amendment. In both cases their reasons seemed to be something like a distrust of the people of Scotland, and yet within the last few days they had both lauded those very people. The hon. and gallant Member said two days ago that the people of Scotland might well be trusted with the administration of the paltry sum of £250,000 a-year. In that case, the people were not to have the administration of the fund in their own hands; but in this case the question was as to trusting the people themselves. Could they not trust them with the management of their own schools—that was to say, with the election of boards qualified to manage the schools in which their children were to be educated? The people of England could be trusted to do that; but it was now said that the people of Scotland could not be so trusted, because they had no desire for the education of their children except in “the three R’s.” The hon. and gallant Gentleman said they would look to cheapness, and not to education. Was that a true account of the people of Scotland? He denied that it was. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who spoke so often in this discussion did not represent any Scotch constituency, and whether he spoke in praise or dispraise of the Bill, was not an authorized exponent of the views of his countrymen. His own belief was that the people of Scotland did care for the education of their children, and that they would elect the best men to manage their schools, and would not be satisfied with “the three R’s.” One objection to the Amendment was that in some parishes the school boards would be so large as to be unmanageable; in others, the board would consist of the proprietor and an elected member only.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that the learned Lord had alluded to him in complimentary terms, and informed the Committee that he was not a Scotch Member. He begged leave to tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he had addressed Scotch constituencies, but was found deficient in some of the qualities which were necessary to suit them. He was found deficient in that hypocrisy which it was necessary to possess in approaching a Scotch Liberal constituency. However, having been rejected, he had found an honest constituency, with whom he intended to remain as long as they thought fit to return him. He believed that what lay at the root of the clause was kept carefully out of view. When he looked at the benches opposite, the thing was perfectly explained. There was not one hon. Member from Ireland to be seen. They were absent from the debate, but present at the division, simply because if they forced these boards upon the people of Scotland, they intended to do so with the people of Ireland also, and the consequence would be that they would place the education of the people of Ireland in the hands of the parish priests. Who would be accountable for this but the Members from Scotch constituencies, who, he believed, were in league with the Roman Catholic Church.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he had hoped that the Amendment would have been discussed in a different spirit, and could not see why he should have been attacked as he had been. The English system had been alluded to; but that system was the result of a compromise. He failed to see why a system which worked admirably in Poor Law administration should not be applied to education. He would not give the Committee the trouble of dividing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ANDERSON moved, in page 4, line 2, after "burgh," to insert—

"But having regard in the case of a burgh, as far as possible, to the number of wards into which such burgh may be divided for municipal purposes, and, if the number of wards shall exceed fifteen, then the number of members shall be increased so that there shall be one member for each ward."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there would be no connection whatever between the wards and the boards, which would be elected by the whole constituency. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ORR EWING moved, in page 4, line 8, to leave out the words "or occupiers," and to insert, in line 9, after "pounds," "and occupiers of lands and heritages of the value of not less than ten pounds." In the first place, he wanted to have a more intelligent and a smaller constituency, which did not require an "illiterate clause" similar to that which had been introduced into the Ballot Bill. The next—and in his eyes the most important—reason for proposing the Amendment was, that families who lived in houses below £10 ought to be relieved from this new burden. In his opinion, they did their duty sufficiently at present both to their families and to the commonwealth if they paid for the education of their own children. The Lord Advocate might say that he wished to interest these parties in the education of the children; but the elections for the school boards in the London district afforded an illustration that the poorer classes did not take much interest in them. Again, he objected to the clause in its present shape, because it did not prevent persons from voting who did not pay their rates. Besides, if the rate were likely—as the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had said—to be as high as 1s. in the pound, it would be one of the heaviest rates in any city or town. As the people of Scotland had always had education provided for them hitherto without a rate, he was sure this proposal would not be at all acceptable to them. In England, moreover, they had only elected about 400 school boards, while in Scotland there would at once be found 1,200 of them, which would cause additional expense, so that Scotland would be more heavily taxed than in England, as there would be a local board everywhere. It might be said, however, that this system was already adopted in England, and that there was no reason why it should not be extended to Scotland; but it should be borne in mind that there were considerable differences between the two countries. In England, for example, there was no provision for endowing schoolmasters similar to that which in Scotland tended to sustain the status of the teachers. He believed we should get such inferior teachers in a short time we should be obliged to endow them in the same manner as was now done in Scotland.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was afraid his hon. Friend had misunderstood his remarks about the amount of the education rate. He did not mean them to apply generally to large towns; but said that, according to the best calculation he could make, 6d. in the pound would produce £50,000 in Glasgow, which sum, he imagined, would be much more than would be required to carry out the Act.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member, because there was no principle in it. He could not consent to give votes to owners of houses under £10 a-year, and refuse to give them to the occupiers. The principle of the Bill was to give to the parents of the children attending the schools a voice in the management of the schools—not directly, but by making them influential parts of the constituencies by which the managing boards would be elected. The hon. Member had alleged that many of the poorer classes would find it very burdensome to pay the school rate. Now, suppose it was as high as 6d. in the pound—one moiety to be paid by the proprietor and the other by the tenant—the occupier of a £4 house would have to pay 1s. a-year, for which sum he might have a number of children attending the schools. If he had a £10 house he would have to pay just 2s. 6d. a-year for education. He did not think the people of Scotland would exclaim against that as being burdensome. It should be remembered that they would get full value for their money, and in a manner, perhaps, which they could appreciate better than any other people. The proprietors of lands and heritages would, on the whole, pay not only as much as heretofore, but more, as they would have to contribute a full half of the whole school rate. Again, the contributions out of the Imperial funds would be much larger than hitherto. His hon. Friend apprehended that the schoolmasters would not be paid as well as they were at present; but where, then, was the money to go to? The matter would be under the Government to a certain extent, and under the school boards elected by the people to a certain extent, and he supposed they would pay what was needed in order to secure such education as the people desired; while, at the same time, they would not be extravagant, and pay more than was required. The poor people to whom his hon. Friend had referred would get for the tax an immediate return which they highly valued, for the additional money must lead to a great increase both in the quantity and the quality of education in Scotland, unless the money were absolutely squandered away.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

MR. CAMERON opposed the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing), inasmuch as its result would be to deprive the poor tenants of any power of management which they might be able to exercise in educational matters through the elections for school boards.

Amendment negatived.

MR. MILLER moved, in page 4, line 10, after "burgh," to insert—

"And who are not in arrear of any assessment for poor's rate or school rate which may have become due and payable prior to the date on which the electors exercise their votes."

He had put that Amendment on the Paper because similar words were in the Poor Law Act of 1845, which was the general rule of the mode in which business was transacted in parishes. In his opinion, people who were not able to support what was wanted in the parish ought not to have a voice in the direction of it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment, saying that he, too, was following a precedent, for there was no such provision in the English Act as that proposed by his hon. Friend. It was difficult to see, moreover, why the fact of a man getting into arrears for a poor rate should be a disqualification, any more than his getting into arrears for any other debt.

MR. ORR EWING said, he thought it would be more satisfactory if the Lord Advocate had argued on the merits of the proposal than say that he followed the example of the English Act. He did not think it right that anyone who did not pay his rates should be allowed to exercise the franchise. He trusted his hon. Friend would go to a division.

MR. M'LAREN, while agreeing that the Amendment was quite right in principle, doubted very much whether it was expedient to enact it now.

MR. ORR EWING pointed out that the effect of the Amendment would be to make the constituencies for school board elections the same as those for the election of Members of Parliament.

MR. MONK thought there was no reason why the Government should be asked to make one rule for Scotland and another for England, and trusted they would not accede to the Amendment.

MR. GORDON remarked that the difficulty of the compound householder did not exist in Scotland, and it would be judicious to avoid having amongst these electors a number of persons who would not only be unable to pay the rates, but would have to apply to the school boards for the fees to give their children gratuitous education.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment, as he might re-consider it before reaching the clause providing for the future elections.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'LAREN moved, in line 13, at end of sub-section, add—

"Provided, that any person who by any law or custom has been or is now exempted from payment of poor's rate, by virtue of any office he may hold, may, on payment of the said rate for the preceding year and of the school rate levied therewith, and on his declaring that he is willing to continue to be charged with and pay the same annually, be entitled to vote in the election of the school board, and be eligible to be elected a member thereof."

He said his proposal went entirely in an opposite direction to that of his hon. Friend, inasmuch as its object was to make the rule in Scotland and England uniform, instead of varying it. In Scotland the clergyman of the parish paid no poor rate either on his residence, or his salary, or his glebe; and while the Bill proposed that the school rate and the poor rate should be levied together, no provision whatever was made in it for this exemption. It was contrary to principle that a gentleman should be elected to the school board who was not liable for the school rate or the poor rate.

THE LORD ADVOCATE sympathized with the opinion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, that Established ministers ought to pay local and other taxes; but he was under a misapprehension in supposing that they were not liable to pay in respect of incomes. The Act of 1845 provided for liability to taxes on the part of the parish ministers in Scotland, and consequently there was no necessity for introducing a clause in the Education Bill to abolish the exemption. It might be desirable to deal with that matter at a more convenient opportunity, and in a Bill directly bearing upon it. Moreover, this franchise did not depend upon taxation, but on ownership and occupancy.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would not divide the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE, in moving that the cumulative vote should be applied to elections under the school board in Scotland, said, he did not regard this as merely a religious question. The principle of the Amendment was as applicable to Scotland as to England, and, in his judgment, its adoption was essential to the sound and satisfactory working of a united system of education. The majority of to-day might become the minority of to-morrow, and the majority in England might become the minority of Scotland or Ireland. The question was whether functions such as were entrusted to these boards could be given to a tyrant majority, which would be empowered to walk into the schools of their adversaries. The religious question—the most tender of all—was involved between the Protestants and Roman Catholics of Scotland, and unless some such provision was engrafted in the Bill one denomination would be predominant. It would be impossible to carry out this Bill unless fair play was allowed for difference of religious opinion, so that the boards might represent the relative and various shades of belief. The principle of cumulative voting had been tried in England. Its working had been impugned; but when an attempt was made to repeal it, an amount of testimony had been brought forward in favour of the satisfactory working of the clause in England, which ought to weigh in passing a Scotch Bill. In the interest of education, and with the view of cultivating good feeling among members of different denominations, and leading them to unite heartily in the cause of education, he cordially recommended that clause to the Committee.

Mr. M'Laren

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "At every election every voter shall be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of the members of the School Board to be elected, and may give all such votes to one candidate, or may distribute them among the candidates as he sees fit."
—(Sir Edward Colebrooke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN supported the Amendment. On a question of representation he could see no ground for applying one rule to England and another to Scotland. Having supported the principle of the Amendment in the case of the English Education Bill, he could not consistently abstain from voting in favour of the present proposal. The minority ought not to rule, but, on the other hand, it should be heard; and the system which the Government had proposed with regard to the election of school boards in Scotland, while it would secure that the majority should govern, would also prevent the minority from obtaining a hearing. He believed that the hon. Baronet's clause would be very beneficial in promoting harmony.

MR. DIXON said, he was very glad to find that the Scotch Education Bill did not contain a provision for establishing cumulative voting, and hoped the Government would resist the Amendment. He agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) that it was desirable that Roman Catholics should be represented; but the only qualification which ought to be admitted for a seat on a school board was an educational one, and if a Roman Catholic possessed that, there was no reason why he should not be elected. He believed that would be the result where there were a large number of Roman Catholics, and men among them who were qualified for the post. A great number of Unitarians had been elected, although their religion was distinctly opposed to that of the majority of those among whom they lived. His objection to the cumulative vote was that it would introduce wrong considerations into the elections, and men would be elected for reasons which would unfit them for being useful members of a school board; and he hoped that disturbing element would not be introduced in Scotland, where education seemed more likely to be carried on harmoniously than it was in England.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he thought the great difficulty would be, in the country parishes of Scotland, to find persons who would be willing to take the trouble of serving on the school board. In the parishes generally there were three congregations besides the Roman Catholics. It appeared to him that the cumulative vote would go far to enable those congregations to return each a representative to the school board, and thereby it would remove the difficulty that would otherwise exist in getting members to serve.

MR. STAPLETON saw no reason for making a distinction between England and Scotland in this respect, and therefore, unless the Committee was prepared to make a distinction, they ought to assent to the Amendment.

MR. M'LAREN said, it should be borne in mind that there was a novel system in England, and he believed that instead of having produced harmony, it had had the opposite effect. It had caused great distrust and much hostility in some of the districts in England in which it had been in operation, and with that experience before them, it was rather too much to ask that the principle should be applied to Scotland. The only argument of any force which he had heard urged in favour of the proposal had reference to the Roman Catholics. But as regarded the rural districts of Scotland, there were hardly any Roman Catholics to be found in them. ["Oh, oh!"] Roman Catholics were chiefly to be found in the larger towns and populous places, and he saw nothing in the present system of voting to prevent Roman Catholics from being returned in proportion to their numbers and influence in the different towns and districts in Scotland. He thought that, upon the whole, it was much better not to change the mode of voting proposed in the Bill.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, he supported the Amendment. The Committee should remember that a very fair proportion of the proprietors in Scotland were Episcopalians, and it was admitted that they had voluntarily contributed very largely to the cause of education in that country. It would not, therefore, be good policy to exclude them from all chance of being represented on the school boards of Scotland.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he believed that the adoption of the cumulative vote in England had avoided much inconvenience and discontent that would have arisen under any other mode of voting. It was clear that only through the minority vote could the Roman Catholics be elected to the boards. He hoped that the cumulative principle, which had worked so well in England, would be also established in Scotland.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he thought that both in political and educational matters the principle of cumulative voting was a good one. His own defeat at the election for the London School Board was a proof that the cumulative vote did not confer an undue share of power on minorities. In many of the country districts it would be long before the party which was fonder of the rates than of education would be vanquished by the party which was fonder of education than of the rates. We were not legislating merely for the present, when there were religious difficulties, but also for the future, when there would be more important educational difficulties. It was a great mistake to suppose, as had been stated by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, that the Roman Catholic population of Scotland was almost exclusively confined to the large towns and the populous districts, for in the North there were many districts which the Reformation never penetrated, and where the name of John Knox had never been heard of until long after he was dead and buried. He had recently spent some time in the district of Braemar, in a village nearly half the population of which were Roman Catholics, and hereditary Roman Catholics. He was told by the Free Kirk minister that there were many other villages in which the same condition of things existed. Seeing that this Bill had a bearing on the question of Irish education, which was to be discussed next year, he was glad to note that there were present many Irish Members who supported the principle of cumulative voting. If it were not in the Irish Bill, Irish education would be handed over to the priesthood, who would levy rates on the Presbyterian and Protestant minority. He was therefore glad to see Irish Members supporting this principle to save their co-religionists from the domination of a Presbyterian majority, because he inferred that next year they would be equally ready to prevent a Presbyterian minority being taxed by a Roman Catholic majority.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it had been erroneously assumed that the Bill excluded cumulative voting. It simply provided that the Scotch Education Department should frame rules for the conduct of elections, and that gave the Department power to issue rules based on cumulative voting; but he should not like the Bill to leave the Legislature without more precise direction. The question was far too important a one to be left to the discretion of a Government Department. The principle of cumulative voting was not originally in the English Bill; it was proposed in Committee, and was unanimously adopted; and though the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) proposed a Resolution adverse to it last year, such was the feeling of the House that he did not press the Motion to a division. On the whole, he thought the operation of the principle had been to diminish rather than to increase difficulties, and that many who opposed it owed their election to it. This Bill did not contain more distinct provisions, because the Government had wished to see whether there was a strong preponderance of feeling in Scotland against the principle or whether there was any strong reason why it should not be applied in Scotland. The Amendment having been proposed, it was found to be supported by Scotch Members representing influential constituencies. He should be sorry to see religious questions imported into the matter; and minorities might be worthy of representation on educational grounds. For instance, it was of importance to maintain the high standard of education in Scotland. This was a question upon which the Government did not wish in the slightest degree to dictate to the Committee. Being connected with the Department, he should prefer to be guided by a positive instruction from the Committee, but he saw no reason why there should be a law for Scotland different from that of England; and therefore, if there were a division, he should support the Amendment.

MR. GRAHAM could not but admit that the principle of representation of minorities was in some respects a just principle, if equally and justly applied. If the proposition of his hon. Friend (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was adopted, it was proposed to apply it equally to the whole area of Scotland, and upon that ground the objections which he felt to it fell to the ground. He deplored as much as anyone the habit which had grown up of introducing religious questions into politics and the commonest affairs of life, and said the true radical cure was for Christian people to see that no child was left uninstructed in the matter of religious belief; and until that was done he sympathized with those who objected to the exclusion of the religious element from the schools of the country. As long as religious education was permitted to continue in schools, in fairness and common honesty the majority were bound to extend to those who differed from them in opinion the protection of the cumulative vote. Looking to future legislation as well, it was impossible not to see that Irish Protestants would desire to have a voice in the constitution of the school boards in that country. Desiring, therefore, to do what was right to others, he should vote for the proposed addition to the clause.

MR. CRAUFURD, in spite of the eloquent sermon to which the Committee had just listened, expressed what he believed to be the universal objections of his constituents to the cumulative vote. He also complained of the course taken by the Vice President of the Council, in perfect consistency with his previous course upon the Ballot Bill. The right hon. Gentleman told the House in the early part of the evening—and had repeated the declaration in private conversation—that he should be guided by the opinions expressed by the Scotch Members. Having heard but a few of these, however, the right hon. Gentleman rose and prejudged the question by declaring his own opinion in favour of the cumulative vote. It was unfair to Scotch Members that they should thus be precluded from expressing their opinions, for, though they might express them verbally, if they attempted to give effect to them by a vote they all knew what their fate would be after such a declaration on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. With very few exceptions, the Scotch Members, he ventured to say, were opposed to the cumulative vote; and, though he belonged to the Episcopalian Church, he should scorn—as he believed Episcopalians generally would scorn—to ask for any such protection. [Mr. R. W. DUFF said, the Episcopalians had universally petitioned in favour of it.] If that were so, he (Mr. Craufurd) was ashamed of them. He preferred to give freely to the people of Scotland the control of their education, because he had faith in the interest Scotch people took in the subject of education. The speech of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was a slur on the Scotch people. He denied the accuracy of the suggestion which had been made that the department had the power of giving a cumulative vote. It would be absurd to say that general powers of regulating an election carried with them the power of conferring a particular franchise.

MR. W. E. FORSTER complained that the hon. Member should have taken the very unusual course of referring to private conversations; but he assured him that he had said nothing more in private than what he had openly stated in the House. Of course, it was a matter on which the Government desired to know the opinions of Scotch Members; but the Bill would make very little progress if the Government waited until every Scotch Member had expressed his opinion.

MR. ANDERSON did not agree with the views of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Graham), who did not, he thought, represent the opinions of the constituency of Glasgow on this matter. He (Mr. Anderson) regarded the cumulative vote as a clumsy experiment, which ought not to be extended to Scotland until time had proved whether it was a good thing or a bad thing in England.

MR. PIM said, he thought it would be more satisfactory to Irish Protestants to be returned by the cumulative vote than to be left dependent on the kindness and good feeling of their Roman Catholic brethren in the three southern Provinces.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 162; Noes 36: Majority 126.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 19 (School board declared to be a body corporate. Managers.)

MR. GORDON moved, in page 8, line 39, after “fit” to insert—

“To fix the subjects of instruction to be taught in the school or schools under their management: Provided always, That in all such schools there shall be afforded instruction in the Holy Scriptures, and.”

The hon. and learned Gentleman observed that the insertion of those words would carry out the spirit of the Resolution which upon his Motion the House adopted some time ago. If this question was important before Monday last, it became of greater importance in consequence of a clause being then passed which destroyed entirely the constitution and government of the parochial schools in Scotland. If those schools had been left to the people of Scotland they would have been models, after which other schools might have been formed. Under the parish schools as existing at present, the law and practice was that instruction should be given to the children in the Holy Scriptures; but on Monday last the Committee did all in their power to abolish the system of definite religious instruction, which had existed for 300 years. The English Bill of 1870 left religious teaching in denominational schools untouched, subject to a Conscience Clause; but the constitution of the parish schools in Scotland having been destroyed by a recent vote of the Committee, they were bound to make some provision for religious teaching. He trusted that his Resolution of the 7th of May would be adhered to. He would not repeat the arguments he then used, for they were never answered, being met by silence on the other side of the House. The representatives of the different churches had since met.

The assembly of the Established Church consisted not merely of clergymen, but of laymen representing the various burghs, and a resolution approving his Resolutions was adopted by it, with the concurrence of the Provosts of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and of men of all political opinions. One of the speakers—a gentleman who proposed the Home Secretary at his last election—expressed a hope that instruction in the Scriptures should be made statutory by the Government. The Free Church, or at least two-thirds of their Assembly, declined to offer an opinion on his Resolution, because it might not be approved by the Government—not a very high principle on which to act; but they still said—as they had always done—that they would welcome any such provision as he advocated. It had been stated that he would force on all schools not only the Bible, but the Shorter Catechism—an admirable epitome, identical in doctrine with the Thirty-Nine Articles. This, however, was incorrect, for his Resolution left denominational schools untouched as regarded religion, and applied only to rate-supported schools, which were said to be the same as the old parish schools, and in which, therefore, the long-established practice ought to be continued. As to the United Presbyterians, they had not hitherto shown a very active interest in education, having largely sent their children to the parish schools without any objection to the religious teaching, and having only established 49 schools of their own, accommodating 4,500 scholars. They were opposed to the recognition even of the Scriptures as part of the instruction to be given by the master, contending that religious teaching should be given at a different hour by a different agent. It was stated at their synod by Dr. Taylor and others, that, according to the Bill, whatever money was voted for schools would be exclusively for secular instruction, and that the Lord Advocate, on being asked whether the object of the measure was not to prevent the application of public money to anything but secular instruction, had replied that that was certainly its intention. The synod, accordingly, approved the Bill as a secular one, under which no rates could be applied to the teaching of religion. The Lord Advocate had twitted him with advocating a denominational system; but he was in favour of a national system on sound principles, and he objected to the exclusion of any reference to the Bible or religious instruction, for the people of Scotland, being attached to the present system, which had worked so beneficially, would reject one which gave no recognition to religion. The children of different bodies had hitherto attended the parish schools, no religious difficulty having existed, but since the introduction of this Bill societies had for the first time been established for the exclusion of religious teaching from schools. One of these was styled a Society for the Promotion of Religious Education, an object which, strangely enough, it proposed to effect by excluding such education from the schools. Another society maintained that religious instruction should not be given during the ordinary school hours, nor by the master. The formation of these societies rendered it desirable that Parliament should settle the question of religious teaching, for otherwise warm contests were likely to ensue. The learned Lord Advocate the other night made some remarks about Petitions, and adopted a tone which, on reflection, he would hardly think was justifiable. He had spoken of servant girls being induced to put down their names to Petitions which they did not understand. Well, singular enough, later that very night he himself received a letter telling him of a Petition that was transmitted to him from Stranraer, the largest burgh connected with the district which the Lord Advocate represented. There must be intellectual electors in Stranraer, seeing that they returned so able a Representative; and, moreover, they had had the advantage of being well drilled on that subject by their Member. What, then, was his astonishment to find that, there being 650 electors available at Stranraer, 451 of them had signed the Petition in favour of his Resolution. Would the learned Lord say that was not a Petition entitled to consideration? In conclusion, if they were sweeping away the present system, they ought to take care to found their new system to some extent on that religious instruction which had existed so long in accordance with the feelings of the people of Scotland. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Mr. Gordon

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 39, after the word "fit," to insert the words "to fix the subjects of instruction to be taught in the school or schools under their management: Provided always, That in all such schools there shall be afforded instruction in the Holy Scriptures, and."—(Mr. Gordon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR: The Amendment proposed by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) is very simple, and is confined to Bible teaching only; but he has honestly told us that we must assume it is the first effort to carry into practical effect the Resolution which he recently persuaded this House to accept, and which reappears as an Amendment to Clause 50, and more definitely as one to the Preamble, for that explains the whole principle for which he contends. In fact, then, we must take the Resolution as a whole in our discussion, and assume that all schools shall have instruction in the Holy Scriptures according to the existing law and practice. There is no doubt as to what the practice is, though there seems to be opposite interpretations of the law. The practice—or, as it is termed, "the use and wont"—is to give instruction in the Bible, subject to the dogmas of the Shorter Catechism. This practice is not universal, but it exists in about 86 per cent of the schools in Scotland. The law on which my hon. and learned Friend chiefly relies is that of 1861, which made it imperative on teachers of parochial schools to make a declaration, not only that they would teach nothing opposed to Holy Scriptures and the Shorter Catechism, but that they would faithfully conform thereto in their teaching. My hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate contends, as I understand him, that this is a negative and not a positive law, and that it does not enjoin of necessity the teaching of the Holy Scriptures either at all or in conjunction with the Shorter Catechism. He views it very much like the declaration which the Act of 1853 required from University Professors, and which clearly was negative, because it would be absurd to speak of Latin, Greek, mathematics, and the sciences being taught in conformity with the Shorter Catechism. When two distinguished Scotch lawyers, such as the present and the past Lord Advocate, give such different interpretations of the law, an outsider like myself is driven to consider the purposes for which the Act of 1861 was passed. I have, therefore, carefully read over the debates in both Houses of Parliament when that law was made, and I find the clearest evidence, that only one idea then prevailed, and that was to make it compulsory on parochial teachers not only to give instruction in the Holy Scriptures, but to give that in conformity with the interpretation of the Shorter Catechism. Lord Advocate Moncreiff introduced the Bill of 1861, with an apology that in abrogating the Confession of Faith and submission to the Church of Scotland as a schoolmaster's test, he was at the same time actually proposing another test. He said—

"The Bill provides that they should teach the Holy Scriptures and the Shorter Catechism as set forth by the Westminster Confession of Faith."—[3 Hansard, clxiii. 1544.]

Mr. Adam Black, in opposing the test, remarked—

"At present all that was necessary was a Confession of Faith; and the teacher was not bound to teach any theological doctrines, but this Bill proposed to lay down that he should teach doctrines in accordance with the Short Catechism."—[Ibid., 1545.]

Neither at the second reading nor in Committee was there the slightest departure from the view that this double object was the positive purpose of the Bill. When the Bill passed into the Upper House, the Duke of Argyll, who introduced it, said—

"What was now proposed was merely that the schoolmaster should sign a declaration that he was willing to give moral and religious education in conformity with the Shorter Catechism."

Read them by the spirit in which the Act of 1861 was passed, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy) that it is quite clear the purpose of the Act of 1861, and its common sense reading, is to impose religious teaching, subject to the Shorter Catechism in all parochial schools. So far, then, the law and practice of Scotch schools are concordant in purpose, but they are not so in extent; for while the practice extends to 86 per cent of the schools in Scotland, the law only reaches 24 per cent. The law, in fact, is strictly limited to 1,200 parochial teachers, out of 5,000 teachers of elementary schools; but my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities asks to take this law of very partial operations not applicable to one-fourth of the schools of Scotland, and make it of universal application to all the schools in Scotland. If I have made myself clear, the House will understand that the question before them is not whether they will introduce the Bible into schools, but whether the Bible shall be taught as explained in the Shorter Catechism—for that is the practice—and, as I have shown, it was undoubtedly intended to be the law in regard to parochial schools, whether the words of the Act bear out that interpretation or not. The House, then, in passing a Resolution some weeks ago to the effect that this law and practice should form the basis of this Bill, did in reality resolve that, in all State aid to schools in Scotland, the condition must be made that religious instruction should be given according to the most rigid forms of Presbyterian Calvinism. Are the Episcopalians and Roman Catholics in this House prepared to accept this condition for aid as applied to schools of their persuasion in Scotland? For the bare Resolution would destroy separate denominational education as a system, and would establish a State education on the basis of the dominant denomination. Are the Presbyterian Members for Scotland prepared to extend this principle to Ireland, for they must inevitably do so if they pass it for Scotland? Do not let us be in any deception about the effects of the Resolution. The law, so far as it exists, and the practice of Scotland, which you now propose to convert into law, are perfectly in accord, and both demand religion as interpreted by the Shorter Catechism, with its well-pronounced views as to predestination and election. If we incorporate the words proposed as a condition of State aid to schools, all Episcopalian schools must either accept the Shorter Catechism in lieu of that of the English Church or be refused Government grants, and Roman Catholics must be content to have their Douay version of the Bible interpreted by the light of the Scotch Churches. Now, let me tell my dissenting friends on this side of the House what follows of necessity. If these words govern the Act, then the Act would enjoin a particular form of dogmatical religion, and thus make that the condition for State aid to schools; but when State aid is thus given, State inspection follows as a necessity, so that in Scotland

State aid to dogmatic religion and dogmatic religious inspection by the State would be enacted, while both are expressly prohibited in regard to schools in England. These would be the consequences of introducing the words that religious instruction should be given according to the “existing law and practice of Scotland;” but observe how the case stands if you make no such enactment. Then, the use and wont or custom of the country still prevails as of old. Under it 86 per cent of the schools teach the Bible and the Catechism; but they do so under the liberty of withdrawal to those who dissent from the teaching. This custom does not interfere with Episcopalians and Roman Catholic teaching what they please, though they receive aid from the State. As long as you leave religious instruction to be regulated by custom you are reposing with security on the religious sense of a whole people; but as soon as law enforces what custom produced without law, then you distrust that religious sense. Which do you think is the best security for religion? Do you believe that religion, which for past centuries has wholly sprung up from the hearts of a people, is likely to well up more freely in the future from the arid clauses of a compulsory law? How strange a thing it seems to enact a love for the Bible by statute! Has the love for the Bible in Scotland become so weak that you must come between the source of that love and the people by a legislative enactment? And yet the strange reason urged for this legislation is that it would merely represent in law the universal use and wont of the country without law. Religious instruction is given in every school in Scotland with one solitary exception, and you are asked to enforce it by statute. It has so prevailed for centuries—ever since the time of John Knox, and most certainly cannot have its origin in the partial declaratory law of 1861, which is only applicable to 24 per cent of the schools. Its origin must be far deeper than that, and is to be found in the habits, convictions, and religious sense of a whole people—and yet this Parliament, having the most solid grounds for trust and confidence that any Legislature can have in a people which it helps to rule, is asked to distrust my countrymen, to coerce them into religion, and to control their ideas of eternity by an Act of Parliament. The very universality of a voluntary custom is surely a strange occasion for a compulsory law. A habit may be universal, and even most desirable; but that forms no reason why it should be made obligatory by statute. Thus, it is the universal custom of Scotch mothers to give milk to their newborn babes, and it is a most proper and desirable habit that they should continue to do so; but would we not be considered legislative idiots if we passed a statute to that effect? It is quite as universal to teach the Bible in Scotch schools, and it seems an equal waste of the force of law to compel it. I rarely like to refer to my personal convictions; but will hon. Gentlemen opposite pardon me if I remind them that I have not unfrequently co-operated with them in resisting attacks made upon religious instruction in schools in England. In opposing the efforts of my hon. and learned Friend, it is not likely that I could be influenced by feelings of hostility to religion, for then I would be a traitor to the highest interests of my country. I oppose the practical operation of the Resolution which was passed, because I am firmly convinced it will seriously damage religion in Scotland, for its effect would be not to enforce religious instruction, on which all are agreed, but to regulate that by certain forms of Presbyterian Calvinism on which there is no common agreement. Even where the dogmas are accepted, the State interference with them will stir up bitter hostilities. There are three Churches with common Articles of Faith which divide between them 86 per cent of the population of Scotland; but one of these, the United Presbyterian Church, contends that the State and the schoolmasters should have nothing to do with religious teaching in schools, and claims that as the function of the parents and of the Churches. Is it not clear that you will throw this important body in antagonism to your school system if you enact by law that both the State and the schoolmasters shall be compelled to do that which is in direct violation of its principles as a Church? But it is not the only body which you stir into active opposition by such a proceeding. There are two Education Leagues in Scotland. One has its head-quarters in Edinburgh, and advocates united secular teaching under the schoolmasters, and separate religious teaching by ministers of religion; the other has its headquarters in Glasgow, and advocates instruction in the Bible without any creeds and dogmas; for they contend, and I think with great truth, that no book in existence is less sectarian and less dogmatic than the Bible, and that the creeds and dogmas thrown over it like a pauper's pall by the various Churches arise from the poverty of men's conceptions. Is it not obvious that these three important bodies will oppose a school system based on the Resolution which we have passed? One thing unites these three bodies in common with all the people of Scotland, and that is, that religious instruction should be given in schools. All of them are tending to this one end. But you come between them and their conscience, and say that a particular way of imparting religious instruction, by the aid of the Shorter Catechism, shall be the only way for the future. You little know the spirit of the Scotch people, if you think they will quietly submit to this insult to their religious convictions when they realize what it means. It will give the greatest stimulus to the action of those different bodies, and instead of preserving the use and wont, it will greatly tend to produce variety in the custom of the country. In England, the Education Act gave the greatest freedom to religious and even to secular teaching; but now, if the words of the Resolution mean anything, Scotland cannot have secular schools aided by the State, nor, unless you provide specially to prevent the limiting effects of the "existing law and practice," can there be any denominational teaching when it is not in accord with the Shorter Catechism? The few Secularists will be made martyrs, and martyrdom is a soil which is wonderfully productive. The 14 per cent of Episcopalians and Roman Catholics will be left out in the cold, or must be brought in, contrary to the true meaning of the words which we are called upon to make law. I am sorry that I have spoken at such length in Committee; but the terms of the Resolution which we are called upon to give practical effect to, or substantially to reverse, are fraught with important consequences to Scotland. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) would not have proposed it if he had not thought he was doing good service to religion. I, on the other hand, think it will rapidly deteriorate religious instruction in our schools; that it will evoke a spirit of hostility to that instruction; and that it seriously interferes with the liberty of conscience. As a security for religion, it appears to me to be infinitely less potent than the religious sense of the people which produced the use and wont. Religious instruction ceases to have its strength in national custom the moment you make that statutory, and your distrust and rejection of the religious sense of an entire people will have little compensation in the verbal interpretations which lawyers may extract from the dry clauses of an Act of Parliament.

Dr. Lyon Playfair

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he thought that the most important object that the Committee should have in view was to carry out the wishes of the people of Scotland, who he was afraid in the present case were not fully represented by the Scotch Members. It must always be a misfortune for a locality to have all its representatives on one side of the House on particular occasions. This was a Bill brought in by the Government, and it was universally supported by the Scotch Members, who regarded themselves as bound to give their allegiance to the Government rather than to carry out the wishes of their constituents. This Bill went far beyond the English Education Act. The only effect of leaving the Bill as it now stood would be to give facilities to a small section of secularists to raise up acrimonious religious disputes.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH remarked that when the English Education Act was under discussion the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had proposed an Amendment precisely similar to that now under discussion; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) had spoken against it, and it had been rejected by a majority of 250 to 81. He hoped the Committee would not adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gordon). Surely there was no need whatever for Parliament to make that which was the universal practice in the Scotch schools compulsory.

DR. BALL took quite a different view of this Amendment from that taken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair). So far from this Amendment enforcing dogmatic teaching, it excluded dogmatic teaching. ["Oh!"] It appeared to him that what the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh advocated was this—that it should not be in the power of those who governed these schools to enforce dogmatic teaching. He (Dr. Ball) supported the Amendment because instead of increasing that system, it tended to mitigate it. All it proposed was that the sacred Scriptures should be taught in the schools, not dogmatically, but simply. He voted for this Amendment because he believed the Scotch people desired it, viewing what it enjoined as a homage to the Scriptures. He was surprised to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite object to this Amendment, because one of their greatest authorities—namely, Earl Russell—had expressed himself to the effect that the course proposed by this Amendment was the proper mode of dealing with the Education question. The people of Scotland were anxious to have some recognition of religion in their education, and he (Dr. Ball) believed that it could not be done more fairly, or with more justice to the various forms of religion in Scotland, than by this Amendment. He did not pretend to say that only one uniform system of education was to be adopted, or that if this were not a Bill relating to education in Scotland the course proposed by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) was in every case to be followed; but if they were to have regard to the feeling of the people of Scotland, he believed they should adopt the Amendment.

Dr. Lyon Playfair

MR. GLADSTONE said, the clause with which the Committee were dealing was not a clause that related to the subject-matter of instruction at all. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) had taken the opportunity of thrusting his scheme for religious instruction into a clause on the constitution of the school boards. But the Committee were not to be put from their purpose by a stratagem of that kind. During the progress of the Education Bill for England in 1870, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) for the first time, and the noble Lord (Lord Augustus Hervey) subsequently, moved that the reading of the Holy Scriptures should be compulsory in schools; but the House by very large majorities, and without distinction of party, determined not to introduce that compulsory clause. They had heard something about a corpus vile in reference to this question, and it appeared that Scotland was to be selected for the purpose. It must be remembered that it was not the law of that country at this moment that religion should be taught in school. The hon. and learned Gentleman invited the Committee to adopt an innovation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had quoted an authority which he said ought to be one of the highest authorities of the Liberal party. He (Mr. Gladstone) would quote a gentleman who ought to be of very high authority with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Dr. Cooke said the religious spirit and system of the schools of Scotland were secured not by religious teaching, but by placing the schools under the jurisdiction of the Presbytery. That was the ancient law of Scotland, which was relaxed in 1861, and what was now proposed by the Amendment was a complete innovation? Why? Because it was said that it was the wish of the Scotch people to have the Scriptures read in their schools. As well might it be said that it was the wish of England that there should be compulsory reading of the Scriptures, because in point of fact they were so read in all schools, with a few exceptions. The House had refused the proposal to pass a compulsory clause on the subject; yet it was urged to do so now in the case of Scotland.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the right hon. Gentleman would allow him to observe that the Amendment proposed in the case of the English Education Act was that—

“The Holy Scriptures shall form part of the daily reading and teaching in such school, but no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught therein.”

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had read the whole of the Amendment; but he was entitled to refer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because the reasoning of it was based upon grounds which formed the conclusive argument for rejecting this Amendment. With regard to the language that had been held in reference to the feelings of the Scotch people, he was bound to observe that all the lessons he had received on the theory and practice of the Constitution taught him that the wishes of a country were to be learnt from its representatives, and he must say it was little less than ludicrous when a variety of Gentlemen sitting opposite—most respectable Gentlemen all, aye, and Scotchmen by blood, habit, and character, some of whom had not been able to become representatives of Scotland, and had been rejected by constituencies in Scotland, came forward night after night to deplore the condition of the people of Scotland on this subject in the very teeth of the representatives of Scotland, who declared—and he presumed they were better judges—that this Bill was suitable to the case of their constituents. There were two principles which regulated the conduct of Government and Parliament with respect to this great subject of the education of the people. The first was, that they should respect, as far as possible, the local system of instruction. It was on that account, in a principal degree, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) declined to support the Motion of his right hon. Friend near him (Sir John Pakington). The right hon. Gentleman said that—

“Having voted for freedom of religious teaching when the Committee divided on the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote). He would feel great difficulty in supporting the proposition now before the Committee, because the same freedom that he asked for members of the Church of England he was willing to extend to Dissenters and Roman Catholics.”—[3 Hansard, ciii. 1268.]

There was no doubt that the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) was a restriction of the freedom of religious teaching. The other principle which guided Parliament in the English Bill was equally infringed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and that principle was the clear separation of the State from direct responsibility for religious education. That was a principle which lay at the root of the whole of their proceedings, and he wanted to know whether they were to depart from it now or not? It was idle to suppose that they could allow themselves to be bewitched or fascinated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman required that there should be daily readings of the Scriptures in the schools of Scotland. But if they had the reading of the Scriptures, instruction in them must follow; and now it was proposed for the first time that religious instruction should be made compulsory. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed it because it was very much the custom in the schools; but as it was the custom of the people to attend church on the Sunday, would the hon. and learned Gentleman propose that they should be compelled to go to church? The words which the hon. and learned Gentleman now invited the Committee to vote were but the thin end of his wedge. Having ordered the people of Scotland to have daily religious instruction in the schools, the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded, in consistency, to provide that there should be State Inspectors to look after the instruction. But when Parliament passed the English Education Act two years ago, one of the changes which was felt to be a real and great advantage was the separation of the State from the responsibilities for religious instruction. In Scotland they had got four different sets of Inspectors, belonging to different denominations, all crossing one another in their paths and orbits, to inspect the different schools. And that was the system which the hon. and learned Gentleman invited Parliament to maintain. That was the first consequence. The next was, that the State grants should be given for religious instruction. But they had always contended—and Parliament had so understood in the English Act—that the grants made by public authority, whether from the Exchequer direct or from the rate, should be given in respect of secular, and not of religious instruction. But that was not all. In the 65th clause the hon. and learned Gentleman invited the Committee to leave out the Time-Table, which was one of the great securities for religious liberty. He did not think that either the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, or most of those who voted with him on the former occasion, had considered how far such a course would lead them. One other development was so extraordinary that he was almost unwilling to mention it. The hon. and learned Gentleman said no child was to be compelled to receive instruction in the Scriptures. If not, he (Mr. Gladstone) did not understand why it was that school boards and masters were to be compelled to give it. They might have in a district exclusively Roman Catholic children, the whole of whose parents objected to their receiving religious instruction; and yet the teachers under the provisions of the hon. and learned Gentleman were compelled to give it. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he would not compel the children to receive religious instruction, but he would compel the teachers to give it. But the hon. and learned Gentleman did not stop even there, because he proposed to amend the 73rd clause by striking out the word "secular." In the 68th clause it was provided that the parents should be compelled to cause their children to attend school the whole time the school was open. By striking out the word "secular," therefore, the children would be compelled to attend the whole time that instruction, including religious instruction, was given, though many of them might be unwilling to receive it. Now in objecting to that course, he hoped it would not be supposed that they were indifferent to religious instruction. No such feeling was imputable to them. They stood on the great principles as guides and securities in the English Act—namely, a respect for religious freedom, and their resolute determination to keep the State aloof from all matters of religious controversy, which, if mixed up with their educational system, they believed would poison that system, and convert to mischief and discord that which they hoped would result in the spread of intelligence and peace.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) which he quoted a short while ago was "the Holy Scriptures shall form part of the daily reading and teaching in such schools; but." The words which followed the Amendment were—

"no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught therein."

These were words contained in the Bill and now formed part of the Education Act, although the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet had been rejected.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if the hon. Gentleman turned back to page 1,265 of the book which he had got, he would find this—

"Sir JOHN PAXINGTON said he rose to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, to leave out sub-section 2, and insert 'the Holy Scriptures shall form part of the daily reading and teaching in such school, but no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught therein—'" but according to the practice of the House, what was put from the Chair on that occasion was only the first part of the Amendment, because the remainder was already expressed in the clause. It was true that in speaking on the English Bill he argued the case differently; but he did so because the circumstances of England differed from those of Scotland. In England the denominational system was carried out by means of schools supported by voluntary contributions; but in Scotland the schools were maintained by contributions from the heritors, obtained in such a form as practically to amount to rates. These parochial schools in Scotland, however, were denominational schools inasmuch that they taught the Scriptures and the Shorter Catechism. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair) asked what was the use of making any change by law upon this subject; but he (Mr. G. Hardy), for one, could not admit that the Amendment would, if passed, have the effect of making any such change. The only change that could be made would be to render less stringent the rule which existed at present, by enabling the different religious bodies in Scotland to read the Holy Scriptures according to their own tenets. In arguing this question in the progress of the English Bill he expressed his opinion that it would in any district, where a large body of the population belonged to a particular religion, be expedient to allow them to found schools for the teaching of their own religion rather than to force schools of a different character upon them. In Scotland the mass of the people, though they differed somewhat in matters not connected with religious teaching, were Presbyterian, and, therefore, the same provision that was required in England was not necessary there. With respect to the speech he made on a former occasion, he could only say that it was made upon a Motion of a different character from that now under discussion, a Motion which struck at the very root of the first principle of teaching in England—namely, that the teaching should be according to the formularies and tenets of the people taught. It was utterly impossible to have such a system as had been called "evangelical unsectarian" education. Religious education, in the true sense of the word, was impossible unless it was based upon some definite set of tenets.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government denied that religious instruction was laid down in the earlier period of the parochial system; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that in the Act of 1567 it was distinctly laid down that—

"The youth of the country shall be brought up and instructed in the fear of God and in good manners. And it is good both for their bodies and souls that God's word should be rooted in them."

How, he would ask, was "God's word to be rooted in them," except by means of the Bible? That declaration was repeated in the Acts of 1613, 1663, 1693, and 1803. The Bill now before the House would, if passed as drawn, destroy the system which had existed and had worked well in Scotland for centuries.

MR. GLADSTONE denied that he had quoted from the Act of 1567. What he quoted was Dr. Cooke's description—which he believed to be accurate—of the Act in question, which did not propose religious teaching as the Committee were now asked to prescribe it by passing the Amendment under consideration.

LORD HENRY SCOTT denied that the Amendment would have the effect of compelling dogmatic religious teaching in schools. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had thought it necessary to cast a sneer upon the Scotch Gentlemen in that House who represented English constituencies. Although he (Lord Henry Scott) represented an English constituency, it was not because he was rejected by a Scotch constituency. He wished that the right hon. Gentleman could console himself in the same way. The taunt came with a very bad grace from one who had taken refuge in one constituency because he was rejected by those whom he eagerly sought to represent, and who presided over a Cabinet two Members of which—the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary for Ireland—had been compelled to run away from the constituencies they represented.

a short time ago, one of them to find a refuge in Scotland.

MR. GRAHAM said, that the Petitions presented in favour of this Motion were the result of an organized movement in Scotland, which misrepresented the real character of the Bill as one for the exclusion of the Bible from the schools. The people did not want the Bible excluded from their schools, and they did not think a falsehood was being told to them in the name of religion, and they therefore signed those Petitions. But their opinions on the religious question in connection with the Bill might be well learnt from the three great religious Assemblies that represented the country. Since the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) was carried those Assemblies had met in Scotland. In the Established Church Assembly Principal Tulloch, a clergyman of great distinction, stated that the Bill of the Lord Advocate offered adequate security for religious teaching in the national schools. The Rev. Dr. Elder, in the Free Church Assembly, stated that the Bill offered every existing guarantee for religious education in the national schools, and a resolution in that sense was passed by a majority of two to one. And in the United Presbyterian Assembly a resolution was unanimously passed condemning the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. A movement like this, founded on a desire to obstruct, deserved no respect, and he hoped it would meet with the condemnation of the Committee.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE wished the Committee to know that in the General Assembly of the Established Church a resolution approving the Resolution of May 7 was carried by 247 to 42, the minority being Principal Tulloch's party. With regard to the other Assemblies of Scotland, the principle of their action appeared to be a deadly hatred of the Established Church, and therefore their resolutions were not much to be regarded. Both the Prime Minister and the Lord Advocate had taunted those who were Scotchmen by blood and lineage with being aliens. Had the Prime Minister never stood for a constituency which had rejected him? When the right hon. Gentleman was rejected by Lancashire—the bone and sinew of England—he took refuge in Greenwich, and even there, when he had let go his last anchor, he could not find it again without offering a bribe to his constituents. They were told they were to fall back on the three R's. But in teaching reading to a child, what was that child to read? Was he to read the right hon. Gentleman's speeches delivered in Lancashire or in Stranraer? The child must be taught to read from the Scriptures, from which every Scotchman was taught to read; but the 65th clause of this Bill proscribed religious instruction during every hour of the day, except at the beginning and at the end of the teaching.

Lord Henry Scott

MR. NEWDEGATE: It appears from the observations made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, with respect to education in this country, that the right hon. Gentleman has advanced considerably upon the principle of 1870 towards the secular system. What are we dealing with? We are dealing with Scotch education, and I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if his mind was the same in 1870 upon the subject, why he did not include Scotland in the measure of that year? Now, it is perfectly well known that he did not make that attempt, because he had reason to believe that if those Members who were distinctly in favour of religious education being considered as an essential portion of the conditions for the reception of a grant or of rates in the case of English schools, had had the aid which they had a right to expect from Scotland, that the Elementary Education Act of 1870 would have been modified in the sense of the Scotch system. In the course of this discussion a good deal has been said about the views of the Scotch people, and as to what is termed "the use and wont" of Scotland in the matter of education. Those terms "use and wont" describe the common law of Scotland in the matter of education. The common law of Scotland has, in the words of John Knox, been steadily directed to the "godly upbringing of youth." The Scotch people perfectly understand what they mean by religious education. They mean instruction in the Bible. In 1870, when speaking on the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Augustus Hervey), I remember asking this question—"You say you are in favour of religious education; what religion do you mean?" But

I received no answer. The Scotch people however, have answered that question for generations for themselves, and they claim in this matter to be treated as a nation—that, as long as you leave them with a separate Code and separate administration of justice, and recognize the difference between Scotch and English education in other respects, you shall respect also their religious feelings in the matter of education according to the use and wont of the common law of their country. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of freedom, and of endangering religious freedom. I ask what greater invasion of religious freedom there can be than that—because in England we have a different law—this House should declare that the peculiar freedom of Scotland shall be sacrificed in this matter of religious education? Why, the argument runs all the other way. Whither may not his desire for uniformity carry the right hon. Gentleman? It will, I suppose, next induce him to say, because in Ireland the Church has been disestablished, and because, unfortunately for Ireland, we have been obliged to pass Coercion Acts, therefore England shall have her Church disestablished also, and England, like Ireland, shall submit to Coercion Acts. Then, by-and-by, he will extend the same thing to Scotland. Why, there never was an argument more misplaced than when the right hon. Gentleman appealed to freedom. In what does freedom consist but in respect for the national will? You cannot legislate for a nation by sections so small that each community shall have its peculiar fancy enacted by law; but you can do this in dealing with nations. This you can do. When you have entered into co-partnership, as England has done with Scotland by the Act of Union, you can respect the conditions of your bargain; you can respect the freedom which the Scottish people stipulated should be reserved to them, and especially in the matters of education and of religion. Why, the next thing the Scottish people may expect may reasonably be this, from the right hon. Gentleman's state of mind—that he will argue, if he does not disestablish the Church of England that, because an Episcopacy exists in England, therefore it should be enforced in Scotland. Sir, this blind adherence to uniformity is, in fact, a disguise for tyranny. Now, whence did this system come from, which is becoming so popular in this House, that education should be compulsory? Where did it originate? It originated during the first French Revolution with Danton, who proclaimed from the tribune that every child is—first, the child of the State, and then, the child of its parents; and acting upon that principle he and Robespierre attempted to grasp the guidance of the education of every child in France, but they failed. And if you adopt this principle, the difficulties which surround you in meeting the great variety of opinion which prevails, divided as it is between Scotch opinion, English opinion, and Irish opinion, will lead you, not to the establishment of freedom everywhere, but to despotism throughout. Therefore, Sir, being thoroughly and sincerely anxious to maintain the freedom of education for which Scotland stipulated for at the Union, I give my hearty support to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon).

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 204: Majority 44.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 7th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, The Earl of Longford and The Earl of Charlemont added.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) and Act (No. 2, 1864) Amendment* (130).

Second Reading—Local Government Supplemental* (103).

Select Committee—Petroleum* (104), nominated. Committee—Gas and Water Orders Confirmation* (101); Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing) (re-comm.) (78-106).

Third Reading—Church Seats* (59), and passed.

THE GUARDS.

NOTICE OF MOTION WITHDRAWN.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I put on the Paper for this evening a Notice that I would call attention to the case of the officers of the Guards who were gazetted to the rank of ensign and lieutenant in the month of October, 1871, and that I would move an Address praying Her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased not to deprive them of that rank, or of the position they hold in the Army. I have now to state that within the last 48 hours I have had the honour of an interview with His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and the result of that interview is that it will be wholly unnecessary for me to trouble your Lordships with the matter. I shall, therefore, with your Lordships' permission, withdraw my Notice.

ARMY—THE PURCHASE AND THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS.—QUESTION.

LORD ABINGER asked the Under Secretary of State for War, What steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take to remedy the injustice to the captains of the Purchase Corps in consequence of their supersession by the first captains of the Scientific Corps? He understood it to be proposed to make the first captains of Artillery majors, and also to give captains of Engineers higher rank. That proposition, if carried out, would be very unjust to the officers of the rest of the Army. By the system adopted in Woolwich garrison batteries were interchangeable with field batteries, and the number of field officers in the Artillery and Engineers would be very much larger than that of the field officers in the Infantry or in the Cavalry, and the proportions of officers in the several branches would be altered by this change. There would be a great supersession of officers in the Line and Cavalry. The officers of the Scientific Corps had taken their commissions with the knowledge that their promotion would be slow, but as against that disadvantage they had received their commissions without purchase. In the case of the other branches the officers had purchased their rank, while the Government still retained the purchase money. If the Secretary for War did not step in to prevent such an injustice, 331 officers who had not purchased would supersede 831 officers who had paid for their commissions.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he did not admit the existence of the alleged injustice. The subject had been for a considerable time before the public, and had several times been brought to their Lordships' notice, and therefore it would not be necessary for him to dwell upon it at length. In 1867 a Committee of the House of Commons reported on this subject, and recommended a very elaborate and, he believed, a very expensive system of retirement as the best remedy for the stagnation in the promotion in these corps. That recommendation had been under the consideration of the then Secretary for War, but no action had been taken on it, he believed, because of its expensiveness. On the accession of the present Government further inquiries were made, and it appeared to the Secretary of State for War and to the military authorities, that it would be both more economical and more conducive to the efficiency of the service, if, instead of devising a system of retirement only, they could create the flow of promotion which was desired without, of necessity, losing the services of valuable officers. As to the Scientific Corps, he might observe that in most foreign armies the commanders of batteries were field officers, and in all countries were looked upon as holding more important posts than they were in the British Army. It must be moreover recollected that the number of men in an Infantry company was about 60 or 70—that in a cavalry company about 50; while a first captain of Artillery had about 200 or 250 men under his command, together with very valuable materiel. During the Autumn Manœuvres it was seen to be very desirable that the officers in command of batteries of artillery should act with greater independence than they had hitherto done, and the Commander-in-Chief had determined to allow them a wider discretion than they had formerly possessed, and he had issued an Order to that effect. Under these circumstances, the Secretary of State thought that he would be justified in giving these officers higher rank than they had hitherto held, and for the future the first captains in the Scientific Corps would hold the rank of majors. Then, as to the question of injustice. The War Department had inquired into the matter with the greatest care, and they found the average service of officers of the Line on attaining the rank of major was, on full pay, 17 8-12ths years; unattached, 18 6-12ths; and that the service of the senior captains in the Line next for promotion was 20. The average of those three classes together was 18 6-12ths. The service of the senior officer in the Scientific Corps now to be promoted was in the Artillery, 24; and in the Engineers, 25 10-12ths. The service of the junior was, in the Artillery, 16 10-12ths, and in the Engineers, 16 years. The average length of service of officers in the Line on promotion to the rank of major would not, it was estimated, in future exceed 18 years. The average length of service of officers of Artillery, on attaining the rank of major, would be, in the normal state, 20½ years. It would thus be seen that the supersession would be slight and temporary; and his answer to the noble Lord, therefore, was that the Government did not see any injustice, and did not propose to apply any remedy such as that indicated in the noble Lord's question.

The Duke of Richmond

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he thought the speech just delivered by the noble Marquess one of the best he had ever heard in favour of the purchase system. He only wished that he had had half the arguments employed by the noble Lord to adduce last year when he opposed the abolition of that system. The officers who had paid for their commissions had done so in the belief that they would improve their position in the Army; but it now appeared that advantages were to be given to the officers in the Scientific Corps at the expense of officers who had purchased. The injustice of the charge was shown in the fact that the Government were giving the benefit to officers of the Artillery at the expense of officers of the Line. The proposal involved the placing of 330 officers of the Artillery over 830 officers of the Line, all of whom had purchased their commissions upon the faith that, by so doing, their promotion would be more rapid. He must express his protest against such a system, as calculated to interfere with vested rights in an unjust manner.

LORD SANDHURST said, that he could not but consider the reply of the noble Marquess as eminently unsatisfactory. He need not remind their Lordships that he (Lord Sandhurst) had always been an advocate for the abolition of purchase for reasons stated last year, to which it was unnecessary further to allude. But he had never suggested, and he had never conceived, that among the results likely to flow from the abolition of purchase, an accelerated rate of promotion was likely to be found: he must, therefore, take exception to the statement of the noble Marquess in this respect, more especially when he referred to the likelihood of subalterns in the Line succeeding to companies in eight years. He (Lord Sandhurst) believed that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had never made a suggestion to such an effect, or afforded any data according to which the conclusion could possibly be arrived at. It might be true that, as stated by the noble Marquess, field batteries in some countries were commanded by field officers. On this he had no exact knowledge; but this he was able to state, with some degree of certainty—that in some of the Continental armies the batteries were stronger in point of guns than those in Her Majesty's service. He could not say how it was with the German Army; but in the Austrian and Russian Armies there were eight guns to a battery. Thus the command of a battery in those armies was a far more important duty than it was with us. But he was compelled to revert to the figures stated by his noble and gallant Friend opposite. It was impossible not to admit that the facts, thus brought out, were of an astonishing character. Thus, if the proposed change be carried out, the result would be the presence of 14 field officers to a brigade of Artillery. Now, assuming that the brigade of Artillery consisted of eight batteries, they had, then, the proportion of 14 field officers, 8 captains, and 24 subalterns to that brigade, or 14 field officers to 32 captains and subalterns, or about a proportion of 4 to 9. In the Infantry, they had in a battalion of 10 companies, 3 field officers, 10 captains, and 20 subalterns. That was 3 field officers to 30, or a proportion of 1 to 10. In the Cavalry, they had 2 field officers, 8 captains, and 16 subalterns, or a proportion of 1 field officer to 12 other officers. It was thus apparent that at the very time that purchase had fallen away from the Guards and Line, with whatever supposed advantages of promotion it might confer, extraordinary advantages were conferred in the artillery. Now, the leading principle of the abolition of purchase was the abolition of privileges and of privileged corps. All superior means of promotion had, in accordance with this principle, been taken away from the Guards. They had, then, this further corollary—that at the very time that privileges were taken away from one set of corps, privileges of a like character were conferred upon another corps, with the results of disadvantage to the corps that were not favoured. The distinction drawn by the noble Duke opposite between field artillery and garrison artillery was perfectly correct; the horse and field batteries were certainly important commands; but it was impossible to assert the like of garrison batteries. With regard to promotion, it was perfectly well known that Artillery captains when in a campaign were in a position of considerable advantage in comparison with those of the Line. Thus, if they achieved distinction, horse and field batteries were noticed by generals in command in their despatches as if they were separate corps, the officers winning brevet promotion as a certain consequence. It was now proposed to give them a step before they go into action, and so to add to their already considerable facilities of advancement. There was one point to which he must advert—namely, to the assertion that artillery were likely to play a more important part in future wars than they had hitherto done. There were no grounds for such a belief, or that the improvement of materiel generally conferred a signal superiority on one arm. The truth was, that defeat would be inflicted upon an enemy, and victory would fall to one side as heretofore, according to the skilful combination of the several arms, and not because of a fancy for one particular arm, and forgetfulness of the others. Before sitting down, he would take the liberty of reading to their Lordships an answer to an inquiry made by him of a gallant friend of his who had passed the Staff College. The officer referred to had been in many campaigns, and was a distinguished man. The following was his answer:—"My captain's commission is dated May, 1859; my first commission, October, 1854; I have paid £2,300 for commissions; officers, now my juniors, who will supersede me, 218." He must, therefore, beg to express his concurrence with the noble and gallant Lord opposite with regard to the imme-mediate question before the House; but he would further express the hope that the proposed reform might not be carried into execution until time had been afforded for further consideration.

Lord Sandhurst

THE MARQUESS OF HERTFORD said, he was disappointed with the answer given by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), and urged the inexpediency of any course which would convince officers of the Army that they were being treated with injustice. There was an uneasy and distrustful feeling among the officers of the Army at large, because, as it was not known what innovations were coming, every man feared it would be his turn next to suffer injustice. He trusted the Secretary for War would look into this matter carefully, and see if he could not avoid carrying out the measure under consideration.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR (LICENSING)

BILL—(No. 78-106.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of Amendments, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY suggested that the Bill should be recommitted, in order that their Lordships might be able to discuss the Amendments to be proposed on the Report with greater freedom.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was ready to accept the suggestion of the noble Marquess.

Order discharged; and Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House forthwith.

House in Committee accordingly.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was now proposed that the Bill should come into operation immediately after it passed, instead of on the 1st September next, as originally intended. To effect that amendment it would be necessary to strike out Clause 3, and to provide a machinery for new licensing bodies.

Clause 3 struck out accordingly.

Clause 4 (Prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors without license).

Amendment moved, to add at end of clause—

"And the court may, if it thinks expedient so to do, declare all intoxicating liquor found in the possession of any such person as last aforesaid, and the vessels containing such liquor, to be forfeited."—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

Also words containing provisions to meet the case of the death or insolvency of the license holder.

Amendments agreed to.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he rose for the purpose of moving an addition to the clause, which, he believed, would have the effect of meeting one of the great necessities of the Bill—namely, the want of an adequate provision for the regulation of the retail sale of wine and spirits in bottles over the counter. His Amendment was in strict accordance with the Preamble of the Bill, which stated that the object of the Bill was to amend the law relating to the regulation of public-houses and other places in which intoxicating liquors are sold. The first portion of his Amendment proposed to make it necessary that all these licenses should be granted by the magistrates, and the second that the persons to whom the licenses were granted should be bound to close at the same hour, and should in other respects be subject to the same regulations, as the holders of the ordinary licenses. The noble Earl had incorporated the provisions of Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson's Act of 1869 in this, and, consequently, would probably agree with the principle of the Amendment he was about to propose. The advantage of the Amendment would be that if the granting of these licenses were left to the magistrates they would at all events know that they would be issued subject to the wants and necessities of the particular district, for which the applications were made; whereas under the present system it was to the advantage of the Revenue and to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Excise from whom they were now obtainable should grant as many as possible, without reference to the wants of the district. One of the greatest means of preventing drunkenness was stringent control over places where intoxicating liquors were sold, and therefore the Amendment would tend to prevent drunkenness and to ensure a better regulation of licenses.

Moved, to insert the following clause:—

"No person shall sell by retail any intoxicating liquor under the authority of any retail license which such persons shall have obtained as a wholesale spirit dealer or wholesale wine dealer from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, except in premises occupied and used exclusively for the sale therein of intoxicating liquors, unless such person shall have first obtained from the licensing justices a certificate authorizing such sale in premises not exclusively so occupied and used. Every person selling by retail any intoxicating liquor in contravention of this section shall be deemed to have sold the same without being duly licensed. Every person holding a certificate under this section from the licensing justices shall be subject to the same regulations as to hours of closing and police supervision as persons holding a retail license under the section of 32 and 33 Victoria chap. 27."—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was surprised that the noble Duke could think it possible that he should concur in an Amendment relating to what were called grocers' licenses, and proposed solely in the interests of the liquor monopoly. It was true that he had incorporated Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson's Act in this Bill. That Act provided that certain houses for the sale of liquors to be consumed off the premises, as beerhouses and wine shops, should obtain a license from the magistrates, although they had not previously been compelled to do so. In that respect the present Bill made no alteration, for all houses which had hitherto been required to obtain a magistrate's license would continue under the same obligation. But the noble Duke proposed to bring a new class of houses under the magistrate's licenses, and his Amendment would act against the grocers in the interest of the monopoly of public-house keepers and others. He trusted the House would not accept the proposal. One of the great difficulties they had to encounter in dealing with this subject was the existence of a kind of vested interest in licenses, and the noble Duke's proposal amounted to the creation of an entirely new set of vested interests. The result would be that if they desired to make any further amendment in the law at any future time their difficulties in this direction would be increased, and they would be met with even a stronger cry of privilege and monopoly. If these licenses, as at present granted, had given rise to any gross abuse connected with public morals or public order, he should then be willing to admit that in embarking upon any system of restraining monopoly they were bound to include this particular branch of the trade. He could not admit the right of Parliament to fetter trade, as was proposed by the noble Duke, or to create a new monopoly. He had himself prepared one or two Amendments which would, he thought, improve the Bill as it stood. One of the hardships of the Bill as it stood was the case, for example, of a public-house which under the Bill, would be obliged to close at 10.0 or 11 p.m., while the grocer's shop next door might sell liquors in bottles to a much later hour. This was an injustice and might lead to abuses, and the remedy he proposed was to bring all houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors under the same law as regards the hours of closing. Another mode in which he proposed to amend the Bill was by subjecting both licensed victuallers and grocers to identical provisions and penalties.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY wished to say a few words in support of the proposal of the noble Duke. The noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) seemed to have forgotten the interests of the temperance cause. There were certain persons who for a great number of years had been allowed to sell intoxicating liquors in open vessels, and 10 years ago another class of traders was created, who were allowed to sell the same class of articles in closed vessels. These last-named persons were the pets of the Government of the day. It was necessary to stimulate the class into rapid growth in order to give effect to a certain French treaty, which was much admired at the time, but was not quite so popular at the present day. It was now said that the whole of the precautions in order to restrain the publican from misusing his license had been insufficient; that there were too many places where liquor was sold in open vessels, and therefore the temperance agitators successfully urged his noble Friend to bring in a measure which should in some degree correct the evils complained of. But his noble Friend was mistaken in imagining that there were no complaints of the way in which the grocers conducted their business. They might be maligned—as he believed the licensed victuallers were in many cases maligned—but they were charged with selling intoxicating liquors so recklessly as to occasion drunkenness and immorality among the people; and there could be no doubt that it was equally in the power of either class to do so. Therefore, his noble Friend asked that the same measure should be meted out to both classes of traders alike with regard to the number of hours during which they should conduct their business, and the penalties they should incur when they broke the law. He concurred in the principle; but the net result of all this had been the creation of a class of traders who were able not only to compete with the licensed victuallers, but, without any control on the part of the magistrates, to create all those evils which were attributed to the beerhouse in times past. He hoped the House would render the legislation on this question consistent, and would take care that while they were closing the avenues of intoxication in one direction they were not opening them in another.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET was understood to say that, having heard the Amendments which the noble Earl proposed to introduce into his Bill, he was prepared to support the measure of the Government, though in the first instance opposed to it.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY addressed a few words to the House, which were inaudible.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH thought there was a slight fallacy in the argument of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond). There was an important distinction between legislating against private vice and breaches of public order, and the difference ought to be kept in view while legislating on this matter. The law had no right to interfere with a man who chose to commit the sin of drinking in his own house, though it had a right to punish a man who paraded his mischievous drunkenness in the public streets. There was a fallacy also in what the noble Duke said on the question of an equal law. An equal law was that which dealt impartially in like cases, not a law which dealt alike in unlike and unequal cases. The case of the grocer who sold his wares in closed bottles, to be taken away, and within whose house consequently no disorder would arise, was not on a par with that of the licensed victualler or beerhouse keeper, who sold the liquor for consumption within his own house, where disturbances often arose in consequence. It could not, therefore, be said to be an equal law which measured out the same punishment to both. There was a vast difference between drinking on and drinking off the premises, and it was a fallacy to suppose that it was an equal law which dealt equally with both cases.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND wished their Lordships to understand, before dividing upon his proposal, that it was not intended to apply to wine merchants, but only to the other classes of traders in intoxicating liquor. With regard to the remarks of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough), he seemed to think that the man who sold the drink was the real culprit, and that it did not matter how much liquor a man bought, or how much he drank, provided he drank it outside the public-house door, or within his own house.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH reminded the noble Duke that he confined his observations to the distinction between a man getting drunk in a public-house and in his own house.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he desired to make a few observations in reference to the remark of the noble Duke, that he did not intend his proposal to apply to wine merchants. If the noble Duke's Amendment were carried, the more stringent provisions of the Bill would apply to persons who, in addition to intoxicating liquors, sold certain harmless articles, such as tea or tobacco; whereas if he dealt exclusively in liquors he was not subject to such restrictions. It was thought that this grocers' interest might be safely invaded, and therefore we were to have this extraordinary, absurd, and preposterous anomaly. If their Lordships agreed to the Amendment the Bill could not possibly pass into law.

LORD DYNEVOR made some observations, which were inaudible.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that after listening to what had been said by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), he was bound to admit that there was a great deal of force in the argument he had adduced, and although he should very much like to place this class of house under the supervision of the magistrates, yet he perceived that if this were done while persons who sold nothing but wine and spirits were exempted from such supervision, an injustice would be committed, and the condition of the law would be anomalous. He did not think he should be justified, therefore, in persevering with the Amendment; but he should propose to take the decision of the House on the question of the license going before the magistrates, unless his noble Friend would agree to the introduction of the words which he proposed to add to the latter part of the clause, with the view of putting these houses under the supervision of the police, both as to hours and adulteration.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, few persons would have the candour and the fairness to admit there was some force in the arguments of an opponent, as the noble Duke had done on the present occasion.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn; clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Occupier of unlicensed premises liable for sale of liquor).

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY pointed out that the occupier of an unlicensed house in which intoxicating liquors were sold would be required to show he knew nothing about it, or, in other words, to prove a negative.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it rarely happened that the onus probandi was thrown on the occupier; but he in his turn would make an admission of the validity of his opponent's argument, and would alter the clause by striking out the words "unless he proves that he was not privy or consenting to the sale," and substituting the words—"if it be proved that he was privy or consenting to the sale."

Amendment made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 22, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 23 (Analysis of Intoxicating Liquors).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY proposed to leave out the words "public-house inspector under this Act," and insert—"superintendent of police or other person authorized in writing by the police authority so to do."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had pointed out on a former occasion that the inspectors of police were the proper officers to perform the work of inspection under the clause. The Amendment of the noble Earl, however, would carry the power of appointing inspectors beyond the limits of the police. To that he objected.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had no objection to substitute for the words "or other person" the words "or other constable."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND expressed himself satisfied with the alteration.

Amendment made accordingly.

Clause further amended and agreed to.

Clause 25 (Times of closing).

On the Motion of the Earl of KIMBERLEY, Amendments made, the area being made to include "the City of London and the liberties thereof;" and the hour of re-opening being altered from 7 o'clock to 6 o'clock in the morning.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved to leave out, page 10, lines 8 and 10, the words ("the hours of 10 o'clock and 6 o'clock on the following morning,") and to insert—

("Such hours, not being earlier than 10 o'clock at night nor later than 6 o'clock on the following morning, as the licensing justices shall appoint.")

His impression was that drinking intoxicating liquors was not in itself a sin, and that people had as much right to drink beer as to eat mutton, so long as they did not overdo it. He did not think it fair that, because the inhabitants of Manchester wished to enforce the closing of public-houses at 10, the population of Hertfordshire should be obliged to adopt that hour also. There was, no doubt, in the North a strong feeling in favour of early closing; but it was, he thought, somewhat hard that because the inhabitants of that part of England found that their morality could not stand having public-houses open till 11, the morality of those who did not find themselves in a similar position in the South should have no regard paid to it. What he desired to effect, therefore, was that the law should be made local in its application on that point, seeing that the demand for closing public-houses at 10 was local. It would cause a great amount of dissatisfaction if they insisted on public-houses being closed on fair and market nights at 10 o'clock. He saw no objection to allowing the authorities in each county to fix the hours of closing within the limits of his Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the case of such occasions as fairs or markets was met by the law relating to occasional licenses, so that no inconvenience would be produced by the Bill in that respect. As to the general question of the hours of closing, it was one which was, no doubt, beset with considerable difficulties. He could assure his noble Friend that besides being inundated with communications, it had been his lot to receive numerous deputations, each of which held on the subject the most conflicting opinions, yet each of which urged him to adopt its own particular views as being those entertained by the great majority throughout the country. He had quite as much pressure put upon him to make the Bill more stringent as in the opposite direction; and three of the largest towns in England after London — namely, Liverpool, Leeds, and Manchester — had voted resolutions and sent up deputations to him to beg that the Bill should either be kept as it was, or that its provisions should be rendered stronger. That showed that a strong feeling existed in the country upon that point in favour of restriction. He doubted much indeed whether noble Lords were aware how great the feeling was throughout the country in favour of early closing, and he must confess that he thought 10 was a very reasonable hour in rural districts. It was not the respectable labourer who frequented the public-house after 10 o'clock for the purposes of refreshment. They were generally in bed at that hour. Those who went there after 10 o'clock went there for the purposes of disorder and the concoction of crime. To give power to the parties to fix the hour of closing at their discretion would, he might add, give rise to great anomalies, inasmuch as the hour might vary in every district.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there would be great difficulty in convincing him that there was anything wrong in drinking beer, or that it was the business of Parliament to take care that the labouring man did not drink too much. Their business was only to take care that public-houses were properly conducted. However, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 29 (Forfeiture of license on repeated convictions).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY desired to draw the attention of the noble Earl to the effect of the clause. The clause proposed not only that the license should be forfeited, but that the person holding it should be disqualified for a term of five years from the date of the third conviction, and the premises might also be disqualified from receiving any license for a term of two years. The result of that legislation as regarded the owner of the premises would be that he would evict the occupier after his first conviction, so as to prevent the premises becoming disqualified. Surely that was rather Draconian legislation? The noble Earl talked of the importance of having some self-acting law that should be independent of the sympathies of magistrates, and he had so altered it that the leniency of the magistrate should not frustrate his object. But the noble Earl might carry this too far. He might make the law so severe as to excite the pity of the magistrates, and there would be no convictions at all. He suggested that the disqualification should not arise unless such premises had at any previous time within 20 years have been occupied by a person whose license had been forfeited during such occupation.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, there was a very general opinion on both sides of the House that provided the principle was not carried too far, it was fair, and just, and expedient in the interests of the public that the owners should be made to a certain extent responsible for the good order of their houses. That being so, the question resolved itself into one of degree. An unanswerable reason why they were justified in making the owners responsible was, that they possessed a monopoly. The House should never forget that the license did not attach to the house—though from custom and general feeling, except something were done actually justifying its forfeiture, its annual renewal was never refused. By that means a special Parliamentary value had been given to the house by the monopoly; and that being so, Parliament and the public had a perfect right to require that the owners, as well as the occupiers, should suffer when the law was violated. The noble Marquess had hinted that there was something Draconian in the legislation proposed; but he (the Earl of Kimberley) would remind him that the present law enacted for certain offences, the forfeiture of licenses and disqualification of premises for two, three, and even five years; and he could not think it an unreasonable proposition that after three offences had been committed the house should be liable to be disqualified. The clause, moreover, left it to the discretion of the licensing magistrates. He had introduced a series of securities for the owners, and when he was told that the owner could evict after a first offence, he replied that it was purely a question for the owner's consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY urged that the provision would necessarily render public-house property and trade extremely precarious, while the machinery affecting the owner might have the very opposite effect from that intended by the noble Earl. He could not however press his suggestion.

Clause agreed to.

EARL GREY moved, after Clause 42, to insert a new clause, making it lawful for a town council or other local authority to take the retail trade in intoxicating liquors within the district for which it acts into its own hands; in which case certain rules—which the Amendment set forth at length—should come into force. The noble Earl said, an opinion was entertained by a considerable number of persons that the best mode of dealing with the sale of intoxicating liquors would be to establish a system of free trade, subject to a rigid enforcement of strict regulations; and he inferred from the speech of his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), on the second reading of the Bill, that he was favourably disposed towards that view, though he was not prepared at present to act upon it. He quite agreed with his noble Friend in thinking both that there was much to be said in favour of that principle, and also that it would be a hazardous experiment to adopt it at present, as the country was not as yet prepared for it. If, then, we were not to have free trade in intoxicating liquors under strict regulations, we must fall back upon monopoly of some kind or other. Hitherto the privilege of selling liquors had been entrusted to certain selected persons. That was the principle on which the present Bill proceeded. Even his noble Friend admitted that this was not altogether the most satisfactory arrangement that could be devised, and though it might be the most practical mode of dealing with the question, it was undoubtedly liable to great objections. Some of these objections were stated in the other House of Parliament last year by the Secretary for the Home Department, who showed most justly that you could not establish a monopoly of this character in the hands of private individuals without leading to those evils which are usually caused by the creation of monopolies; and it was found in practice that, however strict the regulations established, it was very difficult to enforce them and prevent abuses. One inconvenience was that, as a matter of fact, power was placed in the hands of this selected body exercising a monopoly to levy a tax on the public. Another objection was the constitution of the body by whom the licenses were granted to the selected persons. The power entrusted to the selecting body enabled it to determine who should be the persons to be invested with a lucrative privilege; to grant it to one candidate and to refuse it to another purely at its own discretion. This was necessarily a power of a somewhat invidious character, and might be exercised from personal motives apart from the interests of the public. Since, then, these difficulties existed—in respect of free trade on the one hand, and in respect of the creation of a monopoly on the other—the question remained to be considered whether some plan might not be devised to meet these objections. That object, he believed, might be attained by the clause he proposed, which, while retaining the monopoly of the sale of intoxicating liquors, entrusted that monopoly not to private individuals for their own benefit, but to some public authority. This principle had never been acted upon in this country; but it had been so, apparently with great success, in Sweden. He would call the attention of their Lordships, for a moment, to a system pursued at Gottenburg, of which an interesting account was sometime ago given by Mr. Rathbone, the Member for Liverpool, in a speech to his constituents, which was referred to as well deserving consideration by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in bringing forward his Bill of last year. This experiment has been more fully described in a pamphlet recently published by Mr. Marshall. It appears that in 1865 a certain number of persons in that town formed themselves into an association to buy up the licenses of the public-houses, with the view of placing the control in the hands of the local authorities for the benefit of the public, and not for individuals. The number of licenses was consequently greatly reduced, and the public-houses were in fact kept in the hands of the local authorities. They did not attempt to make a profit by this scheme, but they established a scheme by which spirits were sold on behalf of a company which in fact represented the Corporation of Gothenburg. They appointed managers who were entrusted with the management of refreshment houses for the sale both of liquors and of food and other refreshments. So far as regarded the sale of spirits they were the mere servants of the company, and were allowed no profit on their sale; but they were permitted to sell tea and coffee with other articles of refreshment and food on their own account. The managers, therefore, had no interest, but the reverse, in the sale of spirits. The profits derived from the concern were paid into the corporate funds. The result had been a great decrease in the consumption of intoxicating liquors, a consequent diminution of drunkenness, and a very great improvement in the conduct of the people generally. He knew their Lordships did not like statistics and figures, and he would not therefore trouble them with those that had been furnished to him to show the success of the system, except to mention one fact which he thought very remarkable, as showing the improvement it had caused. In 1865 the cases of delirium tremens reported to have occurred in Gothenburg numbered 118; in 1867 they were only 14. Something like the Gothenburg system he proposed to introduce into this country. The clause which he moved would give a town council, or other local authority, the power of taking the retail trade in liquor for consumption on the premises into its own hands, and, when the local authority had determined to do this, certain regulations, which he had sketched in 12 rules, would come into force. The local authority would be entitled to demand licenses from the Excise; no new licenses would be afterwards granted to other persons; all vested interests would be protected and existing business would have to be purchased, if compulsorily, for a price to be fixed by arbitration. The clause was permissive in this respect—that it did not apply to any place in which the representatives of the ratepayers had not determined to try the experiment; but, beyond this, the clause did not in any way embody the principle of what was called the Permissive Prohibitory Bill, to which he strongly objected as highly unjust and inexpedient. The clause he proposed would not enable the local authority under colour of taking the trade into its own hands to try to stop it. The authorities would be bound to make due provision for meeting the public requirements, but in such a manner as to get rid of the evils of the present system. If their Lordships would examine the clause they would perceive that regulations were introduced to give an appeal to the magistrates, and ultimately to the Secretary of State, if the local authority should neglect to make proper provision for the fair wants of the population in respect of a supply of liquors. It was a great recommendation of the system that it would give the ratepayers and their representatives greater influence than they now possessed; and there was a wide difference between empowering the local authority to stop the trade and investing it with control. Further, the system might be made the means of aiding the local funds, upon which there was an increasing pressure; and municipal administration, by reducing the number of houses, would attain economy, which would increase the surplus to be added to the rates. It was possible the clause might be amended in detail; but he hoped its principle would be accepted. The noble Earl then moved the insertion of the clause.

Earl Grey

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY hoped his noble Friend (Earl Grey) would not be disappointed at the announcement that the Government could not accept the clause. He was glad, however, his noble Friend had taken the opportunity of explaining a system which, he said, worked well in another country, and which, no doubt, was worthy the consideration of Parliament. But, for his own part, he could not avoid stating that he felt very great doubt whether the local authorities in this country could be safely entrusted with the management of this matter. The whole of the machinery of public-houses was of such a nature, and the influences in connection with the liquor traffic was such, that he was apprehensive of the results—without much more inquiry and consideration than had been given to the subject—if this power were placed in the hands of local authorities. The essential principle of the Gothenburg system was this—that provision was made for the sale of spirits by persons who had no pecuniary interest in the sale, but who made profit by the sale of non-intoxicants and food, so that they had no motive for unduly pressing the sale of spirits. Now, he (the Earl of Kimberley) was free to confess he had considerable doubts whether we had not gone too far in the direction of restriction, and whether it might not be ultimately necessary to somewhat retrace our steps. As long as we had to deal with a system of monopoly, it was essential that the monopoly should be subject to proper regulation; but to break down the monopoly itself it would be requisite to have practically free trade, with severe police regulations, to prevent abuses. He was not at present prepared to introduce this clause into the Bill. That Bill he believed to be sound in principle for the regulation of a monopoly; but the principle of the proposed clause was altogether different, and he did not think it would be possible or politic to introduce two systems at the same time into one Bill.

Amendment negatived.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY proposed a new clause to follow Clause 46:—

“Where any tenant of any licensed premises is convicted of an offence against this Act, and such offence is one the repetition of which may render the premises liable to be disqualified from receiving a license for any period, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the licensing justices to serve, in manner provided by this Act, notice of such conviction on the owner of the premises.

“The owner of any licensed premises, for the purposes of this Act, shall mean the person whose name appears in the assessment for the relief of the poor as the owner of such premises:

“Where any order of a court of summary jurisdiction declaring any licensed premises to be disqualified from receiving a license for any period has been made, the court shall cause such order to be served on the owner of such premises, where the owner is not the occupier, with the addition of a statement that the court will hold a petty sessions at a time and place therein specified, at which the owner may appear and appeal against such order on all or any of the following grounds, but on no other grounds:

(a.) That notice, as required by this Act, has not been served on him of a prior offence which on repetition renders the premises liable to be disqualified from receiving a license at any period, or

(b.) That the tenant by whom the offence was committed held under a contract made prior to the commencement of this Act, and that the owner could not legally have evicted the tenant in the interval between the commission of the offence, in respect of which the disqualifying order was made, and the receipt by him of the notice of the immediately preceding offence which on repetition renders the premises liable to be disqualified from receiving a license at any period, or.

(c.) That the offence in respect of which the disqualifying order was made occurred so soon after the receipt of such last-mentioned notice that the owner, notwithstanding he had legal power to evict the tenant, could not with reasonable diligence have exercised that power in the interval which occurred between the said notice and the second offence.

"If the owner appear at the time and place specified, and at such sessions, or any adjournment thereof, satisfy the court that he is entitled to have the order cancelled on any of the grounds aforesaid, the court shall thereupon direct such order to be cancelled, and the same shall be void."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY proposed to amend the proposal of the noble Earl by prescribing some period after notice within which a second offence on the part of the tenant would not involve the owner in any penalty. If some provision of that kind were not inserted the result would be to degrade the trade, because the owners would have to protect themselves by inserting in their agreements a power of immediate eviction.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that under the present law the owners were, without so much protection as this Bill would afford, equally liable to this misfortune. He could not accept the Amendment, which he believed would not remedy any real hardship.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, and inserted in the Bill.

Clause 47, a new clause.

"Nothing in this Act shall prevent any person from being liable to be indicted or punished under any other Act, or otherwise, so that he be not punished twice for the same offence."

Clause agreed to.

EARL DE LA WARR moved, after Clause 47, to insert the following clause:—

"Any justice or justices having jurisdiction where any provision of this Act shall be alleged to be infringed may order any superintendent or constable of police or Excise officer to prosecute the offender, but such justice or justices shall not adjudicate in the case.

"The costs of these proceedings shall be levied in the usual way, except that in no case shall the prosecutor or his witnesses be liable thereto.

"They shall be borne where no conviction ensues by the Treasury when the prosecution is by the Excise, and in other cases by the county rate."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought the clause could not possibly be assented to in the face of the decision which their Lordships came to when the Bill was last before them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY also thought his noble Friend's proposition could not be accepted. Moreover, he would point out to the noble Earl that his proposal could not be conveniently sent down to the House of Commons, as it would, if carried, involve a charge upon the Treasury.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that under the circumstances, he would not ask the House to divide upon his Motion.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Further Amendments made.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next, and Bill to be printed, as amended (No. 131).

PETROLEUM BILL [H.L.]

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

E. Morley.	L. De l'Isle and Dudley.
E. Ducie.	L. Hatherton.
V. Sidmouth.	L. Wrottesley.
V. Hardinge.	L. Aveland.
L. Clinton.	L. Penrhyn.
L. Colchester.	L. Hare.
L. Rosebery.

House adjourned at half past Eight o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 7th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Burial Grounds * [111].

Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental * [185].

Report—Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 3) (re-comm.) * [148-188]; Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 4) (re-comm.) * [155-189].

Considered as amended—Sites for Places of Worship and Schools [2].

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * [158], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

OXFORDSHIRE MAGISTRATES—CASE OF MR. NORRIS.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has made any inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Norris, a magistrate for Oxfordshire; and, if so, whether it is true that Mr. Norris did refuse to grant a summons against a farmer for a violent assault upon a labourer; and, whether Mr. Norris insisted upon the labourer settling the case by receiving money from Mr. Garrett?

MR. BRUCE said, that having made inquiry into the case, he was bound to say that there appeared to be no foundation for the charges against Mr. Norris which were to be inferred from the Question. It appeared that a farmer of the name of Garrett having assaulted a labourer in his employ, the latter called upon Mr. Norris in order to obtain a summons against his master. In the meantime the farmer had an interview with Mr. Norris, had admitted the assault, and had expressed his readiness to make his servant any pecuniary compensation that the magistrate might think proper. Mr. Norris informed the labourer of this offer, at the same time telling him that if he preferred it he was perfectly willing to grant the summons, and that it was for him to determine whether he would accept or refuse the offer of compensation. He also informed him that in the event of a summons being granted, any fine which might be inflicted upon the farmer would go to the county fund and not to the injured person. The labourer at once joyfully accepted the offer. He was assured that the statement that Mr. Norris had refused to grant the summons in question, or had thrown any difficulty in the way of its being issued, was without foundation. He might mention that the Trades Union in the district had applied for a summons against Garrett under the Criminal Law Amendment Act of last year for attempting to coerce his servant into not joining their body.

INDIA—WATER SUPPLY OF PESHAWUR QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government of India are taking or are going to take any measures to improve the water supplied to the inhabitants of Peshawur?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Yes, Sir; a project for improving the water supply of Peshawur, which greatly wants improvement, is under the consideration of the Government of India and of the Punjab Government.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—MANCHESTER SCHOOL BOARD.

QUESTION.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether a letter was sent from the Education Department to the Clerk of the Manchester School Board, asking if in the opinion of the Board it was desirable that the vacancy caused by the death of one of the members should be immediately filled up; whether, in consequence of the vote of the Board in reply to that communication, the vacancy in the Manchester School Board is not to be filled up; whether letters of similar purport have been addressed to all School Boards wherein a vacancy has occurred since their formation; and, if so, whether, in case of a vacancy or vacancies in a School Board, the right of the ratepayers to elect representatives is to be exercised at the discretion of the remaining members of the Board?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that this was a matter of some importance. A letter was sent on the 17th of May to the Manchester School Board asking whether, in their opinion, it was desirable that a vacancy, caused by the death of Mr. R. Gladstone, should be immediately filled up. To this a reply was sent back, forwarding a resolution of the board that, in their opinion, it was not desirable that the said vacancy should be immediately filled up. His hon. Friend asked, whether letters of a similar purport had been sent to all school boards where vacancies had occurred? His answer was, that it had been the practice of the Department to issue such letters since February of this year. The reason they had so acted was this—they found that there was, generally speaking, among the constituencies of school boards a dislike to an Order being sent out immediately upon a vacancy occurring, and very strong representations upon it had been sent up from different parts of the country, and they were founded upon two or three reasons. One was, that they thought that such elections would cause not only considerable expense but also considerable excitement; and another was, that it was found by experience that one vacancy was not unfrequently followed by another; and it was very undesirable to have that sort of excitement immediately followed by another election. In consequence of this, it seemed to them necessary, as they had a discretion in the matter, that they should ascertain the feelings of each particular district. There was nobody that they could officially communicate with except the school boards, and they therefore determined to obtain the opinion of the school boards. They had communicated with the school board at Manchester, as well as with other school boards, for the reason which he had mentioned; but they would issue an Order for an election in Manchester, or in any other place, if any important body of people should think that an election ought to take place. They had, however, had no such expression of desire upon the subject, or it would have been carefully considered. As to the last Question, he could only say that a discretion appeared to have been given to the Department by the Act, but only until Parliament should finally conclude how the election of school boards should be conducted. This power was only given by statute for one year. In consequence of the position of the Ballot question last year, the Government thought that the only course they could then adopt was to take a renewal of the power for this year. They did not think that there should be any further renewal of the power. In a very few days he hoped to be able to bring in a Bill settling future elections for school boards, in which Bill this particular question would have to be dealt with. He did not think that a discretion should be left to the Department in this matter, and he should be very glad to get rid of it.

Mr. W. E. Forster

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[Bill 31.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr.

William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

III. SCHOOLS.

Clause 20 (Parish schools.)

MR. M'LAREN, in moving, in line 16, after "parish," to insert—

"Including the power now vested in them by the second recited Act of sending, without payment of fees, such poor children of the parish as shall be recommended by them to any school under the management of the school board of the parish," said, he simply desired to preserve a power which already existed under the Act of 1803.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had no objection to the proposal.

MR. COLLINS said, he should like to know whether the result of accepting the proposal would not be to give the preference to board schools over denominational schools, which were outside the General Act—because, if that was so, they were asked to do in Scotland what Parliament had refused to do in England.

MR. M'LAREN said, he could not admit that his proposal would affect the denominational schools in any way. Under the Act of 1803 the heritors, in consideration of the assessment they paid, had the right of sending poor—not pauper—children to the schools without payment of fees, and he proposed to continue that power to them, but to limit them to board or undenominational schools.

MR. COLLINS said, that by the proposed step they were going to enable the heritors to pay—that was, practically to remit to the parents of the children—the school fees of children who did not absolutely require such assistance; but to confine their attendance to the board schools; which was, in effect, refusing to give assistance of any kind to the children of poor Roman Catholics. It was the 25th clause of the English Act over again, and he objected strongly to the proposal.

MR. M'LAREN said, the hon. and learned Member's opposition was capricious, for a clause was contained in the Bill—the 66th—which would enable the fees of all children whose parents were too poor to pay them, to be paid by the school board.

MR. COLLINS said, if that was so, he saw no reason for prejudging the question. Let them leave it for discussion and determination when the 66th clause was reached.

MR. MILLER said, the question did not arise in the burgh schools, and therefore the hon. and learned Member for Boston need be under no alarm as far as the children of Roman Catholics were concerned. It was never attempted by the heritors to put children into any other than the parish schools in the country districts; so that the payment of the fees fell entirely upon the heritors themselves. This plan was adopted as being more convenient to the local authorities, and had been found to work well.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought the question was one of considerable importance to the ratepayers of Scotland. The heritors, it seemed, had power to send to the schools and pay the fees of children who were not paupers, but only poor—which was a relative term. He thought the ratepayers ought to consider carefully before consenting to a power of this kind being conferred upon the school board.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would remind the hon. Member (Mr. Synan) that under the Bill the heritors were the only ratepayers who would be affected, and therefore no particular hardship could be inflicted upon the “ratepayers” by the adoption of the proposal.

MR. M'LAREN said, that since his proposal was objected to, he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Proviso added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 21 to 23, inclusive, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 24 (School boards to ascertain amount of accommodation).

MR. GORDON said, he thought a more exhaustive inquiry than appeared to be contemplated by the Bill was required. He thought the inquiry should be made by the Board of Commissioners, instead of by a merely local Board.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the House had determined that the duty of seeing that a sufficient amount of accommodation in public schools was provided should be put upon the Department, with the usual Government responsibility to the House of Commons; so that during the three years immediately following the passing of the Act, they should be required to perform the duty through the medium of the Commissioners appointed in Scotland, who should be responsible to them, and for whom they should be responsible to the House. These clauses provided accordingly.

MR. GORDON said, that as there was a danger of local Boards, in order to save the rates, expressing satisfaction with accommodation which was insufficient, he desired as much as possible to put the local Boards under the control of the central authority.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, his desire had been to make provision very much in the sense of his hon. and learned Friend's remarks. The duty was put upon the local Board in the first instance, however, because they were on the spot, were immediately interested in the matter, and had the best means of making the necessary inquiries; but they were required to report the result of their investigations forthwith to the Education Department. The Report would be transmitted in the first instance to the Scotch Commissioners, who, if they were of opinion that the school accommodation was insufficient, were required to specify the amount and the nature of it. Their decision was then subject to review by the Department. That appeared to be exactly what his hon. and learned Friend desiderated.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must object to the circumlocutory nature of these proposals. The inquiry was to be made by the local Boards, who were to forward the result of their investigations to the new Department in London, which in turn might, on the ground of want of local knowledge, re-transmit the document to the Commissioners in Edinburgh.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would remind the noble Lord that the Report of the local Board would, in the first instance, be transmitted to the Commissioners in Edinburgh.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Not by this clause, which said that the Report was to be sent to the Scotch Education Department. The whole phraseology of the clause required to be altered in consequence of the change made by Her Majesty's Government with reference to the newly-constituted Board of Commissioners in Edinburgh.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the noble Lord, on looking at the clause he had prepared, would find that it directed all Reports made by local Boards on the subject of school accommodation to be sent, not to the new Education Department, but to the Commissioners.

MR. ELLICE was of opinion that this clause met all the necessities of the case.

MR. ORR EWING thought that, with the view of making this clause harmonize with the new clause, the words, "or the Board of Commissioners" should be added after "Education Department."

MR. F. S. POWELL said, that according to the English Act the local authority was to send to the Education Department Returns containing such particulars respecting elementary schools and children requiring elementary education in their district as the Education Department might from time to time require. But, in examining this clause, the initiative seemed to him to rest wholly with the school boards, and he was afraid that, in consequence, the Returns would be found to differ very much, and just in the same ratio as the school boards had the wish to afford the desired information. The English Act was, in his opinion, far more convenient, and he wished to know whether the Bill as it now stood contained any provision giving a controlling power over those inquiries?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the most complete controlling power was given to the central authority in the phraseology of the clause now under consideration, for it had been already agreed that in Scotland a school board should be established in every parish and burgh, and therefore a statutory local authority was created to deal with this matter in the first instance. This was not so in England, and therefore it was necessary to obtain information for the central authority in another manner, in order to enable them to consider the advisability of establishing school boards in particular districts. He could assure the hon. Member that the intention of the Bill was to subject these local authorities completely to the control of the central authority in this matter. Perhaps the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) would be satisfied with the assurance that, although he (the Lord Advocate) could not see how any difficulty could arise from the ambiguity of the phraseology as it stood, yet he was most willing to re-consider the point, and if, after readjusting the clause which constituted the Scotch Commissioners, it should be found necessary to add any words to it, he would undertake to do so.

The Lord Advocate

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 25 to 34, inclusive, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 35 (Transference of existing schools to school boards).

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he wished to make a few remarks on this clause which had reference to the transfer of schools to school boards. Many of the friends of existing schools in England looked with great jealousy on the transfer authorized by the Act, although such transfer was subject to certain limitations which were absent from the Bill under consideration. Then, again, the English Act only referred to elementary schools; whereas by the section referred to any school, however dignified, important, and venerable, might be transferred to the school board, so that the entire character of the teaching might be lowered. That was a point, however, for the consideration of Scotch rather than English Members. In the English section, too, there were various limitations and restrictions, which made the transfer of a school much more difficult than it would be under this Bill. There was, for instance, the right of audience before the Privy Council. He did not see any such right in this section. It was also required that when the need for doing certain things was recognized by the trustees two-thirds must agree. There was no such requirement in this Bill. He desired to protest against the present course being established as a precedent with regard to England, and would express an earnest hope that the limitations in the English Act would not be removed.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that at the present time some of the schoolmasters had something like fixity of tenure in their office. He felt extremely anxious that the fixity of tenure which had been guaranteed to them should not be interfered with by any subsequent arrangement, and would move an Amendment to that effect, and also providing that no school should be transferred except with the assent of two-thirds of the managers.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved to insert words providing that all existing liabilities of managers in respect to contracts or engagements with teachers should be accepted by the school boards and implemented by them.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was generally understood perfectly well that existing contracts could not be interfered with except by express words, and Parliament would certainly hesitate before it sanctioned any words to defeat existing contracts between employers and employed. Consequently, he thought it would be unnecessary to insert any words to say that no such interference should be implied from the language of the clause. If, however, his hon. Friend entertained any apprehension on this subject, and was not satisfied with his assurance, he should have no objection to insert words expressing that "Nothing in this clause contained shall interfere with any contract between a teacher and any body of school managers."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE inquired whether in the case of the transfer of a school to the school board, and the schoolmasters did not receive what they considered proper treatment, their remedy would be against the old trustees, and against them only?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the law on this matter was quite clear. A contract subsisted until it was legally terminated by the contracting parties, and, as a matter of course, no managers would transfer their school with its teachers without coming to a satisfactory arrangement with the school board. There was nothing in the clause compelling such transfer; but if the managers of a school who desired to transfer it were under existing liabilities towards their teachers, doubtless they would make satisfactory arrangements before concluding such transfer.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he should like to know whether the clause would apply to such schools as Madras College, St. Andrews?

MR. ELLICE said, he had considered the case of the Madras College at St. Andrews, and at the proper time he should move its omission from the schedule.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he was quite satisfied with the insertion of the words proposed by the Lord Advocate, and, accordingly, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (Sir Edward Colebrooke), by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was true that the 35th clause was couched in general terms; but Scotch Members knew very well what schools it applied to. It was intended to apply, and did, in truth, apply chiefly to the schools established by the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church. These were the schools which it was expected would be transferred in large numbers, and placed under the management of school boards. The effect of the change would, of course, be to substitute for the managers now appointed by the Free Church or the United Presbyterian Church the school boards appointed under the provisions of this Bill. These schools were undoubtedly established and maintained by funds derived from contributions and donations, and the contributors and donors of the funds resided all over Scotland—

"Frae Maidenkirke to John o'Groat's."

Therefore, it would be practically impossible to hold a meeting of the subscribers, and to obtain their sanction to any proceeding. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Wheelhouse) would not press his Amendment.

MR. COLLINS thought it would be sufficient to require the assent of a large majority—say two-thirds—of those who administered the trust.

Amendment (Mr. Wheelhouse), by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 36 to 38, inclusive, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 39 (Combination of school boards).

MR. GORDON said, that when there was an agreement between two local boards to combine their efforts in order to secure a higher grade of education wherever they might think it necessary, they ought to obtain the consent of the Education Department. He would, therefore, move the insertion of the words "with the consent of the Scotch Education Department."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not himself think it necessary to impose his control on the local authorities; but if his hon. and learned Friend desired the insertion of the words proposed, he should offer no opposition to the Amendment.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he must complain that the clause did not confer on the central authority power to force parishes to combine, in the event of their refusing to do so from parsimonious motives. He thought the introduction of the Amendment was wholly unnecessary, as it was injudicious, in his opinion, to give the school boards greater powers than they now possessed under the clause.

MR. MILLER also thought it would be better to allow the clause to remain as it stood.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he should support the Amendment, for it would enable a rather better description of education to be given in populous parishes and boroughs, when they chose to combine for that purpose. The use of a central department frequently was to inform the local authorities of what was being done elsewhere, and to assist and advise them as to the best mode of doing it.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he should also support the Amendment, on the ground that it would prevent a difficulty being experienced in Scotland, which had been the occasion of much disappointment in England under the Act of 1870.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

IV. FINANCE.

Clause 40 (School fund).

MR. GORDON said, he wished to suggest that the whole of the Parliamentary Grants and fees to schoolmasters should go to the schoolmasters themselves. That had been the invariable practice in Scotland hitherto.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought the question as to the proper mode of remunerating the schoolmasters might be more conveniently and satisfactorily discussed on Clauses 50, 51, and 52. If it were the opinion of the Committee that the whole of the Parliamentary Grant, or of the fees, or of both, should go to the schoolmasters, he would make the provisions of the Bill conform to such opinion.

MR. M'LAGAN said, that after the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman he should withdraw the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 41 (Power to impose rates).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, at end of clause, to add the words—

"And the school rate shall in all cases be levied and collected in the same manner as poor's assessment, and the laws applicable for the time to the imposition and collection and recovery of poor's assessment shall be applicable to the school rate."

He proposed those words on the suggestion of those who were practically acquainted with the assessment and collection of poor's assessment, and on the assurance that the Amendment would facilitate the collection of the rate.

MR. M'LAREN said, he should like to know whether the residences which were exempt from poor rate would not be liable for school rate?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the school rate was directed to be imposed upon all tenants of the annual value of not less than £4.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 42 (Borrowing by school boards).

MR. GORDON, in moving, in page 16, line 39, the omission of the words "the school fund," said, that fund ought not to be pledged as a security for the raising of money. The fees out of which the fund partly arose would in almost all cases be payable to the masters, or be otherwise specially appropriated, and the pledging the Parliamentary Grant would likewise prejudice the right of the schoolmasters. Moreover, the English Act had been strictly followed in this case.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should be sorry if the Bill interfered, as his hon. and learned Friend appeared to think this clause would, with the rights of teachers. He thought, however, that a reference to Clause 40 would satisfy his hon. and learned Friend that it would not. If the Parliamentary Grant or the school fees were specially appropriated to the teachers, no creditors would, of course, lend money on such security. Nothing should be wanting on his part to secure to the teachers whatever the House in its wisdom destined for them.

MR. COLLINS said, it ought to be made clear that the children's pence could not be made a security for a loan. The Parliamentary Grant to the schools could scarcely be considered a security, as it might cease any day; indeed, he thought no one would be so unwise as to lend money on so fluctuating a security.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the Parliamentary Grant could scarcely be considered a security, as it would fluctuate in amount, or might not be earned by a schoolmaster through incompetence, or Parliament might change its mind. He would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and the following words inserted:—"other than the Parliamentary Grant and school fees."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there appeared to be some misconception on this subject. The school boards could only borrow in respect of the wants of the schools under their administration, and for that purpose they were authorized to pledge the income of their own schools. The language of the clause was precisely in conformity with that of the English Act, Clause 57, which enabled the school board to borrow for a term of years, not exceeding 50, on the security of the school funds and local rates. The whole of the Parliamentary Grant must go to the maintenance of the school, but it might be necessary to borrow a larger sum; and in doing so, he would take care that the rights of the schoolmasters were not interfered with.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he would suggest that, as in the case of the English Act, the consent of the Education Department should be obtained in the case of raising funds under the clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that as he could see no objection to such a condition, he should be perfectly willing to insert it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the words—"with the consent of the Scotch Education Department," were inserted after "they," in line 38.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 43 (Burgh school funds to be transferred to school boards).

Amendments made.

MR. DALGLISH moved, in page 17, line 24, to leave out the words—

"And the town council of every burgh shall at the time of Martinmas yearly pay to the school board thereof such sum as it has been the custom of such burgh prior to the passing of this Act to contribute to the burgh school out of the common good of the burgh, and the same shall be applied and administered by the said board in conformity with said custom."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was sorry to be under the necessity of opposing his hon. Friend's Amendment; but he really had no other option in the case under notice. The "common good," as the Committee were doubtless aware, consisted of property held by the magistrates as trustees for the community, to be administered for certain purposes, and one of those purposes was the education of the children of the community. Now, in some burghs, the trustees—the magistrates—had contributed with something approaching to liberality to the cause of education. In others they had contributed very little in that direction. Now, it had seemed to him that the most proper and reasonable way of dealing with this trust money in the present Bill was not to raise any question about the past, nor to leave it to the discretion of the magistrates in time to come—but to fix the future contributions at the same amount as had hitherto been so applied. It was not in the nature of a rate; it was the administration of trust property held for particular purposes, and he could not agree to give those contributions up.

MR. DALGLISH asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman to explain on what principle he gave up the sums paid by the heritors for the maintenance of schools, while he insisted on the contributions out of the burgh funds?

MR. COLLINS considered that the principle enunciated by the Lord Advocate was a sound one.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought that the burgh funds would be augmented generally by the alteration which had been moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish). In the smaller burghs, whose funds had been mostly jobbed away, they would relieve themselves of the £50 or so which they now paid to the schoolmaster, and place it on the rates—and as to the large burghs, what they contributed to education at present was the merest trifle, apart from the endowments and special funds.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that the amount of money which burghs contributed to secondary education in Scotland was extremely trifling—amounting only to about £5,000 a-year—and, therefore, if the object of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) had been, by omitting these words, to supply a proper aid to burgh schools by rate, he would gladly have co-operated with him. But Clause 61 provided that the higher burgh schools of the kingdom should receive no aid from the school funds. If, therefore, they took away that small sum from the common good, they still more impoverished the burgh schools than at the present moment.

MR. ANDERSON said, it appeared to him that in this matter burghs and heritors must stand or fall together. The Bill would take away the management of the parish schools from the heritors, and in consideration of doing that, they had relieved them from their old payment. They were in like manner taking away the management of the burgh schools from the magistrates and town councils, and in consideration of so doing, they ought to relieve them likewise of the contribution they had hitherto paid out of the common good.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he entirely concurred in the view of his hon. Friend (Mr. Anderson).

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the question of relieving the heritors stood for discussion at a later stage. His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) asked him to state the distinction between the contributions to burgh schools out of the "common good" of burghs and the school rates paid by heritors. With respect to the burgh schools, many of them, according to the scheme of the Bill, were not to receive any support from rates or Parliamentary Grants. Take the case of Glasgow. Undoubtedly, there would be a very large quantity of schools there under the Bill, should it become law, to be supported by rates and Parliamentary Grants; but the Burgh School of Glasgow would not be one of them, for the Burgh School of Glasgow was not a rate-supported school—and no burgh school was at the present moment. In future, these burgh schools, which were of a class very much inferior to the Burgh School of Glasgow, would, like other elementary schools, be rate-supported, but were not so now; and the Burgh School of Glasgow, like the High School of Edinburgh and other burgh schools of a high class, would not be in the future more rate-supported than they were in the past. He should be glad if Parliament were disposed to do for Scotland what it had declined to do for England—namely, to allow a local tax to be imposed for supporting the higher class schools; but he confessed he was not hopeful in that matter, and he could not therefore consent by any provision in the Bill to forego in regard to the higher class schools which now existed the interest that they had in these funds, estates, and revenues which were conveyed to the Royal Burghs of Scotland by charters, with this as one of the trust purposes for which the conveyances were made. The rates imposed upon the heritors were taxes imposed upon the heritors of parishes for the purpose of maintaining rate schools. He trusted that his hon. Friend would perceive from this explanation the distinction between rate support, which consisted of taxes for supporting rate schools, and trust-money given for the support of schools which were not rate schools at all.

MR. M'LAREN said, he should be sorry to be a party to depriving any school in Scotland of one shilling of the money it now received—he was disposed to increase their emoluments rather than diminish them; but he thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had overlooked one thing, and that was, that in two-thirds of the burgh schools of Scotland the children began at the very beginning, and went through a course of the most elementary teaching.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GORDON said, they were all agreed that the benefits of higher class schools were very much required, and they would be happy to see assistance afforded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but after the expressions which fell from the right hon. Gentleman on a recent occasion, he feared they had little hope of obtaining aid in that quarter. Moreover, the question of a rate for the purpose seemed to be excluded under the Bill. The elementary schools would, of course, be supported by means of the rate; and as the contributions payable from the common good of the burghs were a fund applicable generally towards the support of higher schools, he thought it would be desirable that all contributions paid to the school boards out of the common good should be applied to the support of the higher schools. They would thus have, to a certain extent, assistance in setting up higher education in some of the schools. He proposed, in line 29, after "board," to insert these words, "for the purpose of promoting higher instruction."

MR. M'LAREN said, it struck him that this was an extraordinary Amendment to put into the Bill. Its effect would be that the funds which were now given for the benefit of the rich and poor alike was to be given to those only who were educated in the higher subjects.

MR. GORDON said, that that was a misapprehension, for the higher education which was now provided in schools was given alike to the rich and poor.

MR. MILLER feared that the effect would be in small towns to deprive the poorer classes of that which they at present enjoyed.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR did not think that the Amendment would abstract money from the poor, the object being to carry out what was peculiarly a characteristic of Scotch education—namely, that a higher class education was so provided as to be applicable to poor children.

Amendment agreed to.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR, in moving, in page 17, line 29, after "custom," the insertion of words to the effect that the town council in a burgh should, when required by the school board, provide funds as heretofore out of the common good for the maintaining and renewing the buildings of such burgh school in an efficient state, said, that it was not his intention to persevere with the Amendment; but he took that opportunity of asking the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate how the burgh schools were in future to be maintained and enlarged without the imposition of a rate, or some other means which did not appear on the face of the Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that if he rightly understood the question it was how the burgh schools should be kept in repair, and be enlarged as occasion might require. The burgh schools, according to the provisions of the Bill, were of two classes; they were the higher class burgh schools, which were separately provided for; and the burgh schools generally, which were provided for in the Bill. With respect to the latter class, they were not in a different position in respect to their maintenance and repair than any other public schools under the Bill. The rate-supported schools would be resorted to in order to maintain a sufficient number required by the population; while the higher class schools had already sufficient revenues to enable them to give a much higher class of education. In such cases, for instance, as that of the Glasgow Burgh School, it would be kept in repair out of its revenue; and if that revenue fell short, there would be no other source than that derived from endowments or from any funds which the liberality of the inhabitants of the district placed at its disposal. That remark would equally apply in the case of the High School at Edinburgh. In point of fact, they would stand upon their old footing; and while he should be sorry if it was proved that the liberality of the future inhabitants should not prove equal to such a charge—a calamity in no way foreshadowed by the conduct of the existing ones—he could not hold out any hope that they would receive contributions from the public money.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had not suggested that any money should be asked from the public Exchequer, but when they came to Clause 61, dealing with the higher schools, he should propose that the districts should be allowed to rate themselves when they voluntarily desired it, for it was absurd to suppose that the endowments, which were of small amount, would suffice to maintain in repair and enlarge those schools. He would, therefore, withdraw his present Amendment, and raise the question again on Clause 61.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved the insertion, in line 30, of the words "with the sanction of the Education Department," after "to time."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 44 to 49, inclusive, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 50 (School fees).

MR. GORDON moved, in page 19, line 23, after the word "schools," to insert the following words, "subject in case of complaint by any person having interest to an appeal to the Board of Education."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not consent to the Board of Education being made a Court of Appeal in any case where parents might complain of the school fees.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GORDON, in moving, in line 25, to leave out from "paid" to end of clause, and insert—

"Payable to the principal schoolmaster or schoolmistress in charge of the school; but where there is more than one teacher subject to such division as may be made by the school board, with a right of appeal by anyone having interest, to the Board of Education; and the school board shall pay out of the school fund to each schoolmaster or schoolmistress an annual salary, to be fixed on the occasion of each appointment, of an amount (unless the Board of Education shall in any case otherwise determine) not less than fifty pounds nor more than one hundred pounds in the case of a schoolmaster in a burgh school, and not less than thirty-five pounds nor more than eighty pounds in the case of a school in a landward parish, and not less than twenty-five nor more than fifty pounds in the case of any schoolmistress. The schoolmaster or schoolmistress shall likewise be entitled to the interest or annual produce of any bequest or endowment for his or her behoof, and to any Parliamentary Grant which may be earned in respect of the school under his or her charge, under deduction of payments to pupil teachers, if any: Provided, That the salaries and scales of fees of schoolmasters and schoolmistresses appointed before the passing of this Act under the recited Acts, or any of them, shall not be reduced; and that the school board may, if they think fit, from time to time raise the salary of any schoolmaster or schoolmistress, so that the amount thereof shall not exceed the maximum hereinbefore provided," said, that in all statutes dealing with the salaries of Scotch schoolmasters a maximum and a minimum amount of remuneration had always been fixed. The Bill of 1869 contained a provision to the same effect, which was adopted by this House after full discussion, and it would probably be the more necessary on account of the transfer of the management from heritors who had often paid sums considerably in excess of their legal obligations to local Boards. The latter in some cases would no doubt be liberal, but in others there might be a desire to save the rates. He, therefore, proposed that the masters should receive, as hitherto, the Parliamentary Grant and the produce of any endowment, and should likewise have a salary of not less than £50 and not more than £100.

Dr. Lyon Playfair

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would at once admit that this was a very important question, involving as it did the liability of the people to pay rates to provide the salaries under discussion. A calculation had been made by which it had been shown that the cost would amount to nearly £400,000 a-year, a bonus which, if granted, would probably result in the schoolmasters of England and Ireland demanding the like liberality. Not only that, but the hon. and learned Gentleman could scarcely have calculated the amount which masters would receive in the shape of fees and Parliamentary Grants, especially in schools with from 300 to 1,000 children. If a master received £300 a-year from these sources, would his hon. and learned Friend still award him a statutory salary out of the rates? Such a course had never been dreamt of in England; and were the Scotch so rich and so indisposed to liberality, and even to justice, that it was to be applied to them? It was all very well to fix the minimum of £35 for rural parishes, where there was only one school, but the Amendment would apply to hundreds of schools. He would, moreover, remind the House that no Amendment that they could make would affect the amount of the fee, and it was proposed to be given in proportion to the efficiency of those who attended. He must also say that he could not approve of the Amendment, because it threw on the inhabitants of the district the expense of erecting and maintaining buildings out of the local rates. The matter really stood thus—by the Bill schools would be established wherever they were needed, and they must be of a certain class, and maintained up to a certain standard at least. Every school must have a certificated master, and his qualifications might be as much higher as the district pleased or required. The people of every district were thus encouraged to have the schools made as good as possible, for in proportion to their excellence would the Parliamentary Grant be distributed, and that was an encouragement to the ratepayers to equip the schools well, so as to entitle them to the receipt of Government aid. But it was for the managers to make their bargain with the teachers, and if they desired a higher education than was required by the Government Grant, they would have the right to demand a higher qualification. Every inducement was therefore offered to the school board districts to appoint well-qualified teachers, capable of giving the children a good education. In short, the people of Scotland desired to give their children a good education, and the Bill would give them all the necessary machinery for gratifying that desire; all the Government insisted on was that these qualifications should not descend below a certain point. He, therefore, thought there should be no interference with the bargains to be made by the boards and their teachers. Could not the teachers take care of themselves? Good teachers must be had, and good teachers would find their price; and if an efficient teacher were giving a good education in a school, and obtaining for it the largest amount of Parliamentary Grant that could be obtained, would it not be necessary to pay him high terms in order to retain him? The eyes of school boards, who would be pecuniarily interested in such matters, would be turned towards him, and he would be taken away if there were not sufficient inducement to him to remain. In short, the demand for his services when required would follow the natural operation of the law as regarded supply. The fact was, there was a field opened up to teachers by the Bill which had never existed in Scotland before; and why, then, should not they be left to make their own bargain, like the schoolmasters in England? The notion that they ought to have both the fees and the Parliamentary Grant proceeded upon a mistake, for what the Government said to the school boards was precisely what it said to the school managers. It encouraged them to provide and equip schools of the best description, and to employ schoolmasters, who would give a good education to the children by contributing money, in the shape of Parliamentary Grants, according to results. He did not see how it was possible to apply the fees and the Parliamentary Grant in the manner now proposed. There would be something like 300 schools to be provided in Glasgow alone. Now, the expense of providing a school for 300 children would be about £1,500—£5 a child being the ordinary estimate. A school to accommodate 1,000 children would cost £5,000. The schools, too, would have to be upheld, and the resort to the borrowing powers to raise money in order to provide school buildings would be very extensive. The money invested in ground and buildings would be of large amount, and part of the fees and the Parliamentary Grants would be required to enable the managers to meet the interest and pay off the debt, besides meeting the expense of the equipments and the staff. There would, therefore, no doubt, be a large amount of money to be borrowed on the security of the school fund, and was there to be no relief out of the Parliamentary Grant and the fees? He ventured to say that such a proposal was extravagant and almost ridiculous, and yet the Scotch schoolmasters had by their importunity induced Scotch Members to advocate the proposal, and had tried to make it appear that they were ill-used by the Bill, and so had obtained a large amount of unfounded sympathy. But he would ask not only Scotch, but also English and Irish Members, to consider that if Parliament consented to give Scotch schoolmasters all fees and all Imperial grants, and a fixed salary in addition, to be paid out of local taxation, how long it would be before the schoolmasters of England and Ireland would demand to be placed on the same footing? Why should they be dealt with differently? With what justice, with what sense of fair dealing, could they refuse to England and Ireland that which had been granted to Scotland? For those reasons, he strongly opposed the Amendment, and he did so in the belief that schoolmasters were, as regarded their remuneration, treated in the Bill justly and liberally.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he would recommend his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) to withdraw his Amendment, because a portion of it was embraced in the Amendment to be moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan). He had no complaint to make against the speech of the right hon. and learned Lord, except that it was an answer by anticipation to the speeches which his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and he meant to deliver on a subsequent Amendment.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE observed, that the good education of Scotland hitherto was owing to the high qualifications of the teacher, and the liberal manner in which he had been treated. There was no point to which the people of Scotland attached such importance as the proper payment of the schoolmaster; but what the Lord Advocate wanted was cheap education.

MR. GORDON said, he would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Playfair), and withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the hon. Member for Linlithgow on Clause 52.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved in page 19, line 27, after "and" to leave out to end of clause, and insert—

"The schoolmaster, schoolmistress, and teachers of a school shall be entitled to receive from the school board the full amount of the fees received by the board in respect of such school, and, when there is more than one teacher, the said amount shall be divided and distributed among them as the school board shall determine."

The Committee had already heard a speech against allowing schoolmasters to receive the fees. His Amendment was copied verbatim from a clause in the Bill introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman last year. There was, therefore, nothing shocking in the idea that fees should be given to schoolmasters, neither was there anything in the proposition to which the Government could or ought to offer objection. In fact, a clause giving fees to schoolmasters appeared in the Bill introduced by the Government in 1869. It was quite true that in the English Act there was no such clause, and the right hon.

and learned Gentleman asked why Scotland should be treated differently from England. The simple answer was because Scotland was not England—because Scotland for centuries had had a system of national education, under which the fees were paid to the schoolmasters. It was the universal practice in Scotland for not only teachers, but the highest professors to depend chiefly upon fees. University Professors received an extremely small sum from endowments, their main reliance was on fees, and that system had an admirable effect, because it stimulated the Professors to activity. The main reliance also of teachers of schools was on fees, and that system stimulated the teachers enormously. His right hon. and learned Friend proposed, however, to hand over the fees to what he called the School Fund, which was to be applied according to the ideas of the school board. What was wanted was simply this—that the school board should make what bargain they chose with the schoolmaster. If he received a large amount in fees, he would receive a less salary; but by giving him an interest in all the fees he would have the greatest interest in keeping his school in a state of efficiency. The great objection which he entertained to the Bill was that it was an attempt to Anglicize Scotch education, and it was with a view to prevent that sad consummation that he entreated the Committee to follow in this instance the wise counsels which the Lord Advocate gave in 1871, and his predecessor in 1869.

The Lord Advocate

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 27, to leave out from the word "and" to the end of the clause, in order to add the words "the schoolmaster, schoolmistress, and teachers of a school shall be entitled to receive from the school board the full amount of the fees received by the board in respect of such school; and, when there is more than one teacher, the said amount shall be divided and distributed among them as the school board shall determine."—(Dr. Lyon Playfair.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MAJOR WALKER bore his testimony to the immense advantage of retaining the present system of fees in Scotland. Speaking from his experience of a large agricultural district in Scotland, he believed that to do away with the interest which teachers had in the fees would be to inflict a serious blow on education, and reduce it to the dead level of mediocrity.

MR. ANDERSON said, that the proposal before the Committee did not carry out the intention of the hon. Gentleman, for there was nothing in the words of the Amendment to compel the school boards to give the fees. It was desirable that the schoolmaster should to some extent be paid by results, and therefore he would not compel the school boards to give the whole of the fees, but only a part.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that although he was anxious not to interfere with the Scotch system of education by means of English opinions, still he wished the Committee to bear in mind conditions which appeared to apply to Scotland as well as to England. In Scotland as well as in England they were imposing this duty upon every district—that the education of every child should be provided for. In Scotland they had the enormous advantage of that principle having been acknowledged centuries ago, whereas in England it was comparatively new. But still it was necessary to extend the principle over the whole of Scotland, so that in every parish the ratepayers would be responsible for the education of every child, however poor. When they imposed on the ratepayers that duty it seemed but common sense to leave them entirely unfettered both as to the men they were to employ and the mode in which they were to pay them—in short, to allow the matter to be regulated by the action of supply and demand. If the fees were to be given as now proposed, all the influence of the schoolmaster—and that was not slight—might be brought to bear in order to have high fees. ["No!"] Assuredly, if he was to have the fees, his interest would be to have them as high as possible. And, secondly, the schoolmaster might try to fill the school with children who were able to pay the high fees. But what was especially important in poor districts and in large towns was that the children of the poorest parents should be encouraged in every possible way to come to school.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he thought that the school boards would in most cases make arrangements that the schoolmasters should have the fees; but it would be better not to compel parishes which might be peculiarly situated.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, that although he should support the Amendment, yet he thought there was a two-fold risk in the matter—that the school boards would not be of high quality, and lest they should starve the schoolmasters. Though at present the feeling in Scotland was very strong in favour of education, yet it was possible when the school boards found out their power they might try to cut down the income of the schoolmasters, and for that reason he hoped before the Bill passed through Committee they would be able to procure a somewhat larger provision for them.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh was not right in stating that his Amendment was taken from the Government Bill of last year, for the fact was that it was not contained in that Bill. However, having since consulted some gentlemen of great experience upon the question, he had now come to the conclusion that a modified form of it would be very advantageous, for it was undoubtedly true that the Amendment proceeded upon the custom of Scotland in the parish schools, which was, that the schoolmaster should receive the fees. That, however, was not the most convenient arrangement, and he preferred to leave it to the option of boards and schoolmasters to stipulate that the latter might take their chance of the fees, so far as they went. There were many cases in which that arrangement might conveniently be made; but there were others in which it might not be expedient, for a master might prefer to have a fixed salary, and let the fees go into the school fund. There were cases, too, in which it would be quite wrong to compel a school board to hand over all the fees to a teacher. Was it not better to leave everything connected with emoluments open to arrangement between the parties? He regarded it rather as a matter of detail than one of vital importance, and would prefer that arrangements should be made according to the circumstances of each case and the district in which it arose.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Lord would not depart from the great courtesy and kindness he had exhibited towards Scotch Members, and that he would adopt the course desired, for the opinion of the Scotch people was decidedly favourable to the Amendment, which was only to continue a system that had existed in Scotland for hundreds of years. It was not to the interest of a schoolmaster to have high fees and but few children in his school, and therefore the fears of the Vice President were groundless. The proposal, moreover, was, that a schoolmaster should have what he earned, and who else ought to have it? He submitted that the Government ought to accept the proposal.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he believed there would be heart-burnings in many minds if a share of the fees was not given to the schoolmasters. He hoped, therefore, the Government would give way.

MR. M'LAGAN said, that in the Amendment which he had put on the Paper he had copied the words of the Lord Advocate's Bill of last year. He thought the Government should yield, and spare the Committee the necessity for a division upon the point.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would believe that Scotch Members were in favour of this proposal, when he saw the Division List, but not till then. He thought that to alter the Bill would be to injure it, and should therefore support the proposal of the Government, and trusted they would stick to it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 108: Majority 13.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

And it being now Seven of the clock, House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—SYSTEM OF NAVIGATION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. HANBURY TRACY, in rising to call attention to the system under which Her Majesty's ships are at present navigated, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the maintenance of a separate and distinct branch of officers for navigating duties is no longer desirable in the interests of the Naval Service," said: The question which I am desirous of bringing before the House is the present system under which our ships and vessels are navigated; and, although I much fear that the discussion must, to a great extent, prove uninteresting and technical, yet, as I believe it is a matter of the very gravest importance, I trust the House will allow me to go somewhat fully into the subject. Under the existing arrangement, it is well known that a separate class of officers formerly termed masters, now called navigating officers, is maintained for the distinct duty of what is termed navigation and pilotage, whereby it is supposed that a more competent set of navigators and pilots are obtained than could be procured if these duties were undertaken generally by the executive branch. I am anxious to show to the House, that even if it were necessary to have the duties restricted to one branch, that the present system has of late utterly broken down, and must be entirely remodelled; and, secondly, I wish to prove that the only true alteration and satisfactory solution must lie in the entire abolition of a separate grade, and in throwing these duties to a far greater extent than at present upon the captain and commander of a ship. I maintain, Sir, the knowledge of practiced navigation has of late been neglected very much by our executive officers, and it has become to be considered a totally secondary consideration, instead of being, as it certainly ought to be, of primary importance. Officers seem to forget that unless a ship is skilfully and safely navigated any other qualifications they may possess are of little avail, and they do not consider that unless a ship is properly handled and piloted, not only are the lives of all on board endangered, but she is rendered utterly and entirely useless. It seems to me perfectly absurd and ruinous in the highest degree to allow our officers to look upon these duties as trivial; and yet, Sir, unhappily, the long list of vessels which have got ashore during the past 10 years seems to prove conclusively that this state of feeling is spreading, and that there is something radically wrong in the system under which our vessels are navigated. In the present day, the handling of one of our large iron-clads is no easy task, and is a very different thing to what it was in the days of sailing vessels. You go now at terrific rates of speed—18 and 20 knots an hour; you have huge and clumsy vessels to deal with, and the difficulties are increased ten-fold. At no period of our history was it ever so essential to guard with the most scrupulous jealousy that the safe navigation of ships was in fit and proper hands; and yet, notwithstanding this, you still retain the old anomaly of having sea nurses for your captains with divided responsibility, and actually prevent your commanders and captains from acquiring that intimate knowledge of practical navigation and pilotage, and that confidence in themselves, which it is impossible for any impartial man to deny must render a captain infinitely more competent to command. You admit that in all the great passenger fleets—in the Cunard, in the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and in the whole Mercantile Marine of the world, and in every foreign navy—the captain is not only responsible in name, but in deed. It is considered in all those fleets that the captain, with proper assistance, is the only man who can do the work properly. He alone can alter the course, make and reduce sail, ease and increase speed, being the only person on board who is perfectly free and uncontrolled. He it is who is entrusted with the lives of all on board. But, Sir, in the English Navy—which you pride yourselves is the finest in the world, where you have vessels worth half a million of money, where you have interests committed to its charge of the greatest and most vital importance, second to none other—you entrust this great duty of navigating your ship to another officer, and that officer one who you take no trouble to render competent—an officer who, from the time he enters the service, seems to have no friend, is looked down upon, and is made a drudge of. You give this officer no authority—he cannot make the slightest alteration in the course without leave of the officer of the watch—you give him no social status equal to his brother officers; and, to crown all, you take away all prospect of promotion, and every inducement to become zealous and energetic.

Sir Robert Anstruther

Is it to be wondered at that high-spirited officers placed in this extraordinary position become discontented; and is it surprising that the other officers look upon the duties performed by the navigating branch as of secondary importance, and that your captains arrive at that rank without having paid any attention to what they consider the navigating officers' work—a duty of a separate branch? It is very easy to understand the theory which is sometimes advanced that pilotage and navigation are such peculiar duties, requiring such delicate and careful manipulation, such experience, such confidence, and such intimate acquaintance with harbours and vessels, that it is necessary to have picked officers for this particular duty, who, by devoting their lives to this one subject, become most able and skilful navigators, and that in this manner a superior race of pilots and navigators can be trained up. But, Sir, without going into the question for the moment as to whether or not it is beneficial to have this trained body of men, it is an actual fact—which I defy anyone to disprove—that at this present moment you have not got them, and that your navigating class, separate though they may be, actually receive no special training, and are not selected. If we look back two centuries, and even up to 50 years ago, we find to some extent that this theory of having a trained body of officers was carried out.

In Henry VIII.'s time, when war ships were first built, no attempt was made to organize a professional race of naval officers, and in lieu thereof masters of merchant ships were specially selected as good navigators, and were put in charge of the equipment, stowage, and navigation; and the fighting of the ships was entrusted to military admirals and captains quite innocent of all knowledge of seamanship; and thus soldiers fought the ship, and a few seamen were engaged to take the fighting machine about. As far as I can discover, the French first commenced to organize a naval profession in 1672, and we quickly followed suit, though retaining the masters of the merchant navy to assist.

Now, Sir, comes this extraordinary fact. I find that as the race of our naval officers grew up well trained in nautical knowledge, that when Lord Pembroke was First Lord of the Admiralty, in the year 1692, the evil of confining the professional knowledge of navigation to one man was found so great that an order was actually issued that all commanders of ships were to pass the Trinity House and be examined as master; and five years after, in 1697, we find another order was issued by Lord Orford that the race of masters were gradually to be abolished, and the captains of 6th rates were ordered to do the navigation duties themselves, and to be called "Commander and Master." This state of things appears to have remained in force until the breaking out of the French War, when, unfortunately, it was found necessary to expand the Navy enormously, and for this purpose a large number of masters were once more introduced into the service from the merchant navy. At the close of the French War the service had got so accustomed to trust to the master for the navigation that no one liked to abolish them; and as time went on they became indispensable, as officers neglected navigation more and more, and in many cases captains, when appointed to their ships, had been so long unemployed that they clung with the greatest tenacity to the master class. These old masters who were introduced were generally of a mature age; they brought with them experience, great practical ability, and their superior seamanship commanded respect. They also had great incentives to zealous work, and looked forward cheerfully to lucrative appointments, which were then open to them. In those days there was one special reason which prevented the line getting as strongly marked as it now is—namely, that a large number of midshipmen and mates were continually being sent away in prizes, and who thus at an early age acquired confidence and experience as navigators.

We thus see that up to the close of the French War the theory of having selected officers was carried out by introducing picked men from the merchant service who were thorough seamen, thorough navigators and pilots. But, Sir, from the year 1824 to this date this selection has, I fear, been entirely swept away. Who are now our specially trained and picked officers? Where do our officers obtain that knowledge which so peculiarly fits them as pilots, and which gives them such an intimate acquaintance with all the harbours and channels of the world? I fear that the answer to these questions cannot but show up the hollow farce which has been enacted since 1824. In that year you ceased to select from the merchant service, and commenced to rear up a special branch of navigators from lads of about 16 who were entered as masters' assistants. Unfortunately, Sir, this special training has been a perfect myth. You commenced by giving these nominations in many cases to boys who were very much inferior in general ability to your cadets in the other branch. Admiral Sullivan and Admiral Fanshawe gave rather strong evidence on the point before the Committee on Masters in 1862. Admiral Sullivan said—

Mr. Hanbury Tracy

"I have known those appointments given in succession to second-rate tradesmen's sons of a naval borough; so that I heard once a man who examined them say, that out of a long batch there was hardly one who had even the appearance of being a gentleman's son. I think that has not been so for many years now; I think that they are generally much of the same class as the executive rank."

Admiral Fanshawe said—

"In the last ship that I was in, the masters' assistants were immeasurably inferior to the naval cadets in all the subjects of which tabulated forms came in to me, and in their studies under the naval instructor they were always the worst, and it was the same in other things. They were dull; they were not easily stirred up to compete, and there was not much emulation amongst them."

Of course there have been bright exceptions, and several sons of old and distinguished officers have entered under these nominations; but still far too large a number of lads without ability or position have been considered sufficiently qualified to train up as navigators. Well, Sir, from the day these lads enter, instead of attempting to repair the damage of defective early education, every obstacle is thrown in their way against obtaining knowledge as seamen and navigators. You station your young navigating officer in the store rooms, holds, and tiers, instead of obliging them to be constantly on deck, where alone they can obtain an insight into their peculiar calling. I am well aware that of late years a slight improvement has been made in this respect, especially in the Mediterranean Station; but, practically, it is still in force generally throughout the service; and, as a matter of fact, I apprehend it cannot be denied that hardly any training is given to the navigating officers before they are placed in charge of vessels. Even when these officers are passing their examination, you do not allow them to go to the Naval College. Nobody seems to care for them; and it is a perfect marvel to me how they are able to get on at all. It is generally admitted that, in nine cases out of ten, these young officers gain their experience after they become navigating lieutenants. In the Baltic some very curious instances of this kind occurred. Admiral Sullivan, in his examination on this point, said—

“In the Baltic the second master of a flag-ship, when offered a death vacancy, went to the master of his own ship and said—‘I am afraid to take it, I know nothing of pilotage and navigation, and I should be afraid to pilot the ship; what had I better do?’ The master argued with him, and said—‘You will soon pick it up, I dare say, and you will do as well as the others.’ He took the post, feeling his incompetency. . . .

Some of the young masters in the Baltic were really so incompetent, that the things done there were almost incredible, and several captains complained to me of the utter uselessness of the masters, that, for the first time, they had been obliged to take the navigation and pilotage upon themselves, and learn it, as it were, because the masters were utterly useless; therefore it is clear that they had not had the training before they undertook the duties. . . .

It is a mistake to suppose that you get a scientific body of officers, you get good practical sailors and navigators for the ordinary work of surveyed harbours, but place them on a new coast in a difficult position in an unsurveyed place, and they will be just as much adrift as the other officers.”

Admiral Key, who is well known as one of our most distinguished officers, alluded strongly to this point. He was asked by Captain Richards—

“Do you think, as a general rule, that the practical part of a navigating officer’s duty is learnt after he becomes a navigating officer by experience afloat?—After he has become a master. Just so?—In the early part of my service, masters’ assistants and second masters were educated in the holds of ships; and I have known a great many instances in which they have been suddenly brought on deck to be put into the position of masters of ships.”

I do not mean to imply that you have not some very competent navigating officers; but the result of this curious system is that you have frequently many of your ships in the greatest possible danger during the time that the navigating officer is acquiring experience. I can perfectly understand that some men should have such a high opinion of the difficulties of navigation as to think it necessary to train up a special class selected for that duty; but I cannot comprehend on what possible ground you can defend a special class without special qualifications. Can any reasonable man deny that if you have a navigating class they ought to be selected for their peculiar fitness for that office?

Now, Sir, I hope it will not be thought that I wish to disparage or cast a slur on the navigating officers as a whole. I am well aware that you have among them some very clever and distinguished men. After these officers have acquired experience, many of them became very clever pilots and navigators, notwithstanding the continuous slight and annoyance they are daily subject to, and notwithstanding the fact that they are an isolated body without promotion to look forward to, or any real inducement being held out to them to work. Some nine years ago, when discontent had reached a point which could not be ignored, the Admiralty attempted to make the position of what was then called masters somewhat more tolerable; but like most half measures, the remedy has completely failed in giving satisfaction. The name of master was then abolished, and the cognomen of navigating lieutenant and staff commander were introduced, making them retain, however, their old position as junior to the lieutenant of the watch. The result of this change has, I fear, rendered matters much worse. It has had the effect of drawing the line of a navigating class much sharper and clearer. Even the additional rank, which was given as a sop, with the extra amount of gold lace, has proved a matter of heartburning and soreness. You have not, and cannot do away with the peculiar inferior social status they are placed in. Unfortunately, there is still existing throughout the service an amount of grumbling and discontent which has the effect of making officers callous of their work, and must prove a source of weakness in time of danger. Navigating officers find themselves hampered at every turn in carrying out their duty—constant irritation must beget slovenly work. You may depend upon it that officers will not do their work efficiently when they are discontented.

I will not, Sir, dwell further on this part of my Motion. Whatever course it may be found necessary to take, I am confident that matters cannot remain as they are, and I think I have proved that even if you continue a separate class the present system is so unsatisfactory that it must be entirely remodelled. But, Sir, let us examine my second proposition—that the only sound remedy is total abolition and to throw these duties on the executive officers. During the last 10 years there have been three Committees which have more or less examined into this subject, and have brought together a mass of most valuable evidence, a portion of which I will quote from. We have the Report of the Committee on Naval Promotion and Retirement; secondly, the Report of a Departmental Committee; and, thirdly, we have the Report of the Committee which inquired into the question of the Higher Education of Naval Officers. Captain Washington, the late Hydrographer of the Navy, drew up a very carefully expressed Memorandum, which he laid before the Committee of 1862. In this paper he shows very clearly the prejudicial effect this separate branch has on the other officers—

“I think it cannot be denied that the system of entrusting the pilotage and navigation of Her Majesty's ships to a single class, as masters, must have a tendency to beget indifference or inattention to those particular duties in the lieutenants and other officers of the main executive branch. It can hardly be expected that a young officer, who knows that when once he has passed his examination at the Naval College, he will probably never be called upon to navigate a ship, should keep up his knowledge of navigation or astronomy. The master is there to attend to such duties, and why should he give himself any trouble about it, unless an officer has a special taste for the subject, such as is, I fear, too generally the result. Whereas, by throwing the work and responsibility of navigating and piloting and conning the ship on the lieutenants and other officers of the executive branch, a more general acquaintance with those duties would be cultivated and diffused throughout the service; emulation would be encouraged, and those who might subsequently be called upon to command Her Majesty's ships, even if they had not performed the special duties of a navigating officer, could not fail to have a more general knowledge of those subjects, and thus prove far more efficient commanders and captains.”

Then, again, Sir, we have the strong testimony of Admiral Sullivan, and it must be remembered that both of these officers have been surveying captains, and therefore having studied the question in a practical form are most competent to form a true and unprejudiced opinion. Admiral Sullivan was asked—

“Do you think it would be beneficial to Her Majesty's Naval Service in general if the class of masters, second masters, and masters assistants, were done away with as a separate branch of the service?—Most decidedly. I think that the present system is merely the result of the old custom, when sailors only navigated ships, and soldiers fought them; and that has been handed down by degrees until the service is totally altered, and yet the anomaly of the separate class is retained; that is the only reason that I have ever been able to see in the slightest way for having two classes of executive officers in a ship.”

I know, Sir, that some officers think that these opinions are only shared by surveying officers. Indeed, I was gravely informed the other day, that no captains or admirals who had sailed with a fleet were in favour of the change.

Now, Sir, it so happens that we have unmistakable proof to the contrary. We have the recorded evidence before the Committees of seven admirals and 11 captains in favour of abolishing the separate grade as at present constituted. These names include some of our most distinguished officers, and they cannot fail to carry great weight in solving the question. We find amongst them Admirals Sir Spencer Robinson, Sir William Hall, Sir Frederick Nicolson, Sir B. Sullivan, Hon. J. Denman, Fanshawe, Cooper Key; Captains Goodenough, Corbett, Arthur, Moorman, Bradshaw, Chatfield, Shortland, Field, Rice, Rolland, and Nares. But, Sir, these are only names of officers who have given official evidence. I could, if it were required, quote a long list of other distinguished and gallant officers who are in favour of the change; but I have thought it best to confine myself exclusively to the evidence which is now on the Table of the House. The evidence of some of these officers is so much to the point that I hope the House will allow me to read a few extracts. I find that Admiral Fanshawe, who is now Commander-in-Chief on the North American Station, stated in evidence—

“I should propose that the regular naval service should do the masters' duty altogether, and that the masters should cease to exist as a separate class. I think now, taking the service as it is, that they are what might be called an unnecessary excrescence upon the service; it was not the case in olden times, but it is so now. . . . I feel very strongly now that the circumstances under which the masters were beneficial to the service as a separate class have passed away, and that being no longer beneficial to the service, it is very desirable to get rid of them as a separate class. . . . I think it stands to reason that a man who has had those duties to perform, and has navigated a ship, and had the responsibility attaching to it as lieutenant, would have perfect confidence in himself as a captain.”

Then Admiral Sir Frederick Nicolson, who was a Commodore, and was some years in China, stated—

“Many young officers work up their navigation so as to be able to pass their examinations, and then it dies away entirely out of their minds,

Mr. Hanbury Tracy

But I do not see any difficulty in making captains entirely responsible for the navigation. I think that the divided responsibility between the captains and masters has always been a drawback, both with respect to the navigation and pilotage. I dare say, if the thing could be traced out, ships have got on shore, and may even have been wrecked, owing to that divided responsibility."

Admiral Denman, who has only lately been in command of the Pacific Station, when asked if he would do away entirely with the masters as a class, said—

"I would. I think great advantage would accrue from it, as introducing more harmony into the service."

And then he was asked—

"Would not the frequent change of the navigating officer on his promotion or otherwise deprive him of the experience necessary for the safe conducting of our large ships?—I do not think so at all. I think that the attention of some of our ablest officers would be constantly given to the subject, and all officers would give more attention to it than they do now. I think you will find that at the present moment that objection would apply to the masters of one half of our large ships—namely, that they are very young masters—masters of six or seven years standing. I consider that the special duties of a master are not in any degree more difficult to learn than the duties of seamanship in general; and that any man who is a thoroughly good seaman, and an educated man, could, in a very short time, acquire all the special knowledge which is required of a master."

Admiral Ashley Cooper Key, who has been appointed to superintend the College at Greenwich, and is most deservedly regarded as one of the most scientific officers in the service, and one who probably knows more about the requirements of young officers than anyone else, was asked—

"You are aware that the question of the abolition of navigating officers as a separate class, has frequently been urged upon the Admiralty. Supposing that measure should ever be adopted, do you think there would be any difficulty in inducing sub-lieutenants and lieutenants to qualify themselves for the performance of navigating duties on board ship, including, of course, pilotage?—No; I do not think that there would be any difficulty whatever in finding a sufficient number of sub-lieutenants and lieutenants to qualify for those duties."

The evidence of Admiral Sir W. Hall, well known as "Nemesis Hall," is also very important. This officer was at one time a master, and was promoted for gallant conduct in China. There is, perhaps, no one who from actual experience, first as master and then as captain of a ship, has a better right to be heard. He stated, before the Committee—

"I have long been of opinion that the line of masters, from their not having sufficient rank, and not receiving that encouragement to which from their services they were entitled, ought to be done away with altogether, and that well-qualified lieutenants ought to be selected to navigate the ship, under the captain, and that the navigating lieutenant should undertake all the duties that the master has now to perform, with better pay, and the same chances of promotion as the other lieutenants. I have known, during my long service, many ships nearly lost by running on shore and foul of other vessels, for want of the authority which, as masters, they ought to have possessed. I have known the lead's-man taken out of the chains, the masthead-man called down to wash decks, and a request to just lower the peak, or hoist the jib, to clear danger, to have no attention paid to it by the lieutenant of the watch. In fact, there has always been a sort of jealousy and rivalry existing between the master and the other officers, and I have found that the public service suffers by it."

Then, Sir, we have also the testimony of Mr. Pullen, a master of considerable standing, in favour of the change, and being in command of a vessel, he speaks from his experience, not only as a navigating officer, but also as a captain, thoroughly versed in these duties. He says—

"My opinion is, that you would add considerably to the efficiency of the officers in the service, if the masters, as a class, as they are at present, could be done away with. I am speaking now as a master in command of a ship; I think that the entire navigation of the ship, and all the responsibilities attached to it, ought solely to be entrusted to one person. I think that that is the duty of the captain of the ship. . . . My ideas may be peculiar upon that point. I am in command of a ship myself, and in the position that I occupy, I feel that I could not tolerate any one in her to navigate under me—in fact, I do it all myself. I take the sole responsibility of whatever happens in that ship, and I am ready to abide by it myself. I could not leave it in the hands of another man to do this work for me. Moreover, when the captain of a ship has this responsibility, he will take care, whenever he is in pilot waters, that all the energies of the officers and the crew of the ship shall be devoted to looking after her safety."

There is a great deal more of similar evidence; but what I have already quoted appears to me to prove that however badly the system may work, so far as it relates to the navigating branch, it is the source of far greater evil, of far greater mischief to the service generally. It is impossible to deny that lieutenants, commanders, and captains are lulled into a state of apparent security in all that relates to the navigation of the ship, owing to the presence on board of this special branch. They naturally reason that it is not their duty to look after the navigation, as that is in the hands of one man who has it under his peculiar guardianship. Directly a sub-lieutenant passes his examination at college he throws aside his books, being well aware that nearly all the subjects he has qualified in will never be required of him again. He may have gone through a brilliant examination in nautical astronomy, and may have, after an infinity of labour, come out the first or second on the list as an accomplished navigator, and yet from that very moment he is well aware that until the end of his career all incentive to continue his studies is gone. He knows that in future all he will have to do will be to send in a few formal days work to the captain, take a few sights during his watch, but that no practical work or real responsibility will be required of him, and that he will be for ever debarred from following out or calling into use that knowledge which he has taken such pains to acquire—and which he may be peculiarly fitted for. Can it be wondered at that the result is so deplorable that to the great majority of officers nautical astronomy and the theory and practice of navigation soon become forgotten, and that on all these subjects which your naval officers ought to be so accomplished in, the mind becomes a blank? Surely, Sir, it is melancholy to reflect how entirely this process has the effect of alienating the watchful care of all the executive officers of the ship. If anything were wanted to show this more conclusively, perhaps nothing could prove it better than the late catastrophe which occurred to the Minotaur and Lord Clyde. In the first case, you find the admirals and captains resting with the blindest possible faith on the staff commander's knowledge. It was apparently the general feeling that it was nobody else's business to attend to the navigation, and the result was that one of your finest iron-clads drifted on to a well-known rock in broad daylight. In the second instance—that of the Lord Clyde—you had on board a very superior and able navigating officer; but notwithstanding this, and clearly owing to the want of a general knowledge of practical navigation on the part of the other officers, and the absence of all precautions, this ship was allowed to drift helplessly ashore. The captain and officers of the watch seem to have been in a state of helpless apathy as regarded the true position of the ship. We see in this instance, as in many others I could quote, no care taken when the officers relieved watch that the position of the ship was accurately placed on the chart. In some ships you have chart houses on deck supplied, and yet in too many cases instead of the officer of the watch being able to consult the chart, as he is able to do in nearly every foreign navy, no facilities whatever are afforded. I have alluded to these two cases as being the most prominent as pointing out with the most fatal precision the defects of the existing system. Now, Sir, I am well aware that although I have quoted the names of several most distinguished officers who are in favour of a change in the present system, my right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty will undoubtedly be able to bring forward an equally long list who are opposed to the alteration. I am free to confess that amongst the senior officers—the admirals and captains—there may be even a majority against me, and I do not think it is to be wondered at that officers who have been brought up under the old system should cling to it; but, Sir, if you were to poll the junior officers, the lieutenants, and commanders, I am confident there would be found an overwhelming preponderance in my favour. Whatever importance the House may attach to these opinions, there is one argument in favour of improving the navigation of our ships which I know cannot be gainsaid and must carry with it immense weight.

I have spoken of two catastrophes—those which happened to the Minotaur and Lord Clyde—but these are a very small fraction of what have occurred. Thanks to the courtesy of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Baxter) I have been permitted to see an epitome of all the Courts Martial and Courts of Inquiry which have been held during the past 11 years, and from this data I have arrived at this astounding result. During the last 11 years—from 1860 to 1871—no less than 106 ships have been stranded. In 41 of these cases no blame was actually attached; but of the remainder 65 the Courts of Inquiry clearly showed that they had got ashore from bad navigation. In 13 of these cases the vessels were never got off. Can it be denied that with these figures before us great improvements ought to be made in the navigation of our ships? Now, Sir, I have gone carefully into the value of these ships which have been stranded, and although I have taken the accounts considerably under what I should have been perfectly justified in putting them at, yet, after allowing a fair depreciation for the time they had been employed, I think the House will agree that the figures are rather startling. Of the 106 vessels, 26 were small, some of them gunboats, which at £20,000 were worth £520,000; 7 iron-clads, which at £250,000 were worth £1,750,000; and 73 were various vessels, which, at £70,000 each, were worth £5,110,000; so that the value of the vessels stranded was £7,380,000. No blame was attached in the cases of 13 gunboats estimated to be worth £260,000; and 28 other vessels, worth £1,960,000, making a total of £2,220,000, which, deducted from £7,380,000, left a value of £5,160,000, endangered from careless navigation. The approximate value of ships lost from stranding through bad navigation was as follows:—1 line-of-battle ship, £150,000; 3 gunboats, £60,000; and 9 other vessels, £630,000—making the total approximate value £840,000. To this must be added the cost of repairing the 65 vessels that were got off, which might be put down at £250,000—so that the total value lost was £1,090,000. I am quite confident that I have very much understated the value, and yet we have this astounding fact—that in 11 years no less than £5,160,000 worth of property has been run ashore and placed in jeopardy from careless navigation, and £1,090,000 worth actually lost. In the Reports of many of these Courts of Inquiry it is only too evident that if full and entire responsibility had rested on the captain, and he had been the duly qualified and competent navigator of the ship, with a skilful assistant under him, many of these accidents would have been avoided. It is true that a certain dual responsibility rests with the captain, and that of late years, since the loss of the Conqueror, an attempt has been made to draw the reins tighter, and to make the captain more so. The recent Courts Martial have endeavoured to drive home this responsibility more and more. I rejoice to see it, as pointing clearly the direction you must take of making the captain absolutely responsible. What you do is this—you place the navigating officer to do the duty, being well aware that the captain has had no experience in the practical work, and yet, if the ship gets ashore, you make the captain liable. I ask the House, can anything be more absurd? What I urge is to make the captain capable, make him a good navigator and pilot, and then by all means make him responsible, giving him a competent assistant. It is true some captains do even now navigate their own ships, and will not allow this duty to be thrown entirely on the navigating officers; but I fear these instances are rare.

Mr. Hanbury Tracy

The strong action which my right hon. Friend took after the Court Martial on the Agincourt in dismissing those gallant officers who were in command, showed that he thoroughly appreciated the principle that the ship ought to be in charge of the captain absolutely, giving him whatever assistance may be necessary; but that on him, and on him alone, must lie the onus of her safe conduct. The strong reprimand which was then administered most certainly had a very beneficial effect; but, still, every impartial man must allow that these gallant officers were very harshly dealt with, as it was the baneful effect of the system which was really at fault, and they only acted in blind adherence to the old tradition of leaving all to the navigating officer. Sir, the abolition of the navigating branch is no new idea advanced by me: it has for a number of years attracted great attention by the different Boards of Admiralty. I understand that when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) was at the head of the Admiralty, in 1859, he determined to try the experiment, and in one noted case he sent for a young commander, and asked him if he would take the vessel without a master. The reply was, that he was not fit to command unless he could also navigate. The ship sailed, and was very well navigated. When the Duke of Somerset came to the Admiralty he was opposed to the change; but, after having been at the head of affairs for some years, and having seen how badly the system worked, he came to a very different conclusion. After long and anxious consultation, he deliberately determined to abolish the navigating class. Lord Clarence Paget, in 1865, when Secretary to the Admiralty, announced this policy. He said—

“The result to which we have arrived is that, upon the whole, it would be better to let the class die out. We propose to appoint lieutenants who would do the work quite as well as the masters, whom, however, I would not at all disparage, for many a time have I had to thank my stars for having a good master. I believe, however, under the extremely difficult circumstances of the case, brought about, I am bound to say, by the masters themselves, the lieutenants will replace the masters with advantage to the service.”

The Duke of Somerset, assisted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), who was then at the Admiralty, had the foresight to see in what a dangerous condition we should be placed in during war time if this canker worm were not rooted out; and, cutting aside all the deep-rooted prejudices which clung round the question, he stopped the entries, and thus paved the way for gradual abolition. Unfortunately, the Duke did not remain long enough in office to carry this alteration out, and he was succeeded by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), who at once reversed the important step which had been taken, and commenced re-entering navigating cadets, and which was continued by the right hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Corry). When my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) came into office, notwithstanding the enormous amount of work which he found thrust upon him, he seems to have determined to carry out the Duke of Somerset's policy of gradual abolition, and for this purpose he placed the entry of navigating cadets on exactly the same footing as naval cadets, and I am sure that if he had remained at the Admiralty the class would have been allowed to die out. Some officers, I know, think that you can retain a separate class, making an immense change for the better, by giving special training, special inducements, and, above all, having selected men; but, Sir, I much fear that whilst you may improve the status of this class, whilst you may also lessen the number of disasters by these alterations, the one evil you will not remedy is the very one I attach the greatest importance to—namely, the absence of all inducement on the part of the other officers—your lieutenant, commander, and captain—to attend to this great branch of a seaman's duty, and the natural consequence is that the captains of your ships will still be deprived of that confidence in their own ability to navigate, which I hope to see absolutely essential as a qualification in a captain. It is absurd to believe that any expedition could be fitted out by private enterprise where the captains were not made the actual navigators and solely responsible. When Captain Sherrard Osborn fitted out his China squadron, what did he do? Why, Sir, he made the captains navigate their own ships. He stated before the Committee—

Mr. Hanbury Tracy

“When, in 1863, I had to organize a naval force for the Chinese Government, I consulted Captains Burgoyne, Charles Stewart, Nicholas, Noel Osborn, Captain Allen Young and others, and I deliberately made each of them responsible for the navigation of their ships, and their logs and work books were admirably kept. The ships were most successfully piloted, and many of those naval officers have expressed subsequently their obligation to me for having compelled them to acquire a knowledge of a branch of their profession which they had hitherto much neglected.”

He was then asked—

“Have you in the course of your service found that a want on the part of executive officers of a practical acquaintance with navigation, has resulted disadvantageously for ships on expeditions?—Yes; I was first struck with it in the Arctic service, where I felt my own shortcomings, and I remarked to what a lamentable extent it existed, even among a picked body of officers that were sent out on two expeditions to those seas.”

The scheme which I would propose is this—1. Gradually to abolish the navigating class, making ample compensation in doing so. 2. Make all your captains, as soon as qualified, the actual navigators of their ships, absolutely responsible, giving them a lieutenant to assist them. In carrying this out I would venture to suggest that—1. Captains should be given (say) £100 a-year extra pay for the additional work. 2. Lieutenants list increased by 150. 3. An extra lieutenant be appointed in all the large ships. 4. All lieutenants, after having served two years as officers of the watch, should be made to pass an examination similar in all respects to that which the navigating lieutenants now go through, in pilotage and practical navigation, and according to the examination passed so they should have preference in being selected to assist the captain, giving a small increase of pay. 5. Commanders, during the first two years after their promotion, should be made to go through a course of pilotage and practical navigation in the Channel in two vessels to be specially appointed for that duty; and, in order to give proper inducement to officers to qualify, I would give to those who came up to a certain standard full pay, and sea time, and so on in proportion to their merit. 6. No lieutenant should be allowed to hold the duty of assistant navigating officer to the captain longer than five years. 7. In every ship, without exception, there should always be a survey in progress, so that all officers might have the opportunity of acquiring an intimate knowledge of surveying. There may be many other plans which might be suggested, and I offer these with considerable diffidence; but, at the same time, after considering the matter very carefully, I believe this would answer the purpose and give complete satisfaction. As to expense, the present system costs £125,000 a-year, while the plan I suggest, including extra pay to captains, would cost only about £90,000.

Now, Sir, what are the main objections which are urged to this plan? I am well aware that it will be stated that it would be impossible to give the captain the additional burden. My strong belief is, that with a competent assistant, it would really give a captain less anxiety, and therefore less work, as he would have thorough confidence in himself, whereas now he seldom feels it. If captains have too much correspondence, by all means curtail it. If the captain of every other foreign navy in the world is able to do this work, surely the argument falls to the ground. Then, secondly, I know I shall be told that it is quite true that foreign navies have no such separate grades. But their vessels are not navigated with the same boldness as ours, and French officers are continually praising our system. Sir, I should be very sorry, indeed, if any change were effected which would militate against our ships being navigated with the utmost boldness consistent with safety. Undoubtedly every consideration must be subsidiary to this one point; and it is only because I believe that ships would be navigated with far greater boldness, and with far greater security, if the captains had practical acquaintance with these duties and felt themselves thoroughly responsible, that I thought it my duty to bring this Motion forward. As regards the opinion of foreign officers, I am quite certain that amongst thoughtful and working officers a feeling of the opposite nature is prevalent. Admiral Sullivan gave strong testimony on this point. He was asked—

“Have you been informed by French officers that they lament that they have not got the rank of master, as we have?—Never. I believe that I have served more with French officers and with French ships than any man in our service. I am the only officer in our service, I believe, who has lived in them, has piloted them, and been in charge of them. I had upon one occasion nine or ten months daily experience with them, and doing piloting and surveying work for them in consequence of their not having any surveying officers, just the same as I have done for our own squadron or fleet, and in no case do I ever recollect them lamenting the want of masters; but they have frequently expressed to me their regret that they had not a class of surveying officers as we had; therefore, they have felt the want of that very class that I have alluded to; but I never heard them say that they were in want of officers for the ordinary pilotage or navigation of their fleet.”

Then Sir Spencer Robinson was asked—

“Have you had any opportunities of hearing the opinion of superior French officers with regard to their navigating system as compared with ours?—Yes, I have spoken to many French naval officers, who thought it a very excellent thing to have a master, and on talking to them about it, I found that the general view of the greater part of them was a desire to discharge themselves from that labour and responsibility. That motive, of course, ought not to influence any officer, and therefore I do not consider that opinion of any great value.”

Surely, Sir, however, there is one satisfactory answer which cannot be got over—namely, that if our system was really considered so very satisfactory it would very soon be introduced into not only the French but every other foreign navy. The very reverse is, however, the case; and in the Russian Navy, where a similar system is now in force, I understand that it is intended to abolish it. In the German Navy, whilst copying every other institution, they have most carefully avoided this. Then, Sir, I shall probably be told that if this navigating class is abolished you will deprive many naval officers of the boon they now have of getting their sons into the Navy which they could not afford to do as naval cadets; but surely, Sir, this may be an argument in favour of giving scholarships or of increasing the pay of cadets, but certainly is no reason in favour of retaining a bad system of navigating your ships. I may be told that five years is too short a time for lieutenants to act as assistant navigators; but it must be remembered my fundamental principle is that they shall only be assistants to the captains, who are themselves to be the thoroughly experienced navigators and pilots. I will not detain the House any longer, Sir; but before I sit down I am anxious to say that I hope my hon. and gallant Friends who sit in this House, and who, I understand, are nearly all opposed to my Motion, will not think it presumption on my part to have raised this question, having only been a lieutenant in the Navy when I left the service. I assure them I have done so in all humility, being well aware of the great authorities which are opposed to me; but I have felt the late disasters to be so serious, and having a very strong opinion on the subject, I did not think I should be justified in not expressing it.

I will only further add that on no former occasion have you ever had such an opportunity to make this alteration. You have a large number of sub-lieutenants ready to increase your lieutenant list. You have a great scheme of naval education which you are about to set on foot—which you have the evidence of all your naval professors cannot be complete until this change is effected. The late disasters have drawn the eyes of all foreign navies upon us, and such navigation, if repeated, cannot fail to become a scandal. The whole service is looking forward to the change—sooner or later it must come. Clinging to a system of more than two centuries old, and not in harmony with the age, will not avail us in time of need. I entreat my right hon. Friend to make the alteration soon, before he has a fresh roll of disasters to mar still further the prestige of the British Navy. I beg to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

MR. T. BRASSEY: Sir, I rise for the purpose of seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend, with an intimate conviction that the change which he has advocated will prove beneficial to our naval service. It would, indeed, be presumptuous in a civilian to entertain a view on a subject so strictly professional, which was not based on the clearly-expressed opinions of naval officers of high reputation. That this essential foundation is not wanting in the present instance, will be clearly demonstrated by reference to the most recent Parliamentary literature on the subject. The evidence taken by the Committee on the Education of Naval Officers comprised much weighty testimony in favour of the abolition of a special class of officers for navigating duties. The change was advocated by Admiral Cooper Key, as an inducement to officers to study; and the Committee in their Report gave it as their opinion that volunteers could be obtained from the executive branch, and that, in a purely educational point of view, that mode of providing for the performance of navigating duties would exert a beneficial influence on the general knowledge of navigation and pilotage among the officers. To show how valuable the abolition of the special class of navigating officers may be as an incentive to the general study of navigation and pilotage in the Navy, I will quote from the evidence of the naval instructors—gentlemen who possess unique opportunities of judging whether we may safely rely on selected officers of the executive branch for the effective performance of navigating duties in the Navy. Professor Main has well explained the distinction between encouragement to study by the hope of reward, and the attempt to enforce a high standard in compulsory examinations. In his Memorandum, presented to the Committee on Naval Education, he says—

Mr. Hanbury Tracy

“All compulsory education should end with the examination for sub-lieutenant. It should be the province of the Admiralty from this point to stimulate talent and zeal in special branches, by creating special classes of officers. This has been already most successfully done in the case of the gunnery lieutenants. If it be thought desirable to do away with the navigating officers, as a distinct class; it will be attended with the greatest benefit to naval education generally. The increase of pay for performing these duties should be such as to afford a sufficient inducement to volunteer for the appointment; and it should be always looked on as a stepping-stone to promotion, and as a claim for employment. I have no doubt this would give an opening for many young officers, who have a natural liking for astronomical work, and at present have no useful way of employing themselves in it.”

Another naval instructor, Mr. Buckley, of the Duke of Wellington, and formerly instructor of navigating cadets in the St. George, gave the following answers to the following questions:—“Did any among the navigating cadets passed out of the St. George give promise of being first-rate navigating officers?” “Certainly,” he replied. “Many?” was the next question. The answer was—“About a quarter of the number.” He was then asked—“Do you think that the other three quarters would be either indifferent or bad navigating officers?” He replied—“I think so.” He was then asked—“Whether he thought that, if the navigating officers were chosen from the lieutenants generally, and if they qualified themselves specially, that you would get upon the whole a better class than those you were likely to have under the present system?” His reply was—“Certainly you would.” Captain Powell, who had formerly commanded the Britannia, abundantly confirmed the opinion of the instructors. He recommended that the navigating duties should be performed by lieutenants, and he predicted that by this means you would often have officers in command of singular ability in manoeuvring and navigating ships. These opinions ought to satisfy the most doubtful minds as to the possibility of obtaining competent navigating officers from the executive branch. If that be so, the other arguments in favour of the abolition of a special class of navigating officers deserve the most favourable consideration. The tendency of our present system must inevitably be to divert the attention of the executive officers of the Navy from the study of navigation and pilotage. If this branch of duty were no longer reserved for a special class, we should not, says Admiral Sullivan, see such a disgraceful occurrence as a commander of a sloop at Spithead—otherwise a good officer and sailor—refusing to obey a signal to proceed to the assistance of a ship on shore outside the Isle of Wight, and twice repeating the signal of inability to weigh, because the master was on shore. Again, to quote from a pamphlet, recently published by a staff commander in the Navy—

“A certain flag-ship was recently required to proceed from Portland to Portsmouth; but she had no master. The Admiralty telegraphed that the navigating officer of the ship remaining behind was to be sent on board. With a captain, a commander, and six lieutenants, does not this appear lamentable? Can the system be correct, if the absence of one man reduces a ship to a comparative state of inefficiency?”

The present system seems, in the highest degree, anomalous. Admirals and captains are held responsible for disaster, if any should occur, from improper navigation, and are liable to suffer the most severe penalties which can be imposed on officers in the Navy; yet, from the time when they pass their examination as lieutenants, until they actually hold a command, they have but little, if any, opportunity of acquiring a practical knowledge of an art, proficiency in which can only be attained by practical training. It is quite impossible to understand how an officer can effectually conduct a naval operation without being well acquainted with navigation and pilotage. Lord Nelson, in his interesting autobiography, written on board his flag-ship, in Port Mahon, in 1779, twice alludes to the opportunities which he had enjoyed, and of which he had eagerly availed himself, to become acquainted with the art of pilotage, as having been of much service to him in his subsequent career. In the first passage, speaking of the year 1772, when he was only 14 years of age, he says that, when on board the Triumph, at Chatham—

“As his ambition was to be a seaman, it was always held out as a reward that, if he attended well to his navigation, he should go in the cutter and decked longboat which was attached to the commanding officer’s ship at Chatham.”

Thus by degrees he became a good pilot for vessels of that description from Chatham to the Tower of London, down the Swim and the North Foreland, and confident of himself amongst rocks and shoals, which had many times since been of great comfort to him. Again, somewhat later in his career, Lord Nelson says that when he was second lieutenant of the Lowestoffe frigate of 32 guns he went to Jamaica.

“But even a frigate,” he says, “was not sufficiently active for my mind, and I got into a schooner, tender to the Lowestoffe. In this vessel I made myself a complete pilot for all the passages through the Keys Islands, situated on the north side of Hispaniola.”

These passages from the autobiography of Lord Nelson appear to me to suggest the importance to the naval profession not merely of a knowledge of navigation and pilotage generally, but especially of an acquaintance with our own coasts, the navigation of which is in some parts exceptionally difficult. The Channel Fleet, so called, is too little seen in the Channel, and rarely appears on the East coast, in the St. George’s Channel, or in Scotland. But even if the Channel Fleet were to remain more constantly at home, it would not be possible for our young officers to study the intricate navigation of the estuaries of the Thames, the Mersey, or the Humber, in vessels of the prodigious dimensions of our modern iron-clads. For this purpose smaller vessels should be commissioned, more capable of being handled under sail, and able from their moderate draught to enter many ports which our large iron-clads cannot visit. I believe that the reserves of seamen in our home ports are at the present time sufficiently large to provide crews for the vessels commissioned for the relief of ships on foreign stations, and also to man, at least in the summer season, a few small corvettes and sloops, which would afford to the officers appointed to serve in them opportunities of becoming acquainted with our home waters. We have not a single vessel in commission on the Home Station which can be regarded as an available cruising vessel for the instruction of officers in the entire pilotage of the English Coast; and when we take into view the increasing number and enormously increasing value of Her Majesty's ships, designed especially for coast defence, the necessity of giving to naval officers more opportunity of becoming familiar with our home waters will be generally recognized. I will not enlarge on one of the objections to the special class of officers for navigating duties—I mean the social difficulty. In spite of many changes and concessions of higher nominal rank to masters, this difficulty still remains and will ever continue, so long as they are retained as a distinct class in the service. A stronger sentiment of jealousy of all class privileges prevails at the present time than was evinced 60 years ago. The pathetic appeals of Sir Charles Napier are not yet forgotten in this House, in which he described the discouragement of the neglected and unknown men in the subordinate ranks of the Navy, with no friends at court. If such disappointment were felt by one class of officers, is it not fair to presume that it is as strongly felt by the other? In conclusion, I may add that while the majority of the senior officers of the Navy are opposed to the abolition of the master class, the majority of the younger officers of the Navy are, so far as I have been able to ascertain, in favour of the change. I am therefore confident that sooner or later an alteration of system, so desirable for the improvement of the service, will be carried out. Meanwhile, I trust that the First Lord of the Admiralty may be able to hold out hopes of an early movement in this direction. The recommendations of the Committee of 1862 in favour of a trial of lieutenants of the executive line was, there is reason to believe, cordially welcomed by the then Board of Admiralty; and in moving the Navy Estimates of 1866, Lord Clarence Paget stated that, while ever desirous of improving the condition of the masters, the conclusion at which they had arrived was that it would be better to let the class die out. "We propose," he said, "to appoint lieutenants, who would do the work quite as well as the masters." The Committee of 1862 recommended that, as an experiment, 10 lieutenants should be appointed in 10 of the smaller vessels to take charge of the navigation. Let the Admiralty adopt this suggestion. Let an additional lieutenant be appointed, instead of a master, to the first 10 corvettes, commanded by officers who will gladly accept them as substitutes for the navigating officers, and let the merits of the new system be tested by results. I am convinced that the result will be favourable; but as many officers, whose opinions deserve the most attentive consideration, object to a change, in deference to them it would be prudent to wait until we have acquired experience of the new system before we do away with the old. Whatever the issue of the controversy may be, the House will appreciate the importance of securing the highest attainable perfection in the navigation of the costly vessels of our modern Navy, and will not regard as time wasted the endeavour to improve a system which has acknowledged defects.

Mr. T. Brassey

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the maintenance of a separate and distinct branch of officers for navigating duties is no longer desirable in the interests of the Naval Service,"—(Mr. Hanbury-Tracy,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would remind the House that this was very much a naval question. It had been brought under the notice of the House by his hon. Friend the Member for the Montgomery Burghs, a naval officer of experience, and his remarks deserved some reply from those who, like himself, had had experience in the same profession. There was, however, one part of his hon. Friend's speech to which he must take exception. He regretted that his hon. Friend should have said that the present condition of the navigation in Her Majesty's Navy was a scandal to the profession. It was in his judgment hardly a right expression to use in that House, for he believed our ships and fleets were navigated as well as those of any nation in the world.

MR. HANBURY TRACY explained that he was only referring to the cases of the Lord Clyde and the Agincourt.

SIR JOHN HAY was glad to hear that the expression was not intended to be applied to the state of the Navy generally. Allusion had been made to the Committee of 1862 by another Committee, which investigated the subject in 1866, and expressed a decided opinion that to retain a separate class of navigating officers would be of the greatest advantage to the Navy. It was in consequence of the Report of that Committee that his hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) reversed the arrangements which would have eventually extinguished that class of officers. That course was taken with the concurrence of all the naval Members of the Board, and was entirely approved by the right hon. Gentleman's successor (Mr. Corry). The question was, how our ships of war could be best navigated, and it was quite new to him to learn that a captain was not completely responsible for the safety and navigation of his ship. It was new to him that the captain was not wholly responsible; as for 2 years out of the 12 that he had a command, he had no master on board, although at that time, according to the hon. Member, he ought to have known nothing, for it was shortly after his promotion from a lieutenancy to a command. It was also new to him that lieutenants had nothing to do with navigation; did not look at the charts; and did not make themselves acquainted with the position of ships, and he thought it would be little credit to a captain if he did not take the lieutenants into his confidence and let them know the position of the ship and everything affecting her safety and navigation. It was however one thing to superintend navigation and another thing to attend personally to all the minute details involved in it, for the safe conduct of a large ship required constant attention on the part of an experienced and practical man, giving his undivided care to compass, chronometer, observation, and calculation; and while it was best that these duties should be entrusted to a practical man of unbroken experience, their due discharge was incompatible with the multifarious duties and responsibilities which devolved upon the captain, and which required experience and training of a different order. The masters, moreover, had special pilot-knowledge of our own harbours and coasts, which could, therefore, be navigated without taking pilots on board—that, indeed, being the duty for which they were originally constituted. It was of the greatest advantage, then, to have a separate and distinct class of men; but it was a question whether it might not be advisable to do something to increase their position and prospects, and he trusted the Admiralty would not make any change in the direction of abolishing the special class of navigating officers, who were of the greatest possible value to the Navy.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, that if the deplorable picture which the hon. and gallant Officer who moved the Resolution had drawn accurately described the general condition of the officers of the Navy, a great change must have taken place in the 10 years that he had been on shore. He confessed, however, he was rather disposed to agree in the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey). But the question was, whether there did not exist in the Navy sets of duties not requiring any great scientific knowledge, but that precision and punctuality that could only be acquired by special attention to the matters immediately connected with those duties—in short, to which the principle of division of labour should be applied; and that in the case of ships of the Navy—which was totally different from that of passenger ships, merchant vessels, and yachts, were navigation from port to port was all that was required—the navigation required an amount of accuracy which was only to be acquired by special study of its peculiarities. There was necessarily great subdivision of labour on board a man-of-war, and navigation and pilotage were as important as any other special responsibility, and though the captain was required to have a general knowledge of everything connected with his ship, there was an engineer to attend to the engines, a carpenter to look to the hull and masts, a boatswain, and a sail-maker; and, for a similar reason, there was great advantage in having specially trained officers to attend to the navigation, for it was impossible that the officer who was called upon to discharge general duties could be as exact in his attention to a special duty as those who devoted their whole time and attention to it. As an illustration of what experience would do in navigation, he would point to the black pilots of Bermuda—the best pilots in the world, yet many of those could not read nor write—whose skill could not be increased by any amount of science. Again, in the Crimean War, we sent a number of masters up to the Baltic to make themselves acquainted with the Cattegat, the Belts, and other passages, and they acquired such a familiarity with them that our Fleet went into the Baltic without a Baltic pilot on board; and not only that, but Sir Richard Dundas performed the feat—which Danish pilots thought impossible—of starting from Kiel with the whole Fleet one morning, and getting out of the Cattegat by the next morning. Compare that with what was done by the French in the late war. Their fleets lay at Brest and Cherbourg for several days, waiting for Baltic pilots, of whom only one old man could be obtained; an able commander was paralyzed for want of acquaintance with the coast; and the fleets returned without having done anything worthy of their fame. Twelve years before that occurrence he had had a conversation with a distinguished officer of the French Navy, commanding one of the squadrons on the occasion referred to, who attributed our great superiority to our having a special class of navigating officers—a class which he regretted the prejudice of French officers excluded from the French Navy. There was one point on which his hon. Friend had shown some confusion of ideas. He appeared to confound navigation and seamanship—two very different subjects, as understood in the Navy. With regard to that point, he would remind his hon. Friend that he could not have held his lieutenant's commission without the possession of two different certificates, given at different times and different places by two different classes of examiners—one as to his proficiency in navigation, and the other as to his proficiency in seamanship. His hon. Friend wanted to persuade them that the want of a scientific knowledge of navigation on the part of executive officers had been the cause of many of the mishaps which had lately occurred. But that was not so. In the case of the Lord Clyde, the mishap was attributable not to the want of a knowledge of scientific navigation, but of practical seamanship. The officer of the middle watch got permission of the captain to steam; but the young officer who took charge of the deck in the morning watch was so ignorant of seamanship—if the evidence on the Court Martial was to be trusted—that he proceeded to wash his decks without ascertaining his position and without taking the trouble of sending to the navigating commander, if he mistrusted his own eyes. Practical seamanship was of all things the first to be desired in an officer having charge of a ship, and it would certainly not add to his efficiency to impose on him also the necessity of a constant practice in details, of which great accuracy was the principal recommendation. The science with which his hon. Friend would endue young officers reminded him of the story in a well-known fiction—the tailor in Laputa who made Gulliver's clothes by the quadrant, but they fitted very badly, because he made a small error in a single figure—and the miscalculation of one figure might lose a ship. He hoped, therefore, his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would pause before he adopted this recommendation.

Admiral Erskine

Mr. CORRY said, he entirely concurred in the policy of keeping the navigating class separate from the executive class of officers, and that appeared to be the opinion of almost all the most experienced naval officers whom he had consulted on the subject. At the same time, he was willing to admit there were others who were entitled to respect, who entertained a strong opinion to the contrary; and if he were to classify the opinions that had been expressed upon the subject, he should do so much in the same way that it had been done by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) — namely, that young officers were in favour of the amalgamation of the two classes, whereas the older officers were for keeping them separate. There was, however, a third class—the navigating officers themselves—whose opinions were naturally influenced by personal considerations; but, certainly, all the older officers who had had the responsibility of command, and who knew what it was to be answerable for the safety of a ship and the lives of all on board, were decidedly in favour of maintaining the navigating officers as a separate class. One of the main arguments in favour of amalgamating the two classes was, that it would improve the knowledge of the lieutenants of the Navy in seamanship and navigation. Now, if a lieutenant could be selected and made a navigating officer at once, and return to his executive duties after a short period of service, that argument would be entitled to weight; but such was not really the case, as long and special training was necessary to the proper performance of the duties of a navigating officer on board ship. That view was confirmed by the Committee which sat in 1862 to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the rank of master, consisting of four Members; and, with only one dissentient, they reported that to abolish a useful class with the view of improving another would be an experiment which, if unsuccessful, would materially injure Her Majesty's naval service, and was a step which they could not recommend. He had paid much attention to the evidence, which entirely convinced him of the soundness of this opinion. Mr. Allen, himself a master, said there should be a navigating class; and if you have a navigating class, you must keep them in that class, for it takes some eight or ten years before a man acquires that faculty of knowing what to do with a ship under all circumstances, near land, by night and day, in thick weather, and so on. Captain Mends was asked—"Do you think that it is for the good of the service that the classes should be merged?" He said—

"I do not think so; but I think it is important to hold to the office. I do not think you can place it in what I may call the migratory class—that is to say, the executive lieutenants who are passing on continually to the higher grades."

Captain Forbes, in answer to the question—

"Supposing the masters to be done away with as a class, do you think it would answer to give the navigating duties to lieutenants or other officers in the executive branch?"—said, "No; I do not think it would, and for this reason—that for a master of a line-of-battle ship you require a person of great experience and a thorough knowledge of his profession, which I do not think could be gained at the age at which a lieutenant still holds that rank. If a lieutenant who had acquired sufficient knowledge to become a good master of a line-of-battle ship was not promoted above that rank, he would be unduly kept back in his profession. Of the average lieutenants of average service that I have met with, very few would be equal to the duties of a master of a line-of-battle ship."

Captain Luard, the present Superintendent of Sheerness, and one of the best officers in the Navy, expressed the strongest opinion in the same sense against the amalgamation of the two classes. Admiral Sir Lewis Jones said—

"I should be very sorry to see the line of masters done away with. I think it imperative that the officer who has the charge of keeping the ship's reckoning should be retained in that office, not subject to frequent change. It is requisite that he should devote himself specially to that duty. The aptitude for piloting is not easily acquired; it requires steady nerve and confidence; hesitation is fatal to the successful performance of it. To acquire that habit, close application is requisite, and steady perseverance, and study of the tides, the appearance of the land through a haze, and of the special capabilities of the ship he may be serving in. I think for these reasons that it would be very inconvenient to do away with the office of master."

Admiral Richards, Admiral George Elliott, Sir Thomas Cochrane, Sir George Seymour, Sir William Martin, Sir Michael Seymour, Sir Rodney Mundy, Sir Alexander Milne, and Sir Sydney Dacres, with many other first-rate officers, all gave similar opinions. There were, moreover, several officers before the Committee, who were in favour of amalgamation, yet the evidence they gave appeared to him to be strongly opposed to the opinion they expressed. Captain Washington, the only Member of the Committee in favour of amalgamation, fully admitted the necessity of special training, though he denied in toto the necessity of a special class. But it appeared to him (Mr. Corry) that the one involved the necessity of the other, exactly as in the Army the Engineers and Artillery required special training, were distinct from the Line. He would here notice in passing, that the hon. Gentleman had told the House that among the lost vessels he referred to there were 26 gunboats; but it should be borne in mind that gunboats were not navigated by masters, but generally by the lieutenants in command. For his part, he could not see how to separate a special training from a special class in regard to navigating officers. It was stated that the education of the young navigating officers, as a class, was not sufficient, and that they were kept between decks, where they had no opportunity of obtaining experience in navigating duties. That occurred more in former days than it did now. The Queen's Instructions required that these young officers should be on deck on all occasions of going into and coming out of harbour; and it was the duty of the master to see they were educated in their special line. When he was at the Admiralty, a vessel in the Channel was specially appropriated to the training of young navigating officers in pilotage. This subject was well worthy of the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and he hoped that right hon. Gentleman would consider whether further instructions ought to be given to navigating officers in the special and important duties they were called upon to discharge. As to the social part of the question, it was no doubt painful to think that many most meritorious officers were debarred from rising to the top of their profession, except under special circumstances; but, on the other hand, there were officers and others, with large families to support, who could not, for want of means, put their sons into the executive line where it cost at least £80 a-year to maintain a lad as midshipman, but were glad of the opportunity afforded to them of introducing their sons into the naval service in what was called "a lower grade." At all events, at the beginning of their career, these sons of poor officers had advantages which were not enjoyed by young gentlemen in the executive line. He was surprised to hear what had been said about the superiority of the French system. He had always understood from officers who had served with the French in the Baltic, that although the French ships were, in general, as well handled as the English, they failed to present as favourable a comparison directly they got into pilotage waters where the navigation was difficult and intricate; and this was entirely owing to the want of a class of officers specially trained to navigating duties. The evidence in favour of maintaining the navigating officers strongly preponderated, and he was glad to understand that the Resolution of the Committee of 1862 was not to be reversed by the present Board of Admiralty.

Mr. Corry

CAPTAIN EGERTON said, he agreed with the hon. Member who brought this subject forward, in thinking that many changes were necessary in the class of navigating officers, and the advantages they enjoyed in the junior ranks did not compensate them for the disadvantages they experienced as they grew older in the service. He could not, however, support the present Motion, because he thought that that House was a bad tribunal to direct the Admiralty in a matter of detail. He did not agree with the hon. Member in the opinion that there should not be a separate class for navigating duty, nor did he entirely agree with him as to the peculiar advantage supposed to belong to the French Navy from the absence of masters. He recollected that on one occasion, when he was on the coast of North America, the captain of a French ship going to the same destination declared that he envied him for commanding a ship with a master; and though the French captain had a pilot, he said that a pilot was nothing compared with an officer in whom he would have confidence from knowing him personally. He should not be able to support the Motion if it should be pressed to a division.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE, in describing the course of naval training in the service in which he was brought up, said, he had first to pass through an examination of Channel pilotage, then in the mathematical stowage, and in the management of a ship below her upper deck; and the last examination for a navigation officership consisted in the working of various astronomical problems for obtaining latitude, longitude, &c., and in a further examination in Channel pilotage, and in the whole pilotage of every port in India and China. Since then, he had often discussed this question of masters with his brother officers, and their opinion was, that as long as there was a distinct service, possessing a certain number of ships which performed a certain programme of service, such an arrangement as that was faultless, but in a service like the Navy the business could not possibly be carried on without a class of officers specially educated for the purpose. He wished, therefore, as a seaman outside the Navy, to say a few words in vindication of the navigation and seamanship of the Navy from the aspersions which had been thrown upon it by the hon. Gentleman. We had in all about 300 ships in commission, including gunboats, and in the course of 11 years, according to the statement of the hon. Gentleman, 106 ships stranded or got into such difficulties as to induce the officers commanding at the stations to hold inquiries. That was less than 10 ships a-year, or 3 per cent. Now, he would ask any hon. Gentleman who knew anything about the insurance of shipping, whether that did not show an almost infinitesimal fraction of the number of ships employed? Why, any commercial concern that had 300 ships, and only 3 per cent of accidents in the year and one total loss, would consider itself very well off. Indeed, the thanks of the public were due to the hon. Gentleman who had brought the subject before the House, for having shown how admirable the navigation of the Navy was, instead of being "scandalous," as the hon. Gentleman would have the House believe. The disasters had been attributed by some to a want of navigation, by others to a want of seamanship. With regard, however, to one or two of those accidents which had lately occupied so much of the public attention, he would like to say a few words. The accident to the Agincourt had arisen from a slight error in pilotage. The ships were hardly stemming the tide—the two lines were gradually converging to the shore — there was a haze from the land — and the officer who was conducting the lee line made a mistake, which any man of his age and service might have fallen into, in calculating his distance from the land. An error in pilotage got that ship aground; but a most remarkable exercise of seamanship, to which we might turn with pride, got her off, for it should be remembered that there was a mass of iron of from 5,000 to 6,000 tons upon the rock, and that all their exertions could only lighten her to about 11 or 12 inches of her enormous draught. In fact, he had conversed with officers outside the Navy of the same class and grade as himself, and they were all of opinion that that was the most creditable performance that had occurred in the Navy for many years; and he must say, that instead of the degradation of the officers, he would have been inclined to promote them. Then, as to the Lord Clyde, that vessel had been sent to perform a certain service at the island of Pantalaria. The captain was fettered probably by the orders with respect to the consumption of coal, and that probably might have had some share in the disaster which ensued; but if he had steamed his ship 20 miles off land on a moderate night, he would have been called to account, and no one could say what would have happened. There was another case to which the hon. Gentleman did not advert, but as to which we might congratulate ourselves as furnishing one of the brightest examples of British seamanship — he alluded to the Megara. Here there was no want of pilotage, when Captain Thrupp ran his ship that stormy morning on St. Paul's, when he could keep her no longer afloat. When we consider the coolness, the resource, and the indomitable courage of Captain Thrupp, and the sharp way in which he repressed the slight germ of insubordination which manifested itself, as well as the manner in which he found his men, provided for their every want, and did not leave a single wooden cross over a grave in the island, we must be filled with admiration. Admiral Sullivan had been alluded to more than once in the debate, and his plan — which he (Sir James Elphinstone) had often talked over with the gallant officer — was well deserving of the attention of the Admiralty and the right hon. Gentleman. The Admiral's plan was to have regular survey squadrons in which officers intended for masters should be educated. For instance, he would have one ship in the Baltic, and the officers on board should be entirely of that class. When on examination found proficient in the pilotage of the Baltic, they should be sent to the West Indies until they were proved to be perfect in the pilotage of those seas; then to the East Indies, Australia, and so on. Then, after a certain number of years, those officers should be drafted into Her Majesty's ships. In conclusion, he must say that the term scandalous might be applied with more propriety to the accommodation for the Survey department at the Admiralty than to any officers or men in the Navy. If the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to that subject, and to the formation of a squadron to carry out surveys which were deficient in many parts of the world, it would be of greater advantage than the consideration of a question of this kind, with regard to which officers of high rank and great experience were agreed.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he must regret that his hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury Tracy) had mainly founded his Motion on what he termed the breakdown of the present system. The onus of proving that breakdown, however, lay upon his hon. Friend, and he did not think he had established his case. He was glad to hear that his hon. Friend limited the application of the word "scandalous" to two or three isolated instances; for at first, he had applied it to the general state of the navigation of Her Majesty's ships. His hon. Friend had placed before the country a fearful catalogue of possible disasters, which, however, had not occurred; but he would certainly have given a very erroneous impression, if he had conveyed to the public the idea that the ships which in the course of 10 years had touched the ground were necessarily in peril. Some disasters had undoubtedly occurred; but it was a dangerous argument to infer from any particular accident that the whole system was imperfect, and he was sure no one would be inclined to think that the navigating officers of the Navy were not a class of the greatest possible value, who would do honour to any country which they served. Doubtless, many officers held that the system might be improved, and many men were dissatisfied with the position and status of navigating officers; but in all the voluminous literature he had read upon this subject, he had not found a single pamphlet, speech, or memorandum that placed the capacity of the navigating officers so low as his hon. Friend had done in his speech that evening. Therefore, he trusted his hon. Friend would allow him to enter a protest against his view, and to say that, although there was much in the present system capable of improvement, he did not think that his hon. Friend should base his case upon the collisions or accidents in navigation which had occurred. He thought his hon. Friend had included in his list of stranded ships many accidents due to collisions and other causes which were sometimes beyond the control of the navigating officers. [Mr. HANBURY TRACY said, he had carefully omitted the collisions.] In that case, he (Mr. Goschen) must say that his hon. Friend's figures were not correct, because there were only 102 vessels with regard to which court-martials had been held, including those stranded and lost, and of these the Bombay was burnt and the Captain lost. But he objected to totals of that kind, extending over a number of years, being put before the public, to produce the impression of the very great probability of disaster, instead of the disasters themselves being specified. The Motion might have been based on different grounds. During the last 10 years there had been considerable agitation with reference to the position of navigating officers in the Navy, and many attempts, some of which might have been successful had it not been for the inherent difficulties connected with the subject, had been made to deal with the question. One of the difficulties consisted in this—that while the argument was exceedingly strong for keeping a separate class of navigating officers, there was an argument equally strong in favour of giving every opportunity for increasing the experience of the executive officers in navigation. It by no means followed, however, that because there was a separate class of navigating officers, the executive officers were not to be expected to be able to navigate their ships, for there was a great difference between the question of navigation and that of pilotage. There were numerous cases in which ships had been successfully navigated by the executive officers, and he doubted whether there was a ship in the Navy which had not on board a number of officers able to undertake the navigation. The examination of navigating and executive officers, too, was the same, and the latter had to pass an examination in navigation which proved them to be of a certain capacity for navigating ships. His hon. Friend admitted that young officers were taught to navigate their ships, but alleged that as they became older they lost the knowledge so acquired. But if he (Mr. Goschen) was not mistaken there were many captains who took a great part in navigating their ships, and would be able to do so without the help of a navigating officer. He also wished it to be distinctly understood that there was no doubt whatever as to the responsibility of the captain for the navigation of his ship, although he might have a navigating officer to assist him, and, in fact, no Board of Admiralty had acted upon a different view. In the case of the Conqueror, which had been mentioned, the Admiralty declared that it was the duty of the captain to take every precaution for the safety of his ship, and that in order to discharge his responsibility he should use every means in his power to ascertain the ship's position, the prevailing currents, and the danger to which she might be exposed. He did not think any naval officer of the present day would dispute his responsibility in that respect. Indeed, the first Article on Pilotage in the "Queen's Regulations," was that the captain was responsible for the safe conducting of his ship. Therefore, it was not true to say that these duties were relegated entirely to a separate class. The question remaining was, whether it would be better to attach to the captain, for assistance in navigation, any officer taken generally from the executive branch, or an officer specially trained to perform such duties. Three views prevailed upon this subject. One was in favour of preserving the present arrangement, and of retaining a separate class, educated somewhat differently from the executive officers. The second view was, that we should retain the name and position of navigating officers, but that they should be drawn from the same class as executive officers, and receive a special and separate training. The third view was, as was held by his hon. Friend, that there ought to be no special class at all, and that officers ought to be told off from the executive ranks for the special duty for a brief term of years. The question was, no doubt, very important, and had occupied the attention of the Admiralty. He had met with a small minority of officers who were in favour of changing the present system, and of substituting another class of equal rank and status with the separate officers. It must be owned that the questions relating to the education of the navigating officers, their pay, and promotion were all questions which could not be said to be settled at the present time, and in which possibly great reforms might be made. While that was so—and judging mainly from the evidence of naval officers, he was not prepared to lay the duty of navigating ships on officers who would only have a very limited experience of their duties from the number of years they might be engaged upon them; and he must still adhere to the practice that ships of such immense value, as those to which his hon. Friend had pointed, should be entrusted to men who had been trained to the special duties in all parts of the world. The practice was this—it was not in the first five or seven years of their duties, that the navigating officers were superior to the executive officers. The point where the navigating officers really began to be most useful and most trustworthy was when they had been for a large number of years engaged on their special work; and while he appreciated the argument for increasing the knowledge of navigation among officers, he thought, considering the immense values of our iron-clads, that we could not attach too much importance to the desirability of retaining a number of men trained by the most extensive experience that could be given them to steer these vessels. While many foreign Navies were powerful, there was no point on which we were stronger than in our officers being able to place our ships in position or to navigate a difficult coast without the aid of pilots. The evidence of Admiral Sullivan corroborated that, and was to the effect that he had been in communication with French officers, and that he piloted their ships and placed them in position; and Admiral Sullivan distinctly stated that one great advantage which the English Navy had over others lay in their power of placing ships in difficult positions, and enabling them to approach much closer to difficult coasts, from the number of specially trained men we possessed. The one difficulty which existed with regard to this subject was, what was to be done with the navigating officers when, after a number of years' experience, they were anxious for promotion. That was another of the points which had often baffled schemes for the solution of this question; for it was supposed that navigating officers would not be so competent to command squadrons as executive officers, and this had constituted one of the great drawbacks. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Motion to a division. He could assure him that the giving all possible opportunities of studying navigation to all officers in Her Majesty's Navy was a point which was constantly occupying the attention of Her Majesty's Government. He agreed with his hon. Friend that they should produce as great a number of men in the Navy able to pilot ships as they possibly could; but, looking at the matter from a non-professional point of view, he confessed he had not seen evidence to induce him to accept the Motion, and embark on a somewhat dangerous experiment.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) had referred to the loss of the Lord Clyde. He would not go into the question further than to say that whatever might have been the errors of seamanship that might have led to the catastrophe to that ship, he fully concurred in the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), that the economizing of coals had a great deal to do with that catastrophe. As to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy), he would observe that real seamanship could only be learnt by long practice at sea, and being constantly afloat, as was the case with the present masters; he must, confess, however, that it was quite certain that under the present condition of the Navy any under class of naval officers had not the same opportunity of acquiring the details of their profession which they formerly had. Besides, we had now constructed a class of ships which were almost unmanageable, and the navigation of which required the utmost nautical skill. If the Motion were adopted, therefore, we should have to do away with men whose talents and zeal were undoubted, in order to place the Navy in the hands of men who had not had an opportunity of acquiring a sufficient knowledge of what was necessary for the safety of our ships. He sincerely hoped, in conclusion, the House would not accept the Motion, but that they would adopt the suggestion for the establishment of school ships.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he concurred in what had been expressed by the hon. and gallant Member for Stirling (Admiral Erskine), and thought it a strange policy to place civilians who might be wholly ignorant of naval affairs at the head of the Admiralty, and he must express his belief that when a crisis arrived, the system would bring this country into the greatest possible danger. There had been some remarkable changes at the Admiralty, and we were now reverting to the state of things which existed prior to the great administrative changes introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract.

MR. BATES said, that, as a shipowner of some standing, he must give it as his opinion that the arguments brought forward by the hon. Gentleman opposite to prove the inefficiency of the masters in the Navy were the very best which could have been adduced to show the great efficiency of those officers. If he only lost one ship out of 25 in the course of a year he should be a gainer by not insuring his ships, and therefore the fact that of the 300 vessels in commission belonging to the Royal Navy, only 13 had been lost in 10 years, went far to prove that the sailing masters were most efficient men. He must repeat, that if he had 300 ships, and only 15 were lost per annum, he should be a gainer by not insuring them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY—INDIA—ROYAL HORSE ARTILLERY.—OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL NORTH, in rising to bring under the consideration of the House the claims for compensation of the officers of the five Batteries of the Royal Horse Artillery suddenly ordered home from India early in 1871, with a view of reducing the force of Royal Artillery on the Indian establishment, by which they suffered pecuniary loss, said he had to complain of the short notice given in this case—in no case less than a fortnight—the usual notice being a twelvemonth, and the usual notice of moves of regiments had been issued for a considerable time and they were not included in it, and according to a scheme which had been drawn up applicable only to the Artillery they would not have been relieved for above a year. They were, however, telegraphed for to return to this country, and the only reason for that urgency was, that the Indian Exchequer might be saved the expense of those 700 men. In this country it would be a great expense and inconvenience to be removed suddenly; but there was much more when a removal was ordered from India to England, more especially when it was remembered that they were stationed in the Upper Provinces of India and were not relieved by other batteries who would have taken over their horses and stores at a valuation; and he therefore submitted that the officers were entitled to some remuneration for the loss they had sustained by the sale of their horses and furniture, and on account of the stores, a supply of which they were obliged to keep up. In two similar cases compensation had been granted, and he hoped that in this instance an assurance would be given to the House that some remuneration would be given to the officers who had so materially suffered.

Mr. Goschen

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, he should be unwilling to cast unnecessary expense upon the Indian Government, but that was a case in which very sudden notice was given, and the officers had been losers by that sudden notice, and their property had to be realized suddenly, and at whatever price they could obtain. It was an unfair system, especially when they considered it had been the custom heretofore to give several months' notice of removal, to order a regiment home on such unforeseen notice.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he must admit that the case cited—that of the two Hussar regiments summoned home in 1870, was, although not on all fours with the one which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel North) had just brought forward, sufficiently like it to be reasonably cited. The Hussars had, however, to leave at even shorter notice, and the Secretary of State in Council determined, as was mentioned some weeks ago, in reply to a Question from the hon. Member for Gravesend (Sir Charles Wingfield)—first, that in their very exceptional case some indulgence might be granted; and, secondly, that that indulgence should not be allowed to make a precedent. Of the five batteries none had less, some had more than a fortnight's notice, whereas one Hussar regiment had only 10 days' and the other had only about 48 hours' notice. The Motion, therefore, went far to prove that in making the concession the Government did make to the Hussars they acted with doubtful wisdom. "Hard cases made bad law," and the moment a rule was relaxed in one case, others were brought forward, which came so near it that it was very difficult to show how they differed; for if a notice of 48 hours deserved consideration, then a notice of 10 days was pressed as deserving consideration; if that was admitted, then a fortnight's notice was put forward; then one of three weeks, and so it went on, till the rule disappeared altogether. After the Secretary of State in Council had, in compliance with the earnest recommendation of certain of the military authorities in this country, given compensation to the Hussar regiments, the Government of India pointed out very strongly the objection to what had been done as forming a dangerous precedent, and experience has proved that it was right. That being so, he trusted the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not press the Indian authorities to go further, as he must see how incompatible was the course suggested with all military usage in this country, and, indeed, with all received principles of military administration. Moreover, the officers concerned were quite aware that the exigencies of the public service might at any moment compel them to make a considerable pecuniary sacrifice, if they were suddenly ordered to leave the place where they were stationed, and the unusually high pay of India must surely, in part, be set against the risk of such sacrifice. A well-known French author had written a book called Servitude et Grandeur Militaires. The liability to be sent now here, now there, with scant regard to personal convenience, was part of the darker side of a soldier's life—part of the servitude militaire. The soldier received much honour from and owed much consideration to the State, even to the Exchequer of the State. He must however say that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made the most of the case, for if the batteries had not come home when they did, they must have come in the hot weather, unless kept in India nearly a year; and would that have been a smaller inconvenience? Then, as to the horses, even if they had been brought home—a thing which had never been allowed—they would have fetched but small prices here, and nothing was commoner than for officers leaving India in a hurry, to leave their horses to be sold afterwards. No one, he maintained, would think of pressing such claims as those upon the War Office, nor would the House support such a claim on our own Treasury; and we should not ask from India what we should despair of getting from the guardians of the public purse at home. The hon. and gallant Gentleman must know very well that questions of this kind were not decided directly by the Executive Government. They were decided by the Secretary of State and the Council of India—a body created by Parliament for the express purpose of defending the finances of India. That body was never so exactly fulfilling the functions for which Parliament called it into execution as when it was protecting the Indian Exchequer against pressure from powerful interests in this country, and it had surely a right to ask the House to support it on such an occasion as this.

MR. LIDDELL said, that the question before the House formed a military grievance, and he thought that some military authority representing the Government ought to offer some explanation upon it. The argument of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India was a quibbling argument, which would not satisfy officers in the Army. There ought to be some explanation as to why the habitual notice in time of peace was not given in this case.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT said, he could not help expressing his regret at the decision which the Under Secretary of State for India had announced as having been arrived at in the matter. Considering the small amount of compensation asked, it would, he believed, be only dignified and just to accede to the claim made.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he should be glad to learn what absolute necessity there was for giving such short notice to these five batteries in India. He was of opinion, that, if these batteries had received short notice simply to suit the convenience of the Government, and not because of absolute necessity, the Government was bound to compensate them.

SIR HENRY STORKS said, that changes oftentimes, and, indeed, generally, involved a certain amount of inconvenience; but it would be a very dangerous precedent to set up, that on such occasions claims should be sent in for compensation. The regiments of cavalry differed in their circumstances from the batteries of artillery in this—that while the regiments were stationed close together, so that it was found extremely difficult to dispose of their horses and effects, the batteries of artillery were quartered at stations widely apart where there was no such difficulty. The notice given in the case of the batteries, too, was much longer than that given to the cavalry. The matter had received the attention of the Secretary of State for India in Council, and the decision complained of had not been arrived at without due consideration.

Mr. Grant Duff.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL—[Lords.]

[BILL 111.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cross.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in withdrawing his opposition to the Motion, said he did not regard the Bill as satisfactory, and gave Notice that in Committee he should move Amendments in order to render the Bill a satisfactory solution of the principles involved in the measure.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday next.

SITES FOR PLACES OF WORSHIP AND SCHOOLS BILL.

(Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Morley, Mr. Charles Reed, Mr. Hinde Palmer.)

[BILL 2.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

MR. NEWDEGATE moved to insert at the end of Clause 5, the words—

"And such trust deeds, together with the names of the trustees for the time being, shall be enrolled in the High Court of Chancery."

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 41, after the word "school," to add the words "and such trust deed, together with the names of the trustees for the time being, shall be enrolled in the High Court of Chancery."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN proposed to amend the proposed Amendment, by omitting the words "together with the names of the trustees for the time being."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "together with the names of the trustees for the time being." — (Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 3; Noes 22: Majority 19.

And it appearing from the Division that 40 Members were not present—

The House was adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 10th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Appointment of Commissioners for taking Affidavits* (133); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (134).

Second Reading—Parliamentary and Municipal Elections (117); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation* (116); Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* (115); Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental* (121); Cattle Disease (Ireland) Acts Amendment* (125); Charitable Loan Societies (Ireland)* (124).

Select Committee—Report—Epping Forest* (112 132).

Committee—Statute Law Revision* (107).

Committee—Report—Local Government Supplemental* (103).

Report—Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing)* (131); Gas and Water Orders Confirmation* (101).

Third Reading—Juries Act Amendment (Ireland)* (109), and passed.

Withdrawn—Middlesex Registration Amendment* (86).

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL.—(No. 117).

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: My Lords, the circumstances under which the Bill of last year came up to your Lordships do not present themselves in the Bill now before you. You will remember that the principal argument of the noble Earl who moved the rejection of the Bill of last year (the Earl of Shaftesbury) and of those noble Lords who supported him was founded on the period of the Session when the measure came up to this House. It was urged by the noble Earl, and by the majority who adopted his views, that we had then arrived at too late a period of the Session to give adequate consideration to a measure of so much importance. I did not concur in the views of the noble Earl; but, at all events, the argument which he used cannot be adduced again on this occasion, for the Bill has come up to your Lordships' House two months earlier than the time at which the Bill of last year was laid before you. That being the case with regard to the period at which the measure comes to be considered, I think I may say that the time which has elapsed since last autumn has shown, in the first place, that the desire of the House of Commons to adopt the principle of the Ballot as an improvement upon the existing system of Parliamentary election has not diminished; for they have again sent up the Bill by a large majority—a fact which of itself entitles the Bill to a full and fair consideration at your Lordships' hands. Again, the time which has elapsed since last August has shown no change in the opinion of the country on the subject, and it remains the same as when at the last General Election, so great a desire was manifested by the electoral bodies to obtain the securities which it is the object of this Bill to obtain. That being so, I hope that your Lordships will address yourselves to the consideration of the question with the desire to deal in Committee with the proposals it contains for the improvement of our electoral system.

My Lords, the main object of the Bill is by improvements in the machinery of elections to effect the establishment of a system that will secure better order and more regularity in elections than at present exist; will put an end to the evils of intimidation, and which, if it will not altogether put an end to, will tend to diminish to a considerable extent the scandal of bribery. There is very important evidence in respect to the effect of the Ballot in producing order and tranquillity at elections. I believe that there can be no controversy, for it is conceded by all who have seen the system in operation in foreign countries, that, whatever may be its other merits or demerits, it does secure a remarkable degree of order and regularity during the time of election. We have now upon our Table very valuable evidence upon this matter—valuable because it relates to the system as practised in different parts of the globe, and because it rests upon testimony which none of your Lordships can suspect on account of any previous approval of the system of Ballot by the gentlemen who gave it, when they were in this country. I will refer for a very few moments to Papers which were laid upon your Lordships' Table last year as to the operation of the Ballot in our colonies. There are among them two statements of Governors of very important colonies in Australia, gentlemen who are very well known to noble Lords opposite, and whose opinions they will not be eager to controvert. These opinions are those of Mr. Ducane, Governor of Tasmania, and of Sir James Fergusson, Governor of South Australia. Mr. Ducane says—

“As no general election has taken place since I first arrived in the colony, my own practical experience of the working of the system is necessarily more limited than it would otherwise have been. Nothing, however, has occurred at any contested election which has taken place during the period of my governorship which would lead me to dissent from Mr. Wilson's opinion so far as the existing state of things is concerned. I may further add that, having been in Hobart Town on three different occasions when contested elections were proceeding, I was much struck with the total absence of any local excitement, and should not have discovered that any event out of the common was going on at the time. That this perfect tranquillity is mainly attributable to the present system of voting, and especially to the system of nomination in writing, also in force in the colony” (full particulars of which your Lordships will find in the copy of the Electoral Act subjoined to the memorandum), “I must unhesitatingly record my opinion.”

Sir James Fergusson, the Governor of South Australia, says—

“I am bound to state that the Ballot is generally and remarkably popular in the colony. To the people at large it appears to give entire satisfaction. By the upper classes and the minorities, especially if unpopular, it is found to be a valuable protection, and the only persons whom I have found to regard it with aversion are those who view it only as part of institutions which they dislike, and to the working of which they attribute legislative mistakes and administrative defects. Such persons are, however, few in number; for, generally, those who regret the institution of universal suffrage, and ascribe to it many mischiefs, consider the Ballot to have had a mitigating influence—to have enabled, often, the superior and independent candidate to be returned, the employer to vote undeterred by his workmen, the Civil Service by the Ministry, the tradesmen by their respective classes—and anticipate a yet greater advantage in case of the occurrence of popular excitement and the discussion of disturbing topics.”

The Marquess of Ripon

My Lords, this evidence relates to what actually occurs at elections—it is not evidence of a matter of opinion, but evidence of matter of fact with respect to the working of the system in other countries; and, looking at the persons from whom the evidence comes, I think no statements on the subject could be more worthy of consideration than those of the gentlemen from whom I have quoted. There is other evidence on which I do not desire to lay too much stress but which I cannot altogether pass over—I mean the evidence as to the working of the Ballot system in the elections of the London School Board. The elections of that School Board are the only occasions on which the Ballot has, to any extent, been put into operation in the country; and those elections, both in their order and results, are a proof that the system has produced the most favourable consequences. Although the general election of the London School Board has occurred only upon one occasion, there have been several by elections under which the system of cumulative voting did not apply, because they were only single elections, so that these latter elections would be very similar to Parliamentary elections, and we have nothing to regret in reference to the regularity and order of such elections. Under this Bill there will be an end of nomination days, which it has always appeared to me might be described as public nuisances. Another advantage which will arise from it will be that there will be no publication of a 2 o'clock poll, which at present is a cause of so much excitement. There will be no declaration till the close of the poll. Your Lordships will not, I am sure, be inclined to underrate the importance of anything that tends to produce order and regularity at elections; and while I approve the extension of the franchise which we have seen within the last few years, there can be no doubt that the larger the constituency and the stronger the popular element, the more likely it is that the individual voters will be deterred from the free exercise of the franchise. In boroughs, in particular, where the conduct of voters is more closely scrutinized, persons of a quiet and shrinking disposition will be likely to be deterred from the exercise of their rights. Persons of this class are more numerous than might be supposed, and a measure affording them security will, in itself, be a great advantage to the cause of public order. I had occasion to point out last year that since the large extension of the suffrage, which took place a few years ago, this question of intimidation had assumed a new aspect. It is said that under the influences which are at present in operation intimidation by individuals, such as the intimidation of landlords, employers, and others, has decreased, and must continue to decrease; but I am now referring to a different system of intimidation, which is likely to spring up under a much extended suffrage—intimidation by bodies like trades unions. Now, while public opinion diminishes the danger of intimidation from an individual, it does not apply with at all the same force to bodies of this description; because in any pressure they may apply they would probably have the support of the mass of their members, and would therefore not lie within the control of public opinion. I think your Lordships will be of opinion that against intimidation from such sources greater security is required than any afforded under the present system. You cannot to any considerable extent deal with intimidation of this kind by any extremity of punishment. Consequently, if your Lordships desire that the suffrage given to those classes should be exercised freely, and should express their real feeling, you are bound to secure them in the free exercise of the franchise and give them that protection against intimidation which you cannot provide for them by any of the means you have hitherto applied. You cannot put it down by penal interference, and if you attempt it you will come to a point at which you will run serious danger of interfering with the just and necessary freedom of contract and of intercourse between employers and employed. I think it is far wiser to adopt the course which would seem to put down the evil altogether. I should be overstating my opinion and going beyond what I believe to be the fact, if I were to say that the introduction of the Ballot will put an end to bribery, but I do think that it will diminish it by rendering the temptation to the briber and the bribed much less than it is at present. Of course it may be possible to bribe by promising to a knot of people a lump sum in case the election is carried; but that may be done now as well as under this Bill. Objections to the Ballot have been made on the grounds of the frauds practised in other places by the removal of voting-papers deposited in the ballot-box, and the substitution of others in their stead; but the question of machinery, while a fair one for argument, is one of detail and arrangement, and not one of principle. My Lords, I have always been for the Ballot, but I must admit that an argument has been used against it which, with many persons, had considerable weight. It was that the franchise was a trust, and that the persons who possessed it were bound to exercise it in the face of the whole community. Now whatever force that argument may have had when the constituency was a limited one, I do not think it can have any at present. I do not suppose it can be said in these days of a very extended suffrage that the electors exercise that suffrage on behalf of anyone but themselves. Of course, the man who votes against his conscience does wrong, whether his vote be given in public or in the secrecy of the Ballot. My Lords, maintaining as I do those opinions, I venture to say that after the discussions on this subject in this House and the other House of Parliament, and after those manifestations of public opinion which have been recognized in the House of Commons, the time has come when your Lordships may be asked to give your approval to the adoption of this system. I will not pretend to argue that it is your duty on occasions of this kind to accept any measure sent up to you by the other House of Parliament merely because it has been so sent up; but I do submit that on a question of this character, the decision of the House of Commons is entitled to especial consideration, because it comes from those who have had the widest and most recent experience of the working of our electoral machinery, and who may be presumed to be the most interested in making that machinery as good and effective as possible. Looking, therefore, at the matter merely in that light, and putting aside for a moment the respect due to the House of Commons as the other branch of the Legislature, I venture to hope that your Lordships will not be inclined to reject a Bill which is sent up to you for the second time after full consideration. Believing that this Bill thus presented to you by the other House is one that contains large and valuable improvements in the machinery which will protect the voter from intimidation and violence, whether from individuals, classes, or combinations; will secure to a very large extent much greater regularity and order in the conduct of elections; and will diminish, though I do not pretend that it will entirely remove, the evils of bribery, I ask your Lordships to give it a second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord President.)

EARL GREY: My Lords, the discussions which the question of the Ballot has undergone during the last 40 years have so exhausted the subject that I should be making an unjustifiable demand upon your Lordships' patience were I again to enter into the general arguments against this mode of voting, which have been used so often, and with which you must be so familiar; I will therefore, on this occasion, confine myself almost exclusively to those reasons for not agreeing to the Bill which seem to me to arise from the time and from the circumstances under which it is brought forward. My main objection to this Bill is that we are asked to make by it a very important change in our representative system without taking into consideration the general state of that system. We must not forget that this is not the only change which is contemplated. We have been told by so high an authority as the Prime Minister that this is but one of three questions connected with the representation which must soon occupy the attention of Parliament. He has warned us that we shall have to consider not only the Ballot, but also a further change in the franchise, and in the distribution of seats as settled by the Act of 1867. This is an important warning coming from the Prime Minister, yet it was hardly needed. The signs that these questions will speedily be forced on our consideration are too clear to escape the most careless observer, and I must add the faults and anomalies of our present system are so glaring that it is neither possible nor desirable that it should be long maintained unaltered. But if we have to look forward to the necessity of revising, at no distant date, the system under which the Representatives of the people are now returned, I submit to your Lordships that it would be unwise and inexpedient to make a partial change in it without considering as a whole the arrangement to be hereafter adopted. Before we determine whether voting is to be secret or open we ought to know by what constituencies, and under what circumstances, the franchise is to be exercised. And there is also this further and important objection to dealing with this question singly—that by doing so, by making one change in the representation this year, another next year, and another the year after, you may be gradually led into making such a total alteration in the whole character of our government, as would meet with your most determined resistance if it were proposed to you at once. As men of ordinary prudence we ought not to assent to such a change as that now proposed to us, without having before us the whole scheme of which it forms a part, for I hold that the only legitimate object of all changes affecting the representation is to secure a better House of Commons. But during the whole speech of my noble Friend who moved the second reading, I listened in vain for any argument to show that the Bill before us would have this effect. For my own part, I oppose the Bill because I believe it would tend to give us a worse instead of a better House of Commons, and also because I believe it would be an obstacle to such a real reform in that House as I believe to be urgently required. It is this last consideration which weighs most with me. The House of Commons is in this country the great centre of political power. It is not only the principal organ of legislation, it also exercises a complete control over the Executive Government, and that Government takes its whole colour and character from the House to which it owes its existence. Whether the country is to be well and wisely governed or the reverse, depends therefore upon the fitness of the House of Commons for its high duties. But this fitness it has not lately shown, and it is because the House of Commons has not proved equal to the task imposed upon it that I think your Lordships ought not to pass a Bill which proposes to make only a partial change in it, and would be an obstacle to a more complete improvement. I have ventured to assert that the House of Commons has not proved equal to its duties, because I am of opinion that during the last few years the country has not been governed as it ought to have been. And I am not singular in that opinion. I find that a large number of persons whose judgment deserves respect concur in it, and I would ask your Lordships whether there are not signs that a feeling is becoming very prevalent in the country that for some time public affairs have been ill managed? That such a feeling exists I am persuaded few of your Lordships would deny, and there is ample cause to be found for it, if we consider the manner in which the work both of legislation and of administration has been carried on. In the Executive Government we find no traces of foresight or of a steady adherence to a policy adopted after careful consideration of the real wants of the nation, but, instead, measures framed only to catch the mere cry of the day and to win a factitious popularity. Take as a sample the administration of our Army. If you look back at the course of our military administration for some years, you cannot fail to recognize the fact that it has been directed, now by close but false economy when economy has been the cry, and now to meet panic by increased armaments and unwise and ill-judged expenditure. Every other Department of the State has been carried on in the same spirit; all have been guided by the fleeting popular opinion of the hour, not by that deliberate judgment in the conduct of affairs, so necessary to secure the permanent welfare and prosperity of a great Empire. The want of firmness and of judgment displayed in its measures has created a general belief in the feebleness of the Government, has impaired its authority, and dangerously relaxed the reins of discipline. Turning to legislation, we know that it is almost at a stand as regards measures which are not taken up as party questions, and in favour of which no party cry can be raised. Yet there are measures of this sort which are universally admitted to be urgently wanted for the welfare of the people, but because they cannot be made to serve party interests they are neglected. Nor is this the worst. We find sometimes that very difficult and important questions—questions requiring for their right solution much knowledge and all the judgment of statesmen, are left under the present constitution of the House of Commons to the decision of passion and of prejudice. Let me remind you of what has just taken place with regard to the Contagious Diseases Act. On this most important and most difficult question we have had the humiliating exhibition of the Government being compelled to declare that while the results of a most careful enquiry by thoroughly competent men, and the general concurrence of enlightened opinion recommended a course which was also approved by their own judgment, they were yet obliged to take an opposite one because it was clearly vain to struggle against the influence which exciting appeals to ignorance and prejudice bring to bear on the Members of the House of Commons under its present constitution. What has happened in this case may well alarm us for the future, when we consider what difficult questions affecting the social state of the country are rising before us—questions such as those respecting the mutual relations of employers and employed, and as to the rights and obligations that attach to property. On these and such like questions infinite mischief may be done by unwise legislation; to judge rightly of them requires knowledge and experience, while they are subjects on which the people may be too easily misled and have their passions excited; and from what has already happened, we have too much reason to fear that the measures to be adopted with reference to them will be decided not by reason and deliberation within the walls of Parliament, but by clamour and passion without. Nor is it only from its yielding too easily to unreasoning clamour that the present House of Commons fails in the discharge of its duty; we have to complain that it never before showed so strong a disposition to sacrifice the interests of the public to the interests of party. I do not pretend that at any period of its history the House of Commons has been free from the influence of party spirit. In all free Governments the evil effects of this spirit have hitherto been felt, and I fear this is a price which must be paid for the inestimable blessing of a free Constitution. But I contend that party spirit was never before so predominant as now, and that never before was the preference of party to national interests avowed and acted upon in so unblushing a manner. There can be no stronger proof of this than that which is afforded by the Bill now before us. Allow me to recall to your Lordships' recollection the history of this Bill. The subject had, for some time, attracted comparatively little notice until last year when, by the failure of its marvellous Budget and by other blunders, the Government found itself involved in such serious difficulties that it seemed doubtful whether it would be able to go on. Then, all at once, the newspapers in its interest raised the cry that it must devote all its energies to carrying the Ballot Bill. It was not pretended that this was the measure most urgently wanted for the public interest. On the contrary, in the third Session of a Parliament, with no early prospect of a General Election, a change in the mode of voting, even if it were admitted to be desirable, could not be pressing in point of time. But there were other measures as to which time was precious—the faults of the sanitary laws had been officially reported as causing annually 120,000 unnecessary deaths. The laws relating to mines were not less notoriously defective, and this accounts, in part at least, for the fearful frequency of accidents, by which the lives of so many industrious men are lost every year. The need of a new law respecting education in Scotland was also admitted by the Government itself to be urgent. And in all these cases time was as precious as it was comparatively unimportant with respect to the Ballot Bill, for every year that legislation upon these subjects was postponed, people were dying and suffering without necessity, and more children in Scotland were growing up in ignorance. To do justice to those who called upon the Government to postpone these important and pressing subjects in order to devote the time of Parliament to the Ballot Bill, they did not pretend that it was for the public good they asked it. A very different motive was avowed; it was proclaimed without disguise that the Ballot Bill must be proceeded with in order “to keep the Liberal party together.” Now, see what this implied; it implied no less than this—that those who gave this advice thought it right to postpone the interests of the nation to the interests of their party, and to sacrifice the former in order to secure the latter. And this was not merely the advice of newspapers; it was acted upon by the Government. When so many of the precious hours of the House of Commons were last year devoted to the Ballot Bill instead of to measures of practical utility, it was as well known by Her Majesty's Government as by the rest of the world that there was not the remotest chance of its passing into a law, and that except “keeping the Liberal party together” it would serve no purpose to discuss it. For this purpose it was successful enough—it helped to divert public attention from the faults of the Ministers and to prevent defection from their ranks—it was a skilful party move—but to those who think the interest of the nation more important than that of a party the result in the waste of a Session is not so satisfactory. My Lords, I have referred to what has happened as to the Ballot Bill and the Contagious Diseases Act, because these transactions throw light on the influences which prevail in the House of Commons as now constituted. Party spirit within its walls; clamour and appeals to the passions of the ignorant without, are shown to be the forces which have most power over it, and account for the fact that it has failed to fill its place in the Constitution as it ought—that its influence has not proved favourable to a judicious and firm exercise of the powers of the Executive Government, still less to the passing without needless delay of such laws as are required to promote the welfare of the people. I must add that it has also failed in another respect. I would remind your Lordships that it is the duty of the House of Commons not only to express and enforce the opinion of the nation, but also to take a very important part in leading and directing that opinion by its debates. Formerly it did this with great effect. Look, for instance, how powerful an influence it exercised in bringing round the opinion of the nation on Free Trade. When I first entered the House of Commons Free Trade was equally unpopular on both sides of it, and with all classes, with merchants and manufacturers, as with landlords and farmers. Those in favour of it were a small minority, both in Parliament and in the country; but the continual discussion of the subject in Parliament was the most powerful instrument in gradually altering men's opinions upon it, and at length, after a 20 years' struggle, the public adopted what is now regarded as the common-sense view of the matter. It will hardly be asserted that the House of Commons now performs this important function of instructing the nation as well as it did; there is no longer to be found among its Members the same independent spirit, and there are few of them who will venture to combat any prevailing error or popular delusion. Perhaps I may be told that in finding so much fault with the present House of Commons, I have forgot the great services it has rendered to the public, especially by passing the three important Acts relating to the Church, to the occupation of land in Ireland, and to the education of the people in England. I have not forgotten these Acts, and I should be the last to undervalue them. I consider them of the highest importance; one of them, on the whole, an eminently wise and good measure, though not free from some serious faults which were probably unavoidable. The two others—those relating to the Church and to the occupation of land in Ireland—were also directed to objects of which I heartily approve; the one was intended to effect a much needed change in the policy of the nation, and to redress a gross injustice to the Irish people; the other to remove a real and very serious grievance. But the means adopted for attaining these objects I cannot regard as entitled to the same approval as the objects themselves. In the provisions of both these Acts, and still more in the manner in which they were carried, there are to my mind unfortunate marks of party spirit, and of a want of the calm and statesmanlike judgment required to deal successfully with such difficult subjects. To this I must attribute the fact that hitherto, at least, these Acts have not yielded the looked-for fruits of increased contentment and a better feeling towards the Imperial Government in the Irish people. Had these measures, however, been as good as their warmest admirers believe, they are not sufficient to alter my view of the general character of the present Parliament. I still hold that the facts I have laid before you make good the statement with which I began—that the House of Commons as now constituted, has not been found equal to its high duties, and that there is therefore an urgent need for a comprehensive measure of real Parliamentary Reform. Not a Reform which would recal what has been done in admitting a larger part of the people to share in the exercise of political power, but which would yet provide—as I am convinced is possible by suitable arrangements—for making the House of Commons a better representative of the intelligence of the nation, and more capable of directing wisely the government of this great Empire. My main objection to this Bill is, that by making a partial change in our representation, it will add to the difficulty of hereafter accomplishing such a real reform; but I object to it also, because whatever effect it has will be to aggravate the greatest faults which experience has brought to light in the House of Commons, as altered by the Act of 1867. Those faults arise, as I believe, mainly from the fact that the present mode of carrying on elections gives undue power to those small knots of men who contrive to promote their own interest, by obtaining a control of elections. These men, in the expressive language of American politicians, have been called “wire-pullers.” Under the system of secret voting, as it would be established by this Bill, and supposing no other change to be made, these “wire-pullers” would become absolutely irresistible. We know that they are so in America, that the right of electors to vote as they please is practically useless, and that the real choice of Representatives lies with “caucuses” and “wire-pullers.” Complaints of this abuse fill the American newspapers; and if this is the effect of the Ballot in the United States, we may safely conclude that in this country also it would tend to increase the power of the wire-pullers. Allow me to add a few remarks on the principal argument in favour of the Bill urged by my noble Friend. He says that it has twice passed the House of Commons by large majorities in two consecutive years, and that this is a manifestation of public opinion to which we ought to bow. No one of your Lordships can recognize more heartily than myself the authority of public opinion; but we must distinguish between real public opinion and a mere popular cry which is sometimes mistaken for it. Public opinion, truly so called, is the opinion of the majority of those who are able to think and to form an opinion for themselves. As such it is gradually formed by the process of public discussion, and as it is of slow growth, so it is not liable to sudden and hasty changes. A popular cry, on the other hand, is merely what has been well called the "mechanical acquiescence" of large numbers of men having no opinion of their own, in what is recommended to them by those who have contrived—sometimes by the lowest arts and for the basest purposes—to gain their ear for the moment; it is lightly taken up, and no less lightly altered, and is ever shifting and unstable. It is a blessing to a nation to be ruled by the former; a curse to be guided by the other. It has hitherto been the great boast of our Constitution, that while it has never failed to give effect to deliberate and mature opinion, it has saved our Government from being the sport of every hasty cry. And it is in no small measure to your Lordships' House that this is due, by your having had the firmness to say "No!" to demands, however loud or menacing," which you have judged not to have the true opinion of the nation in their favour. With regard to the Bill now before us, I should be the last to ask your Lordships to reject it if there were any indications that it had the support of this opinion; but all the indications, so far as I can see, point to the opposite conclusion. We know that even among those who hold strong democratic opinions—a large proportion of the men most distinguished for knowledge and for their philosophical minds—such men, for instance, as Mr. Mill—are decidedly opposed to the system of vote by Ballot. We have reason also to believe, from all we hear out-of-doors, that many of the large majority for this Bill in the other House have given it but a lukewarm and reluctant support; and that if in this case the specific of Ballot had been applied to the House of Commons, and its Members had been allowed the privilege of giving their votes on the Bill in this manner, it would never have come before your Lordships. When I see such strong grounds for believing that the real opinion of the House of Commons is not in favour of the Bill, and that the majorities that have passed it are a mere expression of party feeling, obtained by strong coercion, I cannot accept the fact that it has in two successive Sessions received the sanction of that House as a sufficient reason for our agreeing to its second reading. If this House is not to exercise its independent judgment in such a case as this, I for one say deliberately it had better be abolished, because it will have ceased to perform its proper function in the Constitution. I cannot conclude without adding a few words on the argument I have heard, that it would be better not to reject this Bill on the second reading, but to amend it in Committee. I would ask with what view is it to be amended? I am persuaded that none of your Lordships would approve of attempting to get rid of this Bill by introducing into it Amendments inconsistent with its spirit in order to insure its ultimate failure. So undignified and indirect a course I am quite certain your Lordships will not adopt, and that any Amendments you may decide upon making will be really intended to improve the Bill, with a view to its becoming law. But if so, I am unable to conceive what Amendments of real value can be introduced, except upon one single point. If the Bill is to pass, I think it is important that we should replace in it the provisions for an efficient scrutiny, which were contained in the original Bill of Her Majesty's Ministers two years ago, but are omitted from that now before us. These provisions I believe to be absolutely necessary to prevent gross abuses, and I should look with great alarm to the frauds and the unfair proceedings which might be committed with impunity by unscrupulous Returning Officers under the Bill as it stands. But with this exception, I am utterly at a loss to discover in what respect the Bill could be materially altered without interfering with its spirit and intention. I have only to add that I do not oppose the second reading of this Bill with the slightest hope that my opposition can be successful, since I know that it is not to have the support of the great body of the noble Lords who occupy the benches behind me; but as I entertain a strong conviction that in passing this Bill we shall be making a great mistake—that we shall be taking a course injurious to the nation, and specially injurious to this House—I have thought it my duty to record my opinion, and to give an opportunity of recording theirs to those of your Lordships who agree with me. I also indulge a hope that, although our opposition may be vain so far as regards arresting the progress of this Bill, it may yet be not altogether useless, but may possibly have some effect in leading your Lordships and the public carefully to consider the whole state of our representation, and the urgent need there is of an effectual reform, in order that the House of Commons may be rendered more equal to its high duties, and that the nation may be governed with more vigour and more wisdom than at present. I move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

The Marquess of Ripon

Earl Grey

Earl Grey

An Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months.")—(The Earl Grey.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I am anxious to take this early opportunity of stating the views which I hold in regard to the Bill now before your Lordships; and I wish to begin by stating that I regret extremely Her Majesty's Government should have thought it necessary to deal with this question at all; but the question having been brought before your Lordships it is one we must entertain, and therefore I ask your Lordships' permission to offer a few remarks. I think it will not be denied that this is the first time your Lordships have been seriously and distinctly asked to consider the question of taking votes by way of Ballot; because it was manifest to all—indeed, the noble Marquess who introduced the Bill scarcely denied it—that the period of the Session at which this Bill was brought before your Lordships last year rendered it almost, if not altogether, impossible to devote that time and attention which were necessary to a measure of such importance, and therefore I may assume your Lordships were perfectly justified in the course which you pursued on that occasion. I think that subsequent events have tended to show how unwise it would have been had you on the 10th of August last year attempted to go into the merits or demerits of this question. The Bill of last year was characterized by the Prime Minister as amounting almost to perfection; and yet when introduced into the House of Commons this year it is found to be so complicated in its details and so full of difficulties that it is not till the 10th of June that the other House of Parliament have been able to send it to your Lordships for consideration. Now, the arguments upon this subject are so familiar to most, if not all, of your Lordships that I do not think it will be necessary for me to dwell upon them at any great length; but I should like to call your Lordships' attention to three points—first of all, the manner and mode in which this question has been dealt with by the other House of Parliament at various periods; secondly, what are the evils complained of? and thirdly, whether the measure now before us is one calculated to attain the object which the Government say they have in view? Now, the subject of the Ballot has been debated in the House of Commons for, I think, the last 40 years. It has generally been the crotchet of some Member of the "advanced section" of the Liberal party who annually aired his eloquence before that Assembly by introducing a Bill, which in due course was snubbed by the constituted leaders of the party, and disposed of in a very summary manner, sometimes with, but more often without, any very lengthened discussion. In that condition we find the question till the year 1867. The Prime Minister had, I think, for 40 years of his life opposed this measure—but at that time a change seems to have come over the spirit of the Liberal party; and I confess it did not surprise me that he who had been the champion of the Established Church of Ireland and had at once become the disestablisher and destroyer of that Church should, with all the zeal of a recent convert, become suddenly one of the most ardent and one of the most energetic supporters of the advanced doctrines of the Liberal faith. So we find the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and his Government introducing a measure which, for the most part, they had previously opposed. It is obvious that some reason must be advanced for this change of opinion; and, accordingly, we find the Prime Minister looking about for a reason by which to justify this sudden inconsistency of conduct; and turning to the Reform Bill of the late Government, he stated as a reason for the thorough alteration of his opinions, and for his advocacy of the Ballot, that the Bill of the late Government had produced a state of almost universal suffrage. My noble Friend who introduced the Bill to-night, with great caution, did not go so far, for he only treated that Act as an extension of the suffrage; and, accordingly, the Act, in his opinion, being of a much milder character than it appears to the Prime Minister to be, it does not furnish even that small reason which might perhaps have existed for departing from the course previously adopted by Members of the Government. That the measure, however, which was introduced by the late Government and passed into a law has led to a state of universal suffrage is very far from the truth. By the last Census the population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was 32,000,000; but the voters at the last election numbered only 2,300,000. This would leave of those unrepresented by votes something like 30,000,000 people. ["Oh! oh!" "Hear!"] I merely give the facts and figures, which nobody can contradict; noble Lords will be at liberty to comment upon them hereafter. It is a very remarkable circumstance that upon this subject of the Ballot the great majority of Her Majesty's Ministers in the other House of Parliament have been remarkably silent; indeed, I am not sure that any Member of the Government except the Prime Minister and the Vice President of the Committee of Council took any part in the discussions. The Vice President of the Council has been a consistent advocate of the Ballot, I believe, throughout his Parliamentary career; but the reason why the Members of the Government have not taken part in the debate would not, I think, have been very difficult to discover. It must be painful to men who have, for so many years, been advocating a particular line of policy, suddenly—and without, as I think, sufficient grounds—to take exactly the opposite course. There is one Member of Her Majesty's Government whose reticence on this question I can very well understand, and I am inclined to think that the right hon. Gentleman having changed his opinions so frequently on the matter, is at the present moment at a loss to know whether he is for or against the Ballot. As I shall have occasion to quote the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman again when I come to another part of the subject and to found some arguments upon it, I will ask your Lordships' permission to quote a few lines giving you a notion of the state of mind a few years ago of Mr. Chichester Fortescue the President of the Board of Trade. This was upon one of the earlier Motions to which I have alluded, brought forward by Mr. Berkeley. Mr. Fortescue said—

"It so happened that for several years he had given but one vote on this subject, and that was for the Ballot. He was enough of a party man to feel great reluctance to sever himself from the friends with whom he generally acted, and this reluctance led him without sufficient examination to give the vote in question. Since that time, however, he had thought much on the Ballot, and the more he had thought of it the less he liked it."—[3 Hansard, clvii. 951-2.]

I think—and in that I concur with the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) — that this measure has been brought forward to suit the convenience of Her Majesty's Government and to meet the requirements of the advanced section of the Liberal party. Such being the case, I am led to inquire what are the evils complained of, and how will those evils be met by the measure which is now proposed? The noble Marquess the President of the Council has declared that these evils are—first of all, intimidation and undue influence; secondly, corruption and bribery; and, thirdly, rioting at elections. I think your Lordships will agree with me that, as regards the last subject—rioting at elections—a system of compulsory secrecy cannot be necessary—and in the remarks which I shall make I wish to draw a great distinction between what is called compulsory secrecy and what I will call optional secrecy. If you have a system of optional secrecy, you may make use of the Ballot by having an increased number of polling-places, and you may enact that the state of the poll shall not be declared until some late period of the day. There are various arrangements of that kind which, no doubt, would tend to more orderly conduct during elections than is at present observed. With regard to bribery and corruption, the noble Marquess himself has scarcely left it necessary that I should go at great length into that part of the subject, for he almost, if not quite, gives up the case of bribery, for he tells us that he should not be warranted in stating that it would altogether put an end to the scandal of bribery, though he thinks it would reduce its present amount. But you must remember that there is another corrupt practice which this Bill will certainly encourage, and that is the practice of personation. It is a question whether by this Bill, which is—and only partially—to suppress bribery and corruption, you do not give a great stimulus to this other corrupt practice, for the Bill is so worded and drawn up that it will be almost impracticable to detect this offence of personation. In effect, persons are thus told—"If detected in personation, you will be liable to a very severe punishment; but inasmuch as detection will be almost impossible, you may go and commit the crime with impunity." On the question of intimidation, I was astonished to hear the line taken by the noble Marquess. He did not make out any strong case of intimidation, or that any great number of persons had been subjected to this form of undue influence; but because there are a very few weak-minded persons who have not the courage to stand up for their opinions, he intends to shut the mouths of the great majority who desire to give their votes fairly, freely, and openly before the country. If you insist on a system of compulsory secrecy in the election of Members of Parliament, I say that you are bound to show the existence of a great and pressing evil, and that this is the only measure by which it can be met. The noble Marquess referred to the example of the British Colonies and the great success which had there attended the working of the Ballot. He laid great stress especially upon the Australian Colonies as if they were the only colonies which the mother country possessed. I have read the reports from the Governors of those colonies, and in some of them, I think, the offence of personation was said to be not infrequent; and it often happens, apparently, that a man votes at one station, and then rides off to another, and under the present system no mode exists of detection. I also read in one of those reports—I forget at this moment which—that bribery does not prevail because importance is not at present attached to a seat in the Legislature; but that if this once became an object of great ambition in the colony, it was not likely that the Ballot would put an end to corruption. I think there is at least one Australian Colony in which the secrecy conferred by the Ballot is not compulsory, but optional. [The Earl of KIMBERLEY dissented.] I was told, a few days ago, that in Victoria the Ballot is merely optional; but, of course, if the noble

The Duke of Richmond

Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies tells me otherwise, I am bound to defer to his superior authority—but the argument to my mind is just the same. The Australian Colonies, however, are not, as I have said, the only colonies which the mother country possesses. Why did not the noble Marquess tell us what has occurred in Canada? Surely Canada is a very important colony, and, like Australia, it is inhabited by a population for the most part of British origin. For the last 20 or 25 years attempts have been made to introduce the Ballot into Canada, but they have always ended in failure—many Petitions in favour of it have been presented to the Legislature, and several Bills on the subject have been introduced; but the Ballot has never become the law of the country. With your Lordships' permission I will read a few lines written by a gentleman who is a reliable authority in Canada, and who sums up the whole question of the Ballot with regard to that colony. After going into numerous details, showing the number of Bills introduced and Petitions presented on the subject, he thus sums up the question—and I think this may be fairly regarded as a set-off against the alleged success of the Ballot in other colonies. In a letter dated from Cliffside, Ottawa, December, 1871, and addressed to The Times, Mr. Fennings Taylor says—

"It thus appears that, with one exception, the Ballot has been avoided by every province of the Canadian Dominion. In the excepted province—New Brunswick—after an experience of 15 years, the trial seems to have left no impression of advantage on the minds of those who had the opportunity of watching its operations and estimating its worth. From all of this we learn that the inhabitants of one half of the Continent of North America, having seen the Ballot in use among their neighbours in the United States, and tested its advantages in one of their own provinces, have arrived at what may be regarded as a unanimous conclusion that the secret system of voting has no special charm to recommend it."

Now, I lay down this theory—that the experience of the colonies is not a fair test to apply to the mother country. What does the President of the Board of Trade say on this subject? Speaking in March, 1860, Mr. Chichester Fortescue said—

"These objections (i.e., the objections he held against the Ballot) had not been lessened, but increased by his Australian experience at the Foreign Office. . . . His strong conviction was that the House of Commons had nothing to learn from Australia in this regard. . . . Circumstances were, moreover, so different in Australia from the state of things in the old country, that no safe conclusion from the one was applicable to the other. . . . The Ballot succeeded admirably where it was not wanted, but when there was real intimidation it would either fail, or else the secrecy would be obtained at a cost that it was not worth—namely, the sacrifice of the voter's honesty and uprightness.—[3 Hansard, clvii. 952.]

These remarks were made in 1860, at a time when the right hon. Gentleman told us he had given much attention to the matter. Experience, however, seems to have since taught him that all he said on that occasion, after his Australian experience at the Colonial Office, did not deserve much reliance. In corroboration of the view he then entertained as to the inexpediency of applying the experience of the colonies to the mother country, I will read what was said upon the subject by one whose opinion must command attention on the other side of the House, and I believe on this side also. I refer to a statesman who was thoroughly appreciated by his own party and by the public, and whom I regard as one of the most honourable and upright men who ever sat in the House of Commons—the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis. He said in 1857—

“Neither do I think that the examples of this institution in some of our colonies—those new societies in which this mode of voting has lately been introduced—can be of much assistance to a country whose social and political condition is so different as that of the mother country. The country to which we must look as furnishing really important lessons upon this subject, and which I apprehend is always in the minds of those who recommend the establishment of the Ballot in this country, is the United States of America.—[3 Hansard, cxlvi. 657.]

Now, we know—and, indeed, it appears from the noble Marquess's own showing—that in the United States of America, where last year a very quiet election was held, the Ballot was not conducted on a system of compulsory secrecy.

Having now, my Lords, thus answered some of the arguments of the noble Marquess with regard to colonial experience, I will turn to the Bill itself—and I do so with great curiosity, because I confess that, on reading the Bill, it struck me that its language was almost as vague—and I beg pardon of my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) for alluding to it in so uncomplimentary a manner—as the language of some of the Treaties which have been laid upon the Table. When I take up the Bill I say to myself —“Is this a measure for secret voting, or is it not?” One part of the Bill declares that the voting shall be secret—that is to say, it recommends the voter before he deposits his paper in the box to fold it up in such a manner that no one can see which way he votes; but subsequent provisions of the Bill entirely destroy the idea that this is to be a system of secret voting. We find, for instance, that members of the Jewish persuasion who may be called upon to vote on a Saturday, because they have scruples about filling them up themselves, have the aid of the Returning Officer in filling up their voting papers. Going farther, we find that electors who are physically incapable of signing their papers may also go to the presiding officer and ask him to fill them up. Then there is another class—the illiterate voters—who take an oath, or declaration which has all the solemnity of an oath, that they are unable to read. These also are to have the assistance of the presiding officer in filling up their papers. Now, if the illiterate voter is to have this privilege, why should it be denied to the man who is just one shade above him in point of scholarship, who can read just a little, but who, for all practical purposes, is quite as illiterate as a man who makes a declaration that he cannot read at all? One argument of the advocates of the measure is that it will enable large numbers of the lower classes to vote; but I am inclined to doubt very much whether it will not have a directly contrary effect. There are a great many voters who are not able to make the declaration necessary for procuring assistance, who are nevertheless illiterate. What happened at the election of Guardians for the parish of Brighton in the present year? The number of papers issued to the rate-payers was 10,436. Of those the persons who collected the papers received only 7,389, of which 3,861 were valid, while no fewer than 3,528 were invalid by reason of having been improperly filled up. Now, if that was the result where voters could fill up their papers quietly at home, and could obtain such assistance as they pleased, what is likely to occur in the excitement, the turmoil, and the hurry of a contested election, and with no assistance at hand. Will these persons be able to fill up their voting paper with an approach to accuracy?

The Duke of Richmond

It is clear to me they will fail to do so. I do not find any fault with those provisions of the Bill which permit voters who are illiterate or physically incapacitated to seek assistance from the Returning Officer in filling up the papers, for I think it is perfectly right and fair that everybody should have an opportunity of voting; but what I do complain of is, that other persons, who are proud of giving their votes, should not be allowed to vote in public, instead of being compelled to make use of this secret machinery, to which during the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons Her Majesty's Government attempted to append very serious penalties. I quite agree with what was said by the Prime Minister on this subject—

"Now, what is the Ballot? We say, popularly, it is a Bill to establish a mode of secret voting. What does that mean? Much advantage is taken of that expression, and it is said votes ought not to be given in the dark, and men ought not to be ashamed of making known what they do. I quite agree with that. Probably there is no man in this room whose vote will not be as well known as if the Ballot had not become law. I have no doubt your vote and mine will be just as well known when the Ballot becomes law as it is now. We mean by the Ballot, protection for the weak. We mean to put it into the power of the voter to vote secretly if he likes. He will be the best judge of that. He will be the best judge of the interests that weigh him. He will be the best judge whether other people will not interfere with the freedom of his votes. . . . He himself must be the best judge whether he needs protection. Where he needs protection, the Ballot would give it to him, and where he does not there will be no secrecy, and his vote will be pretty much as well known as his vote is now."

That is from a speech delivered at Wakefield and reported in The Times of the 6th of September, 1871. Of course, I am not prepared to say that since that time the Prime Minister's opinions have not changed; everybody is liable to change his opinion; but I think that here the period is somewhat short for such a change. However, such was the opinion of the Prime Minister last September, and since then the Bill has been introduced into and has passed through the other House. And what was the conduct of the Government during its passage through the House in the present Session? The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) proposed and carried an Amendment making it a penal offence, involving imprisonment for not more than two years, for any man to hold and act upon the opinion which the Prime Minister held in September. It is a monstrous thing that persons who have not changed their opinions since last September should be liable to penal servitude on that account. But if penal servitude is necessary to carry out the measure properly, surely, it ought to have been made one of the provisions of the Bill when the Government introduced it into the other House. If it was not necessary, the Government were not justified in voting for it afterwards; and they cannot escape from the horns of that dilemma.

And now, my Lords, I come to consider what is the course which I shall adopt on the present occasion. There are two courses which appear to me to be open to us. The first, and one which commends itself to the opinions of many on constitutional grounds, is that this Bill ought not to be passed. I am quite ready to admit there is great force in the argument that the country has not yet had an opportunity of deciding whether the Ballot shall be adopted for Parliamentary and municipal elections; that at the last election a majority of the present Ministry were opposed to the measure; and that only about one-fifth of the Members returned to the House of Commons were pledged to the Ballot—although the noble Marquess spoke of a larger proportion. But at the same time I cannot disguise from myself the fact that the measure has now been brought under your Lordships' consideration for the second time; that it has on both occasions been passed by large majorities in the other House; and that it is brought forward with all the authority and power which attend a measure introduced by the Government. I cannot but feel that, if the measure is now rejected, the apathy which now exists in the country on the subject might give way to an excited and exaggerated tone of feeling in which all the bad parts of the Bill would be forgotten. I cannot but feel that with such a subject in the hands of those who are both unscrupulous and apt at agitation, such a feeling might be excited throughout the country as might lead to serious—even to disastrous consequences. My Lords, I cannot also disguise the fact that if there is considerable apathy among the supporters of the measure, there is to a great extent apathy among its opponents, and that the majority of those Members returned to the House of Commons since the last Session of Parliament have been favourable to the measure. Therefore, although disliking the Bill and thinking it an extremely bad one in its present form, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it would not be advisable to oppose the second reading. But after it has been read a second time, I shall be prepared in Committee to propose Amendments which will remove all doubt that the secrecy is to be of an optional and not of a compulsory character, and to introduce clauses which at all events commended themselves to the opinion of Mr. Bright in 1870, for providing a scrutiny, so that there may be power to trace a vote that has been given wrongfully or corruptly. By making these Amendments we may remove many of the objections which attach to this Bill; we may devise the means of protecting the weak voter without unduly injuring or interfering with the rights of others, and we may devise the means of detecting and punishing corruption and fraud; at the same time we may provide the means of removing some of those evils which experience teaches us invariably attend the adoption by an old country like this of a system of secret and irresponsible voting.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, will your Lordships allow me to address a few words to you on the present occasion? So strongly do I feel on the subject that if this were the last speech I had to make I should rejoice at the opportunity of delivering it. I fully sympathize with my noble Friend who has moved the rejection of the Bill; I enter into the force of all his arguments; I share all his apprehensions; I admire his courage, but, at the same time, I think the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) has spoken words of wisdom when he counselled us to give a second reading to this Bill—not out of admiration for the Ballot, but in deference to the House of Commons and to the great constitutional question involved. Your Lordships may not agree with the view I take; but I think the Reform Act of 1867 altered the relation of the two Houses. Before the suffrage was so widely extended, it was very well—as I stated at the time—that the House of Lords should act upon a restrictive principle, and control the House of Commons, acting also upon a restricted principle; but when the House of Commons, returned as it was on a wider basis, and by virtue of almost universal suffrage, spoke absolutely the will of the country, I think your Lordships were placed in a very different position. No doubt it is your duty now, as it would be on all occasions, should such be your conscientious judgment, to throw out any detrimental measure which might come to you from the other House, in order to give that House and the country ample time to re-consider it; but this Bill was, in fact, thrown out last year, virtually, if not formally, with a view to its re-consideration by the country on its merits; and the country, having now had the matter before them for ten months, it is perfectly quiescent, and the Bill is again sent up to this House.

My Lords, I have no doubt there is a considerable body of people in the country decidedly hostile to the Bill; there is no doubt another very much larger body totally indifferent to it; and I think that if there could be a fair and honest plébiscite, and if the votes could be collected from house to house without the voters having any personal trouble to record them, I have no doubt the Bill would be rejected by an overwhelming majority. If, however, the people of this country will be so apathetic and indolent that they will not come forward in defence of their own liberties and of the Constitution under which they live, they must take the consequences of their apathy—this House can then only look to the recorded majorities of the House of Commons during the two last Sessions of Parliament, and rule its own conduct accordingly. But, although we may not deem it necessary to oppose the second reading of the Bill, we are, at all events, bound to call the attention of the country to the principles involved in it, and the serious effect which they must produce upon the character of this nation. The Bill is propounded to us as one for secret voting; and I hope I shall not give offence by expressing my own conviction that such a proposition seems to inflict on the country a direct dishonour—it bears the air and appearance of being—I do not say it is—an open avowal of cowardice and corruption. It seems, moreover, to carry the air—I am sure such was not the intention of its authors—that while the proceedings are conducted in secrecy, there should be a full indulgence, with impunity, to bribery and falsehood. My Lords, we are called upon to make very considerable changes. I do not enter upon an examination of the machinery which the noble Marquess the President of the Council has described—the ballot boxes, the nomination day proceedings, and all other points which, in comparison with the principles of the Bill, are almost trumpery—I would look at the great moral and political consequences of the measure, which the noble Marquess altogether overlooked. The first change we are called upon to make is, I hold, a most important one. The Bill seems to disturb the relations which have hitherto existed, and which ought to exist, between the electors and the elected. My Lords, I sat for 26 years in the House of Commons and represented several constituencies. I always found there was a mutual understanding between the electors and the elected, that if the elected did his duty, he would not be cashiered or sent to the right about without at least, on the part of the electors, a full statement of the reasons for his dismissal. You disturb that by this Bill altogether. You leave the responsibility on one side and take away all responsibility from the other. This novelty will tend to frequent and capricious changes of Representatives, and so speedily disgust the best men in the country with Parliamentary services. Again, everything henceforward is to have the stamp of secrecy. Hitherto, in this country the discharge of duty of every kind is public; but now, by the future law of the land, voting, which is one of its highest duties, is to be a secret transaction. I have heard all sorts of weak denials of the assertion; take but one. It is said juries vote in secret; but juries are supposed to be unanimous, and, therefore, the vote of the 12 is the vote of every one, and it is quite of recent date that Judges have taken upon themselves to relieve juries from giving a verdict because they are not unanimous. For what purpose are we going to make this change? There are but two issues for consideration in the measure before us, and these are, the one to prevent intimidation, and the other to prevent bribery. My Lords, it is impossible to speak in language too strong—I would say, even if approaching to execration—of everything in the shape of intimidation and bribery. It is a positive sin—and it is more than a crime—for anyone to interfere with the rightful exercise of the vote—the great privilege entrusted to the citizen; and I will go to any extent in the imposition of penalties or the infliction of disgrace on those who are guilty of thus interfering with the electoral privilege. But I think, my Lords, the course you are called upon to take will be altogether ineffectual. In the case of intimidation the Ballot will be ineffective; in bribery it will be mischievous also. Take, first, the case of intimidation. Intimidation has existed no doubt—it has prevailed at various times and been productive of very great abuses—but will any man say that intimidation is now carried on to such an extent in any one department of our social existence as to justify you in coming to the conclusion to subvert the whole Parliamentary system, and introduce a new and vicious principle into the conduct of affairs? There may be a case of intimidation here and there, but the cases are so few they are not worth recording, to the extent, I mean, of founding on them a new legislative action. Is it not a fact—will any man gainsay it—that the people are too enlightened, the employers are too prudent, and public opinion is too strong for the continued exercise of such an abuse? All testimony is against it. My Lords, I took the trouble last year to make very extensive inquiries as to the system of intimidation alleged to prevail, and the feeling of the people as to the necessary protection against it, and I have here returns sent to me from some of the more populous districts. One says, under date June 28, 1871—

The Duke of Richmond

“The majority of those who think for themselves, and whose opinion is worth having, are decidedly opposed to the system of secret voting; while many of them are quite indifferent about the matter.”

Very well. If these people thus think for themselves—men perfectly capable of so doing, why is the House of Commons to interfere and think for them? Leave them alone; they know best whether they are oppressed or not. Listen to another report—

“Very many of the working classes who are ardent supporters of ‘vote by ballot’ do not advocate it on account of themselves or their fellow-workmen, because, say they, ‘Our right of voting has never been interfered with by our employers; we support the Ballot because the aristocracy and the landowners drive their tenants to the voting-booth as bullocks are driven to the slaughterhouse.'"

I think I may leave it to your Lordships to say how far that is a veracious statement. Talk of influencing farmers by coercion to give their votes! Does any man of sense for a moment dream of such a thing? And as to influencing the peasantry wholesale, why, very few of them have votes, and if they had, such a growing spirit of independence exists among them that the attempt to interfere with them would be regarded as an outrage. No, no; the only argument left in favour of the Ballot is that it will suppress the intimidation of mob acting upon mob—the mob will be protected against the mob, the people against the people. But if that be so, what opinion do those who use that argument entertain of the condition of the people? We are indebted for this position to a distinguished Gentleman, a Member of the other House, who averred that he had great experience of "The Nottingham Lambs" and "Waterford Kids." It is perfectly true that these excesses may occur, and that some protection is necessary against them; but not that which this Bill proposes. Such excesses we find occurred in the history of ancient Rome and in modern America. When party feeling runs high, when perhaps there is something to be gained or something to be lost—I speak not of quiet times when self-interest is asleep—then there is the greatest excitement and evil consequences ensue. But to show how little the Ballot will control intimidation where there is a determination by one party to carry the victory, I will mention a case or two. Here are the statements, and to control such things your Ballot must be omnipotent. The cases I quote are cases in which the argument is far stronger for polling papers than for secret voting. The attack with us, as with them, will be wholesale; houses, districts, entire localities, will be invaded, pillaged, perhaps, set on fire. Suspicion will be as good as proof, and party or personal feeling will break out into violent conflict—what will secrecy avail here? In 1834 there was an election in Philadelphia.

"Several houses were burnt to the ground. The inmates were compelled to escape for their lives. More, we fear, than one life is lost. The firemen were driven from the ground, and several of them injured by the Tory party."

The Earl of Shaftesbury

I take the next extract from The Times. In 1868 there was another election—

"Numerous fights have occurred, and several persons have been shot. In one place the poll was closed by a row, and in another by an—of course—accidental conflagration,"

In 1871 there was an election for coroner—for a coroner. Nothing, you see, comes amiss for a fight—

"The mob broke in the door, rushed into the room, led by Mr. Sieras. They captured the platform, forced the officers to retire, and nominated their man for coroner, and then, as a matter of course, took a drink on the platform out of the whisky bottle."

What can the Ballot do, I ask again, to repress the like of this? Again, I take this from The Times, 1871—

"Election in New York,—To preserve order four regiments of troops, and extra policemen, are to be on duty in New York City, prepared for any emergency."

Here is a perfect catena of riots. But now let us come to the question of bribery. This, I freely confess, is of far more consequence, and I do not wonder at the zeal and indignation manifested, and the determination to put it down. And yet almost every speaker is doubtful whether secrecy is an antidote to corruption. But for this purpose I believe the Ballot will be completely ineffective. In the first place, let me call your Lordships' attention to this fact—that formerly bribery was much more prevalent than it now is, and that it was then regarded far more as a venial offence. Now, things are very much changed. Last year, Mr. Cross, in a very able speech in the House of Commons, showed indisputably that bribery was diminishing. He said that in 1852 there were 75 Petitions against Members returned on the ground of bribery, and 30 were unseated; whereas in 1868 there were 73 Petitions and only 17 Members unseated, while the Petitions were tried under the new system by the Judges, and not by the old form of Select Committees. Is it not clear that it is publicity which has produced that result, for does not publicity take the place of conscience with the vast majority of mankind?—and if you take away publicity you will give a new and uncheckable career to bribery—for by doing away with publicity you do not remove the motives for offering bribes or receiving bribes; you do not remove the feeling of ambition which induces persons to enter Parliament, because they thereby gain a position in society, or the passion of self-interest which induces others to take bribes under the conviction that they are a just means of providing for themselves or their families. But it is said that you take away the certainty of any briber receiving a return for his bribe; and that no man will give away his money unless he is sure of getting an equivalent for it. Is that so, however? Is it not the case that in commercial transactions men risk large sums of money in speculations, and that in gambling men hazard great stakes without any certainty of winning? You will simply increase the gambling spirit, and reduce elections to the level of dice-playing or horse-racing. In reading the Life of Bacon, by Mr. Basil Montagu, I notice that it was there stated, on that great man's authority, that in the French Courts in former times the suitors on both sides gave money to the Judges, though they knew very well that the decision could only be given in favour of one side. If you ransack all history, both ancient and modern, you will never find that secret voting has got rid of bribery. My Lords, it is a serious loss to the argument we maintain, that we are shut out almost entirely from the quotation of the Roman writers—from Cicero and Pliny, and from the cogent and unanswerable comments on them by Montesquieu, Gibbon, and others. We are shut out because people (I am disposed to think) who feel the force of the quotations, assert them to be pedantic, and inapplicable. But, despite their objections, I must cite a passage from that most admirable and instructive work, The History of the Romans under the Empire, by Dr. Merivale, the present Dean of Ely. He says—

"The favour of the people was sought and gained by profuse largesses; the means of seduction allowed by law, such as the covert bribery of shows and festivals, were used openly and boldly; while the others, which were expressly interdicted, such as the direct proffer of money, were practised not less lavishly in the polling-booths, where the restraint of the Ballot was wholly ineffectual."

Mark those emphatic words, "the restraint of the Ballot ineffectual." And, my Lords, in my own researches a few years ago, I found that while in many centuries preceding the introduction of the Ballot into Rome there was mention but of two laws against the crime of bribery, there were in the 40 years that followed it, decrees and enactments to be numbered by scores in vain efforts at repression. And is our experience less as to the operation of the Ballot in the United States? Where do you hear of such profligacy, recklessness, and bare-faced corruption as in their elections of every kind? Is it only foreigners who say this of them? Why, my Lords, read their own—their native testimony, read all that is said by their own correspondents and their own journals, read especially The North American Review, the highest and worthiest of their periodicals, for October, 1866, with the later elegancies of the Erie Ring, and then, I think, your hair will stand on end. But if Ballot be ineffective to put down bribery, Ballot will be very effective to increase it. Under the Ballot the briber and bribee will have every facility. You give impossibility of detection to the extent, at least of legal proof, and you hold out to covetous spirits to do that in secret they would have never dared to do openly. Your legislation will have no moral power. You will not make candidates more scrupulous or electors more pure. You will leave unchanged and in full force, both on one side and the other, all the lowest mercenary passions, with complete impunity for their free exercise. "Who will know it," says Pliny, in one of his beautiful letters, "is the main consideration of a great portion of mankind." Before we go further we have a right to inquire what is the character of the franchise thus committed to the people, and which we are called on to protect? Is it a trust? Many people are angry that it should be so regarded, probably because they know that a trust must be exercised openly. Is it a privilege? If so, then it should equally be exercised in open day. Your Lordships and the House of Commons have the privilege of conducting your debates if you so choose with closed doors, and of concealing the names and numbers of your divisions; but would the public tolerate that your Lordships' proceedings should be transacted in secret? Some persons say that the franchise is a right. If so, then in some respects it becomes property, and may be sold. But if it be a right, I ask you on what principle you can refuse to give every man in the country that right? The argument that the suffrage is a right therefore leads at once to universal suffrage, and that is the opinion of the Prime Minister himself. We hear, my Lords, contradictory assertions on the action of the Ballot. Some say that it will be really secret; some that it will be no such thing. It is of small importance to the argument. I have no doubt of the belief that will prevail in every one's mind who has a purpose to serve. He will believe secrecy to be possible in his own particular case, and will act accordingly. Now, my Lords, there are very grave political and moral considerations connected with this vote by Ballot. It is a serious political consideration how far the Ballot is consistent with the institutions under which we live. Many years ago the distinguished American statesman, Daniel Webster, said to me on the night he quitted England never to return, in the course of some serious conversation respecting this country—

“Above all things, resist to the very last the introduction of the Ballot; for, as a Republican, I tell you that the Ballot can never co-exist with Monarchical institutions.”

I give your Lordships the words of that great statesman, but I cannot represent his manner, or the degree in which he was moved while speaking to me. He said to me—

“You have a Monarchy and we a Republic; both good in their way, if adapted to the genius and feelings of the people. America has the deepest interest in the welfare of England, and I tell you that it would be the greatest blow to real freedom were anything done to degrade your ancient Monarchy from its present position.”

Here is the weighty counsel of friendship and experience. I am, certain, moreover, that under the Ballot many Members would be returned to Parliament who never would be returned under an open system of voting. And even were the same men returned, they would be returned under new conditions and for new purposes. If the Ballot should be established agitators would go round to every house in the country and persuade the people to vote for special candidates, by saying that if they got into Parliament not only that the taxes and rates should be reduced—that argument is legitimate enough—but hinting also, that by a little legislative arrangement there might be a better and a fairer distribution of all kinds of property. There are many in this class, and religious men to boot, who hold that some are too rich, and some are too poor; and, although they would shrink from any violent procedure, they would have no scruple to redress the balance by the weight of legislation. And yet they would never avow it by an open vote. Why, my Lords, in the agricultural districts of this country, when the peasantry shall have received the suffrage—which as matters stand they ought to—agitators will go amongst them and say to them—“Only vote for Mr. So-and-so, and the house in which you live shall be your own.” My Lords, you—most of you—are living with your people on the happiest terms; yet the tempting conclusion will be unceasingly urged, and the cottager will stifle his conscience by saying to himself—“After all, I leave my Lord his acres, and the loss of this small dwelling-place will do him no harm.” Again, my Lords, I object against this new system that it would place irresponsible power in the hands of those who are as yet, at least, most unfitted to discharge the duties attached to it. If given at all it should be confided only to the highest order of political virtue. Again, I object to it because you are taking away from the great mass of the voters and all the working people the noble sentiment of public responsibility. I have gone among the working people for some 40 years, and the sentiment which I always found most elevating and to which they responded most heartily was when I told them that they were responsible beings—responsible to God and man—and that they ought to be proud to discharge that responsibility in the eye of day and in the face of the whole community. That generous sense of responsibility you are now going to take away—you are going to do that which will enable a man, and indeed, by your compulsory system, force a man, like a creeping animal, to slink away with his tail between his legs; and just at a time when men are rising to a sense of their dignity, you are going to insist they shall not declare their sentiments, and are not to discharge their duty in the face of the whole community. I object to the Bill, again, because I believe you are not aware—many people are not aware—that there is no middle place between Monarchy and a Republic. I have met men who by a Republic mean a Government consisting of the best men of the nation and of all that is great and good. But under the Ballot you will have nothing of the kind. When you go away from Monarchy—and from Monarchy you must go away under the Ballot—it is not to a Republic of that kind you will come, but to a Democracy, and that too when you have upset the moral sense of half your people by your system of secrecy. Then, the social objections to the Ballot are very great. Many men will pass their lives under suspicion, for the honestest can never prove that he has acted up to his declaration, and you will thus keep back from the poll the best of the electors, who will rather lose their vote than be subject to doubt and misrepresentation. But look last to the moral considerations. We are going to introduce a system of secret voting—to hold out to the people opportunities and facilities for bribery and corruption of all kinds. Even the advocates of the measure are perfectly aware that it must involve very serious consequences of that kind. The evidence taken before the House of Commons' Committee, while containing much in favour of the Ballot, contained also much against it. Its very advocates admitted that evasion would become very general, and one in his evidence before the Committee said he did not know whether lying would not very much increase under it; and then he proceeded to justify it if it did. On what a sea of contention we may be launched under such a principle! If a new system be introduced, and people are compelled to adapt themselves to it, they will speedily learn to fashion their morality to suit it. With regard to the morality of the Ballot, there are two strong opinions to that effect. Mr. Randolph, the great American statesman, in a conversation with the Rev. Sidney Smith, which is recorded in the latter's pamphlet on the Ballot, said—"The Ballot either finds a man a scoundrel, or it makes him one." Then, there is another opinion which is much to the same effect. The Communal Delegation of the First Arrondissement in Paris under the Commune demanded open voting, because it held secret voting to be immoral. There was a remarkable controversy on this subject in 1839, when Lord Macaulay—then Mr. Macaulay—supported the question, and I quote his opinion in order to show the dangers which may arise to morality from the Ballot. Macaulay was, no doubt, a very great and, I am sure, a very good man; but, at the same time, we must say of him, as Dr. Johnson said of himself—"No man talks at times more laxly than I do." I think your Lordships will say when I read this extract that no man wrote more laxly at times or talked more laxly than Macaulay. In his speech in 1839 in the House of Commons Macaulay, thus defended the right of voters to deny how they voted—

The Earl of Shaftesbury

"All present knew that many dishonest votes were given, but let a system of secrecy in voting be introduced, and they would have honest votes, although the parties might afterwards deny that they had given them. . . . In short, if the voters could not at once keep faith with their country and with their corruptors, he was one that wished that we should have a system by which their faith might be kept to their country and broken to their corruptors."—[3 Hansard, xlviii. 473-4.] and many other like things. Hence The Times of the day, the 27th of December, 1839, remarks—

"Mr. Macaulay's data and conclusions are, in point of immorality, almost unprecedented, and utterly incompatible with Christian principle of any kind."

And Lord John Russell rebuked his right hon. Friend for "palliating dissimulation." Now, I mention these things in order to show that if this system be adopted, we should be entering upon a new system of morality as to when a vote may be avowed and when it may be denied. We shall have 10,000 cases of casuistry of all kinds, it will enter into the discharge of all our public functions, and in that case it will be necessary that we should have a clause enabling our new school boards to provide that the children shall be trained to the discernment of cases of conscience, so as to know when to tell a lie and when to tell the truth, when to be straightforward, and when to shuffle. My Lords, I have only one more point. Your Lordships will remember that prior to 1834, and for years afterwards, there was a system of voting in the French Chambers in which they used to begin with open voting and then submit the same question to the secret vote. Sometimes they began with secret voting and then went on to open voting; but the extraordinary part of it was—and I do urge this to show that men will do in secret what they will not dare to do publicly—it frequently happened that in the course of half-an-hour a measure carried by a very large majority was thrown out by a majority still larger. Can you wonder, then, that the 4th of May, 1834, when the matter was propounded in the Chamber, the President, M. Dupin, said—

“There are mysteries which it is not given to penetrate. I have seen laws adopted, Article after Article, by open voting, and rejected by the secret Ballot. I have seen adopted by secret Ballot what would have been rejected by open voting.”

He afterwards adds (and no wonder)—

“The Ballot has mysteries of its own. It presents sometimes results which defy all calculation.”

Again, in 1845 another very distinguished Member of the French Chambers made a Motion that that system of secret and open voting should be got rid of—and mark his language, which is very applicable to the Ballot as proposed by my noble Friend. In 1845 M. Duvergier de Hauranne moved, in the Chamber of Deputies, to abolish the secret vote. Among many weighty arguments whereby he sustained his Motion, I select two or three—

“It is right,” said he, “that all should know on whom they can rely, and not be in perpetual fear of some of those mysterious acts of treachery which are effected under the mask of the secret Ballot. Is it not probable that on some pinching question a Deputy might vote against the Minister, and assure him the next morning that he had voted for him?”

He concludes—

“To no one should it be given to escape the vital, essential, and necessary conditions of political power—that of responsibility. Let us no longer try to cover the secret vote with the charming words of independence, impartiality, and conscience. These words are dear to us all; but I refuse to believe that, in order to be independent, impartial, and conscientious, it is necessary to conceal one’s opinions or speak that which is contrary to truth.”

Give due weight to such testimony as this, and consider that if corruption and untruth could then prevail in the French Chambers among men of education and property, what will be the issue when secrecy is bestowed upon poor men who neither value nor know the difference between right and wrong, or between the suffrage as a high trust or a saleable commodity? Now, my Lords, very many of those who advocate the adoption of the Ballot regard it as a very great evil, and very many more, if they could speak the truth, would express the same opinion. It is very possible that the evil anticipated will not come to the surface all at once, and in all probability its pernicious effect will not be realized to its full extent until men’s passions have been aroused by some extraordinary occasion and drive them to excess. In the present aspect of affairs I am prepared for the overthrow of many of our institutions. I am prepared to see the dissolution of the Church of England, torn as it is by internal dissension; I am prepared to see a vital attack made upon the House of Lords, hateful on account of its hereditary privileges; and I am prepared to tremble for the Monarchy itself, stripped as it is of its true supporters; but I am not prepared for an immoral people; I am not prepared to see the people exercising their highest rights and privileges in secret, refusing to come to the light “because their deeds are evil.”

The Earl of Shaftesbury

EARL COWPER, who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to say that he did not think it necessary, after the announcement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) as to the course he intended to pursue, to detain their Lordships at any length. He thought, however, that it was time that some reply should be offered to the arguments urged against the Bill:—although he was bound to say that, with the exception of the speech of the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) they had scarcely heard a single objection which had not been used over and over again. The noble Earl had argued that the present time was unsuited for proposing such a measure, considering the great constitutional changes that had recently taken place. But as to the present expediency of proposing an alteration in the mode of conducting elections so immediately upon great changes in the representative system, he (Earl Cowper) was of opinion that such a time was the most suited for proposing such further changes as might seem desirable. It was better that such proposals should be made at once, before men’s minds had settled down into the new order of things, rather than wait, and then disturb the electoral system afresh. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) had said this was a political agitation set afoot by the Government in order to fill their sails and keep the party together; but the fact was that this question was mooted by the Government immediately after the General Election, when certainly their sails did not want filling. A great part of the noble Duke's speech consisted of taunts against the Ministry and their supporters for having changed their opinions on this question; but that was a charge which might be brought against every prominent man on both sides of the House at some time or other, and on some question or other; but it was no argument against the measure. He would not pretend to follow the details of the eloquent speech which had just been delivered by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury); but he must be permitted to say that if the earnest tones and impassioned manner of that speech were deducted, there would be found little remaining but old arguments dressed in new language. As to the want of agitation in favour of the Ballot of which the noble Earl made so much, that was readily accounted for—when people are satisfied that a measure they desire must certainly pass they cease from agitation upon it. Had there been any uncertainty upon the matter, he was satisfied the agitation would have been vigorous and general. A great deal of unnecessary fear had been expressed that the Ballot would have a demoralizing effect; but no one had ever clearly stated how this would come about, or why the act of voting should necessarily be performed in public. The advantages the Ballot would confer upon a man, however, were great. He would be saved from all persecution, or loss of custom, by voting according to his convictions, and would become what he was not at present—master of his vote. As he believed the present Bill would secure these very desirable results, he should give his support to the second reading.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that he cordially supported the Amendment of the noble Earl (Earl Grey). In former days he had appeared before many constituencies, and had had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons for many years. In the days when he had to appeal to the suffrages of his constituents he had never shrunk from declaring his strong opinion against the system of secret voting, and he had found that those views were almost invariably received by those whom he addressed with applause. It could not, therefore, be expected that he should now shrink from avowing opinions which he had never failed to avow for nearly 50 years, or that he should that evening acquiesce in the second reading of a Bill from the principle of which he so strongly differed. The noble Earl who had just sat down (Earl Cowper) had expressed his surprise that the noble Earl who had preceded him had not alluded to the intimidation practised in Galway and at other elections in Ireland. Did the noble Earl imagine that the system of secret voting such as was now proposed would cure intimidation of the character practised in Ireland? If he did, he would certainly be disappointed. It had often been asserted, and history had shown the assertion to be true, that the assistance of the confessional might be called in to aid the carrying out of political purposes in which the Roman Catholic priesthood were concerned. It had been declared by some of the priests, even so recently as the Galway election, that they would use the confessional to ascertain the fact as to the votes given by electors. He did not know how far that was true, but this he did know, that it would not be the first time that the secrets of the confessional had been made use of to serve a political purpose, and he had, therefore, little doubt that the same consequence would follow now if an attempt was made to conceal the votes of the Irish Roman Catholic electors by means of the Ballot, when it came to the question of how far it would serve the purposes of the Irish Roman Catholic priesthood to obtain the knowledge. He could not help feeling surprised that the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), after the powerful and eloquent speech which he had delivered, could bring himself to acquiesce in the temporizing policy recommended by the noble Duke at the head of the party with whom he had the honour to act. For his own part he could not perceive the dangers which had been held out to them as a bugbear to prevent them from voting against this Bill. Now, was this really a Bill to compel secret voting, or did it leave the matter optional on the part of the voter? He did not see there was anything to prevent an elector from going into the booth and stating broadly whom he intended to vote for. The elector might, with perfect indifference, throw his paper into the box, and say—"I vote for such and such a person." ["Hear, hear!"] The noble Lords opposite cheered that, which showed that he was right in his interpretation of the Bill. But the ardent supporters of the Ballot in the other House of Parliament, the advanced Radicals, declared openly that without the provision of compulsory secrecy the Bill was altogether a sham and a delusion. If it was a sham and a delusion it ought not to pass; and if it compelled secrecy by heavy penalties the Bill would become simply an act of tyranny. He did not desire to repeat the old arguments which had for so many years been employed against the Ballot Bill, but he could not help referring to the character of being un-English, so properly and justly given to it by the late Lord Palmerston. It was un-English because it was opposed to the character of the whole of our institutions, whether political or social; it was un-English because it was at variance with that publicity which universally obtained in this country, and which was regarded, and justly regarded, as a main security of our institutions. Secrecy was inconsistent with the rights of the subject in every Court of Justice, from the highest to the lowest. Then why had this Bill been brought forward? The question appeared to him to have been seized upon as a rallying point now that the Liberal party had been brought into some difficulty and distress, and it had been forced on, as he firmly believed, against the desire of the majority of the educated classes in this country, and in spite of the feelings and conscientious opposition of the majority of their Lordships' House. Another reason which induced him to vote against the second reading of this Bill was the conviction that it would soon become so repugnant to the feelings of the community—that it would give rise to so much hypocrisy and fraud, that before long the tide of opposition would set strongly against it, and the House of Commons would be petitioned for its repeal. It was, therefore, right that those who opposed this Bill in principle should now have the courage to avow their convictions, and to vote against its second reading and he for one was grateful to the noble Earl on the cross benches for the opportunity which his Amendment afforded him to express his opinions, and he hoped their Lordships would not be deterred from expressing their opinion on this Bill, though some degree of intimidation had been practised by the tumultuous meetings which had been held against their Lordships' House, and the threats that had been delivered if their Lordships presumed to vote against the opinion of the House of Commons in this matter. He regretted, however, to perceive that their Lordships were likely to pass the second reading of the Bill. The noble Marquess who introduced the Bill (the Marquess of Ripon) had alluded to the question of intimidation and coercion, but he had omitted to state, in respect to one particular evil, how the measure proposed to provide any remedy. For the great abuse of personation this Bill provided no remedy whatever. Yet in the maritime towns, this class of offence was extremely common. The seafaring men, who formed by far the largest portion of the inhabitants, were obliged by their profession to be constantly absent from their homes—their names appeared on the register, and as the elections always took place during the absence of a considerable portion of the constituency no pains had been wanting, even under the existing system, to supply their places by persons who assumed their names and voted in their stead. He spoke somewhat sensitively on this question of personation, having suffered from it himself in former days, when he became perfectly aware of how it was carried on. In consequence, he himself introduced a Bill into the House of Commons for the better prevention of personation; and that Bill having been taken up by the Government of the day and added to their own Electoral Bill, his clauses as to personation were inserted word for word into their Bill; and thus it happened that he was the author of those clauses for the protection of the purity of elections and for the prevention of personation which was now the law of the land. These clauses would be rendered perfectly nugatory if the Bill before their Lordships passed. The Bill, indeed, stamped personation as a fearful crime, declaring it, for the first time, to be a felony, and attaching heavy penalties to the commission of the offence; but it provided no means whatever of detection. The noble Duke had assured their Lordships that he was about to propose a remedy; he hoped it might prove successful; but still it would only be limited to one single point. He could not help wondering that this Bill was supported by so large a section of the Liberal party. In former days The Edinburgh Review used to have some influence with that party, and in the volume for 1870 there was an article so well reasoned, so ably compelled—he might say so historical—that it ought almost to have prevented the Liberal party from bringing forward this measure. The article dealt with the Report of Lord Hartington's Committee on the subject of secret voting, and contained some very telling extracts from the evidence given before that Committee. One American gentleman described an election in which he took part, in which every precaution had been adopted to prevent tampering with the Ballot, yet he declared that fully as much intimidation had been practised as under an open system of voting, and that as to personation, there was “any quantity of it—an unlimited extent,” and that the corruption was “unbounded.” The Bill was one for establishing secret voting; how could their Lordships disregard testimony like that as to the effect of secret voting, given by an American gentleman, in spite of his attachment to the institutions of his own country? In another passage in the same article the opinions of Mr. Morse, also a distinguished American, were examined, and it was shown that the supposed secrecy of the Ballot did not cloak any appreciable number of the votes given at an election. There were two kind of influence—legitimate and illegitimate. To every kind of illegitimate influence, whether in the shape of coercion, intimidation, or corruption, he was as strongly opposed as any of their Lordships, or as any advocate of the Ballot could be. But the influence of character and example—the influence which was acquired by free interchange of communication with the electors—not by hole and corner meetings, but by open, personal advocacy and argument in public, he believed to be a legitimate influence worthy of all approbation, and one their Lordships ought never to suppress or diminish in favour of any secret system whatever. He objected to the Bill because it afforded a screen for falsehood and hypocrisy, which none of the safeguards or contrivances in its clauses could effectually check or suppress.

Lord Ravensworth

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: The opinion of the noble Lord who has just sat down justly carries weight with it, not merely on account of his practical experience in Parliamentary elections, but because of his high character and great ability. His remarks, however, on the subject of personation are suited rather to the Committee stage than to the second reading; while any analogy sought to be established between the electoral system of this country and that of the United States must necessarily be fallacious, on account of the enormous numbers of the American constituencies and the vast area over which they extend. You are discussing after all not a Bill to remedy certain abuses of the electoral system, but a measure for upholding the purity and the sanctity of the electoral franchise. The question is not whether a voter shall vote secretly or not at his option, but as to whether or not we wish to obtain the honest and unbiassed opinion of the electors of this country. With much of what fell from the noble Lord who spoke last, I fully concur. If, indeed, the Ballot were only advocated on the ground of protecting the farmer, against his landlord it would not be necessary to disturb the existing machinery of the Constitution. I believe that against such intimidation you have a remedy far more efficacious than all the laws in the statute book—I mean public opinion. Look at what happened the other day in Scotland. Notice was given to a tenant that at the expiration of his lease it would not be renewed. Well, it was admitted, I believe, that the tenant had made a fortune out of the farm. It was not denied that the landlord had infringed no legal right, and was justified in choosing his own tenants. But because this notice from circumstances had the character of a political eviction, all Scotland rang from end to end with the case of Mr. Hope of Fentonbarns. This, I think, sufficiently shows that public opinion is sufficiently vigilant as to oppression on behalf of landlords. But you have other multifarious forms of oppression far more dangerous than this. What we desire protection against is the tyranny of the customers over the tradesman, and the tradesman over the customers; the tyranny of the tradesunion over the artizan; of the priesthood over the laity; of the physically strong over the physically weak; of the ignorant over the educated, of the mob over the individual. It is tyranny as between these parties and persons against which it is our duty to legislate. But then "such legislation is un-English." That is a cry that is so easily raised that I wonder we do not hear it oftener. Let us vote openly and frankly, without shame and without reserve. It is better to vote openly with a broken head than to vote in sound health by Ballot. Let us have our old constitutional confusions and contusions. Let us continue to bandy about the good old British brick-bat, the good old constitutional cat, the truly English egg. The corruption of the eggs shows the purity of the system. I have the greatest respect for this argument. It is ancient, and it is historical. The first person who used it was Charles I.—a monarch for whose private character we may have veneration, but who can hardly be considered an authority on constitutional questions. But, again. Early in the present century a Bill was brought in to put down bull-baiting, bear-baiting, cock-fighting, and other national amusements. This Bill was opposed by an eminent statesman, Mr. Windham; and on what ground? Why, because legislation against such sports was un-English. The argument, however, was as unsuccessful as I hope it will be on the present occasion; and, I trust that, in spite of it, our present sports of voter-baiting, and voter-fighting, and voter-worrying may join the category of these abolished amusements; for, at present, it is not so much a rateable as a physical qualification which a voter needs for the exercise of the franchise. Then the Ballot will produce lying. This has always struck me as rather a far-fetched accusation. You might as well say that the Woolsack or the Order of the Garter produce political corruption. It is historically true that an eminent man was tempted to desert his party by the offer of the Great Seal. It is rumoured on excellent authority that the Garter has, if not gained over an enemy, at any rate secured a wavering vote. Yet neither the office nor the Order have suffered in consequence. It is quite true that the ballot-box may, as an accident, produce lying, but I deny that it is an inseparable accident. The truth is, that a man who will lie about his vote will lie about anything else, and that if you wish to remedy this you must introduce a measure of a much broader scope than the present, for it will be a Bill for the abolition and suppression of the corruption of human nature. But "the franchise is a public trust; a vote is a public responsibility? Now, I will not argue against this. I think the franchise is indeed a responsibility to the State. But does that make it necessary that it should be exercised in public? Are you really going to adopt this unbending principle that a public duty should be exercised in a public manner? Take some instances of what your argument leads to. Take the case of the Sovereign, who performs various important functions. If your Monarch were stoned whenever he left his palace, would you insist on his going to open Parliament as usual? Who, indeed, exercise the most important public trust in the State? Is it not the Ministry? Is theirs not a public trust, and a public responsibility? Yet the natural bearing of your doctrine would be that the Cabinet should sit in Hyde Park or in Trafalgar Square. Does not every father owe the most important public duty to the State? Is he not in possession of a most important public trust; the duty of bringing up his child to be a good citizen and a useful member of the State? Yet you would not hear your child his catechism in the street, or his As is presenti in Westminster Hall? It is hardly necessary to point out either that in this way you are subjecting the voter, on whom for a certain fitness you have conferred the privilege of the franchise, to the physical power of the person whom, I suppose for a certain unfitness, you have excluded from the franchise. To some this might seem an anomaly; but to you it is no such thing. You take pride in it. You stand by the polling-booth to watch the progress of the election; you see approach, hustled by a violent crowd, maimed, and stoned, and oppressed, the unfortunate British voter, or rather his remains, and you turn round to that intelligent foreigner, who is somehow always on the spot on these occasions, and you say—"There, see that. That is a sight, I am proud to say, which you will find nowhere in the world except in the United Kingdom." I maintain, on the other hand, that in this duty, as in almost all the higher duties of life, the voter who keeps within the boundary of the law is responsible to his conscience alone. But, on the other hand, I would enumerate some of the advantages of the Ballot; advantages which have not, I think, been dwelt upon this evening, but to which you cannot shut your eyes. Take the question of expenses. If the Ballot be passed, canvassing and cajolment, and all the arts of corruption, will be rendered labour as vain, and impotent, and irritating, as the work of the treadmill. It is impossible to conceive a more dismal and desperate future than that of the canvasser and briber under this Act: the doubts which will harass him as to whether A voted as his conscience and his fee indicated; as to whether B, who took money and principles from him, did not also accept cash and convictions from the other side. I do not think that anyone will long continue so miserable a profession under such disadvantageous circumstances; although they may be like one of the witnesses in the Norwich Election Petition, who said that he did not wish "to assume a purity which does not belong to politics." Look at the expenses where the Ballot is in operation. The expenses of an election in Victoria, for instance, are absolutely insignificant. They bear the same relation to the expenses of an English election as the cost of a Roman triumph to the cost of an English triumph in Swift's famous lampoon. And, then, what a dearly bought triumph is the triumph of an English or Irish election! I remember an eminent Member of the House of Commons being returned for a considerable city. How did he spend the evening of that triumph? In decent revelry, in congratulating his committee, or in thanking his supporters? He spent it on the roof of a housetop, in fear of his life from the fury of the mob. Indeed, if the present system continues, it is clear that candidates will appear on the hustings in Ireland in the armour of the Middle Ages, and that voters on the approach of an election will take refuge in their cellars, like citizens during a bombardment. But not merely will the Ballot save you from the violence of present elections by making the vote secret, but it will also secure the constituencies by concealing the state of the poll till it be closed; thus preventing the mobs which gather on the present announcements, and the distribution of large sums towards the end of the poll when the contest is close. Then, again, it deprives the voter of all excuse for not recording his vote. That seems to me a fact of crucial importance, if you wish to have a real and not a sham expression of the feeling of the country.

The Earl of Rosebery

My Lords, the state of the House, if it does not show any great enthusiasm for, does not at any rate indicate any ardent opposition to the Bill. I will therefore, in conclusion, only deal with one last reason for delay, if not for rejection. The Ballot, we are told, is unpopular. Nobody agitates for it. The House of Lords was not attacked last year for rejecting it. This is a plausible argument which admits of a very simple refutation. Why does no one agitate in favour of the Ballot? Because it is not a cause which needs agitation—no one indeed agitates against it. Even Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Hardy on the recent occasions on which they have unfurled the Conservative banner have not mentioned the subject. Yet I cannot but believe that if the Ballot were the noxious and emasculating system which it is represented to be that we should have heard of it from them. But then if the Ballot is not unpopular, it is not popular we are told. Great meetings are not held, monster Petitions are not sent. But let us examine this. Would it be possible for the vast majority of dependents throughout the country to hold meetings in favour of the Ballot? Why, we should hardly need the Ballot if such meetings were possible. But then if we examine this again a little more closely we have to consider three things. One is that the party who most desire the Ballot—that is the weak or oppressed or threatened voter—is the last person who can agitate for it. Public agitation is worse than a public vote. The more the voter needs the Ballot the more he is physically timid or infirm, the more he is morally dependent and enslaved, the less likely is he to be in a position to petition or to agitate in favour of the Ballot. Then, secondly, we have that large class—very numerous and very influential—to whom this Bill will deal a deadly blow. From the pugilist of the nomination day to the "man in the moon" of election petitions they are opposed to the Bill. No man can fairly be expected to suppress his own occupation in life, and when the Bill is passed their occupation will be gone. Thirdly, we have the class again who are independent and do not care personally whether the Ballot be passed or not. It is no object to them: they can vote as they please; they perhaps rather like the ceremony of a public vote. Anyhow no great demonstration of feeling can be expected from them in favour of the Bill. So then, if we analyze this charge of indifference or unpopularity, we find that one class is from the nature of things indifferent to it, that another class is from the nature of things adverse to it, and that the third class, for whom the Bill is really intended, is from the nature of things sure to be quiescent. So do not let us delude ourselves into the belief that the want of frantic excitement about the Ballot is a sign of indifference or hostility. Nor can it be said, as was alleged last year, that the Session is too old to give birth to so alarming an offspring. I hope then, in the absence of such objections and the weakness of others, that your Lordships will readily consent to give a second reading to this Bill.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that, though he might not be permitted to say how he would vote, he supposed he might be permitted to say how he would not vote—and he certainly would not vote for this Bill. It was a Bill of Pains and Penalties, and nevertheless would fail in securing the object for which it was devised—secrecy of voting. His objections to the measure were entirely based on constitutional grounds, and had no reference to party considerations—for he did not believe it would have much effect one way or the other on the balance of political parties. The question really was, whether this Bill would be effectual to put down corruption and intimidation, and he was convinced you could no more put down dishonesty and unfair voting by legislative enactment than you could put down intemperance by similar means. In both cases you must trust to education, good example, and the influence of public opinion. These had already exercised a wholesome influence on elections, and if we would let them they would exercise a still further influence for good. He entertained the objection, in spite of the ridicule that had been thrown upon it, that the Bill was un-English—by that he meant that it was opposed to our feelings, habits, prejudices, and institutions. An Englishman was not used to concealing his opinion and his vote; and to adopt the Ballot was to tell Englishmen that the Legislature thought they should not openly avow their opinions. The fact that we had got rid of bull-baiting and cock-fighting, which used to be practised in England, was no reason why we should not continue open voting. He objected that John Smith, who had voted openly for 30 years, who might have been a Liberal all the time, and who might have been so disappointed with Liberal policy that he had changed his opinion and become a Conservative, should be compelled to record his Conservative vote in secrecy. Why were they to force upon the constituencies a system for which they had no desire? The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who spoke to-night with so much power, stated what he believed to be the fact, when he said that if the people of England were polled, there would be an enormous majority against the Bill. The only argument he had heard that night in favour of passing the Bill was that the House of Commons had now for the second time sent it up to their Lordships' House backed by considerable majorities, and that therefore their Lordships were bound to accept it. He dissented from that view. No one was more ready to admit than he was that if the House of Commons sent up any Bill Session after Session backed by the real opinions of the people of England, their Lordships would be acting unwisely if they set themselves against the opinion of the House of Commons and of the people of England. But he distinctly denied that the present was a case of that kind. In the first place, with regard to the House of Commons, how did the case stand? Last year the Conservative party did not divide against either the second or third reading of the Bill. This Session a division did take place on the second reading; and how many Members were present and voted on the question of the second reading of this great measure?—this great measure that the House of Commons has set its heart upon, and which the constituencies are determined to have. There are 658 Members of the House of Commons, and of these 658 only 160 voted on the question of the second reading. He was told that during one portion of the debate of the 18th of February only three Members were present—the Speaker, the orator, and the audience. He asked whether these things supported the contention that their Lordships were not to give a free, unbiassed, and unfettered opinion upon a great constitutional question, because the House of Commons were thoroughly in earnest about it? He was told that on the evening to which he referred there was an important debate in their Lordships' House to which the Members of the House of Commons were listening in the gallery. That, no doubt, was very flattering to the House of Lords, but it did not show much zeal for the Ballot. Even on the third reading of the Bill no more than 490 Members took part in the division — which was not at all a large proportion of the Members on a question which really interested the House. And that was not all—an hon. Member had declared in his place in the other House that if Gentlemen voted as they really and truly felt not 10 Members of the House of Commons would be found in favour of vote by Ballot. Were their Lordships, then, to give up their freedom for these 10 Members? With regard to the country, it was admitted to be in a state of apathy upon the question, and it was to give the constituencies an opportunity of saying what was really wished that he asked their Lordships to reject this Bill. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) had said there were two courses—either to reject the Bill or amend it considerably. There was a third course—to pass it without amendment. He was decidedly opposed to secret voting, and therefore thought it would be a great evil and misfortune to the country if they were to adopt either of the last two courses. He was therefore prepared to vote for the rejection of the Bill. With regard to the second course—that they should pass the second reading, but amend the Bill so as to make it a kind of permissive instead of a compulsory Ballot Bill, he felt that would be neither one thing nor another—it would be regarded as a mere sham Ballot, and would satisfy no one; and their Lordships' House, having once pledged itself to the principle of the Ballot, would afterwards find it difficult to resist an extension of the principle. He therefore thought the only fair, open, and manly course would be to reject the Bill, which had been condemned by nearly every speaker who had addressed their Lordships; and if they did so he believed they would gain the gratitude of the country.

The Earl of Rosebery

LORD LYVEDEN said, he quite agreed with the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) that the question of the Ballot in the Colonies was very different from the question of the Ballot in England, and that the voting for the Education Boards was a very different thing from voting at Parliamentary elections, and could not fairly be considered examples in point. They were like the analogy of voting in Clubs, quite inadmissible as examples. The cases were totally different in circumstances and could not be compared. The noble Marquess the President of the Council in introducing the Bill had gone over the old arguments. The noble Marquess, indeed, was the only Member of the Cabinet who could consistently support a Ballot Bill. Of the other Members of the Liberal party it might truly be said that "the more they looked at it the less they liked it," as the noble Duke quoted Mr. Fortescue. He did not believe that any of their Lordships were admirers of the Ballot, or that they wished the present Bill to pass, and yet it had only been argued by one noble Lord after another that they ought to pass it in deference to public opinion. The noble Duke opposite, for instance, had made a remarkable speech—there could not have been a better speech against the Ballot—but he entirely failed in his conclusion, for he ended his speech by saying that he should vote for the second reading of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Pardon me: I never said I should vote for the second reading of the Bill. What I said was that I should not vote against it.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that was as bad, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) came to a nearly similar conclusion;—and, in point of fact, the debate had given rise to the most inconsequential speeches which he (Lord Lyveden) had ever heard—noble Lords declaring emphatically against a thing which they were practically supporting. The noble Duke proposed that the secrecy of the Ballot should be optional and not compulsory. But could any one suppose in voting in favour of a permissive Ballot that there was any chance of the Bill, if altered in that sense, being accepted by the House of Commons? Did it not make personation more easy? Why was it that they were asked to pass the Bill? Because, it was argued, public opinion desired the Ballot. No doubt, when the public opinion was deliberately expressed through the House of Commons their Lordships could not resist it; but he maintained that the opinion of the public had not been declared in favour of the Ballot; and that when the House of Commons, which had not been elected on the question, had sat for four years, the House of Lords ought not to yield without a dissolution. In all large reforms that had been the rule—when any great constitutional change was sought to be made, there had always been a thorough appeal to the people. But no such test had been applied in reference to the Ballot question. What had happened since their Lordships had last voted upon this subject? Why, the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who moved the rejection of the Bill last year went shortly afterwards to Glasgow—one of the most democratic of constituencies—and where consequently he might be supposed liable to ill-treatment for his conduct in regard to that measure—but so far from that being the case he was fêted and lionized, and nothing was too good for him. - And what had happened since then? Why, all the elections that had taken place had gone against the supporters of the Ballot. There had been no expression of opinion on the part of the public in favour of the measure, and the Bill itself was a very different thing from what the public supposed a Ballot Bill to be. Fortunately the Amendments proposed by Mr. Leatham were not carried, though they were supported by the Government; but if they had been adopted the effect would have been to imprison any man who showed his voting paper; in fact, any man who held up his hand at a show of hands would subject himself to penal provisions. Then the Bill almost created personation; at all events, its provisions were of a character to make the offence a new crime. The fact was that the Government, having passed two sensational measures—the Irish Church Act and the Irish Land Act—had tried their hands at a third, which was to re-unite the Liberal party in a compact body, and enable Sir George Grey to row in the same boat with Sir Charles Dilke—mitis sapientia Læli restraining the catilinæ gladius. But the measure had not had that effect, and it never would have such an effect, because so many of the Liberal party were really against it, and the country was tired of it. They were no more united than the Opposition this night, or the bench of Bishops on some other occasions. He thought he ought to congratulate their Lordships on seeing them still upon the red benches of this House, for when they threw out the Bill last year the Radical newspapers all cried out that there must be an end of the House of Lords, for they were the only obstacles to Liberalism and progress. But he always found it the case that when the Radical party were at fault they always found an easy vent to their feelings in saying—"Oh! the Lords are responsible for this; if we could only get rid of them we should be all right." But their Lordships were still sitting where they used to sit, and without much notion of being disturbed. Indeed, he believed that, if the truth were spoken, the House of Lords had rather gained in popularity over the House of Commons. Holding the opinion he did as to the danger of the Ballot, thinking it opposed to the Constitution, and likely to have a mischievous effect on the character of the voters, he entreated their Lordships to reject the Bill. For himself, not seeing any other way of getting rid of it unless they rejected it at once, he should vote against the second reading.

Lord Lyveden

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I wish, my Lords, to offer a few observations upon the course which the discussion has taken this evening. Her Majesty's Government certainly cannot congratulate themselves upon the support which they have received from noble Lords who sit around them—they have received from one or two a rather lukewarm support, while from others who must be recognized as prominent Members of the Liberal party they have obtained very much less. Neither can I congratulate Her Majesty's Government upon the course which they have followed in this matter. This, according to their own avowal, is the great question of the Session—the question upon which Her Majesty's Government stake their reputation; and yet, with the exception of my noble Friend the President of the Council—and from him we have been favoured with only a very brief speech—we have not had any exposition of their views or any statement of their opinions. We have had constant references to colonial practice, but my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies has not condescended to enlighten us on that point; and when noble Lords speak of the apathy of the public with regard to this question, I think it would be quite as true to say that there is just as much apathy on the Treasury Bench at this moment. [Earl GRANVILLE made an observation.] Perhaps my noble Friend the Leader of the Government in this House will be good enough to favour us with his views in the course of the evening. For my own part, I cannot conceive a more curious illustration of the feeling which prevails on this question than in the way in which it has been generally treated. Here is the question which a few years ago was avowed as one of the prime articles of the Radical faith. It is now with many Radicals a matter either of doubt or disbelief. In the case of most public questions, as discussion goes on the interest of the public generally grows. This, on the other hand, is a question as to which as it is discussed the public interest languishes more and more. This is not only the case in speeches, but in writing also. The interest seems absolutely to fail. There are very few writers, very few politicians on either side, who support the Ballot now in the way in which it was supported in the time of Mr. Grote. I dismiss entirely the argument as to intimidation, on which so great a strain has been laid. I believe that intimidation really exists nowhere, except possibly in a few places in Wales and Ireland. But in Ireland, at all events, does anybody believe that the Ballot will be a bulwark, except of the most feeble description, against the Confessional? On that point, a most remarkable statement was made the other day by one of the Irish Judges—a man, too, taken from the Liberal ranks, whose prejudices and sympathies were all in favour of Liberal measures. That statement well deserves the attention of your Lordships' House. Mr. Justice Keogh said—

“It had been reluctantly admitted by Mr. Bernard O’Flaherty, who was taken out of his bed to give the evidence, that Father Cohen had said that priests would use the Confessional under the Ballot Bill if necessary. But the Ballot Bill was not yet law, and Parliament was still sitting, and Ministers and the Legislature ought to know this avowal of Father Cohen.”

I think, therefore, it is not unfitting that we should consider that avowal. But then, on the other hand, I see that this Bill is to pass, and I ask myself the reason why? My Lords, I can only suppose that it proceeds from some such cause as this—that Her Majesty’s Government, who in former days were all individually pledged against this particular measure, have now, for some reason best known to themselves, revolved entirely on their own axis, and come to a totally opposite conclusion. I can account for it only on the supposition that from sheer weariness men at last abandon a cause which they long supported and take up another against which they had struggled in former days. Ten long years of wearisome struggle have at last worn out their resistance. But, my Lords—and this is my strongest argument against the whole of this measure—I am opposed to it because you know very little of the facts and nothing of the operation of this Ballot; what is alleged is conjectural, fancied party advantages are hoped for on either side, and men conceive that it cannot be so bad as it has been hitherto deemed. But wiser men cannot say in what way this Bill will turn out. Against these fancied advantages you have the strong argument of experience. And now what is that experience? My noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond), who made so able and telling a speech in the earlier part of the evening, said that unhappily he had given up references to classical times and practices, because it seemed to savour of pedantry. But if the experience of antiquity went for anything it went against the Ballot. The practice of Greece was that the secret vote should be used not merely in elections, but for offices. I presume Her Majesty’s Government are not prepared to accept the principle that the Members of the Government are to ballot among themselves for the offices they are to hold? In Rome, on the other hand, the Ballot was denounced by the greatest and ablest of the Latin orators. It was the glory of the greatest of Roman orators that although the Ballot was in full force he was elected by acclamation by the Roman people, and that the Ballot was dispensed with on that occasion. My noble Friend has said that whereas for 400 years previous to the Ballot law coming into force at Rome there had been but one single case of bribery, after it became law bribery cases multiplied by hundreds and thousands. My noble Friend might have gone a step further; because, if my memory does not deceive me, the law which enacted the use of the ballot in the election of magistrates was succeeded a few years afterwards by the law that the ballot should apply to the enactment and repeal of what we should call Parliamentary measures. In our case I do not say that we shall fall back on the system so graphically described by my noble Friend; but I do say that the one followed as the necessary consequence of the other. Allusion was frequently made this evening, as on former occasions, to colonial practice; and a correspondence with the Australian Governments which was laid, I believe, on the Table of both Houses, but certainly of the House of Commons, has been quoted. My answer to the argument derived from Australian practice is threefold. In the first place, the conditions of society and of government in the Australian Colonies are so wholly different from the conditions here that no safe or satisfactory analogy can be drawn from them. In the next place, as a matter of fact, the systems of ballot differ in the different Australian Colonies. And, lastly, I will go a step further, and say that this correspondence contains admissions on the part of the authorities of every one of those Australian Colonies which, if true, are fatal to the Ballot. There are five Australian Colonies, and I do not deny that my noble Friend the President of the Council may find arguments in favour of the Ballot in the despatches of all their Governors; but in those despatches and the statements annexed thereto from persons of great authority are admissions which are almost fatal to the Bill. Mr. Cowper, Prime Minister of New South Wales, the author of the Ballot Bill there, and who, if any man, is interested in showing its success, says:—“Personation is not put down.” Either Mr. Cowper or some one else in the colony mentions the fact that the pencil has to be secured by red tape to prevent the voter taking it away. Lord Canterbury, Governor of Victoria, says—

“Desire of secrecy is entertained and acted on by a comparatively small portion of voters; and therefore immunity from bribery is attributable not to secret voting but some other cause.”

The Earl of Carnarvon

That, if I remember rightly, substantiates the evidence which Mr. Verdon, no mean authority, gave some time ago before the Committee of the House of Commons. Sir James Fergusson, Governor of South Australia, writes—

“The system has not yet felt the strain of trial.” “There is a great indifference in acquiring and in exercising the right of voting.”

Coming to Tasmania, Mr. Du Cane says—

“The interest felt by the electoral body in the politics of the colony has of late years been a rapidly decreasing one. . . . If party spirit ran high, and a wealthy candidate were determined to spend money corruptly, the system of absolute secrecy in force here would not prevent his doing so, but would only tend to throw difficulty in the way of his subsequent detection.”

Lastly, we have this remarkable statement from the acting Governor of Queensland, Mr. O’Connell—

“This system no doubt leads to personation, and more particularly where polling-places are at no great distance apart.”

Is it fair, then, to treat this return as favourable to the operation of the Ballot in the Australian Colonies? I may be told that the system works well in other Colonies. Is the House aware, however, that in Canada for two successive years a Ballot Bill has been brought forward? Last year it was rejected by the Canadian House of Commons; and within the last few days that, or a similar Bill, was contemptuously rejected by 140 to 43—the whole House numbering only 190 Members, so that almost all voted. And yet Her Majesty’s Government tells us the Ballot has succeeded in our Colonies. Then take the case of the United States—which has indeed been pretty well disposed of already, but as to which I wish to mention one or two additional facts which deserve attention. Whatever may be the merits of the Ballot in the United States, two things are quite clear—it is quite clear that the Ballot in the United States has not stopped violence and intimidation, and also that it has not stopped that which is almost a greater evil, the suspicion and accusations of foul play. As my noble Friend remarked, riots and faction fights admittedly occur under and in spite of the Ballot; and these things have been thought so serious that they have been referred to Committees by different State Legislatures. Read the Report of a Committee of the Maryland House of Assembly—I think in 1857—and the Report of a similar Committee of the House of Assembly in Louisiana about the same date, and you will find violence and intimidation recognized as facts on which there is no dispute. As to foul play, a Committee of the House of Assembly of the State of New York reported in 1857 in these terms—

“The Ballot Bill fails to be a true reflection of the will of the people. . . . the inspector himself or by others putting in unauthorized ballots enough to outweigh those honestly deposited. So skilfully are these frauds perpetrated that the offenders are rarely detected.”

Next year another Committee sat on the same subject, and reported thus—

“Of late years fraud and simulation at the ballot-box have become enormous. No sane man will deny this.”

In 1868 a Committee was appointed by the House of Representatives, and their Report on New York election frauds is most instructive. The facts there stated are that in the Presidential election of 1868, thousands of aliens were enabled to vote—of course contrary to the law—while many hundreds of persons voted from two to about 40 times, under assumed names, and extensive frauds were committed with canvassing tickets, while names of non-existing persons were entered on the roll lists. One of the witnesses, John Clark, says—

“I voted at the last Presidential election. I voted five times at least in the several districts of the Eighth Ward. I was short of money at the time, and could not find any easier way of getting money.”

Cornelius Doherty says—

“I voted eight or nine times at the last Presidential election. I guess there were 20 or 22 in the gang; they all voted the same ticket; some of them voted 18 or 20 times.”

John Glennon says—

“I voted at the last Presidential election. Several of my friends came around saying that money could be made easy, and that no one would know anything about it. I voted eight or nine times.”

Lastly, out of an enormous list, Charles M'Carthy says—

“I voted at the last Presidential election in this city between seven and eight times in pretty nearly all the districts of the ward. I voted once in my own name, once in the name of Jeremiah Sullivan, once in the name of Charles O'Conner; the other names I do not recollect.”

These are undeniable facts, and such things we must expect in this country under a similar system. To sum up the whole question of the Ballot in the United States—first of all, the Ballot differs in the different States. In Kentucky, at this moment, I believe there is no Ballot at all. In Virginia, till within a few years, there was no Ballot. Again, the Ballot in the United States is certainly not secret—a man votes according to ticket and according to colour. Moreover, it fails to secure immunity from the gross abuses which I have pointed out. While the operation of this measure is conjectural—and on these grounds I mainly object to it—there are some facts absolutely certain, and some results which are probable, which ought to make this House pause before they enter on so grave an experiment. In the first place, there can be no doubt that we are about to change in a very grave manner that which has been the system in England from time immemorial. We Englishmen, rightly or wrongly, have been taught to regard freedom and openness of speech and absolute publicity of action in all public matters not only as our inalienable right, but also as our imperative duty. This, for better, for worse, and, as far as I can judge, upon no arguments of any solid weight, you are now preparing to destroy. It is also certain that you come to an absurdity under this Bill if you push its principles to their fair logical conclusion. You say a man shall vote in secret and shall not disclose how he votes, and you proceed to inflict a penalty upon anybody who induces him to disclose this; yet you have not the courage to say you will punish the man himself if he discloses it. Why? Simply because you know that it is impracticable. Mr. Leatham is perfectly logical in his view, but it carries the whole thing to an absurdity. Again, the Bill is open to all the abuses and dangers of personation. There is no scrutiny in it: and without it your controlling power is at an end, and the election is in the hands of the Returning Officer. The Returning Officer may exercise the duties of his office fairly; but who will say suspicion will not be excited against him and that the gravest evils will not ensue in consequence? No one will deny that interest in public questions is on the decrease, and that it is difficult to get men to go to the poll. Will you find them more ready when they vote in secret and their friends are unable to see which way they vote? I beg the House will remember, in reference to this point, the extracts I have read in which two Australian Governors declare that interest in public affairs was on the decline, and the number of voters was diminishing. The consequence, I believe, will be that the whole control of elections will pass into the hands of "wirepullers," who will contract at so much a head for the voters, and there will be an almost indefinite extension of bribery in one form or another. We are extremely likely to find as the consequence of this that the quality of the candidates will rather deteriorate than improve. Lastly, one further result will follow from it, and that will be the weakening of confidence in public men and public institutions, which will be dangerous, and which is the first indication of a breakdown of the machinery of Government itself. It is under these circumstances that I have to consider whether I should support the Amendment or abstain from voting and trust to the Amendments which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) will submit in Committee. If anyone can give me a guarantee that the Amendments of the noble Duke will be satisfactory and will be carried, it will be another thing—there is no one in whom I have greater confidence than in the noble Duke; but I feel also very strongly that the principles of the Bill are such that they can hardly admit of qualifications which will render them desirable to my mind. I have already stated to the House some of the probable results of the Bill; but I do not believe that it is in the power of any man fully to predict them. I doubt extremely whether it will alter the distribution of the power between the two parties in the country; and sometimes I am inclined to think that the Liberal party, who have done so much to bring it about, will not find themselves favoured by its operation. In deference to the opinion of the noble Duke I shall abstain from voting on the present occasion; but I feel that the Bill is a crude, ill-digested, and ill-considered measure; I believe it to be ill-drawn, full of defects and omissions, and that it will fail to secure us against great frauds. I believe it to be a Bill that is illogical, and which it is feared to follow out to its own conclusion. I believe that it is full of snares, pitfalls, and delusions; I believe it to be opposed to the old English principles which we have long recognized—that public duty should be done in the face of the sun, in the full blaze of public light, and with the consciousness that your fellow-citizens are concerned in your acts; and, lastly, I believe it to be capable of producing great evils, according as the accident of the future may determine.

The Earl of Carnarvon

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he wished to state the course he intended to take with regard to the second reading of the Bill. He had latterly had a practical opportunity of seeing how the Ballot worked in New South Wales, and he was bound to say that rioting at elections, which had existed before its introduction, had been put a stop to. It might not, perhaps, be very easy to say why it was; but so it was. No doubt, in the Report of Sir Charles Cowper, the late Prime Minister of New South Wales, it was admitted the Ballot had not put an end to personation there; but, on the other hand, in a private communication he (the Earl of Belmore) had received from him, Sir Charles Cowper stated that it did not exist to a greater degree than before. The opinions of other Governors—Sir James Fergusson and Mr. Du Cane—had been quoted by the noble Marquess in favour of the Ballot; but it was right to say that they limited their views to the Ballot in Australia. There was one point which had been only very slightly alluded to, and that was the subject of scrutiny. In New South Wales the Ballot was absolutely secret, and there was no means of obtaining a scrutiny; whereas in Victoria—although the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) was in error in supposing that the Ballot was optional—there was very little secrecy about voting, and the scrutiny existed. Lord Canterbury, in his Report, gave it as his opinion that the Ballot which imposed a scrutiny was far superior to that which imposed none. Lord Canterbury, who was no mean authority, having for several years been Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, and who had consequently had considerable experience of our electoral system, said—

"In the first place, I would observe that although the instances in which a 'scrutiny' is demanded in this Colony are comparatively of rare occurrence, I cannot myself doubt that the system of ballot in operation here, which imposes no obstacle to such a 'scrutiny,' is far superior to any system under which a 'scrutiny,' or at least a complete 'scrutiny' is impossible. For while I believe with the Chief Secretary that the security for secrecy which the law here intends to afford to the voter has not been practically diminished by the power of identification, which, under exceptional circumstances, and for a special purpose, it also provides, I believe (the experience on which I have formed this opinion has not, of course, been acquired in this Colony), that the inability to institute an efficient scrutiny after an election is closed is, in itself, a direct and may become a powerful incentive to the use of illegal means for procuring a colourable majority at the poll."

Lord Canterbury having gone on to point out that there was little desire for secrecy in practice; that immunity from bribery was not attributable to ballot, but to the general independent position of voters; and that Government had its full influence, and that the Ballot favoured no particular party, stated, as the general result—

"But I do believe that the existing system (of which the ballot is a part) under which votes are given and received here, has exercised a continuous and very valuable influence in maintaining order and tranquillity during contested elections."

But although he believed in the utility of the ballot in Australia, he (Lord Canterbury) did not wish his opinion pushed so far as to see it introduced into this country. It had been said that there was no analogy between the cases of Australia and of the United States. For his own part—although he (the Earl of Belmore) admitted that there was not a complete analogy—he could not admit that there was none at all. He was not enthusiastic in favour of the Ballot, and he did not believe the Bill would work miracles; yet, at the same time, he was not very much afraid of it. That being so, it might be asked why he was not content to leave well alone? He could not, however, avoid asking himself what the result of their Lordships' rejection of this Bill would be, and he felt perfectly certain that if they rejected it it would come up to them again. They might, perhaps, again reject it, but in the end it would be passed, and that being so, he did not think that such a barren victory as a rejection of the measure would tend to increase the prestige of their Lordships' House. If there were any doubt about the feeling of the country it might be different; but he could not admit that there was any doubt. He did not, of course, fail to perceive the force the arguments employed by those who objected to the principle of secret voting that it had not yet been pronounced by the electors of the country; but he entertained little doubt as to the decision of the constituencies that point would be, and he could at the same time disguise from himself the fact that if this Bill were thrown a very dangerous agitation would be commenced, and that the demand for the lot would be made a party cry. For reasons he had stated he intended giving his vote for the second reading of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am far from resting the case of the Government with regard to the lot upon the papers referred to by my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Marvyn); but if my noble Friend opposite had taken the trouble to read the despatch which I addressed to the Governors of these colonies whose reports he quoted, he would have seen that my object was not to make out a case for the Ballot, but to obtain such information as to its working in those colonies where it existed as was likely to be of service in dealing with the subject. When, however, I say that we must not rest our case upon those papers, I must also guard myself from admitting that my noble Friend opposite gave a fair account of their contents. These reports contain very full and fair and candid statements as to the respective merits. Nothing in the world is easier than to pick out from papers of this kind sentences here and there favourable to particular views; and as my noble Friend has pointed out just those particular passages that suit his purpose, I will trouble the House for a moment or two to listen to one or two passages that suit me. It is a singular thing that, with an exception, my noble Friend quoted exclusively from the despatches of Governors. Now, I have a great respect for the distinguished men who leave a country to govern our colonies, but nevertheless attach even more weight, as a matter of this kind, to the opinions of responsible Ministers practically acquainted with the working of the laws. Mr. Cowper's opinion with respect to personation is, I frankly admit, adverse to the Bill of the Government; but Mr. Cowper's opinion is not entirely opposed to the Ballot, for he says—

"I should be sorry to see any alteration in the law which would destroy the secrecy of the vote given by Ballot, the operation of which has been in various ways very beneficial."

Again, Mr. M'Culloch, Chief Secretary to the Colony of Victoria, says—"There is no doubt as to the satisfactory working of this system of voting in Victoria." The next passage with which I shall have to trouble your Lordships is from Mr. Du Cane, who, speaking of Tasmania, says—

"So far, then, as the maintenance of good order at elections is concerned, I must express my decided opinion that the Tasmanian system of taking votes at elections is a successful one. I have also, as I have observed above, no reason to suspect the existence at the present time of any system of bribery, undue influence, or personation of voters. I trust, however, to point out to your Lordship that the Tasmanian system of absolute secrecy, while securing to the voter the free exercise of his right of voting, and exercising an important influence in the maintenance of good order, by no means, in my opinion, renders the practice of bribery an impossible one when a candidate or his agents are disposed to resort to it."

The last extract with which I need trouble your Lordships is from the memorandum of Mr. Wilson, in which he says—"The Ballot has worked well in Tasmania." Therefore, you have evidence, and, as I think, satisfactory evidence, that the Ballot has worked well in New South Wales, Tasmania, and Victoria. I do not wish to push this argument too far, and I am perfectly willing to admit that the case of Australia differs very much from that of this country. But, on the other hand, I protest altogether against the doctrine that we ought to have brought the experience of Canada to bear upon this question, because the experience of Canada is the experience of open voting. Canada is an open-voting country, and affords us no experience on the subject of the Ballot. Then my noble Friend, passing from modern communities to the history of ancient Greece, hoped we were not about to apply their system of voting to the election of Members and of Ministries—upon which I will only say that, if the Ministers are chosen by lot as they were in Greece, it may have this agreeable effect—that my noble Friend and I may, perchance, find ourselves sitting in the same Cabinet. A great deal has been said about the declarations of particular Members of the Government, and especially of the Prime Minister. I have not at hand the particular passages of the speeches of Mr. Gladstone; but I think it probable that his opinions may have been somewhat misunderstood. I infer from what has been stated that what my right hon. Friend said or meant was something to this effect—"You have established household suffrage in the towns, and it is not improbable that this may be extended to the counties; when that consummation is reached you will practically have universal suffrage throughout the country, and in the case of the large constituencies which will thus be created vote by Ballot will become almost a necessity." If that was what he said, I entirely concur in the opinion which he expressed, and it does not seem to me too large or extreme a view to take of the matter. It has been much pressed upon us that in this Bill no provision is made for the punishment of a man who discloses his vote if he chooses to do so. But therein lies a fallacy. A man after he has voted voluntarily communicating what he has done is a totally different thing from his showing his voting-paper while still in the booth, and thereby giving distinct and absolute proof of how he voted; but although to this act no special punishment is annexed, it would be a misdemeanour at law; and there is a very severe punishment denounced against all agents and officers who in any way procure the display of a voting-paper, or who seek to profit by any information thus obtained. In the United States the Ballot to a great extent is not secret, and a very vivid description was given by a noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) of the scenes of tumult which sometimes take place. I could not help thinking, however, that he must have been speaking of "caucus meetings" and "political platforms" rather than the ordinary elections, which in America are usually conducted without that violence which attends them in England. I confess that I thought more would have been said in the course of the debate about the probable effect of the Bill in Ireland. The whole working of our Parliamentary system as applied to Ireland is such that no man who thinks soberly on the subject, whatever side of the House he may sit upon, can help feeling anxious as to the results which any change may produce in that country; and if I thought that a change could possibly be for the worse, I confess I should entertain very considerable apprehensions. But after the scenes which, as Lord Lieutenant, I witnessed—not with my own eyes, but of which I was fully cognizant—after the tumults which occurred, the transmission of troops from one part of the country to the other, the charges and counter charges brought by landlords and priests of intimidation and violence—after events such as the late election in Galway, I confess it would astonish me if any person could be found to assert that the Ballot was likely to bring about a worse condition of things. I think, on the contrary, it will tend to introduce a better state of things. One thing it must certainly do—it must go far to prevent the gross and monstrous system of open intimidation by mobs, which now so generally prevails. For while bribery is infamous, and personation is base, of all the vices of our Parliamentary system the very worst is the gross and open and violent intimidation by a mob, for it is opposed to the very essence of freedom of election. It does not even put on the pretence of virtue by acting in secret, as bribers and personators are bound to do, but acts in open and flagrant violation of the law. If, therefore, the Ballot tends in any degree to prevent this system of intimidation in Ireland, to that extent it affords a complete justification for the passing of this Bill. It is objected that it will facilitate the exercise of influence by priests over their flocks. I do not pretend to say it will prevent it, but I exceedingly doubt whether it will increase it. It may possibly enable the priest to get information as to somebody who is about to vote against his own views, in obedience to the dictates of his landlord;—but even if that were so, I do not think it a very sad result: and, on the whole, I conclude that this Bill is likely to work well in Ireland. As regards its effect in this country, I said last year, and I say again, that I have never been one of those who thought that the Ballot would be either so immensely beneficial or terribly ruinous as its extreme advocates or opponents imagine. I believe that it is a measure which, on the whole, it is desirable to pass, now that you have the very large constituencies which have been referred to. I had almost forgotten one argument of my noble Friend on the cross benches (Earl Grey), the assailant of this Bill, who after his labours in the early part of the evening is now, I perceive, in a sound slumber. He always differs from anybody else, and he differs most of all from himself in successive years. My noble Friend—who I perceive is now listening to me—has a magnificent scheme in his head. My noble Friend has become much more Conservative in his views than the noble Lords who sit on the benches opposite; but, nevertheless, he has got in view some large measures of reform. He is one of those who believe that this generation is worse than its predecessor; and he describes all the melancholy results that follow from the degeneracy of Parliament, and foreshadows others yet to come. But he has also got a panacea—and this, singularly enough, consists in the adoption of much larger and much more sweeping changes. He probably thinks it a good thing to keep this Ballot Bill still in agitation, because if it is not passed now there will be a certain excitement in the country, a certain demand for reform, a certain amount of indignation excited against this House, and the two parties being stirred up, there will be a great opportunity of re-arranging the whole country, of putting an end to household suffrage, of introducing manhood suffrage—and woman suffrage, too, I suppose—of establishing electoral districts, and ultimately, I suppose, he would be willing to introduce the Ballot. The noble Earl's view is that if we make any change now, we shall deprive ourselves of the opportunity of making great and sweeping changes immediately afterwards. Now, I think it probable that we shall have to make changes from time to time; but while I am as little averse as any man to all necessary alterations, on the other hand I think there is such a thing as altering the Constitution too frequently, and that it may be desirable—to use a homely phrase—instead of having our carriage perpetually at the coachbuilders, to drive about in it and use it for a certain time. I hope that in the division which the noble Earl invites the number of his following will not be large. The noble Duke opposite stated very frankly and candidly his objections to the Bill; but he added that after the subject had been discussed for 40 years, and the Bill had been twice sent up from the House of Commons by large majorities, he thought it would be unadvisable that their Lordships should refuse to read it a second time; and in that view I cordially join. My Lords, I am convinced that the time has arrived when it would be prudent for the House to pass the second reading. And as far as my opinion goes, I do not believe that the passing of this Bill will bring about a political revolution—I believe that its effects will be, on the whole, salutary, but infinitely less than many persons suppose.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I should be inexcusable if I detained your Lordships with any long argument upon a Bill the subject matter of which has been discussed ad nauseam both in this House and in the country. The argument upon which much of the discussion this evening has turned is founded on the experience of the working of the Ballot in our Australian Colonies and in Canada; but I may remark that whichever way you may please to decide, this argument is practically worthless for the object which the supporters of the measure have in view. It may be that the Ballot has succeeded in Australia—it may be that it has been cast out with contempt in Canada—and still the facts may not bear much on the manifold difficulties of the problem we have to solve in this country. In the colonies there are no great differences of fortune—there is no poverty—no great accumulated wealth on the one hand to induce the demagogue to raise up the lower classes of society against the upper, while there is nothing on the other hand to stimulate the poor man to seek in change some lot better than his own. All these things which are not true of the new country are true of the old; and whatever of the experience of the new country you may apply to the legislation of the old, you cannot apply it to the machinery of Government. In an old country problems of a different character have to be solved, and to old countries alone ought we to look for a solution of them. Why is it that in the course of this discussion we have heard so little of the experience of foreign countries? The Ballot has been a great favourite of foreign countries. I believe that paragon of well-governed States the Kingdom of Greece has been remarkable for its assiduous cultivation of the Ballot. The same has been the case in Italy, France, and, I believe, Spain; and I am told that after every election in those favoured countries there always arises a discussion as to how much and by whom the electoral urns have been tampered with. I can give some testimony on the subject of personation under the Ballot. There is a certain Member of one of the Houses of Parliament—I will not say which—who has a large acquaintance abroad, and who informed me confidentially—and this is why I tell the fact to your Lordships—that it was his habit whenever he was present at an election abroad always to go in and vote in order to try whether he could do so, and that in no single instance had he failed in attaining his object. Now, it seems to me that if we are to judge by experience, we should turn our attention more to this foreign experience than to any other—because we, an old country, differ from the other old countries in this remarkable circumstance—that we alone have been able to preserve liberty and society without in any degree resorting to the instrumentality of despotism. We alone have done that, and we alone have cultivated open voting. We have been able to maintain our very peculiar institutions—in which authorities are perpetually clashing, and by which a merely theoretical politician would say that everything is perpetually in danger of going wrong—simply in consequence of this fact, that publicity has been the pervading spirit of our institutions. From top to bottom, in every kind of public duty, whatever its origin—whether it sprang from an Act of Parliament or from the tradition of ages—this thing is true—that our duties have been performed in the light of day, and that each man has been checked and prevented from extending his power so as to endanger the safety or hinder the working of the State by the constant criticism of his fellow men, who watch his every act. A noble Earl who spoke earlier in the debate with an ability which gives great promise of his future as an orator (the Earl of Rosebery) dealt with this question, and told us there were many other public duties which were not performed in public. He named only two, mentioning in the first place the deliberations of the Members of the Cabinet, who, he said, ought to deliberate in Hyde Park if every public duty were to be performed in public. Now, we do not object to the Members of the Cabinet talking over and preparing their measures in private, nor do we object to voters consulting privately, nor to candidates talking over measures beforehand; but as the Cabinet has to perform all its acts in public so all the electors in the country ought to perform their duties in public. Another illustration given by the noble Earl was, I think, that every father was bound to educate his child, and that on our principles the child ought to be whipped in the streets publicly.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: What he said was, that publicity did not require that a father should have his child say his catechism in the streets.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: If it should ever be proposed in Parliament that a father should be required to take his child into a small box to teach him his catechism, and that he should be punished with six months' imprisonment if he discloses what catechism he has taught the child, I shall agree with the noble Earl. If the noble Earl had said this I should have thought there was some relevancy in his illustration. But, my Lords, I feel that it is trespassing on your indulgence to argue this question, for the truth is we are all agreed about it. The real question we have to discuss this evening is—"Why should not the House of Lords vote according to its opinion?" Last year the House did vote according to its opinion; why should it not do so again? I am told that the House of Commons has twice by large majorities decided on the measure, and that therefore it is our duty to pass it. That proposition has met with a just and indignant repudiation from the noble Earl who moved the Amendment (Earl Grey). If it be true that the House of Lords is a mere copying machine for the decrees of the House of Commons, the sooner its duties are remitted to that useful instrument the better. It is obvious that the object of the Constitution in providing two Houses was that there might be two opinions—it being the belief of those who had a share in founding the Constitution that two opinions were more valuable than one:—but if the second opinion is always to be the same as the first, it is clear that the second opinion will not be of much use. My Lords, I do not think that the argument deduced from the fact that the House of Commons has expressed its opinion has much relevancy to this subject:—for I draw the widest possible distinction between the opinions of the House of Commons and the opinions of the Nation. Several of the speakers this evening have admitted what is the fact—namely, that neither this House nor any authority in this State or any other State can resist the deliberate and well-settled opinion of the Nation over which it rules. But that the House of Commons is the expression of the opinion of the Nation is a constitutional fiction which it is convenient for practical purposes to respect; but which is only literally true on certain occasions and on certain subjects. It is true literally when a question on which the House of Commons has been elected is under discussion—then it is undoubtedly true that the House of Commons represents the opinion of the Nation:—but when four years have gone by, and the memory of all the questions on which the House of Commons was elected has passed away, and when an obvious change has taken place in many opinions of the Government which the House of Commons was elected to support, the House of Commons represents only theoretically and not literally the opinions of the Nation. My Lords, I attach much importance to the fact which has been already alluded to in this debate—that this matter has never been before the constituencies at all. The Members of the Government are not the same as they were when they went to the country—they were then mainly non-Ballot politicians. Mr. Gladstone, whose name really was the name to which the electors looked, had up to that time voted against the Ballot, and had given no hint that his opinions were undergoing a change. Again, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, who was especially prominent at the last election, because the question of Ireland was the one problem with which the new Ministry was to deal, and he was the trusted instrument of the party which gained the majority—Mr. Chichester Fortescue not only by voluntarily expressing a solemn opinion, but by a solemn recantation, avowed his horror of the Ballot. Therefore, I maintain, the country has never had a fair opportunity of considering whether it likes the Ballot or not. Remember, my Lords, what a peculiar Constitution ours is. In other countries there is a Constitution which is above the hands of the Legislative Assembly, and which can only be altered by the Nation itself. If we were living in America or Switzerland, before we touched anything which deeply concerned the election of the representative body we should have formally to consult the opinion of the people. We have no such institutions here—and I am glad we have not—but the absence of them imposes upon us informally the duty of carefully abstaining from altering the constitution of the representative body until those who elect its Members have had a chance of expressing an opinion on the change. It is evident that the greatest danger might on any other principle arise. The House of Commons might entirely change the suffrage on which it was elected, and transfer the power to a different class, or take the power to itself, as it did in the case of the Long Parliament, while the constituencies would have no chance of interfering; and it is precisely because there is no constitutional necessity as in other countries of appealing to the people, that the check of this House is so important in controlling the legislation of the House of Commons on subjects of this kind. So far from admitting that because it concerns elections to the House of Commons we ought to obey the behests of that House, I should say, on the contrary, it is rather our duty to regard ourselves in this matter as the agents of the Nation, and to see that the House of Commons, in thus tampering with the laws under which it was itself elected, has not transgressed the mandate it received. Only one word more—for I am haunted by a fear lest the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack should become exhausted—I wish to say one word with respect to the slight difference of detail which exists between some of us and my noble Friend near me (the Duke of Richmond). My noble Friend proposes not to vote on this issue, because he thinks the object we have in view—the prevention of compulsory secret voting—can satisfactorily be attained when the Bill is in Committee. I confess my main difficulty in adopting that proposal arises on the consideration whether my noble Friend's Amendments will be really found incorporated in the Bill when it becomes a statute. I am not an old Member of this House, but I have already survived some hallucinations, and one is a belief in your Lordships' Amendments in Committee. They are proposed with the greatest sincerity, carried by enthusiastic majorities, and sent down to the other House, where they are received with bluff refusal. When the Bill is sent back to us, those who moved the Amendments sincerely are still desirous of importing them into it, but the moment has passed by, the majority has gone to the four winds, only a few of your Lordships are in town, and under the exhausting pressure of an August sun one-half the Amendments are given up and the other half are clipped down so that the authors of them can scarcely recognize their own children. It is not anybody's fault, but this is what is apt to happen. I trust in saying that I may not be thought to be speaking against the Amendments my noble Friend is to move in Committee. I shall support them earnestly and stand by my noble Friend to the last; but I cannot feel that in the resolution to propose the Amendments we have any guarantee they will pass. When I have an important end to reach I would rather reach it by a vote on the second reading, from which there is no appeal, than by voting for Amendments which may not be accepted. My noble Friend and other speakers have been a little disturbed by the fear of that agitation which is always coming and never comes, and by a desire—very natural and praiseworthy—to conciliate the House of Commons. But suppose we pass these Amendments—to which I give all praise—making the Ballot optional, and suppose the House of Commons refuses them, and the Bill in consequence falls to the ground, how are these two objects of avoiding agitation and gratifying the House of Commons to be attained? I am afraid we shall be as far from them as ever. Therefore, we are in this dilemma, either we shall fail to pass these Amendments—in which case my noble Friend will be as disappointed as I shall be; or we shall succeed in passing them, and then we shall incur these very grave dangers of irritating the House of Commons and provoking this terrible autumn agitation. It is with great doubt and difficulty that I have resolved to vote against this Bill. There is no one upon whose judgment I rely with more absolute confidence than I do on that of my noble Friend who tells me he shall abstain from voting against this Bill; but I feel that his position as leader and ours as the ordinary rank and file of the party are somewhat different. I think his mind is a little biassed by the responsibility resting upon him; but to us may be granted the luxury, not open to him, of expressing our opinions by a straightforward vote. Do not imagine that this is a wholly unpractical question. As regards England it will not produce any immediate effect on the balance of parties. It is very likely the rivalries among various classes may so operate that the balance of parties may not be changed, or even that there may be a slight inclination towards Conservatism. But if there is one thing to be feared, it is the dangerous vice of this day, political abstention. Ballot has had that effect on the Continent. There are numbers of people who only go to the poll to please some friend, and when you take that motive entirely away, I am afraid you will have a much smaller attendance at the poll, and consequently a much weakened moral authority in Parliament. Still, it is not these apprehensions which press immediately on my mind. I confess it is Ireland that alarms me. It is said, one object of the Bill is to prevent the terrible scenes which occur at nominations and polls at which mob violence is used. But if I am not mistaken the Government have always persistently refused to apply to Ireland that system of numerous polling-places which exists in England, and which would have prevented in Ireland those scenes my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) deploras, and would have paralyzed that mob power by which the supporters of my noble Friend are returned to Parliament. It is something to reduce the number of bloody heads at an Irish election; but if you pass this Bill, you will withdraw from the Irish elector the moral influence of the educated classes above him, and you will in the next Parliament have to meet a demand for separation from a majority of the Irish representatives. It is a demand which you cannot grant, and which you can resist only by altering your whole system of government and breaking the traditions of a free and peaceful Union which have lasted so long. It is a frightful prospect that the Bill opens before us, and some of us may appear too eager to resist it. If you are induced to condemn us because we are not guided at this crisis by the councils of my noble Friend, at least do us the justice to remember it is a fearful constitutional danger which is opened out by this ill-considered Bill—a danger to avert which it is worth while risking something of private attachment and confidence, and risking something of constitutional agitation. Therefore it is, my Lords, that I shall give my hearty support to the Amendment.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I shall not detain your Lordships long in speaking on a subject which has been so fully discussed here and elsewhere; but I would say that on this occasion the House and the Government may be congratulated on the fullness of the discussion which has taken place to-night—because it is not right or seemly that a Bill sent up by the other House, affecting mainly the position of its own Members, and the interests of those by whom those Members are returned, should be a second time disposed of without patient consideration. For this reason I do not think your Lordships will accept the advice of the noble Marquess who spoke last—to vote against the second reading of the Bill, because the effect of that course will be to prevent the further consideration of the Bill in Committee. I was disappointed at not hearing from the noble Earl who moved the rejection of the Bill (Earl Grey) a well-considered argument against it; but not one word of such argument did we hear from him—it dealt principally with what might possibly happen should this Bill pass into law. He found fault with Ministers for postponing other public measures to this; but I challenge him to point to any three Sessions within his own recollection in which so many important Bills have been passed as have been passed in the three Sessions of the present Parliament. If we are to wait for the Bill until the noble Earl is pleased with the Parliament and with Her Majesty's Government, I am afraid we shall have to wait a long time. The noble Duke who followed him (the Duke of Richmond) was willing to allow the Bill to go into Committee; but he disparaged the Bill on the ground that it was now supported by some among Her Majesty's Government who recently were among its opponents. For myself, so far as I am personally concerned, I can say that 24 years ago I spoke and voted in favour of the Ballot; and even if others have changed their views, that only shows that this measure has made that progress in public opinion which has been common to all important measures—such as the repeal of the Corn Laws, the repeal of the Test Acts, Catholic Emancipation, and Household Suffrage, which last I voted for 24 years ago, and which was finally carried when Mr. Disraeli was Prime Minister. This Bill, then, is simply another illustration of how public measures make their way upon their merits; and the fact of present supporters having formerly been opponents only shows how well considered the subject has been. A measure affecting the way in which Members of the other House are chosen should be something of a very frightful nature to justify your Lordships in rejecting it. The alleged apathy on the subject may arise either from want of interest or from certainty that the object will be attained; and it is the latter description of apathy that prevails. During the last month or two, in every single instance in which candidates have gone before constituencies, every candidate, whether Conservative or Liberal, has been obliged to declare himself in favour of the Ballot. My Lords, there are two remarkable instances of this. There was the constituency of North-West Yorkshire, numbering some 14,000 electors; the Conservative candidate could only be returned by declaring himself in favour of the Ballot. Mr. Powell, I believe, was a convert on the occasion. The other case was in Oldham, where the result was not less remarkable. My noble Friend (Lord Lyveden), who spoke with some degree of paternal interest on this subject, as if he had inherited a dislike to the Ballot, in alluding to the effect of the step taken last year by your Lordships in rejecting the Bill, mentioned what had occurred in the case of the noble Earl who then moved the rejection of the Bill (the Earl of Shaftesbury). He went to Glasgow on the invitation of the working men, and instead of being torn to pieces, the only result was that they received him with hearty and triumphant acclamation. But surely that fact cannot be used as an argument against the Ballot? It would be perfectly absurd. I contend, therefore, my Lords, that the facts I have mentioned really show there is no apathy on this subject. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) says the House of Commons does not on this subject represent the people of England. Why, we know they are represented by a greatly enlarged constituency under the Bill of the late Government. The Members who were returned at the first General Election under that Bill have all voted pretty well according to the wishes of those who returned them on this subject. The noble Marquess says they were elected four years ago, and they do not now represent the constituencies. The argument of the noble Marquess, therefore, resolves itself into this—there should be annual Parliaments, in order that we may see whether the Members elected really represent their constituencies or not. You are entitled, my Lords, to accept the verdict of the country, as expressed by the House of Commons, until it is otherwise expressed. You cannot rely on any other doctrine than that. I must now, my Lords, state briefly what I conceive to be the essence of this question. You have invested a large number of persons beyond those who formerly possessed it with the suffrage. These people believe that Parliament were in earnest when they changed the suffrage—the wish to exercise it; they do not wish to do so under the dictation of their landlords or employers, or the corporation under which they may have appointments—they wish to represent their own sentiments—they say let us do it quietly in our own way. But it is said, forsooth, this mode of secret voting is un-English—that it is against all our institutions, and against the Constitution itself—that it is a large and sweeping change of our constitutional system, and there ought to be a fresh verdict on the part of the country on the subject. America was referred to; but I believe when the Ballot was established in America it was adopted without any fresh appeal to the country. The Ballot has been adopted by our Australian Colonies, who love and carry out everything English—surely that does not show it to be un-English. They reverence every recollection of the old country, and how they should adopt an essentially un-English custom is a mystery which resolves to be explained. It is a perfectly English habit not to like to be interfered with—it is a perfectly English habit not to like to be patronized; and the English people do not wish to be kept in leading strings, or be told—"We know much better than you do what is best to be done, and how you ought to exercise your rights." I say that is not the way to secure the esteem and affection of the people. And, on the other hand, there is no fear of any of those tremendous consequences which the noble Marquess deprecated if you leave those whom you have intrusted with the franchise to exercise it in their own way. I do implore your Lordships as you regard their affections, as you would win their hearts, do not now spoil all you have done in enlarging their franchises by saying you cannot trust them to exercise them as they wish. We have heard a great deal to-night about everything being done in this country with publicity. My Lords, I read the other day a very admirable article, exceedingly well reasoned, in the leading public journal of this country, which spoke of the mischievous effect of secrecy, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) said something of the same kind; but the writer of the article did not appear to recollect that he himself was an instance of this very secrecy which he deprecated, because he was writing anonymously. I say, therefore, that the argument about the Ballot being un-English is an idle contention, and you must trust to the people to whom you have given the franchise how they should exercise it, for they are, after all, the best judges. I apprehend that your Lordships will not say that this measure is to be ignominiously rejected without further discussion.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, the only argument that I have heard from the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down which requires notice is that because a person writes anonymously in a newspaper, therefore we should have the Ballot; and I must say that if writing anonymously in a newspaper had been a public duty, the reasoning would then have been somewhat closer. I rise, however, for the purpose of stating to your Lordships the reasons why I cannot give any active support to this measure. In the first place, I find this most alarming statement on the part of the Prime Minister, that he had become a convert to the Ballot for this reason. He said that formerly he was opposed to it, because he thought that the giving a vote was a public duty which ought to be publicly performed on account of the limited number of voters who formerly possessed the franchise; but now, he stated, the whole thing is changed, as there has been established such an extended suffrage that it is tantamount to universal suffrage; or, at any rate, the adoption of universal suffrage is now only a matter of time and convenience. If that is to be the result of the present measure, the consequences are most alarming. Because, what must be the reasoning of those who do not possess the suffrage? They would say that formerly they had the right to see those who possessed the suffrage exercise their functions before the public; but now that protection was taken from them by this Bill, on the ground that it was only a matter of time and convenience when they would have the suffrage themselves. They would, therefore, say that Parliament when it deprived them of what was a protection must at the same time give them an unlimited suffrage, which is declared to be only a matter of time and convenience. Again, it appears to me that this Bill must inevitably have the effect of disfranchising one-half the constituency of the country. If you enact that all votes must be given secretly, you will find that a very large proportion of the electors will become utterly indifferent to the exercise of the suffrage, and that it will be utterly impossible to bring them to the poll and induce them to record their votes. Again, it has happened to all your Lordships to have to fill up papers with which you receive full directions. Your Lordships are persons educated and qualified for this work; but remember the kind of persons with whom you are now dealing. I speak now only of those who can read and write; and I ask you, do you believe it possible that as to a very large number of these persons they will ever be able to find their way through the complicated and embarrassing directions in this Bill in reference to the mode of voting? If any of your Lordships were to sit down at a table, you would find that it would take you considerably more than an hour to make yourselves masters of them. Do you believe that an ignorant or moderately-educated man, in the excitement and agitation of an election, when put into one of these secret booths, armed with a pencil or pen, and one of these unintelligible forms—do you believe that the chances would be equal in favour or against his filling it up correctly? Then, only think next of those who cannot read or write—we are told that they amount to a very large proportion, in some places to one-half of the constituency; and how are they to vote? They must before the election go to a magistrate and make a solemn declaration that they cannot read or write, and afterwards present themselves at the polling-booth armed with the declaration in order that they may record their votes. I venture to say that the result of that would be such that if this Bill were to pass it would disfranchise one-half of the constituency. It has been said that a portion of the constituency requires special protection against intimidation and bribery. I ask what portion of the constituency is it that requires protection—the higher or the lower grade—the better or the less educated portion? No doubt it must be said that it was the lower and less educated part. But what would be the protection for them? Secret voting is to be only the privilege of the educated; the uneducated are to have no protection; they are to be compelled to vote openly. Every man who is an enemy to an extension of the suffrage should vote for this Bill; but for the reasons I have stated I can take no part by way of voting in favour of the Bill.

LORD DENMAN, who was almost inaudible, was understood to say that if he had not been allowed to express his opinions he should have gone behind the Throne; but as it was, he could only give his reasons, justifying the course he should take. He had heard the whole debate on both sides, and considered that he had a right to be heard. The Bill of last year, brought in on the 10th of August, contained 57 clauses. He voted against that Bill on principle; but it contained a provision against the use of public-houses as committee-rooms, under a penalty of £20, which was entirely omitted in this Bill of 33 clauses. Many Petitions were presented last year for that Bill; there being 9,339 Petitioners in its favour, and only 2 Petitions against it, with 49 Petitioners; but this year there were 3 Petitions against this Bill with 2,752 Petitioners; only 28 in its favour with 559 Petitioners, and 17 Petitions for alteration with 2,213 Petitioners. One Petition from Liverpool contained excellent reasons for throwing out this Bill, showing that bribery, intimidation, and undue influence were the evils sought to be corrected by ballot, but that under the present state of the representation these evils were no longer formidable. He also alluded to a Petition from Manchester—which desired that public nominations might be continued—and he declared that he supported the Motion of the noble Earl (Earl Grey) against the second reading with much satisfaction.

Lord Cairns

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 86; Not-Contents 56: Majority 30.

Resolved in the Affirmative; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

CONTENTS.

Hatherley, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Balinhard, L. (E. Southesk.)
Devonshire, D.	Barrogill, L. (E. Caithness.)
Saint Albans, D. [Teller.]	Bateman, L.
Ailesbury, M.	Belper, L.
Cholmondeley, M.	Blachford, L.
Lansdowne, M.	Bolton, L.
Ripon, M.	Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.]
Airlie, E.	Camoy, L.
Belmore, E.	Carew, L.
Camperdown, E.	Chelmsford, L.
Cathcart, E.	Chesham, L.
Chichester, E.	Clermont, L.
Clarendon, E.	Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
Cowper, E.	Cloncurry, L.
De La Warr, E.	Congleton, L.
Devon, E.	Dacre, L.
Ducie, E.	De Tabley, L.
Durham, E.	Dinevor, L.
Ellesmere, E.	Dunning, L. (L. Rollo.)
Fortescue, E.	Eliot, L.
Granville, E.	Fitzhardinge, L.
Kimberley, E.	Foley, L.
Lovelace, E.	Greville, L.
Morley, E.	Gwydir, L.
Nelson, E.	Hastings, L.
Rosse, E.	Hawke, L.
Bangor, V.	Heytesbury, L.
Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.)	Howard of Glossop, L.
Ossington, V.	Kildare, L. (M. Kildare.)
Powerscourt, V.	Leigh, L.
Sydney, V.	Meldrum, L. (M. Huntly.)
Torrington, V.	Meredyth, L. (L. Athlumney.)
Ripon, Bp.	Methuen, L.
Abinger, L.	Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Acton, L.	Mostyn, L.
Auckland, L.	Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.) Robartes, L.
	Romilly, L.

Rosebery, L. (E. Rose- bery.)	Stratheden, L.
Saltersford, L. (E. Cour- town.)	Suffield, L.
Sandhurst, L.	Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
Seaton, L.	Vaux of Harrowden, L.
Silchester, L. (E. Long- ford.)	Wharncliffe, L.
	Wrottesley, L.
	Zouche of Haryngworth, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Marlborough, D.	Hood, V.
Norfolk, D.	Sidmouth, V.
Rutland, D.
	Braybrooke, L.
Abercorn, M. (D. Aber- corn.)	Brodrick, L. (V. Midle- ton.)
Bath, M.	Colchester, L.
Bristol, M.	Delamere, L.
Exeter, M.	Denman, L.
Hertford, M.	Digby, L.
Salisbury, M.	Dunsany, L.
	Ellenborough, L.
	Fitzwalter, L.
Abergavenny, E.	Lilford, L.
Amherst, E.	Lytelton, L.
Bandon, E.	Lyveden, L.
Brooke and Warwick, E.	Northwick, L.
Carnarvon, E.	Oranmore and Browne, L.
Coventry, E.	Oriel, L. (V. Masse- reene.)
Feversham, E.	Ormathwaite, L.
Grey, E. [Teller.]	Ravensworth, L.
Harewood, E.	Redesdale, L. [Teller.]
Harrowby, E.	Sheffield, L. (E. Shef- field.)
Macclesfield, E.	Somerhill, L. (M. Clan- ricarde.)
Malmesbury, E.	Sondes, L.
Mansfield, E.	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Selkirk, E.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Shrewsbury, E.	Thurlow, L.
Sommers, E.	Tredegar, L.
Tankerville, E.	Wynford, L.
De Vesci, V.
Hardinge, V.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS FOR TAKING AFFIDAVITS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to provide for the appointment of Commissioners in the Channel Islands and also in the City of Dublin and its vicinity for taking Affidavits to be used in the Superior Courts of Common Law and other Courts in Ireland—Was presented by The Lord SOMERHILL; read 1^a. (No. 133.)

House adjourned at half past Twelve o'clock, A.M., till half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 10th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Elementary Schools (Certificated Teachers), nominated; Public Petitions, Mr. Hastings Russell dis- charged, Mr. Arthur Russell added.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SER-VICE ESTIMATES—Committee—R.P.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Review of Justices' Decisions * [190]; Railways Provisional Certificate Confirmation * [192]; Board of Trade Inquiries * [193].

First Reading—Prison Ministers * [191]; Church Seats * [194].

Second Reading—Bishops Resignation Act (1869)
Perpetuation [187].

Committee—Report—Customs and Inland Revenue [106]; Tramways Provisional Orders
Confirmation (No. 3) (re-comm.) * [188];
Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation
(No. 4) (re-comm.) * [189].

Third Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental * [185], and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN—CASE OF MARY ANN SMITH.

QUESTION.

MR. WELBY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has had under his consideration the case of Mary Ann Smith, who died at Spalding, on May 10th, from the effects of an accident incurred while she was working upon a steam threshing machine; and, if so, whether he would take into his consideration the desirability of proposing some legislative restrictions upon the employment of females in work of this nature, as recommended by the coroner's jury in this instance?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he had received no special report upon the case of Mary Ann Smith, but he had seen a newspaper report, the accuracy of which he could have no reason to doubt; and he was afraid that accidents to women had in more cases than this resulted from their employment upon machinery used in threshing. From the representations made to him, he thought the subject of sufficient importance to have a special report made as to the manner in which women were employed upon these engines, and the means which might be taken for their greater safety. It was, however, no light matter to interfere with the employment of women in any sort of labour, or to interfere in any way without just cause with the working of such very useful machinery.

CRIMINAL LAW—COLLUMPTON MAGISTRATES—CASE OF JOHN WEBBER.

QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the account given by Canon Girdlestone in "The Times" (June 6th) of the proceedings at the Petty Sessions at Collumpton last Monday, relating to the case of John Webber a farm labourer; and, whether he has made any inquiry into the conduct of the magistrates on that occasion?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had caused inquiries to be made with respect to the account given by Canon Girdlestone of the proceedings at the Petty Sessions at Collumpton on last Monday relating to the case of John Webber, and he had received voluminous papers on the subject. As, however, they only arrived a short time ago, when he was obliged to attend a meeting of the Cabinet, he must ask the hon. Gentleman to repeat his Question to-morrow.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS BILL—COST OF PUBLIC PROSECUTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. WEST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he will lay before the House the result of his inquiry with regard to the estimated cost of public prosecutors proposed to be appointed?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the inquiry which had been instituted with regard to the estimated cost of the public prosecutors proposed to be appointed was a departmental one, which had been jointly conducted by officers of the Home Office and of the Treasury, and, as their Report was a confidential one, it could not be laid upon the Table of the House. The Public Prosecutors Bill stood upon the Paper as the first Order of the Day for next Wednesday, and when it came on the Government would be prepared to propose Amendments in it and to state what were the results of the inquiry in question.

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE—REPORT OF THE DIPLOMATIC COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any determination has yet been arrived at in respect to the various recommendations made by the Diplomatic Committee last year, which relate to the system of examinations for admission to the junior grades, the scale of remuneration of the junior servants of the service, and to certain pecuniary advantages which it was proposed to secure on special proof of specified qualifications, as also to the recommendations that the gentlemen now in the service who entered it before existing arrangements took effect for giving commissions to second and third secretaries should be entitled to reckon towards their pensions, when they retire, all the period of their service as Attachés without a commission, deducting four years from that period, and that, subject to the Secretary of State's approbation, it be allowable for Chiefs of Missions who have not taken their allotted leave in any one year to unite such leave with that of the following year, without incurring a reduction of salary during the period of such united leave?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, that as regarded the first part of the Question—What change would be made in the system of examinations for admission to the junior grades of the Diplomatic Service? he begged to state that candidates who had taken a University degree, or who had been at a public school up to their 18th year, would be required to pass only such examination as would prove that they had a correct knowledge of French grammar, could converse fluently in that language on ordinary topics, could translate accurately from English into French, and vice versa, and could satisfy the examiner of their proficiency in handwriting and précis writing. With respect to the second part of the Question—Would the scale of remuneration of the junior members of the service be altered, and would certain pecuniary advantages be secured to them on special proof of specified qualifications? he had to state that the period of unpaid duty would be reduced to two years, whereof six months would be spent in the Foreign Office and 18 months abroad. At the end of two years they would receive commissions as Third Secretaries, with a salary of £150 a-year, and if, on examination, they showed a competent knowledge of public law, they would, as Third Secretaries, receive an additional £100 per annum; on promotion to be Second Secretary they would receive a minimum salary of £300 a-year, increasing by £15 a-year till it reached £450 a-year. The minimum salary of a Secretary of Legation would be £500 a-year. Any Secretary of Legation or of Embassy, Second or Third Secretary or attaché, who should possess a competent knowledge, colloquial or otherwise, of the Russian, Turkish, Persian, Japanese, or Chinese language while serving at any mission where such language was vernacular, would receive a special allowance of £100 a-year over and above any other allowance he might be in receipt of. The third part of the Question was—Would those who entered the service before the present arrangements for giving commissions to Second and Third Secretaries took effect be allowed to reckon towards their pensions the period of their service as attachés with four years' deduction? To that he must say no; they would not be allowed to count such time, as no such benefit was promised on their entrance into the service. In reply to the fourth part of the Question—Would Chiefs of Missions be allowed, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, to unite the leave of one year with that of the next without incurring a deduction of salary? he had to observe that the Secretary of State was not prepared to allow that alteration, as it was not considered advisable to establish a system which would sanction the absence of heads of Missions for four consecutive months from their posts every second year, thus depriving the country for so long a time of the advantage which British interests would derive from the weight and authority attaching to heads of Missions. He would further observe that the new regulations he had mentioned had not yet come into practice, and were at present only prospective.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.
QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will give a day for the disposal of the Irish business now before the House, and particularly of the Bills relating to the amendment of the Irish Grand Jury system?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Marquess of Hartington) was anxious to make progress with the measure referred to, and hoped before any long time elapsed to make a communication as to it. For the present, however, the right hon. Gentleman must be content with the answer which he recently gave as to the Public Health Bill—namely, that nothing would be gained by attempting to arrange the order of Business too long beforehand, and that when the Scotch Education and Mines Bill had been dispatched, which would be the case before long, the Government would consider anew the order of Business.

ARMY—BAND OF THE GRENADIER GUARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. WATERHOUSE asked the Secretary of State for War, What control the Officer in charge of the Band of the Grenadier Guards will have over his men in the event of insubordination or desertion from the ranks during their visit to the United States; and, whether he has any objection to place upon the Table of the House any Correspondence that has taken place between the War Office and the Military authorities on the subject?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, there is no novelty in the circumstance of an officer with soldiers under his charge going to a foreign country on a visit of this nature; and in the present instance the officer in charge will have exactly the same authority as was exercised, for example, by the officer of Royal Engineers in charge of the men who attended the Paris Exhibition. Under the present arrangements no correspondence passes between the War Office and the military authorities.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked, Whether any instance had ever before occurred of a band or a company of soldiers being sent out of the country by order of the Secretary of State for War, and without any communication in the first instance with the Commander-in-Chief?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, it has not happened in any former case, nor am I aware that it has happened in this.

THE EARL OF YARMOUTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will be good enough to inform the House of the date on which the promise was given that the Band of the Grenadier Guards should proceed to the United States, and by whom that promise was given; also the date on which His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief was informed of that promise, and the date on which His Royal Highness received the sanction of Her Majesty for the band to proceed to America; and, whether the Secretary of State for War has not now ascertained that portions of uniform were served out to civilians to enable them to appear as bandsmen; and, if so, by whose authority?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the date on which a promise of permission was given was the 27th of September last, by a letter from my right hon. Friend the Surveyor General (Sir Henry Storks) to the Secretary of the United States' Legation. At that time the subject had been placed by His Royal Highness and by me in the hands of the Adjutant General and of my right hon. Friend. The completion of the arrangements having been notified to the Adjutant General, the formal submission to the Queen was made by His Royal Highness on the 29th of May, and Her Majesty's approval was received on the 30th. I have ascertained, not, indeed, that any novelty has been resorted to on this occasion in respect of civilians being permitted to wear the uniform of bandsmen in the Guards, but that an abuse, heretofore unknown to His Royal Highness the Colonel of the regiment and to the Adjutant General—and it was on their authority I made my former statement—has for some time prevailed of permitting civilians to supply the place of enlisted soldiers in the bands of the Guards. That abuse has been brought to light by the useful assiduity of the noble Earl, and directions have been given to prevent its repetition.

THE EARL OF YARMOUTH asked, at whose expense the cost of the uniforms worn by civilians would be defrayed?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, as the noble Earl, I believe, is an officer—[Cries of "Was!"—]—was an officer in one of the regiments in which the abuse has prevailed, I presume he is better acquainted with the subject than I am. If, however, he wishes for information on the point, and will place his Question on the Paper, I will ascertain what has been done in the present instance.

IRELAND—REFORMATORIES AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Will the sum taken in the Estimates be sufficient to pay for as many children as it may be expected will be sent to Reformatory and Industrial Schools now certified, or which may probably be certified in the current year; how far the Circular issued in July last, on his own authority, by the Inspector of Industrial Schools, to the managers of Roman Catholic Industrial Schools in Ireland has been acted on, whether it has been cancelled, and whether in future the discretion entrusted to magistrates by the Act of Parliament will be left unfettered by any restrictions as to sending children to particular certified schools capable of receiving them; and, might not the number of children a school is fitted to receive be with advantage included in the certificate, as is done in England?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that he had reason to believe that a sufficient sum had been taken in the Estimates to pay for as many children as it might be expected would be sent to reformatory and industrial schools now certified, although it was just possible that the Reformatory Vote might not be sufficient. With regard to how far the Circular issued in July last, on his own authority, by the Inspector of industrial schools in Ireland had been acted on, whether it had been cancelled, and whether in future the discretion entrusted to magistrates by the Act of Parliament would be left unfettered by any restrictions as to sending children to particular certified schools capable of receiving them, he had to state that it had never been acted upon with any great stringency, and that for the last six months it had not been acted upon at all. He was not, however, aware that it had actually been cancelled. If his hon. Friend referred, as he imagined he did, to the Correspondence that took place between them in the autumn of last year, he had to state that he was not prepared to abandon altogether the position he then took up. Although the Act seemed somewhat peremptory on the subject, he considered that, as being responsible for the administration of the Act, Parliament expected him to exercise some control over the number of children placed at the public expense in industrial and reformatory schools. There was no occasion—nor was there, he believed, any such intention—for imposing any restrictions whatever on the discretion of magistrates in that respect. It would be an improvement, no doubt, if, as the hon. Gentleman had suggested, the number of children a school was fitted to receive was included in the certificate, as was done in England, where it was practicable to do so; and, if possible, it should be so done in Ireland for the future.

WORKING MEN'S CLUBS—THE EXCISE. QUESTION.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Working Men's Clubs will in future have any security against prosecution by the Excise, such as that which lately failed in the case of the Surrey Club?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that the prosecution to which the hon. Baronet referred took place at the suggestion of the police, who appeared to show a prima facie case against the Surrey Club, but which was satisfactorily met by the club. He could not hold out the hope that anything would really be done that would prevent the possibility of proceedings being taken by the Excise against persons not guilty of the offences with which they were charged.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, that as the right hon. Gentleman's answer was unsatisfactory, he would take an early opportunity of bringing the subject under the Notice of the House.

INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX—TENANT FARMERS.—QUESTION.

MR. C. S. READ asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether in his reply to a Resolution of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, his statement that the tenant farmers would this year be relieved by the reduction of the Income tax to the extent of £150,000, he included the allowance of £80 that will be made in respect of all incomes under £300; and, whether he can state the amount previously allowed under Schedule B by the deduction of £60 from incomes of £200 a-year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that his answer made to the Central Chamber of Agriculture that the tenant-farmers would this year be relieved by the reduction of the income tax to the extent of £150,000, did not include the allowance of £80 that would be made in respect of all incomes under £300, and that somewhat about £10,000 ought to be added on that account. He found that when the income tax was at 5*d.* the relief given in that way was about £10,000, and that was the last Return to which he could get access.

INDIA—STAFF APPOINTMENTS. QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether in appointing to military Staff appointments in India, a preference is accorded to such officers as had passed through the Staff College?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I have no means of knowing the exact grounds on which Staff appointments are filled up in India by the authorities in whose patronage they are; but have no reason to doubt that the rules respecting the qualification of applicants are duly attended to. My hon. Friend is aware, of course, that the great majority of Staff appointments in India are given to the Staff Corps whose members cannot in the nature of things go to the Staff College at Sandhurst.

NAVY—THE REPORT OF "MEGÆRA" COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the noble Lord the Member for Chichester, Whether he can name a day for proceeding with his notice to call attention to the Report of the "Megara" Commission?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, the report of the Commissioners on the loss of Her Majesty's ship Megara dealt out blame right and left. Naval officers of high distinction and public servants of long standing were included in that sweeping censure, and, in fact, almost the only persons who escaped blame were officers of that Department which hitherto had been held primarily responsible for the administration of the Navy of this country. Under these circumstances he asked the First Lord of the Admiralty what steps he intends taking. The First Lord of the Admiralty took the fair course of sending the Report containing this censure to the officers inculpated, asking what they had to say in answer to the Commissioners' charges, and last week, in answer to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), the First Lord of the Admiralty said he intended to lay the replies of these inculpated officers and public servants on the Table of the House. He (Lord Henry Lennox), however, thought it would not be fair to enter into this question until the House of Commons had before it the replies to the charges in question; and if the hon. Gentleman who was the first person to call attention to what turned out to be a great disaster would do him the favour of bringing the subject before the House in his usual lucid manner, he would be delighted to do his utmost to assist him in bringing the House of Commons to a fair, searching, and judicial decision on this question.

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES (IRELAND)
COMMISSIONERS—SALES OF LAND.
QUESTION.

MR. HERON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the fact that the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland in their notices to immediate lessees or tenants, that they are willing to sell to them the fee-simple almost invariably demand thirty years' purchase on the rack-rent of the lands, although under the Act tithe rent-charge may be sold for twenty-two and a-half years' purchase, and perpetuity rents at five years' purchase; whether such a practice does not tend to destroy the right of pre-emption which it was intended the tenants should have, and to prevent the tenant-farmers from becoming owners of their lands in fee-simple; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure on the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, he was informed by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland that it was not their practice to demand 30 years' purchase, on the rack-rent of land which they had to sell. That was only asked in cases where the lands were extremely low let. Before land was offered for sale by the Commissioners, inquiry was made by them to ascertain the selling price of land in the neighbourhood, and the lands which the Commissioners offered for sale were offered to the tenants at that price. If the tenants declined to take the lands, they were sold by public auction, when the tenants had an opportunity of bidding for them in the market. Under these circumstances, he did not think there was any necessity of interfering with the course taken by the Commissioners.

Lord Henry Lennox

SUPPLY — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £74,235, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Subordinate Departments."

MR. BOWRING said, there were two items in this vote to which he desired to call attention. The first was with regard to the appointment to a permanent office of a gentleman who had been private secretary to the Duke of Richmond. At first this gentleman received a temporary appointment for 18 months, at a salary of £400, as corresponding clerk in the Railway Department, as stated in a footnote to the Estimates; but the very next year the footnote disappeared, and the appointment had since been treated as permanent, although sanctioned by the House originally as being temporary only; and this year that gentleman had been promoted over the heads of the whole staff of the officers to be a permanent staff officer of the Board of Trade—namely, junior assistant secretary to the Railway Department, at a salary of £600 a-year. His reason for bringing the matter forward was, that only a few nights ago he had called attention to a similar case in the Privy Council Office, where Parliament had been asked to make a nominally temporary increase to the Registrar's salary, and agreed to it on that understanding; whereas the precedent established in this Board of Trade case seemed to show that such increase was likely to be permanent. Then with regard to the library of the Board of Trade, which was very valuable. A few years ago, when the Board of Trade was transferred to Whitehall Gardens, the library, consisting of between 30,000 and 40,000 volumes of most valuable books, was left behind, and it was now placed in a wooden shed, and, beside deterioration from its comparatively unprotected condition, was in danger of destruction by fire. There were three ways by which this library might be disposed of—namely, by transfer to where the Department was now; or it might be usefully distributed among the several Departments of the Government; or, let the worst come to the worst, be sold, and the amount paid into the Exchequer, so as to prevent a large waste to the public. And yet there was a librarian with £600 a-year to take care of this library, which was of no use to the public service. The sum, moreover, annually voted in connection with the library, for salaries and minor expenses, was probably not less than £1,000, and if the Vote had come before the Committee in the early part of the year he would have moved that it be reduced by that sum. He would now move that it be reduced by £500, for the purpose of bringing the question to an issue, this being the third or fourth year that he had brought it forward; and unless he got some assurance from the Government on the subject, he would take the sense of the Committee upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £73,735, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Subordinate Departments."
—(Mr. Bowring.)

MR. MACFIE said, he would urge upon the Government the erection of the Board of Trade into something like an international body, to settle questions that might arise between this and foreign countries in matters relating to trade; and he also thought it desirable that the Board of Trade, like other Departments, should furnish annual Reports, and the sooner it was done the better.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he wished to call attention to two matters connected with the functions of the Board of Trade. He submitted that all questions relating to the copyright of designs should be transferred to the Patent Office, as an essential branch of that Department, and that the inspection of alkali works should be vested in the Local Government Board.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had to complain that not only had individual Inspectors increased in number, but there was a needless multiplication of the classes of Inspectors with every new restriction on the various branches of industry. He asked whether it would not be possible to economize Inspectors by referring kindred kinds of inspection to one class of Inspectors, and suggested that the cost of inspection of these alkali works might more properly be charged upon the proprietors than upon the public, on the principle which had lately been adopted in the case of Fisheries.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he hoped the duty of inspecting the proving establishment of chain cables would not be postponed till October, but would be fixed for the 1st of July, as originally contemplated.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought the librarian and assistant librarian, to whom his hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bowring) referred, had practically very little to do, and that he was perfectly justified in moving the reduction of the Vote.

MR. EYKYN said, he would call attention to the Joint Stock Companies Registration Office, the business of which he hoped would in future be transacted in a manner more satisfactory to the public.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply to the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie), said, the reason why the Board of Trade did not take a larger share in the transaction of international commercial business was, that it could not efficiently act in matters which implied a dealing between one Government and another, and which must always in the last resort be in the hands of the Foreign Office. He would also express his concurrence with the hon. Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. F. S. Powell), in thinking that the present distribution of work between the Board of Trade and other offices was open to improvement, and that, although the duties which were thrown upon it were well discharged, yet there were several of the duties performed by it which might be more properly given to other Departments of the State. In the remarks which the hon. Member had made with respect to designs he was very much disposed to concur, and the matter was under careful consideration. As to the inspection of alkali works, it had been decided that the duty should be transferred to the Local Government Board. He must, however, say that those duties, being of a very special character, and requiring special knowledge, could not safely be performed by persons who had no particular knowledge of the subject. As to the proving of chains and cables, the present Act would be left in operation, with the option of making use of the new tests in those places where the new testing machinery was provided. The same duties as before would therefore have to be performed till January 1. He had every reason to believe that the duties in the Office for the Registration of Joint-stock Companies had been performed more satisfactorily than they were last year; but he should like to have in black and white the exact grounds of complaint against the office, and would take care there was a searching inquiry. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bowring) raised the question of the appointment of a junior assistant secretary to the Railway Department of the Board of Trade. That gentleman, Mr. Charles Peel, had been previously employed at the Board of Trade in a temporary capacity; he had been private secretary to a former President of the Board, and he had performed important duties connected with the Provisional Order system which had grown up so rapidly. That was the work for which he had been specially appointed. He was now put in a more permanent position than he had previously occupied, but the Treasury had decided that he should not thereby acquire any claim to a retiring allowance, or any claim to compensation if the occasion for his services ceased. As to the library of the Board of Trade, he admitted that it was in an unsatisfactory state, and that that state ought under no circumstances to be allowed to continue. The library itself was, in fact, too good; so good that the Board did not know what to do with it. Being so good, they desired that it should be more widely available for the public service; but it was not now in a position in which it could be comfortably consulted by any large number of people. The question of lodging it better had been under consideration by the Treasury, which some time back appointed a Committee, but it had not yet reported. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, was anxious that the inquiry should be brought to a close at an early date, and to come to some decision upon the Report of the Committee.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he had always felt that the library was an unsatisfactory feature of the Board of Trade. When he was in office it encumbered all the rooms, and not being confined to the scientific works mentioned by the hon. Member for Exeter, sometimes attracted the clerks from their proper work. At the same time, he must say that he was conscientiously able to testify to the great ability and usefulness of the present librarian, who had, he believed, also other duties to discharge. With regard to the alkali works, he might explain that at first the owners of these works considered the Commission a hostile one, and it would have been difficult to carry the Bill if the owners had been saddled with the expenses of the Commission; those owners were now, however, by no means hostile to inspection; on the contrary, they acknowledged that the mode of working which they were obliged to adopt under the Act was extremely profitable and economical, and that they had benefitted largely by the suggestions of the able inspector. They could, therefore, well afford to pay for the inspection, and he thought it was well worth consideration whether the expenses should not be thrown on them. He also wished to know whether the attention of the Government had been turned to the condition of the oyster fisheries, and whether it was considered that the proprietors were now, or might shortly be expected to be, in a condition to pay for their inspection. He was glad that a beginning had been made in a fresh classification of the work in the different public offices, which had long been much required. With regard to Mr. Peel, he thought that no objection could possibly be taken to the appointment of that gentleman, the value of whose services had been acknowledged by two successive Governments.

MR. CANDLISH said, it was quite refreshing to witness the ability and intelligence now evinced at the Board of Trade. In the Estimates before the House work which had hitherto cost £400 was now charged £600, and a gentleman, it seemed, had been brought from the outside (Mr. Peel), passing over the heads of all the subordinates. That was a practice which ought rarely to be resorted to. With respect to the reduction of the expense of the library by £500, he might say that the expense of taking care of 30,000 or 40,000 books—not using them—was £1,000 a-year. That was pure waste, and if a division were taken he should support the Amendment.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he could bear witness to the willingness of the officials in the Board of Trade to assist all persons going to the Office on business. With regard to the library, he thought it would be well to unite it with the other libraries at the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, and other Departments, and to make one good library out of them all. He did not see the use of having so many libraries, particularly as no one read the books. With regard to the appointment of Mr. Peel, he could not find fault with the Board of Trade selecting the best man for the purpose; and, as to Inspectors, he had no objection to their appointment, if those who wanted them paid the expenses. There was one thing, however, he did not like, and that was the Joint-stock Registration Department, for, in his opinion, it afforded too great facilities for making companies.

COLONEL HOGG said, the Provisional Orders with regard to tramways and gas and water pipes were increasing every year, and they were required to be carried out with very great care. Dealing as he (Colonel Hogg) did with them almost daily, he must say that he had found the gentleman who had charge of that branch of the office, and whose appointment had been somewhat questioned, in every respect an excellent officer, and he hoped the Government would confirm the appointment.

MR. BAXTER said, that although there was some ground for the delay which existed in the matter, yet he could assure the House there was some excuse in the fact that the Committee which was now considering in what way that library could be utilized for the public service had had various difficulties to contend with. No good, however, could come of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bowring) pressing his Amendment to a division, which would, indeed, only tend to hamper the gentlemen who, he hoped, would soon be able to present a Report to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that would be laid before the House. With regard to the junior assistant secretary of the Railway Department, several testimonies had been borne to the ability and the valuable services of that gentleman; and the more the matter was investigated, the more the wisdom of his appointment would be shown.

MR. BOWRING said, he wished it to be distinctly understood that his complaint had not been made in any degree against any individual, but entirely against the system. He believed that Mr. Peel was an excellent public servant. With respect to the library, last year the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the matter was then under consideration; and, surely, he (Mr. Bowring) was justified in thinking that the Committee might fairly have been expected by this time to have made their Report. He would leave his Amendment wholly in the hands of the House.

MR. C. S. READ asked whether the reduction of the salaries of the Inspectors of Corn Returns would diminish the efficiency of those Returns; and whether the same Returns, under the head of Agricultural Statistics, would be continued this year?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the work in question was now done by the Excise officers, and not by those of the Board of Trade. He therefore could not give any information with respect to the last question of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. MONK asked for an explanation of an item for the expenses of the delegates attending the Metric Conference at Paris.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Conference had not been held in consequence of the Franco-German War; but it was found that certain additional instruments were required by the Standards Department, and, with the sanction of the Treasury, a small unappropriated sum was devoted to the purpose of those instruments.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,011, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Lord Privy Seal."

MR. DILLWYN, in moving the omission of the Vote, said, he, in common with many other persons, regarded it as a sinecure and useless office, which ought to be swept away; in fact, he had never heard the office itself defended on the ground that it was of any use. He knew that the argument used in favour of its retention was, that it afforded a convenient berth for a Cabinet Minister, whose services were required for the performance of other duties than those which were nominally or apparently attached to his position. He did not, however, think that was a sufficient justification for the maintenance of the office, for the decisions of the Cabinet sitting in Council were more likely to be of a practical and less of a political character the more their deliberations were conducted by Ministers who had real Departments entrusted to them. It appeared to him, therefore, it was desirable that the office should be abolished. When he brought this subject under the notice of the House last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the office on the ground that it was desirable to have a Minister in the Cabinet who could be sent from Office to Office to assist in those Departments the heads of which were overworked. It was also said that last year the Lord Privy Seal had rendered great service by enabling the Marquess of Ripon to go to America to negotiate the Washington Treaty, but the illustration was, in his opinion, not a very happy one, because had the noble Marquess remained at home, perhaps his services in this country might have been more valuable than they were in America. In short, it appeared to him that any relief to be given under such circumstances should be given in a more open and avowed manner, and that if Cabinet Ministers were overworked, it would be better to divide the work, and to appoint Ministers without portfolios to assist in getting through it. Here was a high official, with a salary of £2,000 per annum, appointed to an office which had no duties attached to it; and a chief clerk, with a salary of £250 per annum, a private secretary, an assistant clerk, and a messenger were appointed to help him to do nothing. Such an appointment was contrary to all principles that were supposed to secure efficiency and economy. The country ought to know what it got for its money, and at present there was no means of testing whether the staff of the Lord Privy Seal were under or overpaid for their services. When he brought the matter under the notice of the House of Commons last year, 44 hon. Members against 73 voted against the retention of the Office; and it was the duty of the Government to have taken some notice of this expression of opinion on the part of the House, instead of which they had sanctioned an increase of the expenses of the Office from £2,739 to £2,761. Under these circumstances, he begged to move that the whole Vote be disallowed.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that if, in a full House, the figures on a division respecting the abolition of the Lord Privy Seal's Office had stood in the proportion of 44 to 73, he should have been willing to regard it as a warning that some change should be made in the Office; but so small a division as that of last year could not be accepted as expressing accurately the deliberate balance of opinion of the Whole House. He must also say that he thought it would be a great mistake—a mistake which must inevitably give rise to great public inconvenience—if the House were to adopt the Motion; indeed, that a greater mistake could hardly be made in connection with so small a matter. His hon. Friend the Member for Swansea had said that if a Minister of State were overworked, the proper way to relieve him was to appoint a permanent Colleague to divide the labour with him; but he would point out that it was not alleged that the Members of the Government were overworked in respect to their departmental duties, but in respect of those other general duties that devolved on them as Members of the Government, and it was idle to suppose that the Foreign Secretary, for instance, could obtain relief from the pressure of business that rested on him by appointing two Foreign Secretaries instead of one. [Mr. BOUVERIE: It used to be done.] Yes; but that was at a time when the Cabinet was differently organized to what it was now, and when to see one Member of the Cabinet voting against another was a common occurrence. In our days it would be obviously impracticable to have two Foreign Secretaries. It must be borne in mind, moreover, that besides the departmental duties of a Minister he had, during the Session, to pass many hours every day in the House of Commons—a very serious duty; and allowance must also be made for the duties of the Cabinet, for those of Committees of the Cabinet, and for the preparation of Bills—because the latter was no portion of the distinctive duties of a Department. In fact, his hon. Friend would do well to open his mind to the fact that, as a whole, Ministers were not underworked but overworked; and the consequence was that their work was not so well done as it otherwise would be. There was no good policy and no economy in overwork; but it was an evil from which they suffered, and one that they could not escape from, but from which a partial escape and a very material alleviation were afforded by the existence of the office of Lord Privy Seal; indeed, he would assert that the presence of the Lord Privy Seal in the Cabinet was of the utmost value to the Government. How were Ministers, labouring hard in that House—take, for example, the Secretary for War last year—to perform the general duties of the Administration without the assistance of such a Minister as the Lord Privy Seal? The Lord Privy Seal brought a clear and disengaged mind to the general deliberations of the Cabinet—deliberations upon questions to be looked at in a multitude of different lights. Let them look back to the years 1869 and 1870, and say whether it was possible for Ministers to have discharged their business efficiently in the other House of Parliament without the able advice and assistance of Lord Halifax? The arguments against the office would also go to the extent of saying that when a Minister by temporary indisposition was unable to discharge the duties of his office he ought at once to resign; otherwise, when the head of a department became seriously ill—as in the case of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers)—the strength of the Cabinet would be seriously impaired. It was true that the Lord Privy Seal had no departmental duties to perform, but it was a great fallacy to suppose that he had no other duties. The departmental duties of a Minister were, no doubt, of great importance; but other duties performed by them were even generally of greater importance. The staff was generally so efficient and powerful that the whole available strength of the Ministers was able to be directed to those matters in which it was more needed than for the deliberations of departments, and it was to give assistance in those general duties that the office of Lord Privy Seal was of importance to the Cabinet; and the fact was, that the person filling that office could more efficiently discharge the general duties of a Minister from the fact that he was not burdened with the duties of a department. If his hon. Friend thought that the Government in regard to its aggregate weight was more powerful than the public service required, the most reasonable course to take would be to ask the House to take away some of the assistance they enjoyed. But if it were admitted that they were overweighted, then his hon. Friend might take his (Mr. Gladstone's) assurance—an assurance founded upon a long experience—that the assistance derived by the Ministry from the existence of an office of this kind was most valuable and important as regarded the discharge of the general duties of the Government.

MR. OTWAY said, he regretted he could not see the matter in the same light as that of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. There was no question but that the Ministers were hardly worked, and that it was a great benefit to them to have the assistance of an independent mind in their deliberations; but that formed no argument in favour of a useless office being retained. The present Government, on coming into office, made the most earnest professions of economy, and it was in consequence of those professions that they obtained so large a majority; but in compliance with the requirements of those professions, his right hon. Friend had not given any substantial reason for the retention of this office, or named any important duty discharged by the Lord Privy Seal. All his arguments went to show that he was a sort of "handy man," and that it was important to have his advice and assistance. He (Mr. Otway) would remind the right hon. Gentleman and the House that the country had often the advice and assistance of great statesmen in the Cabinet without salaries. He might name, for example, a former Lord Lansdowne, the late Duke of Wellington, and the present Earl Russell. He confessed he was much disappointed by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Otway) had never been an advocate for diminishing salaries, or for depriving men of the remuneration to which they were fairly entitled; but the present case was one which stood on a different footing, for in the face of those professions of economy the Government were retaining an office to which no duties attached, for the mere purpose of retaining the services of a "handy man" in the Cabinet, who was capable of affording them his advice and assistance in their general deliberations. He fully recognized the high qualifications of Lord Halifax, and believed it would be difficult to find a nobleman better versed in the duties of an Administration—indeed, he had a great respect for the noble Lord—nevertheless he saw no reason why the office of Lord Privy Seal should be retained. As to last year's division, there was a strong feeling 14 or 15 years ago for the abolition of the office, and he believed Mr. Wyse once obtained a majority, or very nearly a majority, on the question. In conclusion, he must say that he could not for such insufficient reasons as had been advanced vote with his right hon. Friend, whom he otherwise willingly followed, in favour of a useless and expensive office.

MR. BAXTER said, he had heard with great surprise the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham. He would, however, at once admit that some years ago there was a strong feeling for the abolition of the office, and that the question was once carried against the Government. That feeling, however, had changed, owing to such arguments as those urged by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, for many strong economists and advanced Liberals had seen the force of those arguments. He himself was one of them, and changed his opinion on the subject long before he became a Member of the Government. Lords Lansdowne and Russell had sat in the Cabinet without office or salary, but at that time there was a Lord Privy Seal also, the work of the Cabinet being so onerous that even his assistance was insufficient. He ventured to submit to his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea that the duties performed by the Lord Privy Seal were of a most onerous and important character, and that his hon. Friend advocated a false economy on this subject, for if his view were adopted by the Committee, the consequence would be that the country would soon have to pay for assistance to the Cabinet a much greater sum than the amount of this Vote.

Mr. Otway

MR. A. GUEST said, he quite concurred in the justice of the declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that it was of great importance to the Government that they should have the benefit of the advice of such a high authority as the Lord Privy Seal. As there were no departmental duties to be carried out in the office of the Lord Privy Seal, it might have been reasonable on the part of the hon. Member for Swansea to move a reduction of the Vote by £600, the salary of the secretary and other officials; but it was most unreasonable to move the rejection of the Vote altogether.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, that there was one aspect of the case which had not been alluded to by any hon. Member, and therefore he must trespass on the Committee for a few moments. He should be the last to deny that Ministers were overworked, or that it was desirable to have one or two Members of the Cabinet practically without portfolio, to relieve their Colleagues of a portion of their burdens. But who were the Ministers who were overworked? Were they the Ministers in the House of Lords, who, except on rare occasions, adjourned at 7 o'clock, and went home to dinner, and in due time, he hoped, to bed? No; they were the Ministers on that bench, who were all day at their Departments, and all night in the House of Commons. And yet what was done? Few had these sinecure offices—the Privy Seal and the Duchy of Lancaster—and they gave them both to Peers! He was bound to say that as long as the overworked Ministers were in that House, and the means of relieving them were carefully kept in the other, he should vote with his hon. Friend.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 193; Noes 57: Majority 136.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £14,133, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, the Vote had been condemned by economists, the Government, and the Opposition for the last seven or eight years, and yet it was still retained. It was a disgrace to their consistency and ingenuity—if not their honesty—that they should still annually pass this Vote, simply because they could not decide on a practical scheme for getting rid of it. The difficulty in dealing with it was the mode of meeting the necessary expenses, and a Resolution had last year been carried on his (Mr. A. Johnston's) Motion to the effect that the imposition of an income tax on the endowed charities of the country would furnish a fit method of meeting that difficulty. There were, however, certain objections to that method, because those beneficially interested in those charities were persons having under £100 a-year, whom it was not fair to call upon to pay income tax. But he would suggest to the Committee that it was competent for them to fall back upon a tax against which no such objection could be alleged—he meant the legacy and succession duties. The Vote which the Committee was asked to pass constituted in reality a very small portion of the cost of the Commission, which was not to be computed at less than £50,000 a-year, and if the legacy and succession duties were extended to those, and also to other corporate properties, a large amount of property would be reached which had no pretence to be called a charity of any kind. For instance, the halls and other property belonging to the City companies escaped the succession duty. It was true they claimed to hold a portion of their property for charitable purposes, but there was really no pretence for claiming exemption under such a ground. He begged in conclusion to say that he should oppose the Vote.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it was unnecessary then to go into the broad question of taxing charities, still less the imposition of any income tax on their property. There was an increase in the Vote this year of £677 which required explanation, and also why the Resolution with reference to this subject passed in 1868 had not been carried into effect. He should like to know from the Government whether they had any proposal to submit to the House on the subject?

MR. CADOGAN joined in the hope that the Government would be able to reduce this Vote, if not abolish it. There was no reason why charities representing such enormous sums of money should get their work done at the expense of the country.

MR. BAXTER said, he was not at all surprised at the objection to this Vote, for he himself was opposed to it strongly, and he was sorry that his official position rendered it necessary that he should defend it. The increase in the Vote arose from the additional work of the office, from the fact of there being upwards of £4,000,000 to be dealt with. He admitted that, after the strong opinion pronounced by the House of Commons, the Government, when time and opportunity offered, were bound to propose a scheme for throwing the expense of this Charity Commission upon the charities themselves; but, at the same time, any scheme of that sort was not likely to pass through the House of Commons sub silentio, and time and opportunity had not yet offered for a measure on the subject—a result at which he confessed his own personal disappointment. If the hon. Member for South Essex would have a little more patience, he had no doubt that before long the hon. Gentleman would find that his views would be carried out.

MR. HUNT said, he was afraid the hon. Gentleman would have to exercise a great deal of patience on the subject before that event would take place. He (Mr. Hunt) had brought forward this question in 1869, when a debate of a somewhat acrimonious character occurred; he hoped, however, that the spirit of that debate would not be imported into the present one. It was then pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had pledged himself in 1868 to the principle now assented to by the Secretary to the Treasury; but the present Government had been in office for some years, and if they had done nothing hitherto, when could any measure be hoped for from them? This was not a question of putting an income tax on charities, but of making charities pay for their own administration—a much smaller question. Any such measure should have his hearty support, and he did not believe the House generally would dissent from it.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, the Secretary to the Treasury was rather given to feel strong objections to things, but he never removed what he objected to. If the Government would only turn their attention to the subject, he felt certain they would be able to find some remedy. His objection was not to the office, but he thought the State ought to have, at least for management, a commission on the £4,000,000 and upwards which the Charity Commissioners managed at an expense to the State of £18,000 a-year. Such an office did a great deal of good, but it ought to be self-supporting.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question was narrowed to a single point, and it was but natural that hon. Members should express their opinion upon it as they had done. They had to consider how best they could make the charities for which the Commissioners did their work, pay for it themselves, and not the taxpayers of the country. The subject had been well considered, but descending from generalities, he had not been able to see—nor did he know anyone who had been able to see—how it could be done. The Charity Commission was a very peculiar office. It really did the charity business formerly done by the Court of Chancery, conducting this business in the most simple and patriarchal manner. It was guided by no rules of evidence; it obtained its information through letters, or inquiries made by its own Inspectors; it heard no counsel; there was nothing formal in its proceedings; and it was exceedingly difficult to see how you could fasten a system of fees upon a procedure of this kind. Again, that being a voluntary jurisdiction, if they were to load it with fees, they would stop the immense amount of good which was being done. It rested generally with the trustees of charities whether they would go before that tribunal or not; and the effect of its action being frequently to limit the power of trustees, and force on them things which they did not like, if a tax were put on those proceedings, it would always be in the power of trustees to say they could not find the money for them. With regard to the £4,000,000 placed in the hands of the Commissioners, for instance, that was entirely a voluntary proceeding on the part of trustees. It was most desirable for the sake of the charities that that money should be placed in safe custody; but supposing the money so placed were to be taxed while those who did not put it in such keeping were untaxed, that would counteract the very object for which the Board was established. Therefore, he was most unwillingly driven to the conclusion that it was not in the way of fees upon the money or property administered under the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners that they could possibly raise the sum which was required. The only mode of doing it was, as suggested by the hon. Member for South Essex, by putting something in the shape of a succession duty, or an income tax on charities. They had had some experience of the difficulties of such matters; and if the Government, with the numerous other subjects they had in hand, had not embarked on that further sea of troubles, they might, he thought, be pardoned, because there was no question in the whole region of politics on which the opinion of the country was so far behind, and so little prepared to grasp true principles as that of dealing with charities, and there was none, too, on which they were so sure to receive from all quarters—no doubt from the best feeling and with the utmost sincerity—a blind, bigoted, and pertinacious opposition. Therefore, there was nothing for them but to go on a little longer, hoping the public would come to take a sounder view of that subject, and until the mind of the community arrived at the conviction that the world was made for the living and not for the dead, he despaired of carrying any large or reasonable measure on that matter.

Mr. Hunt

MR. CANDLISH said, he thought the Government, with so ingenious a Chancellor of the Exchequer, might easily discover some mode of getting rid of a tax which was of no particular credit to the nation. He trusted the hon. Member for South Essex would not divide the House, but would, early next Session, move for a Committee on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government were perfectly in earnest in the opinion they had expressed; but they felt that the House could not now spare the time which would be required for giving effect to them; at the proper time, however, they would be prepared to do so. If the hon. Gentleman could forward the matter through a Committee, however, the Government would give him every assistance.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he did not wish to cut down the expenses of the Commission—in fact, they ought to be very much increased, and the Commission made more powerful and effective; but he objected to the way in which they were raised.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £12,166, to complete the sum for the Civil Service Commission.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked for explanation as to the amount, as he had some doubt as to whether the number of Civil servants employed by the Commission was not too great.

MR. BAXTER said, that no fewer than 18,022 persons applied to be examined last year by the Civil Service Commission, and on the suggestion of the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. Cubitt), a circular was sent to each of the disappointed candidates; but as they numbered upwards of 12,500, a considerable expense was incurred. He could not hold out the hope that the expenses of the Department would be reduced.

MR. CUBITT said, that the complaints which had induced him to make the proposition had since ceased; but inasmuch as each candidate paid, he believed, £1, he did not think that the Minister could grudge 2*d.* to him to inform him of the result of his application.

MR. BAXTER said, it added greatly to the work of the office.

MR. RYLANDS pointed out that if each candidate paid £1, it would more than cover the whole expense of the Commission.

MR. BAXTER said, that it was a mistake, 5*s.* only being paid.

MR. RYLANDS said, that even that fee would make a large portion of the Vote. He would recommend the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary to look a little more carefully into the Votes for the future. Putting all that on one side, however, he must say that he believed the Commission to be a very efficient one.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £14,083, to complete the sum for the Office of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions.

MR. BOWRING said, he must complain of the manner in which the accounts relating to this Vote were kept, which prevented the receipts of the Commission being compared with its expenses, so that no one could tell whether or not it was self supporting.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he must complain of the long delay in producing the promised Enclosure Bill. He would like to know whether it was the intention of the Government to bring in a measure dealing with enclosures during the present Session?

MR. LEEMAN said, that while there were at that moment no less than 8,000,000 acres of unenclosed land existing in the country to its great loss, yet the Office of the Enclosure Commissioners had been practically shut up during the last two years. It was, therefore, urgently necessary that some immediate steps should be taken by the Government towards legislating on the subject.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he concurred in the remark just made, and thought that while it was desirable the waste lands in country districts should be enclosed, great care should be taken in the enclosure of commons in the neighbourhood of large towns, that ample ground should be appropriated for the recreation of the people. In the Fell country, there was the greatest confusion among agriculturists from want of enclosures, no man being able to claim his own rights.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, that enclosures had chiefly been resisted, because a disposition was shown to deprive the labouring classes of recreation grounds. For that reason, he thought that in the enclosure of waste lands provision should be made so as to enable the labourers to obtain a portion of them for cultivation.

MR. BRUCE said, that when the Government had introduced Bills on this subject they had met with considerable opposition in some quarters, on the ground that the measures did not do enough for the people, and in others on the ground that they did too much for them. The only reason for the delay in the introduction of a measure on the subject during the present Session was, that it was impossible to put aside larger measures in order to make way for an Inclosure Bill. The Government intended to bring in a Bill on the subject as soon as possible.

MR. LEEMAN said, he would suggest that the subject was one to which the other House might beneficially turn their attention.

MR. CUBITT, said, he regarded the want of accurate information on the subject as being the great obstacle to the passing of an Inclosure Bill, and thought they could deal much better with the question when the promised Bill came before them.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped the Government would take care in Inclosure Bills of the interests of the great mass of the people.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £7,750, to complete the sum for the Imprest Expenses under the Inclosure and Drainage Acts.

(7.) £28,506, to complete the sum for the Department of the Comptroller and Auditor General of the Exchequer.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that the recent defalcation of about £8,000 at South Kensington ought to have been discovered sooner.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £48,538, to complete the sum for the Department of the Registrar General of Births, &c. in England.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked when the further Report of the Census would be published?

MR. BAXTER said, he could not give a precise answer; but believed the Report would not be long delayed.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £11,181, to complete the sum for the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England.

(10.) £13,377, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

(11.) £20,428, to complete the sum for the Charges connected with the Patent Law Amendment Act.

MR. HINDE PALMER, in commenting on the £3,450 paid to ex-Law Officers of Scotland and Ireland as compensation, said, that while the Patent Commission consisted nominally of the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the Law Officers of the Crown for England, Scotland, and Ireland, in consequence of the numerous engagements of the Commissioners, the duties devolved practically on Mr. Woodcroft, the Secretary to the Commission. The Master of the Rolls had himself stated that the present Commission was worse than nothing; and the Select Committee which had lately inquired into that subject had recommended that some practical and scientific men should be added. There was £60,000 a-year available for the establishment of a good, permanent Museum of Patents, instead of the temporary shed at South Kensington, where they were kept in such a state that it was impossible to make any use of them. In fact, the Museum of Patents was in a most disgraceful condition, having regard to the eminence this country had attained in practical inventions. Models of inventions were huddled together at the Museum in such a manner that inventors or people of science could not discover the nature of those inventions or the machinery by which they were carried into effect, and, therefore, could not obtain from them any guide whatever as to the taking out of patents for the future. As one of the Members of the Select Committee, he had thought it his duty to call attention to that state of things.

Mr. Bruce

MR. F. S. POWELL regretted that on the subject of the Patent Museum the Government still halted between two courses. He feared, however, the Government would find it impracticable to establish in this country such a Patent Museum as the very valuable one at Washington, in consequence of the vast number of English inventions.

MR. BAXTER said, the Government had been waiting for the decision of the Select Committee, whose Report, he believed, was not printed till last month. It would be the duty of the Government carefully to examine that most valuable Report during the summer.

MR. MACFIE said, he hoped the Government would consider how the Commission could be made a real working Commission; not merely in the interest of inventors, but of the trade of the United Kingdom.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, it was extravagant to vote so much money for the Patent Office, when the Master of the Rolls said the whole work could be done by one clerk. He also thought it desirable that the Patent Commission should consist of practical men connected with manufactures.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £18,841, to complete the sum for the Department of the Paymaster General in London and Dublin.

In answer to Mr. RYLANDS,

MR. BAXTER explained that formerly certain officials connected with the assessing and collecting of the income tax in Government Departments were paid by poundage; but it was now proposed to alter that system, and pay the officials by salary only. That had rendered it necessary to make an addition of 8 per cent to the present rate of remuneration.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £239,849, to complete the sum for the Local Government Board.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he wished to call attention to the reduction of the salary of the Medical Officer of Health from £2,000 to £1,500, and to the valuable Report of Dr. Buchanan upon the health of the operatives employed in the weaving trade. Other factory operatives suffered from the dust scattered through the rooms, and their health was also affected by the emanations of gases and other impurities generated during the process of manufacture. He therefore trusted that the medical men at the disposal of the Department would be directed to make other investigations of the same useful kind. It was, he added, of vital importance to the artisan population in manufacturing districts that the system of inspection of workshops, &c., should be efficiently carried out; but, by making unnecessary exemptions and otherwise, the Government had, during the last two years, inaugurated a policy in this matter which was inimical to the interests of the labouring classes.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he must deny that the policy of the Government had been unfriendly to the factory operatives. The exemptions granted under the Workshops Act were not granted without cause. He could only meet a general statement by a general denial; but not one exemption was ever allowed, except after careful inquiry by the sub-Inspector, the Inspector, and, at all events, the Under Secretary of State. It was necessary that some elasticity should be given to the operation of the

VOL. CXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Workshops Act, which would otherwise be wholly unworkable.

MR. STANSFELD explained that the salary of the Medical Officer of Health had been raised two years ago from £1,500 to £2,000; but the Treasury on a subsequent consideration of the Act of Parliament under which he was appointed, thought it desirable to take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the legality of the increase, and they were ultimately advised that it was contrary to the Act.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £16,467, to complete the sum for the Public Record Office.

MR. PIM said, he would suggest that means should be taken to render the interesting publications issued by this Department more generally useful.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he thought that any surplus copies of the public statutes should be sent to our public libraries in large towns.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he wished to express his extreme gratitude to the Master of the Rolls for having devoted his careful, determined, and learned attention to our ancient records, with the view of making the country acquainted with them. If copies of these records were sold by the Government even at a loss, the result would be a gain to the country.

MR. BAXTER, in reply to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), said, he could promise that the subject should not be lost sight of.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £2,993, to complete the sum for the Establishments under the Public Works Loan Commissioners and the West India Islands Relief Commissioners.

MR. CANDLISH said, he would suggest that the Department should be made self-supporting.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was apprehensive that mischief would arise from an attempt to make the Department self-supporting.

MR. BAXTER having pointed out how small a sum was now asked for compared with the amount of work done.

Vote agreed to.

3 D

(16.) £1,619, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Registrars of Friendly Societies.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply to Mr. CANDLISH, said, that the Commission on Friendly Societies, which was appointed in 1869, not having yet made their Report, the Government were not in a position to introduce a measure on the subject.

Vote agreed to.

(17.) £297,658, to complete the sum for Stationery, Printing, Binding, &c.

MR. PIM said, he would suggest that a considerable sum might be saved by printing the Reports of Committees without the minutes of evidence.

MR. MACFIE said, that a large profit was derived from *The Gazette*s. Having regard to the object of those publications, and the splendid field they opened up as an advertising medium, he thought they should be sold at cost price, and that they should be issued more frequently. He would suggest that *The London, Dublin, and Edinburgh Gazette*s should form one national Gazette; and that before waste returns were sold as waste paper they should be advertised, so that some bookseller might purchase at a low rate those documents which were most valuable to the public, but of which the public were not aware in consequence of their not being advertised. He must say that the steel pens supplied to that House were the worst supplied anywhere.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £18,727, to complete the sum for the Offices of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, &c.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that the promised information with reference to the New Forest had not been given this year. The gross receipts were put down at £12,824, and the expenditure at £12,081, leaving the net receipts at £743. Minute details were given of the expenses of management of the office connected with land revenue and mines, but there were no details of the revenue derived from the rents of houses. He wished to know under whose management the Department was, because the office of Woods, &c., had never been very celebrated for the advantageous leasing of property belonging to the Crown in the neighbourhood of the Thames Embankment. He should like to know what plan had been adopted for turning to good account that most valuable piece of land lying between the Thames Embankment and Whitehall, and extending nearly from Northumberland House to the Duke of Buccleuch's, the leases of the houses on the land having already expired? It had been suggested that a new street should be constructed from opposite the Horse Guards to the Thames Embankment; but as the Woods and Forests said it should be constructed at the expense of the public by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and as they declined to make it, it had not been made. There ought to be a searching inquiry into the system of management by the Woods and Forests, who ought not to be allowed to act without reference to public improvements. So large was the amount of property under the care of the Commissioners that the House ought to inquire whether they really afforded facilities for making public improvements, instead of simply endeavouring to realize as much money from the estates as they possibly could. They were, in fact, a subordinate department of the Government, though they acted as if they were independent of the control both of the Government and of that House.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he was often asked what the "Woods and Forests" were, but he was never able to tell. He was always being told what mischief the Woods and Forests were doing, and he replied that perhaps it was so. He would at once admit that the Thames Embankment was a grand improvement, but he could not refrain from telling what he heard outside the House respecting a lease which it was said the Crown had granted to a great personage who had a river frontage, and whose house, to the astonishment of the public, had lately been very much improved. That river frontage was nothing but a mud bank; yet he was informed that £18,000 had been paid as compensation to that great personage, and that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests represented the Crown in the matter, and granted the lease. He feared that the Woods and Forests would always obstruct any improvement which might be beneficial to the public, in consequence of its peculiar constitution. It was not the duty of those who represented the Crown interests, which were no more than public interests, to look at the "cost money principle;" but they should consider what was for the benefit of the public, whom they really represented.

MR. GOLDNEY complained that no adequate information was furnished to the public as to what the land revenues of the Crown, consisted in, and the nature of the duties performed by the Woods and Forests. Some alteration ought, he thought, to be made in that respect. He also wished to call attention to the last item in the Vote—namely, the expenses of the Office of Land Record and Enrolments, and would ask for some information on it, the last Report having been made in 1796?

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked whether any plan had been made for the purpose of laying out the property opposite the Public Offices for the benefit of the Crown and the Land Revenues?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there was no plan at present, and it was uncertain how long the Government would retain it. He would adopt Mr. Goldney's suggestion, and give some information in the Votes next year as to the work of the Land Record Office.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE remarked that Mr. Pennethorne had made a plan before he left office which had not been carried out.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £29,757, to complete the sum for the Office of Works and Public Buildings.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked for an explanation as to an order which it appeared had been issued by the First Commissioner of Works, not to light the Library of the House with candles. Gas, he said, might do very well for youthful, but might be found inconvenient to old, eyes.

MR. AYRTON said, he had issued no order on the subject himself. An experiment of lighting one room of the Library with gas, on an improved principle, was being tried, but if hon. Members could not see to read, it was very little consequence what light they had. He believed that the new gaslights enabled people who were blessed with good sight to read the smallest print.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN thought that gaslight was somewhat objectionable to many persons who had to read or write under it.

MR. WHITWELL, referring to the sum of £2,000 for the cost of the Solicitor's department, asked whether a considerable saving might not be effected by consolidating the legal departments of the several public offices?

MR. AYRTON said, he was afraid it was impossible to decrease that expenditure. A vast deal of legal work had to be done in consequence of the power vested in the Office of Works to acquire land by compulsion, and the advice of counsel had constantly to be resorted to in the investigation of titles, conveyancing, &c., and many questions arose in reference to the settlement of contracts. If they had one legal staff to do the legal business of all the Government Offices, questions would arise as to the precedence to be given to the work required for particular Offices, and he feared such a system was hardly practicable. The legal adviser of that Department and his clerks were very fully occupied.

MR. OTWAY said, he objected to the employment of Government writers at so small a payment as 5s. a-day. He wished to ask whether, if these writers were unemployed for a day, their pay of 5s. was deducted? It must be remembered that no pension was allowed to them—no provision of any sort; and he should be glad to know how the matter stood in reference to the deduction of the day's pay?

MR. AYRTON said, that these writers were persons who copied. They were not clerks, but mere mechanics. Their occupation was mechanical, and, whether they were paid by the day or by the folio, they were usually paid simply according to the amount of work done. They were not on the permanent establishment of the Government, and, of course, when not employed they were not paid, just like other workmen.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he thought the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was not quite satisfactory. The real fact was, that many of these writers—whatever the nominal tenure of their office—were employed from day to day, and from week to week, and from year to year, and had been so employed for many years. It was not surprising, then, that these persons—whom one was not accustomed to hear called “mechanics”—should feel aggrieved at their present position.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought that the simplest way would be for the Government, when it required the services of these persons, to contract with any law stationer for the number required at the regular price of 5s. per day.

MR. BOWRING said, that not only had many of the writers entered the public service with the expectation of regular employment, but that lately the salary of various writers of whom he had personal knowledge had actually been reduced, and if they had declined to accept it dismissal was their only alternative.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply to the observation of the hon. Member for Exeter, said, the salaries of the writers had not been reduced.

ALDERMAN SIR JAMES LAWRENCE said, on the contrary, that instances had been communicated to him of writers whose salaries had been permanently reduced, and who were now paid less than they were paid some time ago. He could inform the right hon. Gentleman of three instances in confidence, and withholding the names of the persons.

MR. OTWAY said, that he had information similar to that of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. He must say also that he had never heard the term “mechanic” applied before to educated gentlemen who discharged duties in Government Offices. These writers used to be allowed a certain portion of leave, which was now withheld, and he did think that that indulgence might be restored to them, for they were a class least able to protect themselves, and their case was a very hard one.

Vote agreed to.

(20.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £18,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services.”

MR. RYLANDS said, he might remind the Committee that this Vote stood now in a different position from that which it had occupied in former years.

Mr. Sclater-Booth

The expenditure of Secret Service money had been brought under the operation of the Exchequer and Audit Act, and in consequence of pressure put upon the Foreign Office, the unexpended balance of former years, amounting altogether to £27,000, had been surrendered to the Exchequer. In the present Estimate, also, there was a reduction of £900, in consequence of the salaries paid to Mr. Hammond and the Oriental Interpreter having been withdrawn from the Vote. That was, no doubt, an improved state of things; but he considered the expenditure of Secret Service money so objectionable in practice, that he should ask the Committee to put a stop to it. It appeared to be the custom of the Foreign Department for Ministers abroad to draw bills from time to time on account of Secret Service money; and so long as they kept within the usual amounts, no inquiry was made, but for any extraordinary expenditure some explanation would be required. That system was obviously open to abuse, and, no doubt, led at the various Missions to unnecessary and wasteful expenditure, within the limits in which the payments would be passed without check or inquiry. He asked the Committee to consider what were the objects for which Secret money might be required. There were objects which might be openly avowed—the salaries, for instance, of naval and military attachés appointed to make inquiries—about which there need be no disguise—respecting the naval and military operations of foreign Powers. So, also, inquiries as to any matters of general interest connected with public proceedings of foreign Governments, upon which special agents might be engaged, ought to be placed on the Estimates without any attempt at concealment. But it would no doubt be urged that our Government might properly seek to obtain information likely to be of importance to our interests, but which it might be the policy of foreign Governments to keep secret. He did not think that in the present state of our foreign relations, and of our avowed foreign policy, there could be any secret plans of foreign Governments that it was necessary for us to take extraordinary measures to find out; and even if it were necessary to take any such extraordinary means, he was quite satisfied that we should never succeed by spending

£10,000, or £20,000 a-year of Secret Service money. With our present foreign policy, Secret Service money was an anachronism—it belonged to the days of the “meddling-and-muddling” policy of Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell. We now professed the doctrine of non-intervention in the dynastic arrangements of Europe, and we did not seek to interfere with the domestic policy or territorial changes of any of the States. If any secret intrigues on such matters existed, they did not concern our interests. So also with trade questions. We now rested upon a Free Trade policy. We had no favour to ask, and had no interests to promote as opposed to other nations. The Prime Minister in his speech at the Mansion House had held forth the great object of our foreign policy to be to create in the minds of other people the belief that we were impartial, and aimed at the noblest and highest objects, and that our policy was not governed by base or narrow motives of selfishness. Nothing could be more calculated to create this confidence than to let foreign Governments know that we seek to promote no objects by intrigue, or secret corruption, or by immoral means. If we were unfortunately involved in a European war such as that against the First Napoleon, no doubt there might be some reason for expending Secret Service money. But he believed that even at that period of our history, there was great abuse and peculation, and that the value of Secret Service money had been exaggerated. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. V. Harcourt) said the other evening that the £40,000 paid out of the Secret Service money for a copy of the Treaty of Tilsit was well expended. It was supposed that that large sum of money was paid by the British Ambassador to the mistress of the Russian Minister for a surreptitious copy of the Treaty—but he was not aware that the alleged transaction was authenticated in history. He suspected that the account was mythical, except in relation to the £40,000, which was, no doubt, drawn out of the Secret Service money by some person. But what he contended was that, even if the account were true, the early possession of the copy of the Treaty could be of no use to England, when the great fact of the submission of Russia to Napoleon must have been immediately known to all the world. He should like to know how the possession of the copy of the Treaty of Tilsit enabled England to oppose with greater effect the results necessarily flowing from the alliance of Russia with France. But he need not press further the consideration as to the use of Secret Service money in times of war—they were fortunately not at war, and not likely to be—and he contended, therefore, that there was no excuse for spending Secret Service money, because there was nothing for us to find out that would not come to us in other ways. The late Lord Clarendon said in the House of Lords, in May, 1866, that—“There is now little of that secret diplomacy which in former days so much prevailed. There is on the part of every Government—such is the force of public opinion—so great an anxiety to appeal to it, and obtain its support, that despatches of the most important character and entailing the gravest consequences are no sooner delivered than they are published.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 572.]

That was, in fact, the whole gist of the question; and he (Mr. Rylands) went further, and said that, tested by experience, it had been proved that the employment of Secret Service money had during the past 20 years been a failure. He challenged the Foreign Office to show that during that period they had obtained priority of information by the employment of Secret Service money, or gained by it any single important object of national interest. Let them grant a small Select Committee of that House to make a secret and confidential inquiry into the expenditure, and the whole thing would be exploded. He could tell them what they had not done. They had never found out the negotiations between France and Prussia several years since, which were continued for some time, and which culminated in the draft treaty drawn up by Benedetti and Bismarck, the existence of which was never suspected by the Foreign Office until the intelligence in The Times one morning startled the country, and no one more so than the Foreign Secretary himself. Probably it might not have been very material for them to know what Benedetti and Bismarck were plotting; but, at least, it would have prevented Lord Stanley convening the Conference in London in 1867 on the Luxemburg question, and being entrapped into joining a Treaty of Guarantee which might have involved this country in some complication, under the impression that the dispute as to Luxemburg was the only occasion of difference between France and Prussia, whilst, in fact, it was the mere fringe of a much wider divergence of interests, and of a serious antagonism of policy. He would ask, in conclusion, why these payments for Secret Service should be continued? They might be used as bribes to unscrupulous persons, whose information was very unreliable; or they might be given to people in exchange for no value at all. In any case, he thought the existence of such payments was discreditable to the Government of this country, and that they ought to be discontinued. With that view he would beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £8,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for Her Majesty’s Foreign and other Secret Services.”—(Mr. Rylands.)

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington had adopted a somewhat different course with regard to the Secret Service Vote from what he did in the previous Session. Last Session his hon. Friend said that if he (Lord Enfield) could assure him that the money was properly expended, he would never question the Vote again, and he was good enough to accept his assurance. This evening he took a different line on a very fair ground—namely, that the expenditure of Secret Service money was altogether alien to the spirit of the age, and asked him whether during the last 20 years the Foreign Office had derived any advantage and information from the expenditure of the money. He need hardly remind his hon. Friend that he had occupied his position in the Foreign Office only 18 months, and therefore he could not give any account on that subject with reference to a period before he became connected with the Foreign Office. But during the time had been in the Foreign Office he believed that some valuable information had been obtained through the expenditure of Secret Service money, and that the same thing could be said for the other 18½ years. The question before the Committee was a very simple one. For many years past the Secretary of State had thought it not unfair to demand that he should be entrusted with a certain sum of money for the purpose of being expended in obtaining such information as he thought advisable from different parts of the Continent. At the end of the financial year the Secretary of State had to render an account to the Treasury of the money that had been expended. It rested with the Treasury to decide how the money should be expended. This Estimate had been reduced during the last three years by £10,000. He believed the amount that would be required this year by the Secretary of State was £15,000. If the Committee thought that money ought not to be entrusted to the Secretary of State, in order to obtain most valuable information and for the management of his Department, let it be so. He merely asked the Committee to remember how often the House of Commons had entrusted Secretaries of State with money for these purposes, and hoped the Committee would support the Vote.

Mr. Rylands

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 166: Majority 131.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(21.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £4,667, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer in the Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly paid from the Hereditary Revenue.”

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he should like to know how it was that this year they were asked to vote a sum for Queen’s Plates in Scotland, seeing that a similar Vote was struck out of the Estimates two years ago? He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £197 13s.—the sum asked for a Queen’s Plate to be run for at Edinburgh, and a Queen’s Plate for the Caledonian Hunt.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Item of £218, for the Queen’s Plates, be reduced by the sum of £197 13s.”—(Mr. Lusk.)

MR. BAXTER said, his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury asked him why this Vote had been struck out of the Estimates. It was struck out in consequence of the representations made by the Scotch Members who were present in the House two years ago. The Vote on that occasion received no support, and the then Secretary of the Treasury withdrew it; but since then it had been represented to the Government by a considerable majority of the Scotch Members, that they did not approve of the statement which was then made in their name, and the Government, considering that it was a small matter, and that a sum of money was voted annually for a like purpose in Ireland, acceded to the wishes of the majority of the Scotch Representatives, and restored the Vote in the Estimates.

MR. A. JOHNSTON, referring to a sum of £719 for the Lyon King at Arms and Heralds' Office, wished to know whether it was really the case that they were asked to vote this money to facilitate rich gentlemen, who had made money at Glasgow and Galashiels, being granted coats of arms, or whether any of this sum was returned into the Treasury in the shape of fees? He had been weak enough once to write to the Lyon King at Arms in Scotland to ask some question respecting his family bearings, and he immediately received a demand of 12s. for an answer, so that he supposed there really was a return of fees; but, if so, why was it not stated on the Vote as in the case of other Votes?

MR. M'LAREN said, he should support the Amendment which had been moved to reduce the Vote by the amount asked for the Queen's Plates. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had said that a considerable majority of the Scotch Members had asked that this Vote should be restored, because they did not agree with the statement made in their name when it was first struck out of the Estimates. Now, he (Mr. M'Laren) was present when it was first struck off. He took part in the discussion on that occasion, and he was not aware that any statement whatever was made in their name. All Members present from Scotland who spoke on that occasion spoke against the Vote. There was no person lifted his voice in favour of it, and there certainly was no statement made by any person professing to have authority from any other person, but all present disapproved of the Vote, and it was withdrawn. He held there was no reason whatever for putting it in again; and assuming it to be a fact that a majority of Scotch Members had asked that this Vote should be restored, he was quite sure that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury would not venture to say that the majority of the people of Scotland or the majority of the people of Edinburgh—where one of the plates was run for—were in favour of it. He believed that if heads were counted in Scotland a very small minority indeed would be found to support this Vote. He objected to it as a waste of public money.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he thought that the Government had gone a little too far, for the Vote having been once withdrawn, a better reason than that alleged by the Secretary of the Treasury should have been given for its re-appearance in the Estimates.

MR. ANDERSON said, he should like to know how the Government arrived at the conclusion that the majority of the Scotch Members were in favour of this Vote. His objection to these plates was that they were granted out of money voted by Parliament, whereas the English plates came out of the Civil List, and were really Queen's Plates. He had not the slightest objection to the Queen giving plates in Scotland and Ireland also; but he entirely objected to the Queen giving plates in England, and making Parliament give them in Scotland and Ireland.

MR. MACFIE said, he had to thank Her Majesty's Government for what they had done in this matter. There was a feeling amongst the Scotch Members of something like indignation, that what they had enjoyed for centuries, and which was formerly paid out of the hereditary revenues of Scotland, should have been suddenly withdrawn. If the Queen's Plates were taken away from Ireland, they would have no objection to cast their lot in with the sister country. He thought it particularly his duty to thank Her Majesty's Government for restoring this Vote, inasmuch as for one or two years the Queen's Plate had been run for within the limits of the burgh which he had the honour to represent.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he objected to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) for proposing to discontinue the Vote for Ireland. If this Vote were so very distasteful to the people of Scotland, let the money be given to Ireland, where it would be received with gratitude.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 78; Noes 116: Majority 38.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he would move to reduce the whole Vote by £719, that being the amount required for the office of Lord Lyon King-at-Arms in Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £3,948, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer in the Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly paid from the Hereditary Revenue.”—(Mr. Andrew Johnston.)

MR. BAXTER explained that the fees paid into the office and received by the Treasury were quite sufficient to cover the expense, and that therefore no reasonable ground of objection could be stated against the Vote.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, he was satisfied with the explanation of the hon. Gentleman, and would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(22.) £7,178, to complete the sum for the General Register Office and Census, Scotland.

(23.) £4,471, to complete the sum for the Board of Lunacy, Scotland.

(24.) £13,366, to complete the sum for the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, Scotland.

(25.) £4,907, to complete the sum for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, &c.

(26.) £20,539, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(27.) £250, to complete the sum for the Expenses of the Boundary Survey, Ireland.

(28.) £1,608, to complete the sum for the Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

(29.) £25,375, to complete the sum for the General Register Office and Census, Ireland.

(30.) £76,580, to complete the sum for the Poor Law Commission, Ireland.

(31.) £3,576, to complete the sum for the Public Record Office, &c., Ireland.

(32.) £20,399, to complete the sum for the Office of Works, Ireland.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £37,255, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for Law Charges, and for the Salaries, Allowances, and Incidental Expenses, including Prosecutions relating to Coin, in the Department of the Solicitor for the Affairs of Her Majesty’s Treasury.”

MR. WEST said, he should move to reduce the amount by £2,500. Twenty years ago the Solicitorship to the Mint was abolished, but the patronage in respect to it was maintained. Not only that, but the Mint prosecutions carried on of recent years were very small indeed, and badly conducted, and it was recommended by a Committee that those coin prosecutions should be given up. He proposed, therefore, to reduce the Vote by £2,500, charged for legal expenses.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £34,755, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for Law Charges, and for the Salaries, Allowances, and Incidental Expenses, including Prosecutions relating to Coin, in the Department of the Solicitor for the Affairs of Her Majesty’s Treasury.”

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he had also to complain that the conduct of the Mint prosecutions was usually given to young men, who practically had no experience whatever at sessions, and that the remuneration they received was excessive as compared with what they would receive for other cases.

MR. CRAUFURD defended the manner in which Mint prosecutions were conducted, and thought that it was rather for the Attorney General, and not for the House, to determine the amount of fees that ought to be paid to the counsel who were engaged in them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Attorney General was the person who could give the most satisfactory account of the matter; and as his hon. and learned Friend was not here he would move that Progress be reported.

Motion agreed to.

To report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

BISHOPS RESIGNATION ACT (1869) PERPETUATION BILL [Lords].—[BILL 137.]

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [4th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." —(Mr. Dickinson.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and the importance of the Question must be my excuse for putting it at this late hour (5 minutes past 12). I wish to ask him, whether he is in receipt of any intelligence upon the American question? ["Order, order!"]—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will have another opportunity of putting the Question when the usual Motion is made for the Adjournment of the House.

MR. OSBORNE: I am not going to put the Question upon the Bishops Resignation Bill. I only wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is in receipt of intelligence on the American question? There is a statement to be made in "another place," and it is only proper that this House should have an explanation upon this most important subject. ["Order, order!"]—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in Order in putting the Question at the present time.

MR. OSBORNE: Then I will put it on the Order of the Day.

MR. MONK said, he would appeal to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Dickinson) to withdraw his Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, and would suggest to the Prime Minister that the operation of the Bill should be limited to three years. He had also an objection as to the amount of payment to be made to the diocesan of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would state that the diocesan acting for the Archbishop of Canterbury would receive £4,000 a-year for performing not primatial, but diocesan duties. He would at once admit that there were one or two points on which the Bill wanted consideration, and that, therefore, he should be perfectly willing to limit the operation of the Bill, but not, he thought, to so short a period as three years. He would suggest that the Bill should be read the second time, and that the Committee upon it should be postponed until there was time to consider those matters.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he hoped it was not intended to make the Bishops and clergy a distinct class by such measures as this. The Bishops and clergy taught the laity that it was their duty to provide for their old age out of their incomes, and he was sure they would be the last persons to say that the same rule should not be applied to themselves.

MR. DICKINSON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 20th June.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL. (Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter.)

[BILL 106.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. OSBORNE: I believe, Sir, that I am now in Order. I wish to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government is in receipt of intelligence, and whether he can conveniently communicate it, with reference to the American negotiations? ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: On going into Committee of Supply, Supply Bills, or Ways and Means Bills, the hon. Gentleman would be quite in Order in putting his Question; but this is the Committee upon a Bill relating to Customs and Inland Revenue, and it is not in Order to raise a discussion not relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill.

MR. OSBORNE: The question is, that you, Sir, leave the Chair.

MR. HUNT: I believe that this is a Bill to impose taxes on Her Majesty's subjects; and I thought it was the constitutional privilege of the Members of this House to satisfy themselves on such an occasion of the state of public affairs. Now this is, I understand, an important matter between the United States Government and this country; and on that principle I should have thought that the Question of the hon. Gentleman might be put. I do not wish, Sir, to question your ruling, but I should like to have the principle laid down.

MR. OSBORNE: There is a new tax involved in Clause 5. I am extremely unwilling to embarrass the Government by putting my Question, and, if the right hon. Gentleman will only say that it is not convenient to answer it, I will not press it. I wish to ask him whether he is in receipt of intelligence as to the present state of the American negotiations?

MR. GLADSTONE: I understand that I am not at liberty to enter into that subject; but my hon. Friend will have an opportunity by-and-by, and I do not think he will lose anything by postponing his Question till the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Exemption of husbandry carts and horses used on Sunday, &c., from duty under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14).

MR. BROGDEN moved, in page 3, line 30, to insert the words "trade or" before "husbandry," to meet the case of those persons who required the use of their horses and carts on Sunday to convey their families to church.

Mr. Osborne

MR. MACFIE proposed to alter the Amendment by introducing the words "or trade carried on in country places."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the purpose of the clause was to give effect to the wish that had been so frequently expressed in that House—that horses used in the country for conveying the owner's family to church should not be taxed, but it was now proposed to extend it to trade horses. The same reason for exemption, however, in the latter case did not exist, because generally speaking persons engaged in trade lived in the immediate places of Divine worship which they attended.

MR. M'LAREN said, he hoped that next Session the Chancellor of the Exchequer would exempt horses engaged in trade. The employment of horses in manufactures was equivalent to their employment in husbandry.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Exemption when income is under £100 and abatement where income is under £300).

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that in 1842, during the administration of Sir Robert Peel, when the income tax was imposed, incomes under £150 per annum, were exempted from the tax, and that sum was fully equivalent to £200 per annum at the present time, for the great pressure of taxation, and the rise in prices of every article of food, fell most heavily on persons whose incomes ranged from £150 per annum downwards. The very prosperity of the country by causing labour and all articles to rise in value, seriously diminished the means of living of those who depended upon salaries and incomes under £150 per annum. There was no principle involved in the matter. He therefore moved an Amendment to the effect that the tax should not be extended to persons whose incomes were less than £150 per annum.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 25, to leave out the word "continued," and insert the words "extended to any person whose income is less than one hundred and fifty pounds."—(Mr. Alderman Lawrence.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must question the statement of the hon. Gentleman that no principle was involved, for the principle involved in the Amendment was, whether the Committee—the financial arrangements of the Government having been already assented to—should adhere to those arrangements, or alter them so as really to take away all responsibility for the financial results of the year from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The consequence of the adoption of the Amendment would be to make a change in the financial arrangements of the year to the extent of £250,000, ; and to take such a step would not, he contended, be a wise mode of proceeding. There was no good reason, he maintained, why the decision of the House in 1853, altering the minimum income which should be liable to the tax from £150 to £100 should be reversed, especially seeing that great concessions had already been made in the way of making deductions from the lower class of incomes on which the tax was paid.

MR. HUNT said, that although not supporting the Amendment, he must protest against the doctrine which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to lay down—that the present was not a fitting opportunity to raise such questions as that which had been raised by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. WHITE said, he should support the Amendment, and would remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had admitted in answer to a Question which he (Mr. White) put, that there then was a sum of quite £750,000 in the Treasury receipts of the current year, due to the exceptional and unexplained postponement of the usual annual contribution from the Revenues of India for military and other charges, thereby diminishing to that extent the (otherwise) actual surplus of the year ending the 31st of March last. Hence he (Mr. White) urged that should the Chancellor of the Exchequer remit £250,000 of taxation by accepting the proposed Amendment, he would still have fully £500,000 more to the good than he anticipated when he made his last Financial Statement. Persons with incomes of £150 a-year were—as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had more than once admitted—a class on whom the pressure of the income tax bore most heavily. It seemed to be wholly ignored by the right hon. Gentleman that our present system of indirect taxation did substantially impose an income tax of the most burdensome and unequal kind. The recipient of an income of £150 a-year ordinarily consumed quite as much tea and sugar as the possessor of ten times that amount—say, £1,500 per annum. If so, whilst the latter individual would pay to the State on the two dutiable articles before-named not more than three farthings in the pound of his income, the former, with one-tenth of such income, would be mulcted to the extent of an income tax of quite eightpence in the pound by our present system of indirect taxation. On those grounds he (Mr. White) held that the existing liability of incomes of £150 to the income tax was a glaring inequality and injustice, and he earnestly supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for London (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence).

MR. GLADSTONE said, he must contend that when the general financial scheme of the Government had been approved as it had been that year, it was not convenient to raise such important questions as the present in Committee on a Bill as if it were matter of small detail. His hon. Friend was, of course, no doubt entitled to move that the exemption be extended to incomes of £150 a-year, or to move the repeal of the tax altogether; but the question was one of very great importance, and, as he thought, entirely beyond the scope of the business immediately in hand, for the sum involved was a large one, and such as would nearly exhaust the surplus estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It must also be borne in mind that the amount of income which would be absolutely exempted from the income tax raised questions of very great delicacy. The tax was one which was attended with considerable social dangers, and the House having evidently arrived at the conclusion that it might be necessary to continue it, at all events for a considerable time, thought it desirable that its basis should be made as broad as possible. Great questions of financial policy should not be decided in passing a measure such as this, which simply settled details; but should have been brought forward in discussing the Budget arrangements of the year.

MR. HUNT said, he should like to know what time was so fitting for a discussion of the question under notice as on the Bill for re-imposing the income tax, while with regard to the time, he thought no one could be blamed for raising the question at this hour. If the exigencies of Public Business required that the Bill should be considered at a quarter to 1, hon. Members could not be blamed if they discussed the question involved in it. The strongest argument urged against the Amendment was that it would result in a deficit of £250,000.

MR. FAWCETT said, he trusted in future the Customs Bill would be considered simultaneously with the Budget. Upon the question at issue he must say that the small incomes were most heavily taxed, and those who received them were the last to participate in a season of general prosperity, because such seasons made workmen extravagant and caused prices to rise even before the clerk at £100 or £150 a-year benefited by the prosperity of the country. The anomaly of the present system, moreover, would be increased if the Amendment was carried, because whereas a man having an income of £149 would pay nothing, a man in receipt of £151 would pay on £71. The proper method was, that the sum upon which nothing was paid should be the sum subtracted from the gross income, so that if incomes of £100 were exempt incomes of £105 should pay on £5. He could not, therefore, vote with his hon. Friend, although he sympathized with him; and he expressed his disbelief in the statement commonly made on popular platforms, that workmen were the most heavily taxed, because the people upon whom taxes fell with most crushing effect were men such as clerks at a fixed salary of about £150.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he should like to know what had become of the £750,000 referred to by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) as the military contribution from India.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he did not think this an improper time to bring forward the question. It was not his intention to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing; but he should certainly introduce the subject again on some future occasion.

Question put, "That the word 'continued' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 108; Noes 65: Majority 43.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Hunt

Clause 13 (Enactments in schedule repealed, and in lieu thereof exemption from inhabited house duty of trade and business premises under care of servant only).

MR. HUNT said, he objected to the proposed exemption from house duty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had proposed it not because he was enamoured of its principle, but because he had thought the House wished for some relaxation of the duty.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he should move the rejection of the clause, on the ground that it would benefit the richer trader, who could afford to live away from his shop.

ALDERMAN SIR JAMES LAWRENCE, in support of the clause, urged that exemptions already existed, and that the clause simply defined them more precisely.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he would remind hon. Members that this was the clause of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Question put, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 79: Majority 1.

Additional Clause.

MR. F. S. POWELL moved the following clause:—

"No person shall be chargeable with Duty in respect of any dog bond fide and wholly kept and used in the care of sheep and cattle, or in driving or removing the same, provided no such dog shall be a greyhound, pointer, setter-dog, spaniel, lurcher, or terrier."

New Clause (Exemption of certain class of dogs,)—(Mr. Powell,)—brought up, and read the first time.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he hoped the exemption would not be granted.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he must urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept it.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he must strenuously oppose the clause, for the reason that formerly the exemption in favour of sheep dogs led to much dishonesty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was waiting to hear what the author of the tax had to say in favour of it.

MR. HUNT said, that when he was Secretary to the Treasury, in 1867, the dog duty was reduced from 12s. to 5s., and exemptions abolished. Previously, there was a large number of dogs which never paid duty at all. He did not think the reduced duty was any hardship upon the farmer, though it might be complained of by those who bred sheep dogs for exportation. The reduction of the duty had increased the pleasure of many who could not have kept dogs at the higher duty. Under all the circumstances, therefore, he should support the continuance of the tax.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could add nothing to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 55; Noes 86: Majority 31.

MR. GREGORY moved a clause to interpret the term "horse-dealer."

Clause agreed to.

MR. GREGORY moved another clause repealing section 3 of Income Tax Amendment Act, 1870.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER opposed the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). THE NEGOTIATIONS.—NOTICE.

MR. BRUCE, in moving the Adjournment of the House, stated on behalf of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, that he would to-morrow, at 2 o'clock, make a statement with regard to the progress of the negotiations as to the Arbitration at Geneva.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (CERTIFICATED TEACHERS).

Select Committee on Elementary Schools (Certificated Teachers) nominated: — Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, Mr. BAXTER, Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Mr. ANDREW JOHNSTON, Mr. FRANCIS SHARP POWELL, Mr. MELLY, Mr. CLARE READ, Mr. BRISTOWE, Mr. SCOURFIELD, Mr. PEASE, Mr. PEMBERTON, and Mr. WHITWELL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

REVIEW OF JUSTICES' DECISIONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HUNT, Bill to amend the practice of Courts of Law with respect to the Review of the Decisions of Justices, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HUNT and Mr. STAVELEY HILL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 190.]

RAILWAYS PROVISIONAL CERTIFICATE CONFIRMATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ARTHUR PEEL, Bill to confirm a Provisional Certificate made by the Board of Trade under "The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864," and "The Railways (Powers and Construction) Acts, 1864, Amendment Act, 1870," for the incorporation of the Widnes Railway Company, and for the construction of the Widnes Railways, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ARTHUR PEEL and Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 192.]

BOARD OF TRADE INQUIRIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, Bill for regulating inquiries by the Board of Trade, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE and Mr. ARTHUR PEEL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 193.]

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 11th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland)
Supplemental * (142).

Second Reading—Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * (122).

Select Committee—Report—Union of Benefices Act Amendment (No. 139.)

Committee—Report—Metropolitan Commons Supplemental * (115); Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental * (121); Cattle Disease (Ireland) Acts Amendment * (125); Charitable Loan Societies (Ireland) * (124).

Report—Union of Benefices Act Amendment * (12-140); Statute Law Revision * (107).

Third Reading—Local Government Supplemental * (103), and passed.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA) THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.

ENLARGEMENT OF TIME. STATEMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it was at so late an hour last night and so few of your Lordships were present, that I am not sure that all your Lordships are aware that the noble Lord on the cross-benches (Lord Oranmore and Browne) put to me, after midnight, the Questions of which he had given Notice with regard to the position of the negotiations in reference to the Washington Treaty. I thought that at that hour of the night, and as so few of your Lordships were present, and as the circumstances referred to in those Questions were not quite applicable to the existing state of things, it would be more advisable for me to confine myself on that occasion to a promise of a statement this evening with reference to the position of affairs. My Lords, I have to state that on Saturday last it became perfectly clear that we must fail to ratify in time the Supplemental Article which would have the effect of cancelling the Indirect Claims, on condition of an agreement for the future as to the obligations under which both countries should be bound. It appeared that, on the one hand, the Government of the United States were of opinion that we were hypercritical as to the wording of the agreement; while, on the other hand, we were of opinion that we ought not to agree to words which would not clearly convey what the real meaning of both parties to the agreement was. That being the state of things, and finding it was no longer possible to have the Article ratified in time to send before the Arbitrators at their next meeting, we resolved—acting on a suggestion previously made by the United States—to propose an adjournment, in order to give time for the removal of the remaining difficulties between the two countries. I must now, my Lords, express my surprise and regret that the communication which I made to the American Minister should have been made public in New York almost immediately after its transmission. I spoke to General Schenck on the subject; and, in reply, General Schenck has explained to me that he could not account for the publication, as certainly the proposal had not been communicated to the public by anyone in the American Legation here. The Secretary of the Legation, however, suggested an explanation that might, perhaps, account for it—namely, that my communication had been sent to the United States not in cipher, but en clair; and that in consequence of its having been so sent, it had got into the Press from circumstances over which his Government had no control. The substance of the proposal is this—that there should be an adjournment of the Arbitration for eight months, under certain reserves and certain conditions in which we should both join. Since the transmission of the proposal we have received a communication from the United States Government respecting the mode in which we proposed the adjournment should be made; and in answer to that we have made a further communication to the United States. I have only to add that to-morrow the Lord Chief Justice, as the Arbitrator for this country; Sir Roundell Palmer, our Counsel; and Lord Tenterden, our Agent, proceed to Geneva. But no inference is to be drawn from this fact:—whatever might occur, we thought it would be more dignified on our part and more courteous, not only to the American, but to the other Arbitrators, that our Counsel and Agent should appear; but they have precise instructions as to the course they are to pursue, and they have full powers for providing, on our part, that there shall be no act whatever which would be a departure from the declarations which Her Majesty's Government have made on the subject of the Indirect Claims.

Earl Granville

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, your Lordships are so much accustomed in this important matter to surprises—to the expression at one time of the most sanguine hope, and at another to the confession of the most bitter disappointment on the part of Her Majesty's Government—that communications of the kind of that we have just heard have lost the claim of novelty. Before this occasion we have seen that communications which are usually regarded as most secret and sacred, have been issued to newspapers until the disclosures have ceased to surprise. I am inclined to think, however, that but for the disclosures which from time to time have been made in this way we might have been in a still worse position. They have, at all events, however they may have come out, put us in possession of facts with the knowledge of which, as they have occurred, we ought not to grumble; but, my Lords, the information of to-day certainly transcends any which has hitherto come to light during the conduct of these negotiations. It now appears from these "channels of information" that we have made a proposal to adjourn the Arbitration at Geneva for eight months. My Lords, consider for a moment how far that is possible. I want to ask your Lordships, in the first place, what precise object is to be attained, what is supposed to be the utility of an adjournment of this kind? Is the object to decently put an end to that part of the Convention which relates to an Arbitration at Geneva? If so, would it not be better to do so openly and fairly than in this indirect and covert manner? What will be the consequence of adjournment for eight months? What will be the consequence on this side of the Atlantic? Great anxiety; great misgivings from day to day; great uneasiness in respect of the negotiations; great perplexity of telegrams and despatches, and from time to time explanations or partial explanations, such as have hitherto been made to Parliament. All this time the commerce of the country and the financial interests of the country will be disturbed and confused. Those who are most interested in the existence of friendly relations between the two nations will naturally feel anxious and perplexed throughout the whole of this period of adjournment. That will be the result on this side of the Atlantic. And if that will be the consequence in this country, what will be the state of things on the other side of the Atlantic? What the adjournment means is that a "platform" on one side and on the other will be made during the Presidential election of the relations between this country and the United States. Is not that the inevitable consequence? Your Lordships will have observed the tone and temper in which these negotiations have been commented on in the United States. Do not you think that as the Presidential election comes on, it will be the object on one side or on the other to depreciate the policy of the Cabinet of Washington, and that during the election the negotiations will be represented in the various lights in which the contending parties may feel it their interest to place them? Is that a state of things which can be regarded as beneficial to the interests of this country or to our relations with the United States? Is it desirable that relations which ought to be most friendly and intimate should be made a bone of contention during the election of President? and what is the prospect of the result of this proposal? The noble Earl the Foreign Secretary has referred to a communication which appeared this morning, and which, we are told, has not been impeached by the Prime Minister in the other House of Parliament. That communication is prefaced with the statement that Mr. Fish has declared it is useless to discuss Amendments—that the Government of the United States has no suggestions to offer or entertain. Is that a prospect which ought to induce us to adjourn the Arbitration? It may be the case, as has been stated "elsewhere," that nothing but the want of a little good sense can prevent an agreement being arrived at on the points now in dispute. But, if so, I want to know whether a period of eight months is necessary for the development of a little good sense? I want to know whether a space of eight weeks is not sufficient, if an agreement can really be come to at all? Let me ask you now as to the possibility of an adjournment. We are informed that in answer to the noble Earl, Mr. Fish replied that the time for the Arbitration could be extended only by a new Treaty; but if the Arbitrators themselves wish to adjourn, the United States will not object. Let me remind your Lordships of the dates. The Counter Case was delivered on the 15th of April. Now, according to the terms of the Treaty, within two months from the delivery of the Counter Case the Arbitrators are to meet to receive the written or printed arguments on the points to be insisted upon by each side respectively. Having been so possessed of those points, the final Case on both sides, the Arbitrators are to proceed with the reference and the decision of the Tribunal is, if possible, to be made within three months after the close of the arguments on both sides. Now, I am far from suggesting a doubt that if the two Governments had agreed upon it, there might not be an adjournment of the Arbitration, even beyond that time and for any period that might be required for the mere purpose of arguing the points of the case. But we have before us the views of Mr. Fish, who says the adjournment cannot be made except through the medium of a new Treaty. Whether these are correct or not, they are, at all events, the views of the United States Government—an adjournment can only take place with the concurrence of Mr. Fish. Her Majesty's Government are not at liberty to arrange beforehand that there shall be an adjournment of the Arbitration. But this statement goes on to say that if the British Government proposes an adjournment, and if the Arbitrators consent to it—if the British Government and Arbitrators are for an adjournment—the American Government will not oppose it. But that is not an agreement that the American Government will approve it. What it amounts to is throwing the responsibility on the British Government and Arbitrators, and taking the proceeding out of the ambit of an agreement between the parties. I say, my Lords, it is very much more than doubtful whether the Arbitrators have the power to go outside what is necessary for the purpose of convenience in respect of the carrying out of the reference, and of adjourning the Arbitration in this manner for a period of eight months. The words in the Treaty give a power to the Arbitrators in respect of what is to be done in the case of the death or the absence of any one of the Arbitrators appointed to hear the reference; but I hold that under the reference to Arbitration, it is the duty of the referees to go on with the Arbitration in the regular course at the time appointed. Of course, if both sides agree, the Arbitration may, for convenience sake, proceed notwithstanding such an event; but it is more than doubtful whether, without an agreement between the parties, the Arbitrators have the power to adjourn for eight months for a purpose that is merely collateral to the object of the reference. If they have the power under such circumstances to adjourn for eight months, why not for a year or for eight years? There is no reason why their power should be limited as to time. But we have it stated that the American Government will not enter into an agreement—that Mr. Fish is of opinion that this is not to be done by an agreement, but by a new Treaty. If, however, the Arbitrators order an adjournment, the United States Government will not object. I wish to know what is to be our position after an adjournment under such circumstances? But, my Lords, the matter does not stop there. What is the position of this country in submitting this proposition to Mr. Fish? The noble Earl who brought forward the Motion the other night (Earl Russell) stated on that occasion what is quite true. He stated that in this matter we are not suppliants, going to America and putting forward claims and asking for satisfaction—we are a people against whom America is making certain demands, which under certain conditions we are willing to submit to a proper tribunal. Is it, then, consistent with the dignity of the Sovereign, or with the high position this country should assume, that we should go to America in the form of suppliants—we who want nothing, and have nothing to ask for? I say, then, that we should be degraded if we went to the American Government and asked them for an adjournment of the Arbitration for eight months. And for what reason? For any definite reason? No. For the chance of something turning up. At the end of five months the Government have failed; and what you have failed in accomplishing in that time you think you may accomplish in eight additional months. Now, with reference to this despatch, I wish further to ask the noble Earl what it is he proposes? According to the published despatch, this proposal has been made by the noble Earl—

Lord Cairns

“With this view I have the honour to propose that, on the meeting of the Geneva Arbitrators on that day, joint application shall be made for an adjournment for eight months. If the Government of the United States concur in making an application for adjournment, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to deliver to the Arbitrators on the 15th inst. the summary of the argument under the 5th Article of the Treaty, accompanied by a Declaration, of which I have the honour to enclose you a copy for the information of your Government.—[No. ix, 64.]

Well, my Lords, I will observe that the first step that is to be taken before the Arbitrators is to lodge the printed statements on both sides, with the points relied upon. Therefore the first step must have been taken before you can approach the Arbitrators to make your application to them. But the noble Earl says—“If you concur in applying for an adjournment, we will lodge our Case, with this condition that there is an assumption that the adjournment will take place.” But the United States say—“We will not agree; it must not be a matter of agreement, because we will not concur.” Now, I want to know whether in that case Her Majesty's Government mean to arm the Arbitrators with the points and with the arguments which are your last pleadings? When you hand in those points the whole process is complete:—and then what position are you in? Even if Her Majesty's Government in the form of suppliants ask the Arbitrators to direct an adjournment for eight months, how do you know they will agree to that? Suppose they said—"We will not accede; our duty is to hear the case as soon as the pleadings are complete. We have no right on the application of either side to adjourn the Arbitration. We have no authority to do so, and therefore must decline, without the consent of both sides, to order an adjournment." Where are you if the Arbitrators should arrive at that decision? If they go on, how are you to stop them? Your pleadings having been completed, and the Arbitrators being armed with them, where is your power to arrest the progress of the Arbitration? I have only one other statement to comment upon. In the published account of the Declaration there is this statement—

"The Undersigned is instructed by the Government which he represents to state that this printed Argument is only delivered to the Tribunal conditionally on the adjournment requested in the Note which he had the honour to address to the Tribunal this day, jointly with the Agent of the United States, being carried into effect, and subject to the notice which the Undersigned has the honour herewith to give that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to cancel the appointment of the British Arbitrator and to withdraw from the Arbitration at the close of the term fixed for the adjournment, unless the difference which has arisen between the two Governments as to the claims for indirect losses referred to in the Note which the Undersigned had the honour to address to Count Schlopis on the 15th of April, shall have been removed."

Perhaps it may be said that it is the intention of the Government to cancel the appointment of the British Arbitrator. But, my Lords, that term "cancel" in this case is quite new to me. I want to know by what authority the Government will "cancel" the appointment of their Arbitrator. I do not see any such authority in the Treaty. If an Arbitrator dies or is incapable of acting, that is a case provided for by the Treaty; but I cannot find any words in the Treaty giving power to cancel the appointment of the Arbitrator; and I think that the power to do so is, to say the least, doubtful. My Lords, in a case so novel, so unusual, and so unprecedented, I hope—to repeat the phrase made use of by a noble Lord on a former occasion—the Government will not, in their endeavours to escape from a bog, end by only getting deeper into it. I hope they will give your Lordships some assurance that, without any prospect of light or explanation, we are not to be drawn into eight more months of fruitless negotiation and bitter disappointment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, my noble and learned Friend commenced his observations upon the statement which has just been made by my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs saying that the Government were again placed in a position in which, according to him, we have been so often placed—that position being that at one time the most sanguine hopes are expressed, and at another the most bitter disappointments are confessed by Her Majesty's Government. Now, sitting here as I do every night during the whole of the discussions in your Lordships' House, I take upon myself to say that—my own recollection fortified by that of my noble Friend—I can assert that the noble Earl never on any occasion expressed the most sanguine hopes, and never on any occasion confessed the most bitter disappointment, with reference to these negotiations. So much as to the accuracy of the noble and learned Lord's recollection. He then proceeded to comment on the statement that appeared in a morning paper—which, he says, is not controverted in any way in "another place," though brought under the attention of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government—in which the United States Government is represented as saying, through Mr. Fish, there can be no agreement for an adjournment, except through the medium of a new Treaty. Now, I do not blame my noble and learned Friend for quoting that statement, because it appears in the published statement; but I am glad to be able to say that it is wholly inaccurate. Mr. Fish never said that an agreement for an adjournment could not be effected except through a new Treaty, and I should have been very much surprised if he had. I do not mean to follow my noble and learned Friend through his comments on Treaties. I believe his comments on the Treaty of Washington, which have excited so much painful attention for a long time, were not very accurate, and that their inaccuracy has been productive of much evil. It is very singular that my noble and learned Friend should be the person who raised the first doubt I ever heard of being expressed either in this or any other country as to whether the Treaty of Washington excluded the Indirect Claims. I have been searching ever since he gave expression to that doubt to find who were those who supported him in that doubt, and, as far as I can discover, no one supported him in it. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Westbury) said the other night he had no doubt the construction of that Treaty did exclude the Indirect Claims. The noble Earl who proposed the Resolution for an Address to the Crown (Earl Russell) said the same thing; the noble Earl who followed him (Earl Granville) concurred in that opinion; and the noble Earl the late Secretary for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Derby) said that though the language of the Treaty might be ambiguous, he thought that it excluded those Claims. For my own opinion I shall not say much; but it is the same as that held by the Attorney General and the Solicitor General; and the American jurists have said they have no doubt on the matter, because they cannot find in the Treaty language which would give such a construction to it as would include the Indirect Claims. My Lords, that being so—being unable to discover anybody who gives his sanction distinctly to the doubt entertained by my noble and learned Friend—I hesitate to accept the construction which he has put on the Treaty. It is doubtless much to be regretted that in the earlier stages of debate—after my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary stated the terms of the Treaty, and that by them the Indirect Claims were excluded—this statement should have been allowed to go without contradiction from July to December, and that then the statement of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) should have been fastened on and introduced into the American Case as one bearing the authority which justly attaches to any opinion expressed by him; but I repeat, my Lords, that when I find that, besides such legal authorities as we have in this country, the American jurists are against the view taken by my noble and learned Friend, I must arrive at the conclusion that he is not a very safe expounder of Treaties. My noble and learned Friend on the present occasion undertakes to expound the sense of the Treaty with reference to adjournments of the Arbitration; and, further, with regard to expressions he finds communicated through the channels we have heard of, and reflected back to us from America in the singular manner in which intelligence is now reflected back from that country, he says that he finds no words in the Treaty authorizing the Government to cancel the appointment of the British Arbitrator. Nobody supposed there was—it was never assumed that the question of cancelling the Treaty would ever arise. But surely the appointment of the Arbitrator could be cancelled if the case arose which I hope never will arise—namely, that through the two parties to the Treaty being unable to come to an agreement as to the intention of the Treaty it never became full and complete, because it was not taken in the same sense by the two parties. I hope that that will never arise; and why? Because an Article has been proposed by which the Indirect Claims, whether set up or not, will be put aside by an agreement which, I believe, will be a good one if it can be effected, and which will operate, by reason of a consideration on both sides, to hinder the bringing forward of the question whether the Indirect Claims are to be admitted. If that be so, is there not good reason for asking for an adjournment when the question at issue is so near an arrangement? Our hope of bringing the settlement of that Article to a conclusion was frustrated by the accidental circumstance of the Senate of the United States being in that position that its adjournment was fixed to take place within a period which expired yesterday. But my noble and learned Friend says, why should we apply for an adjournment at all? He says we have nothing to ask for—nothing to gain. I am proud to say we have nothing to gain; but we have a great deal to ask for, and so has the United States. Each nation has to ask the other to join in an act which will cement their friendship, put an end to their temporary heartburnings and disquietudes, and prevent any arising in the future. Each has to ask that the other should join her in uniting in bonds of brotherhood the English race throughout the world. I ask, is not this sufficient to negotiate for—is it not sufficient to induce us to prolong the negotiations as long as there is any hope of their being brought to a successful issue? And, finally, I say my noble and learned Friend must not assume because he reads published a correspondence which was never intended to see the light till the negotiations were finished—when, of course, it must have been produced on both sides of the water—he must not assume that the expressions in that correspondence are to be held as expressing the final determination of the negotiators. The course of these discussions has, undoubtedly, been greatly favoured by the forbearance of your Lordships' House, and at this moment it is so by the forbearance of the House of Commons. Your Lordships thought fit to break through that reserve—through that reticence—which is usually observed by the Legislature during the course of negotiations until a Treaty has been concluded; but, notwithstanding that somewhat untoward intervention, while I will not express a sanguine hope—because my noble and learned Friend trembles at the very idea—this I must say, that the Government at least hope that the object they have in view of bringing these negotiations to a satisfactory conclusion will yet be realized with the approval of the Parliament and the people of this country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think your Lordships will be inclined to agree with me that a more grave position for the country and a more difficult position for the action of this House could scarcely be conceived. Consider what is your position. My Lords, six months have been spent in negotiations, and how far these negotiations are likely to tend to cement that brotherhood of which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has spoken in such enthusiastic terms, you can easily judge by a perusal of the American newspapers. But those six months have passed away, and have practically and precisely left us in the same position as when the American Case first met the eyes of the noble Earl opposite—when the Indirect Claims were put forward, and when he said the Government would insist on a withdrawal of these Claims. But they are not withdrawn. The Americans are now asserting them as strongly and as determinedly as ever they did before. The only difference is that whereas there were then six months before the Arbitration, the Arbitration is now at our door. The Indirect Claims are put forward as strongly as ever, and no advance seems to have been made by Her Majesty's Government in making good their declaration that they would never suffer those Claims to be gone into before the Arbitrators. We have some ground of complaint in this. It is not a case of embarrassment come on the noble Earl for want of warning. Over and over again he was warned by my noble Friends of the fatal approach of dates—of the fatal approach of the time when some definite course must be taken; but no action has been taken, and here we are within three days of the Arbitration and the Indirect Claims are still upon the Table. The noble Earl told us that in all questions relating to the Indirect Claims and to the time appointed for the meeting of the Arbitrators full care would be taken; but we find now that the English Arbitrator is going to Geneva and that the English Counsel is going over to conduct our case with a protest which will make the proceedings to be gone through at Geneva valueless. I should like to know what Sir Roundell Palmer is going to do, and what the English Arbitrator is to be sent out for? If the United States agree that the Arbitration should be adjourned for eight months, Sir Roundell Palmer will have his journey to Geneva for nothing. If the United States do not agree to the adjournment which Her Majesty's Government are asking from them, are we to understand that Sir Roundell Palmer is going to conclude our Case—to deliver that Case out of the hands of England—so that there will be nothing to stand between us and the arbitrament of the Indirect Claims? We ought to have clearer accounts of these negotiations than we get through scraps of information derived through the corrupt indiscretion of American officials? The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack spoke of the great forbearance of Parliament during those negotiations—certainly it has been carried further than it was ever before carried during negotiations as important as these—but we are entitled to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is intended for the next eight months to leave us to subsist on the indiscretion of American officials; or does the noble Earl intend now to lay the Papers on the Table? Does he intend to give us any further information, or to leave us to chance for the next eight months? My Lords, obviously there is in the Cabinet some influence which counteracts the strong and generally expressed feelings of the people of England that those Indirect Claims should be at once put an end to; and we are justified in feeling apprehension. I hope the House will urge on the Government to give us clear information; but if the Government still refuse—still shelter themselves behind official privilege, I hope your Lordships will again step forward and say on what terms—and what terms alone—Great Britain would consent to proceed with the Arbitration.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am not surprised at the manner in which the noble Marquess treats this question. He feels complete distrust of Her Majesty's Government, and is justified in expressing it. But what I wish to put to your Lordships is this—that when a Ministry is charged with the government of this country they cannot discharge that duty under the principle of distrust. If we, who are Ministers of the Crown, are as such intrusted with these negotiations, and Parliament does not take any means to displace us, it is our bounden and absolute duty to the country and to Parliament not to be driven by any taunts or attacks or mistrust to depart from the system we think necessary to conduct these negotiations to a prosperous issue. My Lords, I must express my opinion—speaking in reference not only to the present, but to all other diplomatic negotiations—that no negotiation can be brought to a successful result if it is to be conducted in the face of day, and information is to be given to Parliament day by day, and, as noble Lords opposite have wished, almost hour by hour, of every step which is taken. For my own part, I should infinitely prefer to cease to be one of the responsible Advisers of Her Majesty, and would never desire to be in such a position again, if we are to be made responsible for negotiations carried on under such circumstances. The noble Marquess asks if it is our intention to keep Parliament for eight months without information. If it were so we should, indeed, be carrying reticence to a point where there would be no excuse for it. But so far from that being the case, it is the intention of my noble Friend, before the close of this week, to lay before Parliament the whole of the Papers connected with these negotiations. From them it will be seen precisely what has and what has not been done, and Parliament will be able to judge whether the negotiations have been conducted in a manner consistent with the declarations we have given and with the honour of the country. As to the observations of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), there was one point to which my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack did not advert. It was the extraordinary argument that supposing the adjournment were to be consented to it would cause angry discussions in the United States. But can anyone conceive anything more likely to cause anger than the failure of the Treaty? If anybody tells me that the adjournment of this Arbitration—which can obviously only be agreed to because the two countries conceive there is, at all events, the possibility of coming to an agreement—is more likely to bring about dissension between the two countries than if the Treaty were entirely broken because of complete disagreement between the two Governments—I say deliberately that such language can only proceed from a person who, from the first, has been determined, whatever might be the consequences to the interest of his own country, to destroy this Treaty. The person who takes that view is the noble and learned Lord opposite, who has been a consistent advocate of the United States Government from the first. Therefore, I do not propose to tell the noble and learned Lord what instructions will be given to our Agent upon the occasion of the meeting at Geneva. If I did so I know that the noble and learned Lord would rise in his place, and with that power of ingenuity which I always admire would at once demonstrate that it was the one thing which was necessary to prove that the United States Government had been entirely in the right, and that this country had been entirely in the wrong. My Lords, I decline to give any such information; but while I do so I do not intend anything I have said to bear a personal character as regards the noble and learned Lord. The character of the noble and learned Lord stands far above any attack, and I do not propose to make one. But I have made these remarks, because words spoken by a noble Lord of such high character have an effect upon the interests of the country which we must all deprecate. It is for these reasons that I think the Government right in refusing to give the noble and learned Lord the information for which he has asked.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I have no intention of carrying further the rather personal discussion initiated by the noble Earl who has just sat down. I am not, however, surprised that the noble Earl should have preferred to look at the matter from that point of view, because I can easily understand that to the noble Earl and his Colleagues the discussion of any topic would be more agreeable than that of the facts now under our consideration. Nor do I feel it necessary to vindicate the character of my noble and learned Friend, who is charged by the noble Earl with having done all in his power to destroy the Treaty. My Lords, nothing has been said or done by my noble and learned Friend in the course of these discussions for which we who sit near him do not take an equal responsibility. And when he is charged with having given his support to the American Case, I must say that he simply pointed out what appeared to him to be weak points in the Treaty so far as regarded the interests of this country—objections which afterwards proved to be well founded:—but when he did so the Government had still an opportunity to prevent the Treaty from being ratified before those doubts he had suggested were fully cleared up. I do not want to go further into that. For my own part, I do not wish to indulge in any of those taunts or sarcasms which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) deprecates. I think such a course would be particularly inadvisable, when all the facts of these negotiations are so imperfectly known, and when circumstances are so critical:—but I must say that notwithstanding the speech of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs—who, I have no doubt, has laid before us all that he thinks it consistent with his duty to make known—notwithstanding that the unexpected disclosures from the other side of the water have thrown some light on the matter—the position in which the matter stands is by no means satisfactory. It is quite clear that the Arbitration could not go on at the time originally appointed—that is admitted on all hands; but there are two points on which we have heard no explanation. First, why this delay specially asked for is applied for by us? and, secondly, why the delay asked is for the particular period of eight months? Unquestionably, any delay that may arise must be for reasons of mutual convenience. The American Government have quite as much to lose as we have—I will not say they have more, but certainly they have quite as much to lose as we have—by the breaking off of the Treaty, if that unfortunately happens. Then, why is so long a term as eight months asked for? If no difference has arisen except one as to the conditions of Arbitration, the question might be settled in a very much shorter time than eight months—if, indeed, it admits of being settled by negotiation. I do not say that we may not be able to get over the difficulty—I hope we may—but it is clear that by an adjournment for a few weeks, or a few days, you would be quite as likely to get over it as you would by an adjournment for a longer period. I do not suppose the date of adjournment is fixed with reference to the Presidential election in the United States; but, of course, that is an idea which occurs to every one's mind. I, however, reject that, because to suppose it would be to suppose this country placed in a position which it is not too much to say would be ridiculous, and even degrading. You must, however, consider the risk to which you expose the pending negotiations in hanging them up in a way that they shall be made use of by two political parties in fighting out their battles. At the same time, I admit the difficulty of the situation, and I am very reluctant to press for information which may be withheld for public reasons; but I cannot think there would be any breach of diplomatic reticence on the part of the noble Earl in his telling us why a delay for such a period is necessary; why the delay is to be so protracted as would amount to almost an indefinite postponement? I need not point out the evils that will result from the injury which it will occasion to commerce and the anxiety to which it will give rise. These must occur to the minds of the Government. What I now want to know is what is the reason which induced them to take a course so singular and so unexpected, and which the country will hear of with so much surprise and regret.

EARL GRANVILLE: Before I answer the questions the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) has put to me, I must say a single word as to the arguments of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury)—who is so singularly qualified to speak of the best means of promoting conciliation and avoiding irritation either between two individuals or two countries—that I do not believe the language he has used to-night is calculated to produce that soothing effect upon the United States which he is so alarmed lest the action of Her Majesty's Government should disturb. I deny that at this moment there is the greatest irritation between the two countries, and that a really unfriendly feeling has been shown in the United States towards this country. I think the very reverse is the case. Even as regards the Press of the United States—which is of course carried away by party politics, and very likely takes the same course as regards the Government of that country that some noble Lords do in respect of the Government of this country—shows a better feeling than it formerly displayed in reference to these negotiations. I may observe that not only in newspaper articles, but in speeches of Senators the Government of the United States are charged with having allowed themselves to be out-generalled and humiliated by this country. I saw the other day that General Butler denounced General Schenck for dancing attendance in my antechamber, and writing by dictation from me. The Governments on each side of the Atlantic must put up with such things; but I believe that in the result any Government that seeks honestly to discharge its duty in endeavouring to keep good feeling and peace between the two countries will reap its just reward. With regard to the question put to me by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), I have to say that we proposed the period of eight months as that of the adjournment because we thought it combined these two advantages—the meetings of the Congress are fixed by the Constitution for certain dates—the next meeting will be on the 1st of December. On the other hand, Parliament generally meets in the beginning of February, and our arrangements would not be concluded till Parliament met next year. It is quite true that the President, if he likes to exercise his privilege, can call the Senate together in extraordinary Session; but I believe—though I am not authorized to say the fact is so—that there are objections to that course, and these objections would probably be increased at the time of the excitement consequent on the Presidential election, which event happens every four years. There is a minority of the Senate bitterly opposed to the re-election of President Grant. We have some knowledge of what minorities can do in this country; but I believe that in the United States speeches are not made as here by hours, but by consecutive days. Here it is only necessary for us to have a mere majority; but there a majority of two-thirds is necessary. I believe that to press the American Government to call an extraordinary Session of the Senate would not be a wise proceeding under existing circumstances; and therefore we believe that the objects we have in view will be best promoted by an adjournment of the Arbitration to the time we have proposed to the American Government.

The Earl of Derby

EARL GREY: My Lords, I have heard with alarm and regret the statement of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary. I think that this Arbitration should not be allowed to go on in any manner without a clear and distinct understanding that those Indirect Claims are not to be pressed before the Arbitrators. We have now had the question before us for five or six months—noble Lords on the Opposition benches have pressed again and again for the assurance that the Indirect Claims shall not be admitted—I have very humbly joined in the same request; but we see step after step some concession made, and now we hear that Sir Roundell Palmer goes to Geneva to-morrow with instructions of which we do not know the purport, but which I fear can only have the effect of prejudicing this country. I have to remind your Lordships that when the letter of General Schenck was read the other night it was believed that if the Arbitration went on, with the Supplemental Article and that Letter before the Arbitrators, no doubt could exist that the Indirect Claims had disappeared. I ask your Lordships whether anyone in this House acquiesced in the proposal to refrain from expressing any opinion upon the subject, except upon the understanding and in the belief that if the Supplemental Treaty should fall to the ground, then, without any new negotiations or any new scheme for patching up the failure, we were at once to withdraw from the Arbitration. I am convinced of nothing more clearly than that this was the understanding my noble Friend (Earl Russell) came to, and that it was on that understanding only he asked the House to refrain from addressing Her Majesty on the subject. On any other supposition it would have been very wrong for us to have taken that course. We all understood that if the Supplemental Treaty failed then we were to withdraw from the Arbitration at once, without any further attempt at negotiations, when so many had been made and had failed. We now find ourselves placed in the most embarrassing position, and I hardly know what duty requires of us. Can we, after what we have lately done, allow these proceedings to go on without taking some steps to obtain from the Government an assurance that nothing shall be done inconsistent with the honour of this country? The circumstances almost warrant our adopting the unusual course of sitting on Wednesday, and reviewing to-morrow the proposals of the Government. I make no proposal of that kind; but I must repeat that we are placed in a most embarrassing position by the disclosures of to-day, after having assented to the withdrawal of the Motion made last week.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: My Lords, I do not wish to prolong the discussion upon this subject, but to advert to a statement made by the noble Earl the Colonial Secretary, to the effect that the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary would lay on the Table the Correspondence on the subject of this new Convention before the close of the present week. What I wish to ask is, whether that Correspondence which the noble Earl proposes to lay on the Table will embrace the alterations which have been made, or are supposed to have been made, in the Supplemental Treaty by the Senate of the United States—so that the House may have an opportunity of knowing what those alterations are, and what view the Government has taken of those alterations?

EARL GRANVILLE: It is not usual previous to the presentation of Papers to describe their contents; but, at the same time, I have no objection to state, in reply to the noble Duke's Question, that the information he desires will be contained in the Papers I shall lay on the Table. In reply to the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey), I would say that Her Majesty's Government have taken all the measures they thought necessary in order to carry out all the assurances they have made to the House.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he had merely placed the Notice which appeared in his name on the Paper to allow any noble Lord who might wish to raise the question to do so consistently with the Orders of the House.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—COMMUNICATIONS OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONERS—PROFESSOR BERNARD'S LECTURE.—QUESTION.

LORD BUCKHURST rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there was any objection to laying on the Table of the House a copy of the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the British High Commissioners during the negotiation on the Alabama Claims and since the presentation of the American Case referred to in Earl Granville's letter to Sir Edward Thornton, dated the 13th of May, 1872? The noble Lord said, he introduced the subject in the form of a Question in consequence of a letter from the noble Earl to Sir Edward Thornton, recently laid on the table, in which the noble Earl said the British Commissioners, in the information they had furnished during the negotiations and since the presentation of the American Case, had uniformly maintained that the claims for Indirect Losses were not included, nor intended by them to be included, in the terms of the Case to be submitted to Arbitration. And in the course of the recent debate the noble Earl had stated that on a particular day a statement was received by the Government from the British Commissioners to the effect that the Indirect Claims had been waived by the American Government. The document containing this statement should be on the Table of the House. That a Correspondence such as he referred to did exist was clearly proved by the speech of Sir Stafford Northcote at Exeter, and the lecture delivered by Mr. Bernard at Oxford. In the latter, Mr. Bernard stated that throughout the whole of the proceedings the British Commissioners were constantly in communication with their Government. He would ask, therefore, whether it was consistent with the dignity of their Lordships' House that information of such importance as that which the speeches of these gentlemen contained should first be communicated in the forms of lectures and speeches. Again, in a letter to Sir Edward Thornton, the noble Earl opposite said that the nature of the claims made by America was closely defined and limited. He should be glad to learn where that definition and limitation occurred—for they were not to be found in the instructions given to the Commissioners, nor, as far as he could see, either in the Treaty or the Protocol. They must, therefore, occur in the correspondence for which he was now asking. He would at the same time ask the noble Earl the second Question of which he had given Notice—whether the sum—namely, £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 sterling—claimed by the American Government, as stated by Mr. Bernard, in his lecture at Oxford, is the total amount of the "Direct Claims" now presented to the Arbitrators at Geneva.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he must decline to enter into any statements made by Mr. Bernard, and would further beg to point out that the noble Lord would find the amount of the American claims by consulting the proper records. As to the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the British High Commissioners, there had been no correspondence between them since the presentation of the American Case. With regard to the clear definition of the Claims referred to arbitration, that clear definition would be found in the Treaty itself. All the Correspondence, except that which was confidential, had been laid upon the Table; and as to the confidential portion of it, he saw no advantage in presenting it to the House.

Lord Buckhurst

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE, believing it to be desirable that such a Resolution should be placed upon the records of the House, said he would now move the Address of which he had given Notice.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the arbitrators appointed to meet at Geneva pursuant to the Treaty of Washington be suspended until an agreement in writing be come to between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, and such agreement be laid before the arbitrators at Geneva by the joint action of these two Governments, removing and putting an end to all demands on the part of the Government of the United States with regard to the claims included in the case submitted on behalf of the United States and understood on the part of Her Majesty not to be within the province of the arbitrators.—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

Resolved in the Negative.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 11th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Resolutions [June 10] reported.
PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Education (Scotland)
[31]—B.P.

The House met at Two of the clock.

EUROPEAN ASSURANCE SOCIETY BILL—(by Order.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. EYKYN rose to move that the Order of the Day for the third reading of the Bill be read and discharged, and that the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee. He regretted to stand in the way of the solution of the very difficult question involved in that Bill, being himself strongly in favour of the principle of arbitration, and believing that the constitution of a proper Court of Arbitration by the Government would confer lasting benefits on the country. His objection to the present Bill related only to one point—namely, the question of who was to be the arbitrator under it? He did not think that ex-Lord Chancellors should hold such appointments. Filling the high position which they did as Peers and as Judges in “another place,” and being, as he thought, well entitled to the recompense which the country gave them, he regarded it as unwise in those noble and learned Lords to depart from the rule followed by their predecessors and to enter into competition with their former brethren of the long-robe. If he had been rightly informed, Lord Cairns had declined to act as arbitrator in this case, on the ground that it would interfere with his duties in the House of Lords, and the appointment had thereupon been offered to and accepted by Lord Westbury, who was to receive for his services as arbitrator 3,500 guineas. He (Mr. Eykyn) thought it unbecoming that ex-Lord Chancellors should undertake to act as arbitrators for fee and reward, and he had drawn the attention of the House of Commons to these circumstances, in order that some notice might be taken of them in “another place.”

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “be” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “re-committed to the former Committee,”—(Mr. Eykyn,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. BARNETT, as Chairman of the Committee to which this Bill had been referred, might say that when they recommended a course of arbitration the counsel on both sides unanimously offered their thanks to the Committee for having so decided. He had no doubt that ex-Lord Chancellors very usefully employed their time in the judicial tribunal of the House of Lords; but, in his opinion, there could not be a more important judicial function than that which this Bill proposed to confer upon Lord Westbury. The interests involved in the case were so immense and intricate that it would require a man of great acuteness of mind and of judicial ability to bring the matter to a satisfactory ending. It must be remembered that when Lord Chancellors were pensioned no condition was imposed upon them that would prevent their accepting the position of arbitrators in such cases as that now under discussion. He could not help having a suspicion that the interest of some persons would be served by delay in this matter; and, without imputing any motives or mentioning any names, he was afraid that this Amendment would have the effect of carrying out their object.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that the House ought to feel obliged to the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Eykyn) for calling attention to this case; because there was really a great principle involved in it. A person who had filled the office of Lord Chancellor received a pension of £5,000 a-year, on the ground that he had lost the opportunity of making money in his profession. If ex-Lord Chancellors were to act as arbitrators, with salaries of £2,000 or £3,000 a-year, he could not see upon what principle their magnificent retiring pensions could be defended. It appeared to him that it would be wise of the Government to consider the subject when they were dealing with the Judicial Committee or the new Court of Appeal. He hoped the hon. Member for Windsor would not divide the House upon the question.

MR. JAMES said, he hoped the hon. Member for Windsor would not divide the House on his Amendment. It would be a great hardship to the members of the different assurance companies if this Bill were not passed, and he thought that the House ought to make some sacrifice of principle on behalf of those unfortunate persons. He hoped, therefore, that the Amendment would be withdrawn; but, at the same time, considered that some protest should be made against this dangerous practice, lest it should be drawn into a precedent. The Albert case had been quoted as a precedent in order to justify the present proceeding. The Appellate Court was starved from want of power, that power being the services of eminent Lord Chancellors. Lord Cairns, when Lord Chancellor, directed that County Court Judges should in no case hold arbitrations when their Courts were sitting, and yet Lord Cairns became an arbitrator, and sat as such when he ought to be sitting in the Court of Appeals; and was a party to the passing of a Bill which gave him £2,000, and as much more as he wished to appropriate to himself by his own will. Of course, he should speak of Lord Cairns with the utmost possible respect; but surely human nature was human nature, and if a man could sit in the Appellate Court when he liked, and do other business besides, was it not natural that ex-Lord Chancellors would yield to the temptation of the latter rather than give their services to the country? Surely, if the House wished to preserve the dignity of the Bench, and have suitors come to Courts above suspicion, they ought to make clear their protest against the course sanctioned by this Bill. However humble his voice, it should be ever raised on behalf of the profession.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he thought the present was not a time for discussing so grave a question of policy as the one they were then dealing with, and he also was of opinion that his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Barnett) was a little too severe in some of his remarks. The liquidators had acted under the directions of the Court of Chancery, and he thought that no imputation of interested motives ought to be made against them. It was an open question entirely as to which was the better way of dealing with the matter—whether to send the Bill to arbitration, or to give powers to the Court of Chancery for settling the question. The President of the Board of Trade had promised to introduce clauses in his Bill, giving powers to the Court of Chancery to decide such questions as these; but they had not seen these clauses, and could not tell whether they would become law. He thought, therefore, that it would not be fair to deprive the Company of one mode of meeting their difficulties before they were sure of the other. Should these clauses be sufficient, the Bill might be dropped in "another place." He thought the House should allow the Bill to be read a third time.

MR. EYKYN withdrew his Amendment, with the view of moving on an early day a Resolution that, in the opinion of the House, no ex-Chancellor should accept any fee or reward for acting as arbitrator or referee, unless specially appointed by the Government.

Mr. James

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MASTER AND SERVANT (WAGES) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. PELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government have decided on proceeding with the Master and Servant (Wages) Bill, and, if so, in what order they propose to take it?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the Bill. But with regard to the order he must refer the hon. Gentleman to the Answer given by the Prime Minister on a recent occasion, to the effect that the order in which the remaining Government Bills will be proceeded with must be determined after the Scotch Education Bill and the Mines Regulation Bill have passed through Committee.

EDUCATION—INSPECTORS OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether Certificated Elementary Teachers are at present excluded from filling the appointment of Inspectors of Elementary Schools, and if that be the case, if he would consider the advantage of removing that restriction would act as an additional inducement to men of ability to become Teachers in the Primary Schools?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that elementary teachers were not at present excluded from filling the appointment of Inspectors. There were two Rules which guided his noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon), with whom the appointment of Inspectors absolutely rested; the Vice President had nothing to do with it. Of these two Rules, one was a Treasury Rule, that the persons appointed should not be over 35 years of age. The other was a Rule which his noble Friend thought expedient—namely, that no person should be appointed who had not taken University honours. It was possible that these two Rules, the first of which applied not only to Inspectors, but to other appointments, might make it difficult for certificated teachers to become Inspectors.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
 TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).
 THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.
 THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.
 ENLARGEMENT OF TIME.—STATEMENT.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise with reference to a Notice kindly given for me by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, on the adjournment of the House this morning. I shall make a brief statement to the House, partly with reference to the rumours that are in circulation, partly with reference to the stage which we have reached in the communications with the American Government, although the statement I shall make will not be a final and conclusive one. ["Oh!"] Although it will not be final and conclusive, I will endeavour to make it clear. For that purpose I will just remind the House of the main points which have been present to the mind of Parliament and of the country in such declarations as have been made, and such inquiries and suggestions as have been made during the last few weeks. The first of these points in order is the negotiation of a Supplemental Article containing a prospective engagement, and likewise containing a stipulation with respect to the Indirect Claims at Geneva. The second of these is the question, to which allusion was very properly made on a former occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), with respect to the enlargement of time. The right hon. Gentleman inquired, I think, whether measures had been taken for the purpose of securing that, if the time for discussing and settling the terms of the Supplemental Article should not be sufficient, the time specified in the Treaty of Washington should be enlarged. And the third point which has been present to the mind of Parliament and the country has been—presuming that we should fail on both the other points—the measures to be adopted at Geneva with reference to the exclusion of the Claims for Indirect Losses from any award or procedure before the Arbitrators. Sir, with respect to the first of these points—that is to say, the negotiation and adjustment of the terms of the Supplemental Article in the time which has been at our command—we have not been able to agree upon the terms of that prospective engagement which refers to the presentation of what I may loosely call Indirect Claims upon future occasions, although, as the House is aware, there has not been, and there is not, any difference of view between the two Governments as to the course to be taken at Geneva with respect to the Indirect Claims under the Treaty of Washington, in case an adjustment were arrived at with respect to the Supplemental Article as a whole. So much for the first point. With respect to the second point—the enlargement of time—I mentioned in the House, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite suggested it, that that matter had been in the view of Her Majesty's Government, and we are still in communication with the Government of the United States as to the means of bringing about an adjournment of the proceedings of the Tribunal of Arbitration. I am not yet able to say what the issue of these communications will be. It is obvious to the House that the issue must be reached almost immediately, inasmuch as the 15th of June is the day on which some decisive step at Geneva must be taken. And when that issue is reached, it will be our desire forthwith to lay upon the Table the Papers containing the whole details of the proceedings up to the present time. Lastly, Sir, and with regard to what should be done on the 15th of June at Geneva in the event of our failing in the second point, as for the present we have failed in the first, all I can say, and that I think the House will expect me to say, is this—we are considering, and we shall, in any case, be prepared with measures which we think proper measures to be taken at Geneva on the 15th of June, in order to sustain, in their full force, the declarations which on various occasions we have made to Parliament and the country with reference to the Claims for Indirect Losses under the Treaty of Washington.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I have listened to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman in mute astonishment. It is not for me to gauge the limits of Parliamentary patience. But, with such a document as I have seen this morning in the columns of The Daily News, I ask whether we can possibly rest satisfied, provided that document be not a forgery, or, to use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman on another occasion, "furnished by literary enterprise." I say, if that document be genuine, we are in a position to demand further explanations from Her Majesty's Government. Now, Sir, I do not wish unnecessarily to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, and I think the conduct of this House has been most exemplary with regard to them. I only ask hon. Gentlemen who have sat here for some lengthened period what, in their opinion, would have happened if a Conservative Government had been in office? Would not anxious, rising young men, as well as old men on this side, have put before now some very awkward questions? Sir, I think we are approaching a very grave crisis in the history of this country. The right hon. Gentleman appears to me to be a little too anxious to make this Treaty at any price; and our connections on the other side of the water fully understand the right hon. Gentleman, and are prepared to take advantage of his anxiety. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this despatch, which has been printed in The Daily News—through enterprise, of course—and which states that Earl Granville has directly written to Mr. Fish, the Secretary of the United States Government, and made a proposition to the effect that the Arbitration at Geneva should be postponed for eight months, is true? [Cries of "Read!"] No; it is unnecessary to read it. ["Read!"] Do not condemn me to that. Everybody has read it in The Daily News. [An hon. MEMBER: No, I have not.] Everybody will read it. It is simply a proposition from Earl Granville to Mr. Fish that these negotiations be postponed for eight months. ["Read!"] No, I will not read this humiliating despatch. If anybody is to read it the Clerk at the Table should read it. I object to read such a humiliating despatch myself. Although I have clung to the last to the hope that the Treaty would be carried out—not through any particular affection for this Treaty, but because I thought we were bound to it—it seems to me that what is now being done is not the way to carry it out. At any rate, if we cannot conclude a Treaty with dignity, let us get out of it in the best manner we can.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that he is out of Order unless he is prepared to conclude with a Motion.

Mr. Osborne

MR. OSBORNE: I will not conclude with a Motion, because I do not like to interrupt the Business of the House; but I will put myself in Order by asking a Question. ["Move!"] No, I will leave some other hon. Member to do so. I have not received that assistance from the other side of the House or from this which would induce me to move the Adjournment of the House. I stand here simply as an independent Member of Parliament, and I wish to put this Question—Whether this latest telegram which we have seen in the columns—or, if some hon. Gentlemen have not seen it, which they will see in the columns of The Daily News of this morning—whether that telegram is founded on fact, or is the exact despatch written by Lord Granville to Mr. Fish?—I pause for a reply.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to try the patience of my hon. Friend; but he will, upon reflection, naturally suppose that, though I did pause—almost, I think, for three-quarters of a second—before I rose, yet that it is very proper and natural that a Minister who has to answer a question on a subject of this kind should pause for a moment, inasmuch as it is his duty to bear in mind that there might possibly be other Members of the House, beside my hon. Friend, who were desirous to ask for information, and, consequently, that it would have been hardly respectful for me to rise the very moment my hon. Friend had sat down. I am in the condition of not having before me the document to which my hon. Friend has referred—[Mr. OSBORNE offered to pass it for the inspection of the right hon. Gentleman.]—nor would it be possible for me to go into it now, or examine it in such a way as to be able on the instant to give to my hon. Friend the assurance he desires as to its literary and verbal accuracy. On this point, of course, I should have to refer to the original. But my hon. Friend has put a question which I will answer very readily—Has Lord Granville proposed that the negotiations at Washington should be postponed for a period of eight months? Sir, the proposal was that such a postponement should be made upon a joint application of the two Governments; and the proposition which my hon. Friend describes has been made by Lord Granville. My hon. Friend describes this document as a humiliating document. Well, the Government are responsible for the proposition which has been made. They will contend, when the proper time comes for doing so, that it is not a humiliating document, but a proposition required by national justice, national interests, and national honour. That will be our contention. I only mention it now with reference to the opinion given by my hon. Friend, because this is not the time to defend the cause of the Government. But I have not the least hesitation or difficulty in avowing that that proposition for an adjournment of eight months, if agreed to by the two parties—and the application would be a joint one—was made by Lord Granville and by the Cabinet on Saturday last. I will only add one explanation with reference to the term of eight months which will naturally suggest questions to the minds of hon. Gentlemen. Why should the particular term of eight months, and so considerable a term, be included in such a proposal? The simple reason, so far as my own mind is concerned—and I believe that was also the view of my Colleagues—was this:—The purpose of this adjournment, should it be made, is to enable us to arrive at an agreement upon the terms of the proposed Supplementary Convention. That agreement cannot be made excepting by the concurrence, on the other side of the water, of the President and Senate of the United States. Now, it is perfectly true, I believe, that the President has the power to summon the Senate for the purpose of considering a question affecting a Treaty at any period. But we did not feel it would be entirely consistent with propriety on our part to make a suggestion to the President of the United States as to the time at which he should summon the Senate. We thought it right, on our part, in making the suggestion for an adjournment, to name a time within which the Senate would again be in Session; and I may also add that we thought it would be an additional advantage that the time we had named would also be a time when the Parliament of this country would again be in Session, and when, therefore, it would have the opportunity, which it might reasonably desire, of giving its opinion upon the negotiations while they were taking place.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, when the Question was put yesterday, the right hon. Gentleman formally and officially informed us by the mouth of one of his most eminent Colleagues of his intention of making an important communication to the House of Commons this day, and the right hon. Gentleman, faithful to his engagement, appeared in his place, and has made such a declaration. I think it most remarkable—I may say astounding—that the right hon. Gentleman made no allusion to that all-important document (the despatch published in The Daily News), the authenticity and even verbal accuracy of which I understand he does not for a moment dispute. Sir, it appears to me that the course taken by the Government is wanting in that frankness which, above all things, is necessary for the communications between Ministers and the representatives of the people. That document is an authentic document—and that document, signed by the Secretary of State, intimates the intention of proposing a delay of eight months in the meeting of the Tribunal of Geneva. The right hon. Gentleman wishes us to understand, in the second explanation that he has given us, the real reasons for that proposition. They may be so—it is not for me to doubt the convictions of the right hon. Gentleman, or what he believes to have been the convictions of his Colleagues as to the reasons which induced them to fix on that date; but we know very well that in eight months from this time a hot contest will be taking place in the United States for the highest position in that country; and I take the liberty to say that I know nothing more unwise or more indiscreet, nothing more to be deprecated, than that the relations between the two countries should be made the stalking-horse of discussion on every hustings. If Her Majesty's Government have been induced unconsciously to fix on the term of eight months in order that the President of the United States, his Government, and even the Senate might, perhaps, be in the humour then to accede to the propositions which at present they will not countenance, I think that result will be attained at too great a sacrifice, at a cost too perilous and pernicious, if it is to be attained by making the relations between the two countries a topic of exciting discussion.

during the Presidential election. I see an hon. Member rise as if I were not acting in unison with the Rules of the House. I never willingly act counter to those Rules, and if I am doing so on a most critical occasion, I will avail myself of a right which I should exercise with reluctance. I am at a loss also to understand from the right hon. Gentleman—for in this important statement, announced yesterday, and made under circumstances so critical, not the slightest allusion was made to that part of the subject—what is to become of all the other provisions of the Treaty of Washington during the interregnum. What is to become of the relations between this country and Canada? What of that guarantee which certainly has excited the anxious attention of Parliament? I may have misapprehended the right hon. Gentleman; but in his statement I understood him to say that the draft of the Supplementary Treaty was to be placed on the Table of this House, although not negotiated, in case the Tribunal at Geneva did not resume its duties on the 15th instant. Am I correct in that anticipation? If so, I should like to know the reason that has induced the right hon. Gentleman to depart from a line of conduct, the importance and necessity of which he dwelt on so much only a few days before. And if I have mistaken his meaning, if he is not going to place on the Table the draft Treaty, is it to be endured that for eight months after all that has occurred—after five months of anxious and baffled negotiations—is it to be endured that the people of this country should be ignorant of what is the question at issue between the Government of the Queen and the Government of the United States? Sir, these are subjects upon which we require information from the right hon. Gentleman. I wish to know why, when he came forward to make this statement, he did not advert to the most important element in our discussion—namely, the not-questioned despatch of the Secretary of State which has appeared in one of the public journals to-day. I wish to know whether, if the Tribunal at Geneva does not resume its duties on the 15th instant, I correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman that he would place on the Table the Supplementary Treaty, and the propositions of the United States, which have been so long in controversy between the two Governments. I wish to know, also, from the right hon. Gentleman, what is to be the condition of the Treaty of Washington with respect to the other and equally-important questions which it embraces. These are points upon which we require information; for, generally speaking, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and coupling that statement with the despatch of the Secretary of State with which we have become so irregularly acquainted, I am alarmed at the course and conduct of Her Majesty's Government. I join issue—so far as my immediate impressions upon a state of affairs so startling will enable me to do so—I join issue with the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, for I believe that he is pursuing a policy which will end in disaster and disgrace to England.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this Question I should be glad to put another Question. There is also a telegram appended to the reply in The Daily News, which states that Mr. Fish has refused to join in the declaration at once—that the American Government will not listen to the proposition of eight months' delay unless it is embodied in a new Treaty; and therefore, under the terms of the letter written by Lord Granville, the whole Arbitration seems to be at an end. I am very sorry the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) did not read the despatch out: but I have made extracts from it, and it is so very important that I hope the House will permit me to read it. It is a joint application that Lord Granville wishes to be submitted to the Arbitrators—if it is a joint application. Mr. Fish telegraphs to say that he refuses to join in the application, and therefore the whole Arbitration is now at an end.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I rise to move the adjournment of the House. It is wholly unbecoming that in an Assembly such as this a discussion should be carried on beyond its Orders, if not in contravention of those Orders. My own impression is that on this important subject the House of Commons has abstained from action much too long. I shall not, however, enter into the merits of the question, which has now occupied the attention of the House irregularly during the last 20 minutes; I rise merely to enable the House to place itself in order, and therefore if necessary in action, by moving that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. HORSMAN: I must say I agree with my hon. Friend who has just sat down. A very inconvenient practice is growing up, of which the majority of the House has some right to complain. The Leaders of the House on both sides enter into the fullest discussion upon most interesting questions, and raise all kinds of controversial matter; but when other Members try to take part in the debate they are called to order before they have spoken a dozen words. The Rules and Orders of this House know no distinction between Ministers of the Crown and private Members. All have the same privileges, and all ought to have awarded to them the right of discussion upon any question which may be brought forward, or all ought to be stopped. We have now had a despatch given to us in The Daily News, as to the authenticity of which, I believe, there is no doubt. I think it is to be regretted that information relating to the correspondence between our own Government and that of the United States is not already laid before Parliament; and I wish to ask, whether there is any objection on the part of the Government to give us the answer to that despatch?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my right hon. Friend has asked me whether there is any objection on the part of the Government to give the House the answer to the despatch which had been published in The Daily News. I presume his question must be understood to include both the despatch itself and the reply to it. The answer to the despatch does not purport to be a representation of its entire contents, but is rather a summary than the despatch itself. I do not think there would be any advantage whatever in laying these two documents—and I believe my right hon. Friend will see the force of what I say—I think there would be no advantage, but the contrary, in laying on the Table these two documents disconnected from those which preceded and followed them. Our desire is to place the House in possession of information at the earliest possible moment.

To that subject I have already adverted; but to communicate to the House partial information upon which it would be quite impossible for the House to form just conclusions, would really not assist, but rather tend to bewilder the House, and would not be a course compatible with our own duty. My hon. Friend (Mr. Osborne) has censured me for not having referred to this despatch. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Horsman) says the Leaders of the House raise all kinds of controversial matters in their statements. I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) can answer for himself. I do not know that he is open to much charge on his account; but, for my own part, in any statement which I have made to-day, I was most careful to avoid it. It was, however, necessary for me, in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford, to state the propositions which we should be prepared to maintain. With regard to the statements of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), I do not object to his censuring me, if he likes, for not having referred to this document, with regard to which I am quite sensible of the great inconvenience that arises, not only from premature publication but from fragmentary publication; but I do not wish to be censured for want of frankness. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that I or my Colleagues entertained a hope that by refraining from referring to this document we should succeed in diverting the attention of the House from a paper which has been published by many tens of thousands—if he supposes we entertained a deliberate intention to withdraw a document of this kind from the notice of the House, I do not object to the charge of want of frankness; but I do object to the charge of fatuity which the right hon. Gentleman seems to think it consistent with Parliamentary usage to impute to me. Whether I was right or wrong, I did not entertain the idea that my want of allusion to the document would prevent any Gentleman who thought it desirable to make such an allusion from doing so. The right hon. Gentleman says truly that we have arrived at a knowledge of this document, and the public have arrived at it, in a manner most irregular. All that I can say on that subject is really needless, so far as we are concerned. I need not state that we have had no share in its publication. I am given to understand that the document was transmitted from the American Legation in this country to the United States of America by the telegraph, and not transmitted in cipher. That is the statement made to me, and I have nothing more to communicate upon that part of the subject. That is the whole extent of my knowledge. [Mr. OSBORNE: Not in cipher?] The document was transmitted en clair as the phrase is at the British Foreign Office descriptive of sending documents in plain language. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has put to me two Questions of great importance to which I will give him answers that I hope he will find perfectly explicit. Both of them are conditional on the supposition of there being an adjournment, at least the first of them is. The first Question is—what is to become, during the interval of the adjournment of the Tribunal, of all the other provisions of the Treaty of Washington? My answer is, that I apprehend that if an adjournment took place of the sittings of the Tribunal of Geneva, all the other provisions of the Treaty of Washington, and all the executory measures connected with those provisions, may proceed exactly as if no such adjournment had taken place. If an adjournment takes place, I apprehend it can hardly be but by the consent of both parties. I will not presume to give an authoritative opinion on that point; but I will assume that very little good could arise from an adjournment, unless it took place by the consent of the two parties; and if there were the consent of the two parties, I apprehend there could be no reason in the world why the other provisions under the Treaty of Washington should not proceed towards a full accomplishment, just as if the sittings of the Tribunal at Geneva had gone on continuously from the 15th of June. The second Question is this—whether the Papers which we have proposed to lay upon the Table include the Treaty which has been lately under negotiation? I understood the right hon. Gentleman to deliver to me a double challenge. In the first place he asked—I am not sure I understood him correctly—“Why, if you mean to include it, do you depart from the usual course, and decline to submit to Parliament negotiations which have not yet reached their final accomplishment? Do you intend that the people of this country should remain in ignorance, during this long period, of the proceedings which have taken place, and of the actual state of the relations between the two countries?” I will first answer the second question, which relates to a matter of fact. We do not mean, certainly in the event of our failing to make arrangements for the adjournment, or, even if the arrangements are made for it, that the people of this country shall remain in ignorance of the steps we have taken. On the contrary, our opinion is, that at the point we have reached—perhaps I ought to say, especially after this publication, but even independently of this publication by The Daily News—our opinion is, that at the point we have reached it will be better that everything that has been done by the Government, on the part of the Crown and of the people, during those anxious communications, should be at once submitted to Parliament. That is the state of the case as regards the matter of fact. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly justified in asking me why, and upon what grounds, we departed from the usual course of withholding details of the negotiations until they have reached their final accomplishment. I will give my reasons as simply and intelligibly as I can, and I hope they will be considered satisfactory. The negotiations which have been carried on have been negotiations with respect to the formation of a Supplementary Treaty, and not only with respect to the formation of a Supplementary Treaty—for if that were the whole truth, the question might still arise whether it would be desirable to submit the details of these negotiations at present. But they have been negotiations of a most peculiar kind [Mr. OSBORNE: Hear, hear!]

—they have been for the conclusion of a Supplementary Treaty, but also for the conclusion of a Supplementary Treaty within a given time and before a certain date, and in order that the proceedings under the main Treaty of Washington might go forward on that date. So far as regards the conclusion of that Supplementary Treaty within a given time, as I have already stated, we have failed of its conclusion—I do not speak of its ultimate conclusion. I think the House will see, when the Papers are laid before them, how much reason there is to believe that if good sense be the dominating principle in the two nations on both sides of the Atlantic, it is almost an impossibility that there should be a final failure of agreement where the substantial questions of discord and controversy have been taken away. But I admit that, considering the Supplemental Treaty as an arrangement to be concluded within a given time, we have been unable to conclude it; and, that being so, it stands in immediate relation to the proceedings at Geneva on the 15th of June. We think it is due to Parliament that it should have an opportunity of judging of the whole of our conduct, in order that it may see whether we ought to and could have concluded, or whether we could not conclude, that Treaty so as to enable the proceedings at Geneva to go forward without impediment or interruption on the 15th. That is the reason why we think these negotiations should be laid on the Table of the House, although it undoubtedly involves, to a certain extent, a deviation from general rules; and, as I have stated, when we feel that the negotiations with respect to the question of adjournment have reached their issue, it will be our desire to submit that series of Correspondence which—though many, and perhaps the most important parts of it, have been transacted almost entirely by telegraph, will yet form the documents upon which we shall—I will not say, challenge—but shall patiently, and I may say also fearlessly, abide the judgment of Parliament and the country.

MR. BOUVERIE: My right hon. Friend has made a long speech; but he has not answered the important question put to him by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baillie Cochrane).

MR. GLADSTONE: It is a pure omission, for which I apologize. The hon. Member opposite asked me whether the Arbitration was at an end. As I understood the hon. Member, he assumed that this letter having been sent by Lord Granville on Saturday, and having been answered by a document which did not accept the proposal connected with the Arbitration, the Arbitration was at an end. That is not so. These are not the final Papers on the case. Communications are still proceeding. I cannot undertake to say what their issue will be—I mean between this and Saturday next; but it would be a mistake to treat these Papers as bringing the negotiations to a conclusion.

MR. BOUVERIE: I would call attention to the despatch which was written by our Foreign Secretary to the American Government, and of which it is agreed that we have an authentic report. It states the view of Her Majesty's Government on a review of the Correspondence, and Lord Granville goes on to say—

“With this view I have the honour to propose that on the meeting of the Arbitrators that day” (the 15th of June, four days hence) “a joint application shall be made for an adjournment of eight months. If the Government of the United States concur in making this application for adjournment, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to deliver to the Arbitrators on the 15th instant the summary of their argument, under the 5th Article of the Treaty of Washington.”

Then the same “enterprising” authority goes on to say—

“Mr. Fish refuses to unite in this arrangement, believing that the time can only be extended by a new Treaty; but if the Arbitrators consent to adjourn on the request of Great Britain, the United States Government will not object.”

Now, what is the position of the Arbitrators; because no reference has been made to that in the statement addressed to the House to-day? In the Treaty of Washington all the proceedings of the Arbitrators are sketched out with a definite time for every step which they are to take. By the 3rd Article the written or printed Case of each of the two parties is to be delivered to each of the Arbitrators within a period not exceeding six months from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the Treaty. By the 4th Article—

“within four months after the delivery on both sides of the written or printed Case, either party may in like manner deliver in duplicate to each of the said Arbitrators, and to the agent of the other party, a Counter-Case and additional documents.”

Now, these two steps have been taken; and there being, as stated in the Notice of Her Majesty's Government, a misunderstanding between the High Contracting Powers as to the meaning of the Treaty, the Counter Case was put in on the part of Her Majesty's Government at the proper date specified by the 4th Article, two months ago. The declaration addressed on the 15th of April by Her Majesty's Agent at Geneva to the Arbitrators said—

“Her Majesty's Government have been for some time past, and still are, in correspondence with the Government of the United States upon this subject, and as this correspondence has not been brought to a final issue, Her Majesty's Government, being desirous, if possible, of proceeding with the reference as to the Claims for direct losses, have thought it proper in the meantime to present to the Arbitrators their Counter Case (which is strictly confined to the claims for direct losses), in the hope that before the time limited in the 5th Article of the Treaty this unfortunate misunderstanding may be removed."

Well, what is the time limited by the 5th Article?—for here is the hinge and pith of the whole matter, as far as I understand the documents. In the 5th Article it is said that—

"It shall be the duty of the agent of each party, within two months after the expiration of the time limited for the delivery of the Counter Case on both sides" (that is, in April, as already referred to by me) "to deliver in duplicate to each of the said Arbitrators and to the agent of the other party, a written or printed argument, showing the points and referring to the evidence upon which his Government relies."

Now, as I understand the statement in the paragraph of that newspaper, the American Government refuse to agree to make a joint proposal to the Arbitrators to adjourn the proceedings, upon the ground—which seems to me to be a just ground—that if it is to be done at all it must be done by a specific Treaty. Then it is suggested on their side, not that no written or printed argument shall be delivered on either side, so that the Arbitrators shall be unable to proceed for want of the thoroughly complete course of documents which the Treaty requires to be submitted to them; but that we shall put in our statement, and ask an adjournment, and the United States Government will then have it in their power, if they choose, to present their statement to the Arbitrators; and, if they do not, the Arbitrators, under the 7th Article of the Treaty, are bound, if possible, to make their decision "within three months from the close of the argument on both sides." As far as we are informed, therefore, the position of the case is this—that we are to take every step without any counter-stipulation on the part of the United States that they will go along with us in this; and then, when we have put in our counter statement, we shall be really at their mercy whether or not the business is to go on. I, for one, say that if all these transactions had appeared throughout to have been conducted in a perfectly open and above-board manner, and there had been nothing behind, and no suspicion of want of candid and ingenuous dealing between the negotiators, it might have been worth while to contend that this course was the right one to take. But it cannot be forgotten that a strong and a prevailing impression exists in the mind of Parliament, and also in the mind of the country, that there has not been perfectly open, candid, and ingenuous dealing in this matter with our Government. That should make us extremely careful and cautious that no single step should be authorized by this House, or be permitted to the Government, which would leave us at the mercy of the Government of the United States to go on or not with the Case submitted to the Arbitrators.

MR. GORDON: If I understand the Prime Minister aright, he made a statement which must naturally cause considerable alarm. It was, as I gathered it, to this effect—that the proceedings might go on with reference to the other branches of the matter in dispute than the Indirect Claims. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] I am glad to find that I am wrong as to that. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] I will, therefore, not trouble the House further than to express my hearty concurrence with the views expressed by the last speaker.

MR. G. BENTINCK: I should have been glad to hear that everything connected with this Treaty had come to an untimely end. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) expressed himself as being greatly alarmed at the conduct of the Government, and at the language used by the right hon. Gentleman at its head; but I may inform him that upon more than one occasion I have been at least as much alarmed at his own proceedings when he was himself in office. It appears to me that there is no ground for a conflict between the two sides of the House on this question, because there is between them what I may term a community of error. Both sides of the House have sanctioned the principle of Arbitration in the settlement of International disputes, which I regard as a great and fatal mistake, and nobody will venture to say that both sides are not equally responsible for the difficulties in which we find ourselves placed in consequence of our having accepted that principle. In the only debate upon this subject to which I have reason to refer, which took place just before the close of the last Session, while various objections were raised to the conduct of the Government, no exception whatever was taken to the Treaty being based upon the principle of Arbitration. The right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Sir Charles Adderley), who was almost the only speaker on this side of the House on that occasion, although he took exception to the acts of the Government, did not utter a single word against the principle of Arbitration. I must protest against that principle, which I regard as lowering to the honour, the dignity, and the interest of this country. The position we occupy in consequence of our having adopted that principle is not that which a great and powerful country ought to be placed in. We ought not to place our honour and our wealth at the mercy of any description of arbitration. If this country is not sufficiently respected abroad, and does not sufficiently respect itself to be able to decide what concerns its own honour and what is due to its own character with respect to its obligations, it is no longer worthy to occupy the position of a great country. Holding this belief, I regard the fact of our having submitted the American Claims to arbitration as most lowering to the honour and dignity of this country. If I were to hear from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that it is probable that there will be considerable delay in the negotiations connected with this Treaty I should hail the announcement as good news, as showing that we have at all events obtained a respite in the matter.

VISCOUNT MAHON: The only part of the most unsatisfactory explanation which has been given by the right hon. Gentleman which is in the least degree satisfactory is that in which he promises that the whole of the Papers connected with the negotiations respecting the Supplemental Article shall be placed upon the Table of the House. It is, at all events, some comfort to know that we shall not be left in profound ignorance of what has been done in this matter for the next eight months. It would not be right that the Government should protract their negotiations for another eight months without laying those Papers on the Table of the House; and, therefore, I must express a hope that the Papers and despatches relating to this Treaty will be laid on the Table of the House before next Saturday.

MR. GOLDNEY said, although he had listened with the greatest attention to the explanations that had just been given by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, he had failed to collect from them what was the exact position in which they stood at the present moment with regard to the Supplemental Treaty and to the Arbitration at Geneva. About a week ago the right hon. Gentleman informed the House that there was no dispute about the latter portion of the Supplemental Article, and that the whole of the discussion then going on had reference to the early part of it, which formed the consideration for the latter portion of the Article being agreed to. It seemed to him from this new despatch of Earl Granville that that matter must have gone off altogether, and that new negotiations had been commenced for securing a further and distinct consideration of the Treaty. The Prime Minister had said that the latter portion of the article in The Daily News, containing a part of the despatch from Mr. Fish, did not conclude the transaction. He wished to know whether the negotiation now going on was entirely dependent upon the extension of time sought for; and whether if that extension of time were not acceded to, they were to consider that the other negotiations for the completion of the Supplemental Article had failed altogether?

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: The House is under a great obligation to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) for having raised this discussion. We have waited patiently for five months for some definite explanations on this subject, while the Government have gone on staggering like drunken men from one difficulty to another. I ask, are such men fit to continue these negotiations? ["Move!"] It is not for me to move in this matter. If hon. Members opposite wish to move they can do so for themselves. I repeat the question, whether the right hon. Gentleman who has landed us in a difficulty from which he cannot extricate us is capable of carrying these negotiations to a proper conclusion? I deny that he is capable of doing so. If he is permitted further to regulate our course in this matter we shall find ourselves involved in an Arbitration with the whole of these Indirect Claims hanging over our heads. The Americans are making use of the Government of this country for their own political purposes. The Treaty was nothing more than a stock-jobbing transaction on the other side of the water, and our Government have been duped into negotiating this Treaty with men who are not fit to be negotiated with. I can recollect negotiations going on with America ever since 1814, and the result of all of them has been that they never came to anything unless the Americans had everything their own way. We have been duped on every occasion. When we went forward the Americans went back, and when we went back they came forward. Our best course is to stand still and to throw this Treaty overboard altogether. Having got rid of this Treaty, let us next year begin negotiations afresh, actuated by that good feeling which every one of us has for America. [A laugh.] Oh, you may have a perfectly good feeling towards a man, and yet not let him make a fool of you. Let us, when the Presidential election is over, send over to America a few wise men, who will be able to settle the question to be submitted to the Arbitrators in a couple of days. In conclusion, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether the Arbitrators have any right or title at all under the Treaty to adjourn the consideration of the American Claims for any period?

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, who was received with cries of "Divide!" said, I do not think that hon. Members opposite have any right to object to those who sit on this side of the House saying a few words on this important subject, after we have remained silent with reference to it during the last five months. In common courtesy they ought to allow some independent Members on this side of the House to express their views on the matter. This is not a party question — it is a national one. How long are the honour and the interests of the country to be made a stalking-horse for the political interest of the President of the United States? I rise to ask what will become of the Canadian guarantee in the event of the negotiations falling through? Lord Russell, when Foreign Secretary, at the time of the escape of the Alabama, insisted that we were not liable for any losses or damage consequent on the escape of that vessel; but we have now admitted our liability for the direct losses, and the Prime Minister has admitted our liability for the money expended by America for cruisers in pursuit of the Alabama and her consorts. We have made an apology for injuries which we never committed, and we are now to compensate Canada for Fenian raids committed by American citizens by guaranteeing her a loan of £2,500,000. The Americans peremptorily refused to recognize those damages in the Treaty, and we instantly yielded. The Prime Minister now says no difference exists between the two Governments as to the Supplemental Article. Why, then, is it not concluded? We have shown the Ministry the utmost forbearance for five months, yet after wasting that period they ask for eight months more, on the plea that the good sense of the two parties is sure to lead to an arrangement. I do not, however, see any certainty of a settlement being come to at the end of that time. If we give the American Government eight months' delay, it will be made use of for political purposes in the Presidential election, and if Parliament is prorogued without a distinct arrangement we may be committed during the Recess to something even worse than the Treaty, so that "the last state of that man will be worse than the first." If the Government are determined to conclude a Treaty coûte que coûte, the sooner the thing is at an end the better.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that after this phase of the negotiation is concluded, all the Papers will be presented to Parliament; but I did not understand him to promise that they will be presented in time for the House to express an opinion on the wisdom or unwisdom of postponing the proceedings at Geneva for eight months. I wish, therefore, to ask him, whether he contemplates affording Parliament an opportunity of discussing that particular phase before a decision on the subject is come to between the two Governments?

MR. WATNEY: The duty of the Government is surely to settle the question of the Indirect Claims before settling what arrangement is to be made for the future. We ought to stand firmly to our position on the former point before attempting to arrange for the future.

Sir James Elphinstone

MR. GLADSTONE: As various questions have often been put to me, and one or two constructions placed upon portions of my speech, the House will, perhaps, allow me to answer those questions, though I believe I should not be strictly in order, except by permission. With respect to the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson), he stated that he would put a question to me; but I did not understand him to put any question to me in the sense that is commonly understood. [Sir GEORGE JENKINSON: I asked, what would become of the Canadian Treaty if the negotiations fall through?] That is a question which, I believe, I have already answered in reply to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli). I think I stated distinctly that, in case of an adjournment of the proceedings at Geneva, our opinion is that all the other proceedings connected with the Treaty would and should go forward just as if no adjournment had taken place, and just as if the sittings of the Arbitrators at Geneva were to be continued. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), he has asked me whether the Arbitrators had power under the Treaty to adjourn. Sir, it is the opinion of both the Governments, and of those, I presume, by whom they are both advised—certainly of those by whom Her Majesty's Government are advised—that the Arbitrators have a power to adjourn as a body charged with the transaction of important business. With regard to the general observations of the hon. Member, this is not the place for me to resent them, or even to reply to them further than to say this—that we have from the very commencement of this matter marked out to ourselves a path perfectly clear, and from that path we have never deviated, and shall not deviate. In my opinion, the greatest error—the greatest crime against the country and against the trust with which we are charged—of which we could be guilty, would be if we were to allow ourselves to be goaded and stung by accusations of incompetence—however just or unjust they may be I will not inquire—into deviating by one hair's-breadth from that course.

Our business is to act in this matter according to our conscience and convictions, perfectly irrespective of charges of that kind, unless and until these charges be embodied in the vote of an authority to which we are bound to defer; and if that occasion arises, we shall know, Sir, the duty which is incumbent upon us. The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) complains that, after using every mental effort, he cannot obtain a clear view of the situation from the statement I have made to the House. I do not wonder at that. I professed to give him a view which should be clear as far as it went; but it is not possible for me to give any explanation that can be full or satisfactory to the House, or that can clearly exhibit the whole case until the Papers are laid upon the Table, and Gentlemen have had an opportunity of examining them for themselves. The hon. Member, I am sure, will agree with me that it would be a great mistake if I were to attempt to give such a view as that in the absence of the Papers. It would hardly be fair towards the Gentlemen whom I address, or towards other parties, particularly as the Papers, when they are in the hands of Members, will not be very difficult to master, so far, I hope, as their nature is concerned. With respect to the specific question which the hon. Gentleman put to me, I will answer it with perfect clearness. I stated that we had failed within the time at our command to bring to a conclusion the communications on the subject of the Supplemental Treaty; that communications were still going on with respect to the question of adjournment, and in answer to the hon. Gentleman, with respect to that question only, from the present time—that is to say, from the day on which I speak until Saturday next. The noble Lord opposite (Viscount Mahon) has adverted to the delay in the production of the Papers. When I spoke I had in my mind that we should be able to lay the Papers on the Table by the end of the present week, so that they should be in the hands of Members at the very commencement of the next week, and that it should be possible for them, on a very early day, to raise any question they thought fit with regard to them. The noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) has asked me specifically whether, before coming to any arrangement about an adjournment of the proceedings, we will give the House an opportunity of pronouncing judgment on that adjournment. I cannot give any such promise. With respect to those matters in which the honour and interests of the country are vitally concerned, the case might be different; and the House knows that the Government had freely engaged that the Supplemental Treaty, which they hoped to form within the given time, and which would have contained a permanent engagement, should be made known to the House of Commons immediately upon its being signed. With respect, however, to the question of adjournment, it would be quite impossible to conduct negotiations with foreign Governments if we were to engage to lay before the House every statement of that kind for its consideration before we bound ourselves to its adoption. I am obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) for indicating to me a misapprehension which possessed his mind, because if that misapprehension can occur to one of so much knowledge and intelligence as himself, it probably has occurred to many others. I never intended for one moment—nor has any Member of the Government at any time intended for one moment—to leave it to be supposed that we could be parties to proceeding with the Arbitration upon the Direct Claims, until and unless the question relating to the Indirect Claims should have been satisfactorily disposed of. To exclude the Indirect Claims from the consideration of the Arbitrators is, in our view, an absolute condition to our proceeding to Arbitration with respect to the Direct Claims. I will venture to remove a misapprehension from the mind of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham). The hon. Member said we had admitted in the Treaty that certain descriptions of losses—I have no doubt he referred to the expenses incurred in the capture of vessels—were Direct Claims, and a matter on which the Arbitrators might make their award. That is not so. The only admission we have made is that Claims in that respect may be made and be argued before the Arbitrators; but we are equally free to argue against such Claims, and we are pretty sanguine that the decision of the Arbitrators will be in our favour. [Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM: They are classed as Direct Claims.] That is perfectly true; they are classed as Direct Claims by America. That is the extent of our admission, which is an important admission—I do not disguise it. The extent of our admission is this—that we cannot take to these Claims for expenditure in keeping cruisers for capturing vessels the same kind of objection that we make to the Indirect Claims—namely, that they are not within the province of the Tribunal. But, as the Treaty has admitted them, we argue that they are totally unfit matter to be made the subject of pecuniary award. The only other misapprehension was that of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who feared that we might be drawn unawares into a procedure on these Indirect Claims before the Arbitrators, notwithstanding the measures we have taken. All I can say is, that it has been the whole object of our endeavours to prevent that; and to that prevention we are absolutely bound. If we were to fall into such an error, we should, no doubt, receive the censure of Parliament; but that is a danger of which we entertain no apprehension, believing that we have in our own hands the perfect means of preventing its realization.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman has not made his meaning perfectly clear. Assuming that at the end of eight months—if the adjournment takes place—the Supplemental Treaty should not be negotiated, am I to understand that all the other portions of the Treaty of Washington will be advanced to maturity, and carried into execution?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the legitimate bearing of my declaration is that the considerations of maturity will arise as these questions come to be dealt with practically; but I am not able to say what the effect will be. If they are absolutely excluded, I do not see how they can be introduced. I can only say—in as far as I can give an opinion, and if I must give an opinion—that if an adjournment take place at Geneva, that adjournment, ipso facto, will have no effect on the other proceedings under the Treaty, and those proceedings may go forward as if no adjournment had taken place.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman will understand that I have no wish in pressing these questions, except that the House should obtain the clearest possible idea of the true position of the question. Am I to understand this—that in this controversy respecting the Indirect Claims we are to forfeit all inducements to the United States to forego these claims by allowing them to accomplish all their objects, although that question may be unsettled?

MR. GLADSTONE: The question involves an opinion, which the right hon. Gentleman seems to entertain, that the American Government has great objects to attain by means of those portions of the Treaty which are not referred to the Tribunal at Geneva, and that it is in consideration of attaining those objects that they are anxious to go to Geneva. Now, so far as we can judge from the information we have received, or from the language of the American Government, we conclude that the American Government are of exactly an opposite opinion, and consider that it is we, not they, who have an interest in pushing forward those portions of the Treaty which are not subjects of the present negotiation. They consider it is we, not they, who have an interest in carrying them forward and in bringing them to an end.

MR. W. M. TORRENS: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question arising out of the answer that he has just given. Has not the American Government, during this long period of negotiations, steadily taken a tone that implies that they require an assurance that the whole of the three great questions submitted in the course of the negotiations shall be settled if they agree especially on the San Juan Boundary question? I ask the question, because I have reason to believe that the American Government—not yesterday, but at various times, and in the most express manner—have signified that they will not agree to waive what they consider the advantages of the San Juan Boundary unless that they believed that we were going to settle with them fully and completely the Alabama Claims.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is extremely difficult to follow all the points that have been raised. The American Government has contended that the whole of the Treaty must stand or fall together, and

I do not think I should be justified in going further. They consider it is we, and not they, who have a special interest in pushing forward and carrying to completion all those parts of the Treaty which are not in Arbitration.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM: Is it not a fact that the Americans have fished in the waters of the Dominion—in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island—and does not the equivalent for that depend upon the ratification of the Treaty?

VISCOUNT ROYSTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give an explicit promise to the House that he will put them in possession of all the Papers relating to this question before a certain date?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope by the end of the present week—as I have already stated—to be able to produce all that can be produced according to the forms of the House. The question of the hon. Member (Mr. Percy Wyndham) is purely argumentative, and he had better put his Question on the Paper for my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies to answer.

MR. GREGORY: I understand—and have understood all along—that the question of the Canadian Fisheries was always a great point made by the American Government, and a stipulation is contained in that agreement upon which they insist. And that leads me to a consideration connected with the parts of the Treaty which are proposed to be carried into effect. I understand that the equivalent to be given by us to the Canadians is a guarantee of £2,500,000. Now, at all events during eight months the American people will have the benefit of the stipulation with respect to the fisheries of Canada, and during that time the Canadians will raise money for the construction of railways on the faith of our guarantee. Suppose the Treaty goes off, the position of Canada will be a very different one from what it would be under the Treaty. In the meantime, we shall have involved ourselves in a liability of £2,500,000, and after that money is raised it will be impossible to get rid of that liability.

Motion, "That this House do now adjourn," by leave, withdrawn.

EDUCATION SCOTLAND BILL—[Bill 31.]
(*The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr.
William Edward Forster.*)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

IV.—FINANCE.

Clause 50 (School fees).

MR. COLLINS expressed a hope that, considering the lateness of the hour, the Lord Advocate would promise the House not to proceed further to-day than Clause 63, and not to go into the subsequent clauses, which deal with the religious part of the question. Two hours would not be sufficient for their discussion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not at present make such a promise as the hon. Gentleman desired.

MR. ORR EWING said, that before the clause was agreed to he wished to make an appeal to the Lord Advocate with reference to the discussion which had taken place on Friday last at half-past 6 o'clock with regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh University (Dr. Lyon Playfair). The Amendment was then lost; but he trusted, nevertheless, that the Government would be disposed to adopt it. The Lord Advocate had stated that he did not look upon the subject raised by the Amendment as a vital question, and at first the right hon. and learned Gentleman appeared ready to adopt it; but subsequently, finding that he could command a majority, he had gone to a division, and had been successful in defeating the Amendment. Notwithstanding, however, the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in Scotland the question was regarded as a vital one. All the schoolmasters had a right to their own fees in Scotland, and the proposal of the Government, as contained in the Bill, was simply driving hard terms with the schoolmasters, who, it should be recollected, would have a very powerful influence on the education of the country. He regarded the schoolmasters, for this reason, as the most important part of the schools, and consequently, when he advocated their interests, he believed he was forwarding the interests of the scholars. The system they had hitherto adopted in Scotland had been a most excellent one; and, partly in consequence of the school grants, and partly by the school fees, it had worked most admirably. It had always been stated that hon. Members on that side of the House had misrepresented the opinions of the people of Scotland; but it was a significant circumstance that of the 52 Scotch representatives who took part in the division on Friday, 28 voted for the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend, and 24 against it. Moreover, three out of the latter were Englishmen, who knew very little about the subject. Besides, that number included six Members of the Government. He thought that, for the future well-being of the education of their children, the Scotch Members ought to ask for some concessions to the general feeling of Scotland, and he hoped the Government would, on the Report being brought up, introduce an Amendment similar to that which his hon. Friend had proposed. It was perfectly evident that it was the intention of his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that the school boards should not only appoint head teachers, but all the persons engaged in teaching in the schools. He trusted, however, that the head schoolmasters would still be permitted to nominate their assistants, as otherwise a state of confusion would, in all probability, ensue. He hoped, in conclusion, that his right hon. and learned Friend would make some concessions to their very reasonable demands.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 51 (Teachers houses).

MR. GORDON rose to move an Amendment. He was unable to understand upon what grounds the schoolmasters were to be deprived of their rights which they had enjoyed from the earliest times. He denied that the doctrines of political economy were applicable to the case of education, and pointed out that the present Bill was brought in because the supply of education was not equal to the demand for it. He did not see why they should depart from existing rules, unless it was with a view to obliterate all that had hitherto worked so well in the management of the parish schools. He therefore moved the addition of the words of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 32, to leave out from the word "during" to the word "convenient," in line 36, in order to insert the words "and it shall be the duty of the School Board in every parish to provide a house and garden in such places as they judge convenient, or to allow a reasonable sum in lieu thereof, for every principal teacher; the extent of the accommodation to be provided, or the sum to be allowed in lieu thereof, being subject to the determination of the Scotch Education Department, whose decision shall be final."—(Mr. Gordon.)

MR. M'LAREN protested against the assumption that this was a question which only affected the schools in counties. The burdens imposed rested mainly on the towns, and of the higher class of day schools there was not one in a county. There were 11 in Royal burghs and two in Parliamentary burghs, and all that was proposed in the Bill was that there should be a common collection in respect of all of them. That had been characterized as an extraordinary proposition, and as one inconsistent with the character and usage of those schools; but he begged to remind the Committee that such was the practice at the present moment in the High School of Edinburgh. In fact, every town or district had its own usage, and the management of these matters ought to be left to the common-sense of the persons concerned. It was proposed by one hon. Member that the salary of schoolmasters in the towns should not be less than £50 or more than £80, and that was said to be in the interests of the teachers, but he maintained that it was against them.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the hon. Member was speaking on the wrong clause. The clause before the Committee related only to teachers' houses, or a money payment in lieu of such houses.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the Bill provided that it should be within the discretion of the school board to provide gardens, and when necessary they would have the power to provide houses. The object of the Amendment, however, if he caught the meaning of it aright, was to make it compulsory upon the school board in every parish to provide a house and garden for every teacher under the board. [Mr. GORDON: Every principal teacher.] How could anyone say—"No matter how inconvenient or unsuitable it may be to provide a house and garden for the teacher, it shall be the bounden duty of the school board to provide them." That was the literal meaning of the hon. and learned Gentleman's words. The principle of the Bill on this point was, it might be necessary or it might be convenient to provide schoolmasters' houses and gardens in such places as they thought suitable; and that if they agreed it was necessary, or, short of necessary, convenient, that a certain remuneration be given instead of the house, power was given to do it. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated on a former occasion that he intended to make it obligatory upon the school board to provide a house and garden for each teacher; but now he corrected himself by saying "principal teacher."

MR. GORDON called attention to the words "or to allow a reasonable sum in lieu thereof."

THE LORD ADVOCATE asked what was the use of splitting the money paid to the teacher into parts, and saying "So much is for your salary, and so much in lieu of your house?" Such a proposition almost bordered on the verge of nonsense. With regard to the concession asked for by the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr Ewing) he begged to inform him that he had no intention of acceding to anything of the kind.

MR. ORR EWING said, the object of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) was to perpetuate in Scotland the system of giving a house and garden to the principal teacher; and with that he most heartily sympathized. They wanted to make the schoolmaster as comfortable as possible, and they desired he should have a house and garden near the school, and feel himself an important man in the district. If they made provision of that kind for him, they would not only raise his status, but promote the interests of the pupils, and therefore they wished to perpetuate the system of parochial schools in Scotland which had been imitated by many of the Free Church schools. He thought everyone not influenced by party motives would support this Amendment. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), who had been shut up within the walls of that beautiful city, could not be expected to evince the same sympathy in this matter as country Members; but he must be aware of the importance of having as schoolmaster a man who felt that he was respected and cared for.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE recommended that the clause be altered so as to make it compulsory on the school boards to maintain the houses and gardens attached to the schools which already existed.

MR. SINCLAIR AYTOUN wished to ask the Lord Advocate whether this clause did not give power to the school boards, after parish schools were given them, to sell those schools, or let them for purposes other than those of education?

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY thought that the present school-houses should be maintained, and that they should not be devoted to other purposes.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) did not alter the clause, but simply restricted the provision with regard to schools to parishes. He hoped the Lord Advocate would adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. GORDON said, he would, if allowed, withdraw his Amendment and propose it again in an amended form, in which shape he hoped it would receive the support of Scotch Members.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment moved, in line 32, to leave out from "during" to "convenient," line 36, and insert—

"And it shall be the duty of the school board in every parish to provide a house and garden in such place as they judge convenient, or to allow a reasonable sum in lieu thereof for every principal teacher—the extent of the accommodation to be provided, or the sum to be allowed in lieu thereof, being subject to the determination of the Scotch Education Department, whose decision shall be final."—(Mr. Gordon.)

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER pointed out that there was one feature in the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment which had not been noticed at all—namely, that it put vast power in the hands of the Scotch Education Department. He expressed a hope that the clause would remain as it stood in the Bill, as he considered that the matter should be settled between the school master and the local board, because the latter would be fully aware of the importance of doing their best for the schoolmaster.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not agree to the proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for Larnarkshire (Sir Edward Colbrooke) that it should be made a statutory duty of the school board to maintain the school-houses; because, although it might be highly convenient to maintain them in some cases, it might be quite the reverse in others; so that he considered it would be best to leave a certain amount of discretion to be used by the school board. Where there were schoolmasters' residences and gardens in the rural districts it was quite certain that the house would be kept up and devoted to its proper use, while no doubt the school boards would exercise their judgment in the matter in the interests of the districts. But there might be cases in which it would be desirable to use the house and garden as a school-room and play-ground. The houses and gardens were to be vested in the school boards, for the purpose of enabling them to carry out their duties as defined by the statute; and they could not do away with them except as laid down by Act of Parliament. As he had said before, there could be no doubt that in all cases where it was desirable the existing houses would be maintained.

Sir Edward Colbrooke

Question put, "That the words 'during the continuance in office of the teachers now in possession thereof, and' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 193; Noes 111: Majority 82.

MR. GORDON moved to add at the end of clause 51—

"The School Board shall also pay out of the school fund, and by way of addition to any sums payable out of the Parliamentary grant to each principal schoolmaster or schoolmistress, an annual salary, to be fixed on the occasion of each appointment, of an amount (unless the Scotch Education Department shall in any case otherwise determine) not less than fifty pounds nor more than one hundred pounds in the case of a schoolmaster in a burgh school, and not less than thirty-five pounds nor more than eighty pounds in the case of a school in a landward parish, and not less than twenty pounds nor more than forty pounds in the case of any schoolmistress. The schoolmaster or schoolmistress shall likewise be entitled to the interest or annual produce of any bequest or endowment for his or her behoof."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that, as the question had already been once decided, he must decline to repeat the arguments which he then urged against the proposal.

MR. GORDON denied that the Amendment was similar to the one which had already been rejected, because the former Amendment involved the question of fees under the Parliamentary grant as well as of salaries. There had been a similar proposal in the Bill introduced last year.

MR. MACFIE said, he should support the Amendment unless he heard a very strong argument from the Lord Advocate against it. He believed the hon. and learned Gentleman by bringing it forward was doing good service to the schoolmasters and to education generally.

MR. ORR EWING supported the Amendment, but thought there was little use of going to a division, but to trust that better terms might be obtained for teachers in "another place," where their services might be more appreciated.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

V.—TEACHERS.

Clause 52 (Teachers in office before the passing of the Act. Teachers appointed after passing of Act).

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved, in page 20, line 5, after "schools," leave out to end of clause, and insert—

"And every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the School Board, who shall assign to them such salaries as they think fit: Provided, that the principal teacher of every public school, in addition to such fees and such sum from the Parliamentary Grant as may be agreed on between the School Board and such teacher, shall receive annually from the local rates not less than ten pounds if his certificate of competency, as hereinafter required, is of the lowest class or degree, and not less than fifty pounds if his certificate is of the highest class or degree, and not less than such sum above ten pounds as shall be prescribed in the minutes of the Scotch Education Department, as hereinafter provided, if his certificate is of an intermediate class or degree."

The hon. Gentleman said: The object of this Amendment is to preserve for Scotland the advantages of the certificate system which it at present possesses. I must remind the Committee that, though both English and Scotch inspected schools are examined by the Revised Code, Scotch schools are not paid by it, but are still paid and governed by the old certificate Code. Scotland has hitherto resisted the application of the Revised Code, and has as yet not the least inclination to go under its yoke. Government payments to schools in Scotland are made in proportion to the class of certificate which the teachers hold. These payments vary from £15 on the lowest grade, to £30 on the highest. The system, at the present moment, in Scotland is this—Suppose the managers of a school desire a teacher, they apply to the Committee of Privy Council for his services, and the Committee make it a condition that the managers shall contribute an equal payment by subscriptions, and guarantee a like amount from fees. Thus, if the teacher's certificates carry a payment of £20 from the Government, the school managers must provide £20 by subscriptions, and, in most cases, must guarantee a third sum of £20 by fees. That is the actual code ruling of Scotch inspected schools at the present moment, and no one alleges that it works badly. In fact, examination by the Revised Code proves that Scotch schools have a considerably larger percentage of passes than English schools. Now, what I propose by this Amendment simply is to retain for Scotland the advantages of its present certificate system, without preventing the Government from adopting the Revised Code in future, for I bow to the inevitable. My proposal is nothing more than that ratepayers, or their elected representatives, should place themselves in the position of existing school managers; for, as they assume their functions, they ought to contribute to the salaries of teachers, as school managers have always hitherto done without a murmur. The Lord Advocate will no doubt say that my proposal is only a minimum salary under another name. No doubt it is. It is a minimum salary, not on a dead level for all teachers, whether good or bad; but one dependent for its amount on the varying qualifications of teachers. Why should we destroy the certificate system in Scotland merely to please the Committee of Council's ideas of uniformity? I do not ask for one penny from Imperial taxation. I only ask for power for the Scotch ratepayers to apply the inevitable payment of the rates in the direction which past experience has shown to be most productive in results. Nor will this mode of payment add one shilling to the rates, for these must be forthcoming to an amount which will supplement the fees so as to equal the Government grant, otherwise no grants will be given. To understand this, let me remind the House that the Scotch Commissioners have shown that average attendances in each country school in Scotland amount to about 70 children, and that their average fees are 8s. 8d. Now, the cost of education is 30s. per child, so that the expense of our typical school is £105. To meet this the school, if entirely successful, may win the maximum of 15s. per head from Government grants, or £52; but, as a condition for obtaining this sum, it must provide an equal sum from fees and rates. But the fees are only £30, so that the inevitable rates must be £22. Now, I should be exceedingly satisfied with the working of my Amendment if it produced an average sum of £22 on the certificates. So that it is obvious the rates need not be increased by a single shilling, and the current expenses, beyond the teacher's remuneration, might be met by an imposition of the school board upon the fees and the Government grant. Besides, the scheme, as I propose it, would come very gradually into operation. It would not apply at all to the present occupants of parochial schools, nor would it extend to denominational schools. It would, therefore, be of very gradual introduction, and would thus give ample time to show its effects before they became very extended. I hope the Committee will clearly grasp this fact—that the Amendment does not operate at all on Imperial taxation, and that it does not add a shilling to local taxation, but only directs that into old channels which experience has proved to be very useful to the interests of the country. Who, then, objects to the proposed Amendment? Not the schoolmasters; for they have petitioned in its favour. Not the ratepayers; for they have sent up no Petitions against it, and various important bodies have petitioned in its favour. But, though I have not yet heard of any public objections, I know the official objections which are likely to be brought forward against the adoption of this Amendment. Thus, we may be told that the scheme will be to the disadvantage of teachers, by limiting the area of selection of those who obtain a high class of certificate, with a proportionately high amount fixed on it. I may here mention that my very highest sum is £50 less than the average fixed salary of parochial teachers at the present moment, and that the lowest is the paltry sum of £10. What reason is there for saying that a high certificate carrying a higher payment will prevent a teacher being in demand? None that I know of, except that it may be convenient to use it for the purpose of to-day's debate. Experience is all the other way, and of that there is ample, for Scotland enjoys the certificate system at present. Now, it is well known that the active demand at the present time is for teachers with highly-paid certificates, and the lowest demand is for teachers with cheap certificates. If to the results of this experience it is replied—"That may be true at the present time, with school managers of culture and intelligence, but it may not be so with local boards elected by ratepayers," then I say that is a condemnation of the scheme of local boards proposed by this Bill. The Lord Advocate ought to be the last man to doubt them, for he has always contended that they will be well qualified to fulfil every duty of school managers. If the point of the objection be, that a highly-qualified teacher has a smaller number of situations open to him than an inferior teacher, that is a truism applicable to all such cases. The Professor of an University has fewer places open to him than the teacher of a secondary school, and the latter than the teacher of an elementary school. But this fact only operates disadvantageously, when there is a greater supply of highly-qualified teachers than there is a demand for them. That is not the case with our Scotch elementary schools at present, and it will be the faulty operation of this Bill if it be so in the future. Highly-certificated teachers are in greater demand than supply. Besides, as I have already mentioned, the system is not rigid but elastic. Both the fees and the grant go into the school fund, out of which the local board can readily adjust the conditions of the teacher's remuneration. Recollect, that I am not proposing a new thing, but only desiring to maintain the present certificate system, which has worked so well, both in the interests of schools and of their teachers. Surely a class of men are generally alive to their own interests, and when they want a continuance of the system, we need not be afraid that we are doing them an injury. It is not for the teacher's interest, but for the public interest that I press this Amendment. Under the English Revised Code the qualifications of teachers have much deteriorated. It is actually the case that, before 1857, a pupil teacher passed a higher examination than a principal teacher now requires to pass. Such a deterioration in our teachers would be fatal to Scotch education, because it is the custom in Scotch schools to teach secondary subjects of instruction. By maintaining the certificate system, with payments augmented according to qualifications, you induce the teachers to study higher subjects and there is little fear that when they possess the knowledge they will refuse to impart it. Thus you will prevent the lowering of the qualifications of teachers which has within the last few years been specially reported upon by the Royal Commission on Science. As that damaging Report, the qualifications of English teachers must be raised, now ask you not to allow the qualifications of Scotch teachers to be lowered a similar operation of the Revised Code and thus to render it unnecessary some Royal Commission, 10 years hence to remonstrate with the Government having allowed them to sink so low. The right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, in his anticipatory answer to my speech last Friday, told us that he had the security that local boards would desire the continuance of higher subjects in schools, and will therefore select highly qualified men to teach them. He said the constitution of the local boards would ensure the same class of men upon them as at present, no doubt this would be the case. Hitherto they have consisted of heritors and ministers, both classes having been educated in public schools and Universities. These men of culture and intelligence appreciated the value of higher subjects, and liked to see them taught in the schools under their care. But will you have the security that the new boards will have members of an equal amount of education? In large towns this may be so; in small towns and country districts it is not probable that the ratepayers will secure members of equal culture. There has been already some experience on this subject in Scotland, and I will describe it, especially as I am about to quote the words of the Lord Advocate's own secretary, when he was Assistant Commissioner to the country districts under the Scotch Education Commission. Mr. Sellar says in his official Report—

Dr. Lyon Playfair

"It is no exaggeration to say that from the most southern part of Scotland to John o' Groats we were met with the same outcry—'Save from local boards.'"

He shows that 48 per cent of the schools managed by local boards were unsatisfactory; and he continues—

"The real worth of a teacher is not the price that is solely regarded by electing bodies of kind. They know that they are not qualified to decide upon a teacher's merits, and they fly off on some course which they think they can understand."

Possibly, by this time, the Lord Advocate may have converted his secretary from his former opinions to those more consonant with his own; but I hold by the experience and fresh impressions of the Assistant Commissioner, and think he was right. I agree with him that local boards in country districts, though less so in towns, will require to be educated to their duties, and are not likely, for some time at least, to be good judges of the qualifications of teachers. I wish, therefore, to give to the teachers themselves a motive and a stimulus to higher qualifications by maintaining that certificate system under which they now work in Scotland. It will do no one any harm; it does not render more expensive or more complex the central administration; it does not do more than give to the inevitable payment of rates that direction which experience has already proved to be productive of admirable results. It helps to maintain the characteristics of Scotch education, and prevents one uniform Anglicising of our schools, regardless of our national peculiarities formed by the experience of centuries, and which ought not to be thrust aside by the 12 months' experience which England has of a national system. For these reasons, I do hope the Committee will support me in carrying this Amendment, upon which I must divide if it be not accepted by the Government.

Amendment proposed,

In page 20, line 8, to leave out from the word "schools" to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words "and every appointment shall be during the pleasure of the School Board, who shall assign to them such salaries as they think fit: Provided, That the principal teacher of every public school, in addition to such fees and such sum from the Parliamentary Grant as may be agreed on between the School Board and such teacher, shall receive annually from the local rates not less than ten pounds if his certificate of competency, as hereinafter required, is of the lowest class or degree, and not less than fifty pounds if his certificate is of the highest class or degree, and not less than such sum above ten pounds as shall be prescribed in the minutes of the Scotch Education Department, as hereinafter provided, if his certificate is of an intermediate class or degree."—(Dr. Lyon Playfair.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was certainly due to his hon. Friend, who had paid so much attention to this subject, that he should give his best and most earnest consideration to any Amendment proposed by him. He confessed, however, that he could not give his assent to the Amendment. It seemed to him to be open to those objections which he stated against the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon) on a former occasion. It was also objectionable, as being not only not in favour of, but directly, and very hardly, and even harshly detrimental to schoolmasters; and he was not persuaded that that view was unsound because schoolmasters had petitioned in favour of the Amendment. It did not apply to any existing schoolmasters at all, and he was doubtful whether those who had petitioned in its favour had altogether appreciated it. It regarded candidates for the office of schoolmaster, and provided for degrees in certificates of competency 1st, 2nd, and 3rd—the 1st being the highest. It was the universal experience that masters who had attained the highest certificates were not necessarily in practice the best, the most successful, and most efficient teachers. That was not true with respect to teachers obtaining first class certificates any more than it was true with respect to professional men or men engaged in business, that those who had received the highest honours at school or college were always the most successful in the prosecution of their profession or business. He quite admitted that the probability was that it might be, and that the teacher with a high class certificate would succeed better than a teacher with a low class certificate; but the advantage of a certificate to him was as an introduction and as a recommendation to begin with; but after he had entered upon the office of teacher, he would succeed or fail, obtain a higher or lower remuneration, continue in or leave his employment, according to his success; and it did not at all necessarily depend upon the class of his certificate. Now, this Amendment—unless he quite misread it—created a statutory disability against teachers holding a certificate of a high class, because it rendered it illegal for them to expect employment as teachers upon such terms as they could get, and were willing and anxious to take. Suppose there was a vacancy in the office of teacher in a public school in Scotland, and the school board being able to give a salary of, say, £120 a-year, advertised the vacancy, and invited candidates to bring forward their testimonials. According to the best calculations that could be made, £100 out of the £120 would be contributed by the fees and the grants, leaving only £20 to be paid out of the rates. They could not, therefore, have a first class schoolmaster with a first class certificate. He could not apply for the situation, because he was prohibited by Act of Parliament from taking it, if this Amendment were passed, unless £50 was paid out of the rates. And let him, therefore, be ever so willing and anxious to take the place, and let the board be ever so willing and anxious to have him, he was yet prohibited by law from entering into that contract, and they must take a schoolmaster on a lower certificate, because, to satisfy the condition of the statute as it would stand in this Amendment, £20 out of the rates would only secure a teacher with a lower class certificate. In addition, therefore, to all the evils which would arise from interfering with the just rights of schoolmasters and school boards to make their own bargains, they would have this evil, which he considered would be a monstrous hardship to the teachers, that they would say to him—"We prohibit you from taking any situation unless you can get £50 out of the rates." Upon these grounds he must oppose the Amendment.

Mr. SAMUELSON, as a Member of the Commission which had been referred to, supported the Amendment. If there was to be no value attached to the certificates of the various grades, what was the use of a certificate at all? He hoped the hon. Member would make a stand upon this—that until they were better informed upon the subject, they would not allow the degradation of schoolmasters to proceed.

Mr. M'LAREN said, he held in his hand a letter from a heritor of a very small parish, the population of which was under 200 souls. There were 15 children at the parish school, and the emoluments of the teacher were £70 a-year, and had applied for an additional £8. He pointed out that in this instance the Amendment would not work beneficially; nor, in another instance, of a parish in the northern counties, which was 60 miles long. There were in this parish 60 schools, and the Amendment would fix an arbitrary high rate for the payment of masters of each one of them.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the Committee had already decided against fixing a minimum salary. This was a proposal to fix a minimum salary, though at greater inconvenience to the teacher and the scholar.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR, in reply, said, that in order to meet the cases of the Highland districts, he began with as low a salary as £10. In answer to the Lord Advocate's objection, he contended that the fees and grants hinged on the roughly elastic method of making whatever salaries the school boards liked to have. He should press his Amendment to a division.

MR. GORDON approved of the Amendment of his hon. Friend, and would give it his vote, although it did not go so far as he could wish.

Question put, "That the words 'who shall assign to them such salaries or emoluments as they think fit' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 106: Majority 35.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

PARLIAMENT—COUNTS OF THE HOUSE. RESOLUTION.

MR. BOWRING rose to move — "That every Member taking notice that 40 Members are not present shall do so from his place." The hon. Member observed that the late Speaker stated before the Select Committee on Public Business, which sat last year, that it would be desirable that Notice should be taken that 40 Members were not present in a public manner; and Sir Erskine May also stated that it would be desirable to attach some personal responsibility to the act of taking Notice that 40 Members were not present, and not to have it done furtively, as it were, from behind the Speaker's Chair. He (Mr. Bowring) also quoted an extract from The Illustrated London News of 1860 to show that the present practice was of modern origin—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 12th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Bedford County, v. Francis Charles Hastings Russell, esquire, now Duke of Bedford.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Juries Act Amendment (Ireland)* [195].

Second Reading—Criminal Trials (Ireland) [47], put off; Wildfowl Protection [46]; Agricultural Children [104]; Mines Dues [177], debate adjourned; Masters and Workmen (Arbitration)* [123].

Committee — Report — Third Reading—Elementary Education (Provisional Order Confirmation)* [175]; Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation)* [181], and passed.

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 3)* [188]; Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 4)* [189], and passed.

Withdrawn—Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment [79].

CRIMINAL TRIALS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Sir John Gray, Mr. Pim, Mr. Synan.)

[BILL 47.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the measure was a supplement to the Bill for the amendment of the jury system in Ireland which was passed last Session by Lord O'Hagan. In the drafting of that Bill some mistake had occurred which had hitherto rendered the Bill a dead letter, and another Bill was now before the House to give life and operation to the Act of last year. By that Act it was proposed to reform the qualification of jurors, to distribute more equally the duty of serving upon juries, and to purify the administration of justice by putting some check on the unlimited discretion of sheriffs in selecting and returning jury panels for the trial of civil and criminal cases. So far it was good; but it was defective in not dealing in any way with the monstrous and unjust practice which allowed the Crown an unlimited number of peremptory challenges. Before Lord O'Hagan's Act passed, the sub-sheriffs in Ireland had absolute discretion to return what names they pleased to serve on juries, with the exception that they were bound to take the names from the existing jurors' book, and the effect was, that in almost every case in which political or religious feelings were involved, objections had been raised that the jurors had been unfairly returned. The best remedy for that state of things would probably have been to confine sheriffs to the duty of summoning the jurors, and to leave the selection to be made by Ballot in open court; but this course was not adopted, and in lieu of it the Bill of last Session provided that the sheriff should return in future one juror from each letter in the alphabet in succession, going regularly through from first to last as often as occasion might require. This was, no doubt, a great improvement upon the present system; but time alone would tell whether it would carry out the object aimed at. His (Sir Colman O'Loughlen's) present Bill dealt with a most important matter—a matter which the Bill of his noble Friend in no way touched upon—the right of challenging jurors; and it was intended to provide that jurors in criminal trials in Ireland should henceforth be chosen, as in civil trials, by Ballot, and to abolish the power of the Crown in such trials to set aside jurors without cause assigned to an unlimited extent. Under the existing state of the law, in civil cases there was no right of peremptory challenge, and no juror could be challenged without cause. In criminal cases, however, the law was entirely different. The accused had the right of challenging a certain number of jurors peremptorily without assigning any cause, and in all criminal cases the Crown could challenge as many jurors as it pleased without assigning any cause. The whole system of challenging jurors was at present very anomalous; for a person charged with treason or felony was entitled to a challenge peremptorily, but a person charged with a misdemeanour was not. Now, considering that in these days misdemeanours were punishable with penal servitude for 10 or 15 years, or even for life, he thought the right of peremptory challenge should be extended to misdemeanour as well as to felonies. In the case of the Tichborne Claimant, for instance, it was in the power of the Crown to try the prisoner either for a felony or for a misdemeanour; and, if tried for felony, he would be entitled to object to 20 jurors, whereas, if tried for misdemeanour, he could object to none at all. By an ordinance of Edward the First, it was intended to do away with the right of peremptory challenge on the part of the Crown which existed under the common law, and to compel the Crown whenever it challenged to assign a cause. Unfortunately, however, that ordinance subsequently received a judicial construction—especially from Chief Justice Pemberton, and other Judges of the 17th century, when the Bench was disgraced by men like Scroggs and Jeffreys—which had the effect of practically repealing it, and of giving the Crown an unlimited power of challenge. The object of his Bill, therefore, was to provide that, on all criminal trials, the Crown should have the same right of challenge only as the subject, and should not be allowed to bid jurors to stand by till the panel was gone through. The last time the question was raised in the Courts was in 1838, when, in Frost's trial, Sir Frederick Pollock, afterwards the Lord Chief Baron, asked the Court to set aside the old decisions of Charles II. as erroneous. On that occasion that distinguished lawyer drew the attention of the Court to the fact that the panel consisted of 240 names; that the challenges for cause, coupled with the 35 peremptory challenges to which the prisoner was restricted by the law, could hardly be expected to exceed 50; that deducting those 50 from the 240 names on the panel, there would remain 190 jurors, and that the Crown would have the right by postponing its challenges for cause to select precisely the 12 individuals out of the 190 that it might think most convenient for the administration of justice to select, and that thus the Crown would have the means of packing the jury. And, again, Sir Fitz Roy Kelly, the present Lord Chief Baron, on the same occasion, said that if their Lordships were to give their sanction to the doctrine contended for by the Crown, then the officers of the Crown would have the right to pack the jury and to select the 12 jurors that were to try the prisoners, and that he could hardly believe that, in a Court of Justice now-a-days, when the point was put forward and made intelligible to those who heard it discussed, the Officers of the Crown would stand up and defend so monstrous and unjust a claim. The Bill which he now asked the House to read a second time proposed that jurors in criminal as well as in civil cases should be selected by Ballot, and that the Crown should have just the same rights of challenge as the prisoner had and no more. He could not say exactly what was the practice in England; but he knew that in Ireland the excessive right of challenge on the part of the Crown had been most injurious to the proper administration of justice. In 1839 a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to inquire into what was called "crime and outrage" in Ireland, when Judge Perrin, one of the most distinguished constitutional lawyers who ever sat on the Bench, gave evidence to the effect that the practice of setting aside jurors by the Crown was most disagreeable to the jurors personally, and that it was generally injurious to the administration of justice, by tending to create a feeling in the minds of the people that the verdict was not the result of a cool, deliberate, and impartial trial, but might have been affected by the opinion of particular individuals designedly put upon the jury, and by enabling the prosecutor, especially in misdemeanour cases, to set aside any jurors he pleased in order to prevent a vigilant, searching, impartial, and painstaking inquiry by persons whom he thought able and likely to institute it, if he thought his case an infirm one. The learned Judge further said that the practice amounted in many cases to packing the jury, and that he thought the names of the jurors should be drawn by Ballot as in civil cases, and that the right of peremptory challenge should be equal in the case of the prisoner and of the Crown. The learned Judge also said he had known many instances in Crown prosecutions where he thought the practice had been improperly and injuriously applied. In 1834, in a trial for the murder of a clergyman of the Established Church, arising out of the Tithe Agitation, a number of persons were set aside by the Crown. A Return of the names of the persons so set aside was made to Parliament on the Motion of the then hon. Member for Kildare, from which it appeared that a considerable number of persons were set aside who were principally Roman Catholics and persons who were connected with Roman Catholics by marriage. There was thus ample evidence that up to 1838 the power of the Crown in the matter of challenge was frequently abused, and he regretted to say that even up to the present time cases had occurred in which he himself had witnessed an abuse of that power. He had been present at most of the political trials of recent years, and he had seen many instances which seemed to show that the practice was still in force; and was capable of being put into force in all cases in which the feelings of the Irish people were excited. Those who at one time seemed to be very acute in their opposition to the practice, and who were aware of all the evils which resulted from it, lost their acuteness and changed their opinions when they became Attorney Generals for Ireland, as they then undertook the defence of the system which they had before condemned. In the language of Pope—

Sir Colman O'Loughlen

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet, seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

He intended this measure as a supplement to Lord O'Hagan's Act, and he only regretted that the noble Lord had not had last year the courage to go a step further than he had done, and to have rendered his measure complete by embodying in it the proposals which were put forward in the present Bill, for he thought all must coincide with him in saying that it was an odious system which gave power to the Crown to pack juries as at present. Not only that, but as a matter of principle it was most important that the practice should be done away with, because it was calculated to make the people say when a fair trial had taken place, that the reverse was actually the case. If, as it had been said, a conviction could not be had in Ireland without packing juries, it would be better to abolish trial by jury there, and allow Judges in criminal cases, as in Election Petitions, to be Judges of law and of fact. He was happy to say that the English Law Officers of the Crown had introduced a Bill into that House, in which they proposed that jurors should be selected by Ballot in criminal as well as in civil cases, and to limit the number of peremptory challenges by the Crown to 24 as against 12 on the part of the prisoner. Under those circumstances, he could not see how it could be contended by the Government that a change in the law which would be beneficial to England would not be equally beneficial to Ireland. Although he was afraid that he should not be successful in carrying his Bill during the present year, he intended to divide the House on the Motion for its second reading, and if it were rejected he should bring it forward Session after Session until it became the law of the land. The right hon. and learned Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he should have been glad had some other hon. Member risen to address the House upon this subject before he spoke upon the Bill on behalf of the Government—in the first place, because he was anxious to hear all that could be said in favour of the Bill; and, secondly, because he was the only Member of the Irish Government present on that occasion. As, however, no one had risen to support the Motion, he had to say on the part of the Government, that they could not assent to it, and he therefore hoped he should be able to satisfy the House that it would be inexpedient to read the Bill a second time that day. He was convinced that the measure could not become law during the present Session, and he deprecated the practice which had sprung up of reading Bills with the principle of which the House disagreed, a second time, when there was not the slightest chance of their ever being committed, merely, with the view of making things easy. Even if the House were to agree with the principle of the Bill, he thought the time had not yet arrived for the introduction of this measure. His right hon. and learned Friend said that the Government had passed a Jury Act last Session, and that it was a step in advance, and a great improvement in the law, but seemed surprised that it had not come into operation yet. No doubt, it was a great step in advance, but it could not come into operation until the first day of Hilary Term in 1873. There were provisions in the Act which would have enabled it to come into operation sooner; but, owing to an error, the City of Dublin could not be included in the Order in Council, which was a condition precedent to the Act coming into operation before the term he had mentioned. It was considered advisable, therefore, not to bring it into operation as to the rest of Ireland. His right hon. and learned Friend had alluded to his want of acuteness in not discovering certain points in connection with this subject; but he should recollect that the Bill came down to him from the House of Lords, where he (the Attorney General) supposed there was as much acuteness running to waste as there was in the House of Commons. Therefore, if he found fault with him for want of acuteness, he would have to find fault with others also. The Jury Act, it had been said, when it came into operation, would cause a great reform in the jury law. Reform was very much needed. He was of that opinion, both before he took office as Attorney General and now that he filled that office. He had forfeited none of his opinions upon the question for the purpose of taking office, as some hon. Gentlemen might think; and if he had to sacrifice any of his opinions in order to hold office, he would gladly give it up to-morrow. Turning to the arguments of his right hon. and learned Friend, what did the 19th section of the Jury Act provide? It provided that those who were to serve upon a jury panel should have their names drawn up in alphabetical order. The intention was, in fact, to have a sort of roster; when that was done, the list was made out, and constituted the panel. That was the mode of proceeding, and the sheriff was deprived of the objectionable power now possessed by him of selecting the jury. The right hon. and learned Member for Clare had coolly said that his Bill was a supplementary Bill to that of Lord O'Hagan's. It might be supplementary, but it was supplementary in such a manner as to do away altogether with the one to which it was supplementary. His right hon. and learned Friend had given them to understand that Lord O'Hagan was entirely of his opinion in this matter; but that, as he did not like to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown, he had left it to be dealt with by a private Member. [Sir Colman O'Loghlen said, he did not for a moment mean to say that the Bill was proposed to him by Lord O'Hagan.] Well, then, his right hon. and learned Friend meant to say that Lord O'Hagan did not propose it to him, but left it lying about for any private Member to take up. ["No, no!"] Very well, let that pass. He would ask the House the question, were they never to have an end to legislation of the present kind? In Ireland, the House should remember, there was a public prosecutor, who represented the Crown in the conduct of prosecutions, except in very few instances, such as those of libel or private fraud. That, he contended, was a wise arrangement, because the Crown imposed the responsibility of the prosecution upon the Attorney General, who was a Member of the Administration, and therefore amenable to the Government for his conduct. There was no danger, therefore, of any abuse of the power now possessed, while in private prosecutions the power was taken away by the Act of 1871. It would be far better to leave matters as they stood at present, and wait and give the Act which would come into operation in 1873 a fair and impartial trial. There were too many little useless Bills like his right hon. and learned Friend's smuggled through the House at an early hour in the morning—indeed, Parliament had passed not less than 4,000 public statutes during the present reign—and he did not think the present Bill was any better on the ground that it was being discussed at half-past 1 in the afternoon instead of at the same hour in the morning. It was a Bill, moreover, which ought never to have been brought in, as there was a deliberate arrangement entered into last Session with respect to the jury laws. Had his right hon. and learned Friend thought fit to bring into effect such a principle as was proposed in his Bill, he should have moved it as an Amendment to Clause 24 of the Bill, to which he said it was supplemental; and it was no excuse for any hon. Member to say he was absent from the House when the Bill was in Committee. While that Bill was passing through the House not one of the Irish Members made the slightest suggestion with reference to an alteration of that clause. That great reform of the law relating to juries in Ireland, which was introduced by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland last year, passed through the House of Lords with the assent of the Law Lords and of the other Lords, and it passed through the House of Commons also in a friendly spirit. That Bill was a great settlement, which ought not to be disturbed by such a measure as this. His right hon. and learned Friend had referred to the Bill which the Attorney General had introduced with regard to juries in England. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) was anxious that the same laws which governed England should govern Ireland; but the most advanced Irish Member would admit that peculiar circumstances might require different legislation for the two countries. Moreover, the Bill introduced by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland had not yet passed into law. It had gone before a Select Committee, of which he (the Attorney General for Ireland) was a Member. The Committee were endeavouring day after day to make it a perfect Bill, and he was anxious that, whatever was proposed for England might be extended to Ireland; but his right hon. and learned Friend must not suppose that that Bill had yet received the sanction of the Select Committee. If, when that Bill came from the Select Committee it should be found to contain principles which might be advantageous to Ireland, let them be extended to that country. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) contended that no case was made out for an alteration of the law; indeed, in some respects, the English Bill was less liberal than the Irish Act, for the Bill now before the Select Committee proposed that the qualification of a juror in England should be much higher than it was in Ireland by law at this moment. His right hon. and learned Friend wished that a jury should be taken by Ballot; well, the Bill introduced by Lord O'Hagan provided that a jury list should be prepared in alphabetical order, that, he contended, answered equally well. The Irish jury law tended to strengthen the confidence of all classes of the community in the juries selected; but he maintained that the Bill of his right hon. and learned Friend in that respect would not create such confidence; while with regard to the cases of injustice referred to, and the reference of his right hon. and learned Friend to Judge Perrin, in which he (the Attorney General for Ireland) coincided, as condemning them, they belonged to a past time, and did not arise under the present system. His right hon. and learned Friend had said much of challenging jurors, and so-called "packing" of juries; but his right hon. and learned Friend, who was second Serjeant-at-Law, and who was one of the Crown prosecutors in Ireland, had, if his statement was correct that agreeable duty to perform, for he was his (the Attorney General's) official deputy on the Munster Circuit, and he hoped his right hon. and learned Friend preached different doctrines when on circuit than he did in that House. But, of course, his right hon. and learned Friend had a right to say in that House what he liked for himself. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) believed that the Crown solicitors who had the management of such matters, had no desire but that of doing their duty irrespective of religion or politics; and the rules which governed them with reference to their dealing with jurors prevented them from taking exception to any juror on the ground of religion or politics. He hoped no person would think he was defending jury "packing." He objected to such a practice, and would never sanction it in any way. He knew that misrepresentations were frequently made to the people of Ireland of the course pursued by him in that House. Probably, the telegraphic wires would flash throughout Ireland with reference to his opposition to this Bill—"Dowse is at his old work again," meaning that he was taking a course opposed to the interests of the people of Ireland, but he was indifferent to such misrepresentations. His right hon. and learned Friend said that Members of the Government advocated principles very different from those which they had advocated before they obtained office. Well, on that matter, he might observe that his right hon. and learned Friend was more lively now than when he sat on the Ministerial bench; but he disliked such a tu quoque argument. He denied that he now advocated any principle which he would not advocate if he were out of office. As long as he was in office he would not be a party to any measure prejudicial to the rights or interests of his fellow-countrymen; for he was as anxious as anyone to see the same laws for Ireland as for England; but he did not agree with those Irish Members who were constantly standing in the front shouting out in indifferent

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

The Attorney General for Ireland

Latin—"Excelsior." The Bill of his right hon. and learned Friend sought to disturb the settlement of a great question, and had he known that there was a real desire to bring it on he would have put down an Amendment to it. That he had neglected to do so was for the reason he had given, but not because he was afraid to meet the question. He should now move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. BAGWELL said, there was a great difference between the nature of crime committed in England and the nature of crime committed in Ireland. In England, generally speaking, crime was committed for the sake of personal revenge or plunder; but the principal portion of the crimes committed in Ireland were agrarian, and the offenders received a large amount of public sympathy. It was, therefore, the duty of the Government to take care that the persons charged with agrarian crimes in Ireland should be tried in such a way that if they were found guilty, there might be a fair prospect of their being convicted, and that at the same time innocent persons should have the protection of the law with regard to life and property. The Act passed last year with regard to juries in Ireland had gone far to remove any theoretical objections to the criminal law in that country, and he concurred with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland in thinking that the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare, instead of introducing this measure, ought to have dealt with this question when that Act was under the consideration of the House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had referred to the placarding of hon. Members as opponents of the people of Ireland, because they took an unpopular side, although a fact they advocated a course which they thought was beneficial to that country. Well, he (Mr. Bagwell) had poken all his life for the people of Ireland, and on this occasion he had no objection to be described as a satellite of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. SYNAN said, he did not think that anything the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had said in opposition to this Bill called for a reply. The objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that it was useless to read the Bill a second time, because there was no time to pass it through the subsequent stages, would apply equally to five-sixths of the Bills which were now among the Orders of the House ; and, further, if the present was not the time for settling this question, when would that time come? Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman adduced a particle of evidence to show that the right of challenging 20 persons might not be safely conceded alike to the prisoner and to the Crown? Was it right, as under the present system, that a power should be given to the Crown of challenging every man on the jury list, until a jury that could be relied on to convict the prisoner was found? In his (Mr. Synan's) opinion, it was not; and he maintained it was the duty of Parliament to devise some system which would not lead the Irish people to the suspicion that juries were packed in order to procure a conviction. The right hon. and learned Gentleman contended that there was no reason to complain of the way in which juries were empannelled. But there was evidence in the the Blue Books of the House to show that juries in Ireland had been packed. His right hon. and learned Friend objected to the use of the word "packed." But Chief Barons Pollock and Kelly in England, and Judge Perrin in Ireland, had used the word. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had failed to show that on principle this Bill was objectionable, and he (Mr. Synan) denied there was any inconsistency in it, or that it was a repeal of the Act of Lord O'Hagan. His right hon. and learned Friend who had moved the second reading (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) had said that sooner than have the system of packing juries continued he would prefer to leave the prisoner in the hands of the Judge. In that he could not agree with his right hon. and learned Friend. If he saw Judges in Ireland conduct themselves with that discretion which his right hon. and learned Friend no doubt presupposed—if he saw them treat subjects from the Bench in the manner and with the language which as Judges they were bound to do, he might be reconciled to such a change. But bad as the present system was, he preferred that it should continue when he saw instances in which Judges brought their own passions, prejudices, and heat, to bear on the decision of questions. His right hon. and learned Friend was, moreover, willing to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and therefore there ought to be no objection to read it a second time.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE remarked that the question must be considered with regard to the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, and that it should be borne in mind that the Crown, in exercising the right of challenge, did so under a full sense of responsibility, with full publicity, and with the knowledge that the Ministers of the Crown were liable to be called to account in the House of Commons. The judicial system in Ireland was surrounded with difficulties, for owing to political and religious differences the administration of justice there and in this country could not be looked at altogether in the same way, and he had often been struck by the great moral courage shown by Irish juries in finding verdicts, sometimes at the hazard of their lives. If, however, as proposed, Parliament was to take away from the Crown the power of setting aside jurymen, it must be prepared to consider how long the unanimous finding of a verdict could be enforced, for it appeared to him contrary to nature to expect that 12 men, taking such opposite views of things as was usual in Ireland, should find unanimous verdicts. At present, it was no uncommon occurrence in that country that a man should be put on his trial, the witnesses undergo a long cross-examination, the Judge sum up impartially, and yet no verdict be returned after all. The prisoner was then sent back, and often tried a second, and sometimes a third time. He had in such cases often asked himself what was the good of trying a man over and over again? On the one hand, it seemed a pity that a man who in the opinion of everybody was guilty should escape punishment; but on the other, even if innocent, he did not escape, for heavy bail was required which could rarely be obtained, and the man really underwent a long imprisonment, though he had never been convicted. The Jury Bill of Lord O'Hagan which had been passed last year was, no doubt, in many respects an improvement; but there was one peculiarity in it to which his attention had been called by a sub-sheriff, and that was the provision for taking the names alphabetically. In some parts of the country there was a great number of Celtic names which began with the letters M and O, and the religion and politics of the people went all the same way. If one of the co-religionists of these men was put on his trial, and he happened to get into this series of names, he might have a great chance of acquittal, but, on the other hand, if he got into the Protestant series his chance might be very little. He would only add, that if the law on the subject was to be changed at all, it ought to be changed on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, and not on that of a private Member; and when Government were of opinion that this power of challenge—which he disliked extremely—could be got rid of, he would be the first to vote for it. Remembering, however, the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, he should in this instance feel obliged to support the Amendment.

MR. PIM, in support of the Bill, said, that the object of the Bill was to secure a fair jury impartially chosen, and what was wanted was not only a jury which should be fairly and impartially chosen, but which would be recognized as such by the people of Ireland, so that no Irishman could say that anything unfair had been done. There was no doubt that persons whose guilt was as clear as noonday had at times been acquitted in Ireland, and that took place under the present system. But if justice could not be administered, and the law enforced by means of juries impartially chosen, it would be better that even guilty persons should escape conviction rather than that the constitutional form of justice should be strained in order to insure a conviction. If the jury system would not work when impartially administered, some other means of enforcing the law must be resorted to. It was better, when occasion required it, and the necessity was shown, to set aside the Constitution for a time, rather than to strain it habitually. He regretted to say that the administration of justice had long been regarded in Ireland as a contest carried on between two parties, or as a hostile proceeding, and therefore it was of the greatest importance that everything that was done should have the moral advantage of being above suspicion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it had often been stated that there was a rooted belief in the minds of the people of Ireland that justice was not impartially administered. Whether that belief was well or ill-founded—whatever could be done to remove it would be for the benefit of the Empire at large, and it was therefore the duty of the Government to introduce some reform in the administration of justice in its initiatory forms. This Bill did not propose to deprive the Crown of the right of challenge, but only to place both sides on an equality, to allow the Crown 20 challenges, or whatever number might be considered right, and the prisoner as many. When it was remembered that for the future jurors were to be taken from the lists in alphabetical order, an equal power of challenge might be conceded to the prisoner without the smallest fear that the object of the prosecution would be frustrated. The object of a prosecution should be not to obtain a conviction, but to ensure that an innocent man should not be unjustly convicted, and that in all cases in which verdicts of guilty were brought home to the accused, those verdicts should carry with them the weight of public opinion. If a failure of justice sometimes occurred, the Judges were not always free from blame, and there was an impression that in some instances they acted too much like partizans. He therefore trusted the House would read the Bill a second time.

MR. BRUEN said, he thought the Bill ought to be considered quite apart from all party considerations, and having done so, he had come to the conclusion that he ought to support the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, because there was no proof that the present law had worked injustice in Ireland.

MR. M'MAHON said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would allow the Bill to be read a second time and referred to the same Select Committee which was considering the English measure, for there could be no doubt that considerable distrust was felt in Ireland in the administration of the criminal law, owing to the present jury system.

Sir Frederick W. Heygate

The failure to secure convictions was sometimes attributed to the juries; but that was both incorrect and unjust, for Sir Joseph Napier stated before the Select Committee of 1855 that the real cause of the failure was often the slovenly, slobbering manner in which cases were presented by the Crown Prosecutor. He moreover knew of no circumstances which should justify one law on this subject in Ireland and another in England.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, the principle of the Bill was admitted by the Law Officers of the Crown in England, and the House ought to require some ingenious arguments and strong facts for refusing to apply the same system to Ireland. In case of a strong feeling against the Crown in a particular district, the Attorney General had power to change the venue, and that rendered it all the less necessary to preserve the present right of challenge by the Crown.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that in the South of Ireland great dissatisfaction existed with the present state of things, and it was felt that there was nothing more necessary than a reform of the law, for loyal Catholics there had been over and over again offended by the arbitrary order to "stand aside" as jurors. He had himself known instances in which the jury panel was manipulated in the most scandalous manner, and afterwards Catholics left on it were challenged by the Crown, and their feelings grossly insulted by this outrage. As to the Irish Judges he had a longer experience of Ireland than his hon. Friend (Mr. Mitchell Henry), and believed that, as a rule, the Irish Judges laid aside the advocate the moment they assumed the ermine. Men previously known as eager advocates, and in this House as keen partizans, became on the Bench fair and impartial in the administration of justice. He might mention the name of Chief Justice Whiteside, who was a keen partizan here, but whom he had seen conducting himself on the Bench with great dignity, moderation, and impartiality. He could say the same of many others. ["No, no!"] He maintained that the Irish Judges, as a rule, conducted themselves with as much decorum, gravity, and dignity, and with as great a desire to administer the law impartially, as the Judges in England. But, unhappily, there were exceptions, or, he might say, there was an exception, which proved the rule, though the rule made that exception more scandalous. He hoped the House would take away from the Crown the fatal and flagrant power exercised by subordinates of removing jurymen from the panel, and of making a most offensive distinction between one class of religionists and another, for it would be infinitely better that at every Assizes the Crown should fail to secure a conviction, than that the impression should go abroad that convictions were brought about by this right of challenge, or rather the abuse of this right of challenge.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in explanation, said, he had not cast imputations on the great body of the Irish Judges; but he had referred to the belief entertained in Ireland that there were Judges who forgot that they ceased to be advocates when they went upon the Bench. He could refer to trials in which juries had acquitted prisoners in consequence of the vehemence of the charges of the Judges.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in reply, said, he should be quite willing to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, or else defer further progress with the Bill until the English Jury Bill was reported.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 165: Majority 137.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

WILD FOWL PROTECTION BILL—[BILL 46.]

(Mr. Andrew Johnston, Colonel Tomline,
Mr. Brown.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. A. JOHNSTON said, that this measure was founded on the Sea Birds Act, which Parliament had passed in a former Session, and which had for its object the protection of that peculiar class of wild fowl during the breeding season. Like that, the object of the present measure was to protect certain remaining kinds of wild birds who resorted to this country to breed, and which were rapidly becoming extinct, owing to the inordinate and exterminating persecution to which they were subjected. Not only that, but he also thought that with the increase of feathered visitors which must inevitably arise under the Bill, when they found that persecution no longer awaited them, would be found, along perhaps with some new, the once familiar forms and agreeable songs of some which were now only retained in books or memory as having been once familiar to us. Salesmen and people generally in connection with the provision markets of the country were strongly in favour of the principle of the Bill, from a conviction that its enactments were calculated to improve the food supply of the country. He would also point out that these birds were carefully protected in the United States of America not by any general law of the land, but by individual laws in the States themselves, showing that in each of the States of a very democratically governed country, it had been found desirable and necessary to protect these birds during the breeding season. The same rules prevailed in Holland, and, indeed, he believed in most of the civilized countries of the world. His hon. Friend (Mr. A. Herbert), who had placed an Amendment on the Paper, might be quite right in his views; but they were of far too extensive a character to be grafted on to this measure, which was intended to be a practical one, designed to protect a special group of birds. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Andrew Johnston.)

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he should support the Bill, for in his opinion nothing showed a more depraved taste in the way of eating than the desire to eat snipe and wild fowl in the month of April, when they were little more than rancid oil bags, and no more fit for food than venison in the rutting season. Owing to the persecution to which these birds were subjected during the breeding season, the curlew, which was not bad food at table, was scarcely to be found in this country, and what was known as the Norfolk plover had nearly disappeared. The passing of a measure like that under consideration, therefore, would remedy that, and would tend to improve the quality of the food that they ate, and to increase the quantity. However, he was not prepared to go so far as the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Herbert), in whose name an Amendment stood on the Paper.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was of opinion that the Bill as it stood was a very useful measure, one that he heartily approved of, and hoped its passing would not be imperilled by such a proposal as that of which the hon. Member for Nottingham had given Notice. He moreover regretted that the Bill did not include certain species of birds which, though not indigenous, might be propagated here—certain species of wild goose such as the Egyptian goose, and others, which might be used for the purposes of food and of ornament.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT, in moving as an Amendment to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill—"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to provide for the protection of all Wild Birds during the breeding season," said, that he did so in no spirit of hostility to the Bill, although he had no very great enthusiasm for it, for, in his opinion, it smelt too much of the larder. What he regretted, however, was, that instead of giving protection to certain groups of birds, the Bill did not in the first instance include all birds; and then, if it were deemed necessary, to make exceptions, for all those birds were most useful in their habits. There was scarcely a tree or plant which had not its enemies in certain insects or worms. For instance, the apple tree had five or six enemies that attacked it at different stages—those who attacked the bark, those who drew the sap, two who took the bloom, and two more enemies who took the heart of the fruit. He had no time to speak of the injury done by insects to cattle, but he might just touch upon the damage done to the forests of Europe by beetles. In 1783 millions of beetles destroyed a large number of firs in the Hartz Forest. Even in Kensington Gardens some of the finest elms were destroyed by this cause. Then, again, they all knew the ravages that the wire worm committed upon the wheat plant, and it was said that it left its grub behind it, which continued its destructive habits for about five years. There were not only many plants, but even animals which were infested by various descriptions of insects; but at the same time, while there was this army of destruction there was also an army of protection in the shape of the small birds, which had been well called the police or the soldiery of nature. No doubt, these birds had many allies, such as the bat, the mole, the shrew, the hedgehog, and even the little glowworm, but the principal part of the work of destroying these hurtful insects was done by the birds. He asked the House to consider for a moment what a large proportion the migratory or foreign birds bore to those which were native inhabitants of our own country. He believed that there were more swallows or swifts in Great Britain than the whole number of native birds; but he did not ask the House to accept that as an authoritative statement, because it was a mere conjecture of his own. What brought the swallow over to our shores? Some said that it followed the sun, but that was a fable. The real reason that brought over the swallows was the immense quantity of insect life which was here awaiting them at a time when, during the breeding season, they could find none in their own country. The extent to which birds, he might add, fed on insect life was hardly credible. Mr. Ware, whose benevolent views with respect to animals were well known, took the trouble to get up in the middle of the night to count how many times some birds fed their young. He ascertained that the swallow fed its young 36 times within an hour; the redstart, using gooseberry flies, 23 times; and the chaffinch, which principally used green caterpillars for food, 35 times. But there were even more extraordinary instances than these. From careful and accurate observation the same gentleman found that the thrush commenced its daily operations at half-past two o'clock in the morning and worked on until half-past nine in the evening, and during that day of 19 hours it fed its young 206 times. In the case of blackbirds, whose working day lasted for 17 hours and 25 minutes, the young were fed 44 times a-day by the male parent and 59 times by the female parent, and the titmouse fed its young, solely on caterpillars, no less than 475 times in a day of 17 hours. No one, therefore, who knew anything of the habits of these small birds could doubt the valuable service they did to man. There was a large class of birds, such as the swallow, the swift, the marten, the wagtail, the cuckoo, the wryneck, the goat-sucker, the white owl, the shrike, the stone chatterer, and the three warblers, which did nothing but good, though there were other birds with characters of more doubtful description, such as the sparrow, but no bird more frequently fell a victim to prejudice than the sparrow, which really did accomplish a vast amount of good. He had heard a very curious story told by a careful observer of a sparrow's operations, who saw a young sparrow fluttering in a rose bush and beating the bush with its wings. After it had beaten the cover as effectually as a gamekeeper could do, the bird dropped to the ground, where it picked up all the caterpillars which it had shaken from the bush. There was another sparrow story which was historical. Frederick the Great, who had a great liking for cherries, observed that sparrows had a fondness for them also, and he (Mr. Herbert) was obliged to admit that they were guilty of, at all events, that irregularity. The King, therefore, put a price upon sparrows' heads, but at the end of two years the consequences were so serious that he not only had to take off this sparrow tax, but he had to go to some expense to import sparrows into the country to supply the deficiency which had been created. The sparrow also did another good service, for in the farm-yard it picked up a great quantity of grain which had been voided, and which if allowed to go on to the land amongst the manure would prove exceedingly troublesome. Then there was the chaffinch, who was a great favourite with Mr. Waterton, who was of opinion that he did a great amount of good. In fact, the only bird which, so far as he knew, was not partly insectivorous, and which did not feed its young on grubs and insects, was the wood pigeon, and mischievous as that bird sometimes proved to be amongst the crops, there was something to be said in its favour, for there could be no doubt that it also destroyed a great quantity of weeds. Just now, a terrible destruction of small birds was going on, and the Baroness Burdett Coutts had recently stated in a letter that she could not even keep a nightingale safe about her, in consequence of the prevalence of netting; indeed, swallows were netted in the same way and placed in cages, in which not one-twentieth part of them could live.

Mr. A. Johnston

A friend of his happened to be fishing the other day a little below Monkey Island, on the Thames, and he saw the bodies of several swallows and swifts which had been shot by someone, floating by him, an act of pure mischief and wantonness which could not be sufficiently reprobated. The formation of sparrow clubs, too, had led to great destruction; and he really did not think that those who formed such clubs could have a fair notion of what they were doing. Indeed, the act of shooting sparrows had been compared by one who knew the value of these small birds, to the act of shooting down our own soldiers at the moment of invasion by an enemy. Those who proposed the formation of sparrow clubs evidently belonged to that class of people who believed that the starling sucked eggs, that the blind worm bit cattle, that the newt spat fire, that the toad spat poison, that the owl hooted to tell a man that he would fall out of his topmost window and break his neck, that the cuckoo in the winter changed its claws and beak and became a hawk, that the hedgehog sucked cows, and a heap of other monstrosities. Those were the sort of men of whom one read during the Great French War, and who, when they saw trees barked by a particular description of beetle, believed that Napoleon had persuaded our sentinels to do it with their bayonets. The question then arose, should any exceptions be made to the preservation of these birds? He thought not, for a vast amount of good was done by even what were called destructive birds, such as the jackdaw, the jay, the magpie, and the crow, in consuming insects. He believed that both jays and crows had also this virtue—that they destroyed vipers. Certainly, the raven destroyed a large quantity of rats; and the magpie could not be regarded as very dangerous, when in Norway it was received in all the farmhouses and allowed to build its nests under the eaves. To game preservers he would mention the fact, that the late Mr. Waterton encouraged the presence of a large number of birds comprising as many as 119 different varieties, around his place; and his testimony was that nothing seemed to go wrong either in his orchard or in his garden, and that was corroborated by the testimony of Mr. Ellice. He, therefore, thought we ought to give a refuge to birds of every kind, and certainly to those curious ones which were now shot down on their first appearance in England, but which, with a little encouragement, would either breed with us or pay us future visits—he referred to such birds as the golden thrush, the spotted woodpecker, the spoonbill, and others—for by doing so we should endow our parks and the face of the country generally with a greater charm of interest and variety. Moreover, if hawks and other birds of prey did harm, they also did good in the way of purifying the breed of such birds as they attacked; and disease among such birds would have been prevented from spreading if the birds of prey had not been shot down, for just as the titmouse broke off and destroyed those buds which had already been seized upon by insects, so the hawk destroyed those birds which showed the first signs of disease. There was only one other ground upon which he wished to rest this Amendment, and that was the ground of compassion towards those creatures which were so entirely in our power; for the craft of man had increased in a much greater proportion than their resources of defence, and it would be a good thing for us, and have a good effect upon our national character, if we were willing to give up just one little bit of the power we possessed over the life and freedom of this part of surrounding creation. Where anything lay absolutely in our power it was a bad thing for us not to restrict ourselves in the use of that power. No one could have observed birds in the breeding season without noticing the entire devotion which they had for their young, and the courage which that attachment gave them in the face of all enemies—even in the face of man himself. He principally rested his case, therefore, on the ground of right feeling and compassion towards those who, though they had no power of agitating in their own behalf, yet did us good service, and possessed many of the qualities the presence of which we so much respected in men and women. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Auberon Herbert

MR. MUNDELLA, in rising to second the Amendment, said, he could not help expressing his sympathy with the able and interesting speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert)—a speech which he thought would do a great deal of good, and would excite more attention to this subject throughout the country. He would draw attention to the fact that in America they had imported English sparrows to destroy the insects which had consumed the leaves of trees in the Parks. In France, where they killed every small bird, everybody must have been struck with the triste and melancholy aspect of the country in early morning. It was really time to have regard for these small birds, and he hoped that the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham would not be thrown away.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to provide for the protection of all Wild Birds during the breeding season,"—(Mr. Auberon Herbert,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he concurred in much that had fallen from the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert), but he desired to know the meaning of the proviso to the 2nd clause, stating that the clause should not apply where the wild fowl was a young bird unable to fly. In his opinion, it was infinitely more humane to take care of a bird of that kind, than of any other kind of bird. The 5th clause enacted that one moiety of every penalty under the Act should go to the person informing and prosecuting for the same, but, in his opinion, such a provision was calculated to raise an apprehension that informers would endeavour to make a profit by bringing charges which had no foundation in fact.

MR. BROWN said, he was afraid that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert), if carried, would have the effect of defeating the Bill, and therefore he trusted the hon. Member would withdraw it, and propose Amendments in Committee for the purpose of carrying out the object in view, in which to a certain extent he concurred.

MR. DILLWYN said, he thought a case had been made out for the Bill, and as the success of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert) would endanger the passing of the measure, he hoped it would be withdrawn. He thought the farmer and the gardener had reason to bless these small birds, for the benefit derived from them was infinitely greater than any damage they did.

MR. BRUCE said, the Government would be able to support the Bill, which proposed to preserve birds which did injury to no one, but the scope of the Amendment was wider than they could accept. It was true that there were many valuable birds which were not included in the Bill; but the Amendment would only have the effect of saving birds which caused a great deal of harm, by preventing the farmer from killing jays and other destructive birds. If there were any legislation with respect to the class of birds alluded to by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert), such legislation should be carefully considered and carried out not by Amendment on the present Bill, but by a separate enactment.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, he would withdraw his Amendment at present, and bring forward the subject again at another stage of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was quite as well that the Amendment was not going to be pressed, for he feared that they were entering on a course of fines and consequent imprisonment, of which it was not easy to see the end. The Bill, as originally proposed, dealt, among other birds, with plovers. The next step would, of course, be to fine anybody who ate plovers' eggs; for, with the view of preserving the birds, it would be absurd to fine persons for shooting plovers, and not fine them for taking and eating the eggs. All these things grew out of one another, and it would not be a pleasant thing to see boys fined or imprisoned for bird-nesting. He confessed that he thought they were entering upon somewhat disagreeable, if not dangerous, legislation. There was an old saying—"De minimis non curat lex," and he apprehended that legislation on such small matters would produce more trouble than good.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND)
LAW AMENDMENT BILL—[Bill 79.]
(Mr. Sherlock, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. McClure.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to assimilate the franchise in Ireland for municipal purposes to that which now applied to Parliamentary purposes. In most of the corporate boroughs in Ireland the qualification for a burgess was higher than that required to vote for a Member of that House, and he sought to remove that anomaly. The City of Dublin had petitioned against the Bill, but he thought the House would consider that exemptions should be avoided. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had brought in a Bill for assimilating the law of Ireland to that of England in respect to municipal elections. That Bill stood for Committee on the 10th of July, and it had been suggested that this Bill, if read a second time, should be committed on the same day, so that they might be taken together.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Serjeant Sherlock.)

MR. BUTT said, he thought it probable that many hon. Members would be surprised to know that in Ireland, which was the poorer country, the qualification for a burgess was higher than in England. By the Municipal Act it was provided that in England the qualification should be given for any amount of rates and continuous occupation for three years. In Ireland the qualification, however, was fixed at occupation for one year of a house and £10 a-year, with some deductions for insurance and repairs, making the qualification practically £8 or £9 a-year. The City of Dublin had, however, under a special Act of Parliament, adopted the English franchise in 1849; but in 1869 a change was made in the English franchise, reducing the qualification to continuous occupation for one year. In Dublin however, three years' occupation was still necessary; and in all other corporate places the qualification was the high one he had described. The Bill he had introduced was intended to amend that state of things. The Bill now before the House would introduce a totally new principle into the Irish municipalities, and allow lodgers, freemen, and non-resident persons with the property qualification to vote for members of municipal corporations. Although all the corporations of Ireland disapproved of it; yet he would not seek to prevent the Bill going into Committee; but he thought the simpler and better course to have taken would have been to endeavour to pass a law to assimilate the qualification in Ireland to that of England.

MR. PIM said, he hoped the Bill would be withdrawn, for the Corporation of Dublin did not wish to have their Act disturbed, as it must be if the Bill passed.

MR. VANCE said, he objected to the principle of both the Bills which had been mentioned, and would point out that in Dublin, where the English franchise prevailed, the discussion of politics was carried to such an extent by the members of the corporation, that one of the aldermen had given notice of his intention to draw the attention of the council to a recent decision of a learned Judge.

MR. M'MAHON said, he trusted the Bill would be considered in Committee with the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), and would remark that they could not prevent by law the introduction of politics into municipal discussions.

MR. SYNAN objected to the proposal of equalizing the qualification for municipal purposes with the Parliamentary qualification as contained in this Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, he could not assent to the second reading of the Bill merely to place it alongside the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) in Committee, because he thought it might embarrass the consideration of the question; and he was of opinion that it contained no proposition which was not capable of being introduced by way of Amendment into the Bill which had already been read a second time. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. and learned Serjeant would withdraw the Bill. He did not think an extension of the municipal franchise in Ireland should be made in that direction; although he admitted that the franchise was at present indefensible. On one occasion a man said to him—"I do not know, Sir, why I am fit to vote for you as a Member of Parliament, and yet am not fit to vote for a greengrocer as Town Councillor." He could not conceive any reason for that state of affairs, and thought the municipal franchise of Ireland ought to be assimilated to that of England. A defect of the Bill was, as had been stated, that it would allow non-resident persons, lodgers, and freemen, to vote at municipal elections, and therefore he thought it should not be pressed.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, that in consequence of the suggestion and argument of his right hon. and learned Friend, he would beg leave to withdraw the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN BILL.

(Mr. Clare Read, Mr. Pell, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth, Mr. Kennaway.)

[BILL 104.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. C. S. READ, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that early in the Session he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council whether a code of by-laws he had brought up for a country school would be accepted by the Education Department, and the right hon. Gentleman replied that he (the hon. Member) was the best person he knew to draw up such a code. He had, therefore, taken the responsibility of trying to frame by-laws applicable to all children employed in agriculture. If they were to have a school board in every parish the compulsory powers bestowed upon them by the Act of 1870 would be difficult to apply; and he was sure the country was not prepared to have direct compulsion from Whitehall. This Bill, therefore, was introduced now because in future there was to be a school within the reach of every child, and it was necessary to have the power of filling those schools and keeping the children there a certain length of time; and not only that, but that without an enactment of this kind children in agricultural districts would be taken from school on trivial pretexts as soon as they were old enough to be of any use. The principle of the Bill was simply an extension of the Factory Acts in a mitigated form to agricultural districts, and the reason for that was, because as in such districts it was impracticable to adopt the system of alternate half days or weeks for school, it was therefore provided that a certain number of attendances at school in the preceding year should be necessary before children between the ages of eight and twelve were employed in agriculture. He should, no doubt, be told that a child of eight was too young to be so employed, and he admitted that as a rule they were not wanted before they were ten years old; but it was difficult to debar them entirely from being employed before they reached that age. That was not a Bill for the protection of health, like the Factory Acts, and there was a great difference between employing children in the open air and confining them in a dusty and hot factory. The Factory Acts fixed the age at eight, and therefore if any further limit was adopted in this Bill children of that age in agricultural districts adjoining manufacturing districts would be sent to the factory as a matter of course. And, further, it would be extremely hard to prohibit a labourer with seven or eight children under ten years of age from having one of them to assist him in providing for the sustenance of the family. It would, however, be required that children of eight must have attended school 250 times in the previous 12 months; and that children between 10 and 12 must prove 150 attendances. The Bill had been favourably received and commented upon by the newspapers. The Pall Mall Gazette said it was a mild Bill, and that it was imperfect; and he considered that very favourable criticism of a measure introduced by an agricultural Member. The farmers generally approved of the Bill, and the Central Chamber of Agriculture had passed a unanimous resolution in its support. A suspensory power during the busy seasons of the agricultural year was given to the magistrates in petty sessions to be exercised on the application of occupiers of 500 acres of land. It would also be necessary for the parent to get a certificate of the attendances of his child from the schoolmaster, who would give it free of cost; and the employer would be required to see that certificate before he employed the child. To meet the possible objection that the Act would be a dead letter, because there would be no Inspectors, he would observe that, in the first instance, school managers would be practically Inspectors, and public opinion would support the working of the Bill. If, in the future, we had a public prosecutor school Inspectors would not be so much needed. One of the clauses, however, altered the Agricultural Gangs Act by raising the age at which the child might be employed in those gangs from eight to ten years. He was glad to say that there was no serious opposition to the Bill, which was the result of an earnest and honest attempt to secure the education of every child employed in agriculture, without depriving the parent of the right and, he might say, the necessity of adding the child's earnings to his own scanty wages, or needlessly interfering with the reasonable employment of juvenile labourers in the rural districts of the kingdom. In conclusion, the hon. Member moved the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Clare Read.)

MR. AKROYD said, he rejoiced at the movement which was springing up in the agricultural class in favour of education. Having looked through the Bill he marvelled at the skill and care with which the Factory Acts had been adapted to the agricultural population, and thought the hon. Gentleman the author of the Bill entitled to great credit, though some Amendments in the Bill he thought might be necessary. It would be a special advantage to the Bill that it would enlist the employers of labour in the interests of those employed; and in addition it did not throw the onus of attendance at school wholly upon the parents, because part of the responsibility would be placed upon the employer.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was most anxious that the hon. Member should have the opportunity of taking the second reading of his Bill that day, and, therefore, he would not enter upon its details, for which there was not now time. He hoped, however, there would be a full discussion at the next stage. The Government not only did not oppose the Bill, but were obliged to the hon. Gentleman for having taken up this difficult question. At the same time he did not consider that by the general acceptance of the principle they were precluded from considering—he should say favourably considering—the question of direct compulsion. They had found it necessary, under the Factory Acts to supplement indirect compulsion with direct compulsion; but, no doubt, direct compulsion would be very much facilitated by indirect compulsion. There were two or three points on which he might have to express some difference of opinion with the promoters of the Bill. He doubted whether the age ought to be limited to 12, and in regard to Clause 6 it appeared to him that the attendances required were too few in number, and it might be necessary to make them more consecutive to obtain greater regularity. But those were questions of detail, and the Government would be most glad to hear the arguments upon them of the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that, although allusion had been made to the principles of the Factory Acts, the Bill had no reference whatever to them, those Acts having been introduced solely on the ground of the "young persons' health; whereas no one would pretend that field work was unhealthy for children. At the same time, he did not think that the Bill made any adequate provision for the education of children employed in agriculture. It merely enacted that so many attendances should be given at school—250 for a child from 8 to 10, and 150 from 10 to 12, in respect of which the child might be employed without any further attendance at school for at least 18 months.

MR. FAWCETT said, he hoped it would be distinctly understood that if the second reading were now taken, there would be an opportunity of fully discussing it on going into Committee. He took great interest in the subject, to which he had devoted much attention, and he now gave Notice that on going into Committee he should move Resolutions which would give the House an opportunity of discussing the main principles of the Bill.

Mr. C. S. Read

MR. PELL said, he hoped some arrangement would be made to secure a full and complete discussion of the Bill.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, he should be glad of an opportunity for full discussion of the measure, for he wished it to receive very careful consideration, and be much amended in Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

MINE DUES BILL—[BILL 177.]

(Mr. Lopes, Mr. Gregory.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LOPES, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was simply to remove anomalies in reference to rating this kind of property.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. Lopes.)

MR. ST. AUBYN said, he agreed with the principle of the Bill, though he thought that some Amendments would be necessary. One matter, however, which would require consideration was that the Bill would interfere with existing leases.

LORD G. CAVENDISH said, on the contrary, he thought that the Bill contained a new principle, and he doubted the propriety of reading it a second time without further discussion. He also thought that the Government should express their opinion upon the matter, and possibly the subject had better be dealt with when the general question of local taxation was considered.

MR. BRUCE said, that, at that hour, there was no time then to discuss the Bill; but he would at once say he had no objection to the second reading.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 13th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Duke of Bedford, after the death of his uncle; The Earl of Aberdeen, after the death of his brother.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Bank of England (Election of Directors)* (144); Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (Nos. 3 and 4)* (145, 146); Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation* (147); Elementary Education (Provisional Order Confirmation)* (148); Trusts of Benefices and Churches* (151).

Second Reading—Baptismal Fees (128); Charitable Trustees Incorporation* (127).

Committee—Epping Forest* (132-150); Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (122).

Third Reading—Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing) (131); Statute Law Revision* (107); Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* (115); Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental* (121); Cattle Disease (Ireland) Acts Amendment* (125); Charitable Loan Societies (Ireland)* (124), and passed.

EXTRADITION (GERMANY).

COMMUNIST PRISONERS (FRANCE).

PAPERS PRESENTED BY COMMAND.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of laying on the Table of your Lordships' House two sets of Papers. One consists of a Treaty between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Germany for the mutual surrender of fugitive Criminals. It was signed in London on the 14th of May. The other consists of Papers which are of a somewhat painful character. They are the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the French Republic, on the subject of the disembarkation in England of Communist prisoners. I promised my noble Friend the Marquess of Clanricarde, who is not now present, that in presenting the Papers on the subject I would make a statement in reference to the subject. That statement would have involved a recapitulation of facts which have excited an anxious feeling in this country—and this feeling was one of the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government to make representations to that of France on the subject. A correspondence ensued which has closed with a despatch from M. de Rémusat, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, which will prevent the necessity of my going into any details. If my noble Friend Earl Stanhope, who referred to the subject on a former evening, had been present, he would have been ready to vouch for the high character which M. de Rémusat had always held in this country both as a politician and literary man, and the assurance he now gave was only in conformity with his general language towards this country since he had held the seals of the Foreign Department. This is a précis of the communication from the French Minister—

“ M. de Rémusat acknowledges the receipt of Lord Lyons’ note, stating that Her Majesty’s Government could not consent to the deportation to England of the class of persons in question, whether they are provided or not with the means of subsistence, and gives the assurance that the French Government would not deviate from the precautions which they had taken since their attention was first called to the subject. He adds that the persons thus restored to liberty on the sole condition that they shall not reside in France shall not be subject to any measure tending to inflict their presence on a friendly country—a measure susceptible of being assimilated to transportation; and M. de Rémusat expresses regret if any misunderstanding on the subject has arisen, as the French Government are determined to abstain from all such interference as might induce French exiles to elect Great Britain as their place of abode.”

My Lords, I think this is a happy termination of that difficulty, and that I need say no more on the subject in presenting this Paper

Correspondence respecting the embarkation of communist prisoners from French Ports to England: And

Treaty between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Germany for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals; signed at London 14th May 1872:

Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

BAPTISMAL FEES BILL.—(No. 128.)

(The Lord Bishop of Winchester.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that by the ancient law of the Church it was absolutely illegal to demand any fee for the celebration of any sacrament of the Church, because it was said they ought to be administered freely. In more modern times, however, fees had in some instances been demanded for administering the sacrament of baptism, and in other cases for registering it. A consequence was that a large number of children remained unbaptized, because their parents were too poor to pay the demands which were made upon them. Now, these things ought not to be, and this Bill proposed to declare these fees unlawful. The Bill recited that whereas doubts have been entertained whether in certain churches and chapels of the Church of England, under the authority administration of the sacrament of baptism, or for the due registration thereof, and it is desirable to put an end to such doubts; and it declares that henceforth it shall be unlawful for any minister, clerk in Orders, parish clerk, or any other person to demand any fee for the of certain local Acts of Parliament, certain fees may not be demanded for the administration of the sacrament of baptism, or for the registry thereof. He understood that there would be an objection to taking away any vested interest, even in such a matter as this; and that in some cases the incumbents of parishes had been endowed by statute with the fees now proposed to be abolished; and therefore, if it should be found expedient, he would add in Committee that this Act should not apply to prevent from taking fees the holder of any office who might at present be entitled to demand them.

Moved, “ That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Lord Bishop of Winchester.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that in Archbishop Tenison’s time there was the practice of charging fees for registration in the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, and from thence the custom passed to other adjacent parishes, in one case at least, by virtue of an Act of Parliament. In the present day, however, such fee was never demanded from any poor person. Besides the incumbents, who were not anxious to maintain these fees, there were parish clerks who had vested interests, and it would be a great inconvenience that they should be deprived of them. He, therefore, trusted that if their Lordships accepted the Bill, they would adopt a proviso to protect these interests.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

Earl Granville

INTOXICATING LIQUORS LICENSING

BILL—(Nos. 78, 106, 131.)

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved the following new Clause to follow Clause 45 :—

“Where the justices refuse to renew a license, and an appeal against such refusal is duly made, and such license expires before the appeal is determined, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may, by order, permit the person whose license is refused to carry on his business during the pendency of the appeal upon such conditions as they think just; and, subject to such conditions, any person so permitted may, during the continuance of such order, carry on his business in the same manner as if the renewal of the license had not been refused.

“Where a license is forfeited on or in pursuance of a conviction for an offence, and an appeal is duly made against such conviction, the Court by whom the conviction was made may, by order, grant a temporary license to be in force during the pendency of the appeal upon such conditions as they think just.”

Motion agreed to; Clause inserted.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved to insert as a separate paragraph at end of Clause 48—

“In a county the justices in quarter sessions assembled, and in a borough the borough justices, shall make rules in pursuance of which any person other than the owner interested in any licensed premises as mortgagee or otherwise shall be entitled on payment of such sum as may be specified in such rules to receive from the clerk to the licensing justices a similar notice to that which an owner of such premises is entitled to receive under this Act.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that before the Bill passed he wished to express his own feeling, and that of his noble Friends who acted with him, that their Lordships were much indebted to the noble Earl who had charge of the measure for the candid manner in which he had dealt with the House while the Bill was under discussion. There had been some points on which considerable difference of opinion existed; but the exceedingly pleasant manner in which the noble Earl had discussed these points had been the means of smoothing down difficulties. He thought it only due to the noble Earl that he should give public expression to his sense of the courteous way in which the Bill had been carried through that House.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he felt very much the kindness of the noble

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Duke and other noble Lords on the Opposition side. On the other hand, he must say that he and his Colleagues felt that if it had not been for the forbearance of the Opposition, they never could have carried the Bill through their Lordships' House.

Bill passed; and sent to the Commons.

BANK OF ENGLAND (ELECTION OF DIRECTORS) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Election of Directors of the Bank of England—Was presented by The Lord REDSDALE; read 1^a. (No. 144.)

TRUSTS OF BENEFICES AND CHURCHES BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to facilitate the creation of Trusts of the Patronage of Benefices and Churches—Was presented by The Lord Bishop of CARLISLE, read 1^a. (No. 151.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, 'till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 13th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Habitual Drunkards [No. 242].

SUPPLY—Postponed Resolutions 19-32 [reported 11th June] considered, and agreed to.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Railways Provisional Certificate Confirmation * [192]; Board of Trade Inquiries * [193]; Railway Rolling Stock (Distrain) * [116]; Custody of Infants [93]. [House counted out].

Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—n.p.

Committee—Report—Considered as amended—Court of Chancery (Funds) (re-com.m.) [140].

Report—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2) * [172].

Withdrawn—Bank Notes * [117].

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE LEGISLATION.
RESOLUTION.

MR. F. S. POWELL, who had placed a Notice on the Paper to move the following Resolutions:—

“1. That the range of Local Legislation affecting Towns and other Places ought to be contracted. 2. That the existing system of passing Local Bills on the same subjects as Public General Acts is inconvenient, works injustice between different Towns, and leads to unnecessary complication in the Laws affecting Local Government. 3. That no such Bills shall be introduced or passed unless upon proof (to the satisfaction of the Minister within whose department the subject matter lies) that the circumstances are exceptional and are not provided for under the Public General Statutes,” said, he ventured to lay down the general principle that those who desired to live outside of the general statutes of the realm ought to make out a strong case before being permitted to have private or special legislation. A system, however, had grown up, by virtue of which communities came to Parliament, and, almost as a matter of right and of routine, exempted themselves from the operation of the public general statutes, and constructed local Acts to meet their own wishes and fancies. The number of local Acts in the case of our great towns was in some instances not less than 50 or 60. These statutes were often inconsistent with each other, and difficult of interpretation. He had, indeed, been informed by eminent Parliamentary counsel employed in a local Bill relating to water-works, that counsel on both sides abandoned all hope of interpreting the Acts taken together; and that it was only by dealing with each Act alone, and throwing out of view all other Acts by mutual consent, that any reasonable progress could be made in the discussion. This circumstance was an incidental illustration of the inconvenience arising from the vicious system which he desired to abolish. He admitted that there were cases in which communities must necessarily regulate their affairs in certain particulars by exceptional legislation; but he believed, after having passed much time in the examination of local Acts, that the number of such communities was greatly exaggerated. On the contrary, he found, on comparison of local Acts, that whole groups of sections were either the same or differed only by the variations of language which must result when two men were engaged independently of each other in expressing the same idea. He found manufacturing towns, having the same industry, the residence of populations in every particular similar, and having similar local circumstances, did nevertheless apply with success for their own local Acts. These local Acts, he would observe, often excluded in express terms the public general Acts, and placed the towns wholly under this private and exceptional legislation. He admitted there would still remain communities which had a claim to some special enactments; but he believed that most of their wants would be met by amendments in the general laws. Surely a corporate town ought to have power to construct markets and town halls without a special law giving the necessary powers. But this system worked injustice. In public general statutes the Bill was introduced, debated, and passed without cost. Private Acts were attended by costs at every stage, whether of promotion or opposition. Parliament, in fact, abandoning the principle that laws were made equally for all, sold these laws to those who were willing to pay the price. It worked injustice between different towns, because the local Acts gave more extended and unequal periods for repayment of money borrowed, and thereby, by capricious action, diminished the pressure of rates in one town while relatively increasing it in another. The same industry experienced different treatment in different towns. In one town severe regulations against certain trades were enacted; in the next town the same trade was exempted even from the moderate restrictions of the public statutes. But there was still another evil—apart from the mere expense of opposition was the practical difficulty. New clauses were often introduced gravely but indirectly affecting private or public interests which never could be admitted into public Acts. Some weeks since they had an eager debate on Parks in London, and much jealousy was expressed in favour of maintaining foot-paths across them. It, therefore, was with no ordinary surprise that he found a local Act of a great Corporation stopping a much-prized foot-path across one of their Parks. He might say much on the inconvenience of this system; but he thought that he had already laid before the House abundant proof that a prompt and vigorous reform was necessary. It would doubtless be more convenient to take the Resolutions separately, and he therefore begged to move the second of the three Resolutions which he had placed on the Paper.

Mr. F. S. Powell

MR. ASSHETON CROSS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the existing system of passing Local Bills on the same subjects as Public General Acts is inconvenient, works injustice between different towns, and leads to unnecessary complication in the Laws affecting Local Government.”—(Mr. Francis Sharp Powell.)

MR. DENT said, he should move the Adjournment of the Debate, on the ground that the subject could not be discussed with any effect when there was so much important Public Business before them.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was prepared at once to admit the importance of the question; but, looking at the state of Business, he must express a hope that the hon. Member would agree to the adjournment of the discussion.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he was willing to accept the suggestion.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday next.

IRELAND—GALWAY ELECTION PETITION.

JUDGMENT OF MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Keogh, one of the Judges selected, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the County of Galway, and also a Special Case submitted for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland and the Order of the Court upon such Special Case.

And that he had further received the Minutes of Evidence taken before Mr. Justice Keogh, and an Appendix to such Minutes of Evidence, together with a Copy of the Shorthand Writer's Notes of the Judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh on the Trial of the said Election Petition.

And the said Certificate and Report were read, as followeth:—

GALWAY ELECTION, —The Parliamentary Elections Act 1868.

Election Petition for County of Galway.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Dublin, 11th June, 1872.

In the matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas by Captain the honourable William le Poer Trench, candidate at the last Election for the County of Galway, against Captain John Philip Nolan, who was returned at the last Parliamentary Election for said County, by which Petition (a copy whereof I transmit herewith), it was prayed that it might be determined that the said William le Poer Trench was duly elected, and ought to have been returned, or that the said John Philip Nolan was not duly elected or returned.

The trial of this Petition took place before me at Galway, in the said County, upon the first day of April last, and was continued, from day to day, until the 27th of May, in presence of the parties, their Counsel and Agents, and having heard the evidence which was given and counsel for both parties, I did then, at the conclusion of said trial, determine, and do accordingly certify that the said John Philip Nolan was not duly elected to serve in Parliament for the said County of Galway, and ought not to have been returned, and that the said John Philip Nolan had been by himself and his agents guilty of undue influence at such Election, within the meaning of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854."

I further determined, and do certify, that intimidation and undue influence, within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, did extensively prevail in the said County at and previous to such Election.

I further certify that the persons whose names I have set forth in the Schedule number "One" to this Certificate annexed, were guilty, at and previous to said Election, of undue influence within the meaning of the provisions of said Act.

And I do further report to Mr. Speaker that the Roman Catholic clergymen whose names have been set forth in the Schedule number "Two" to this Certificate annexed, being the persons of the same name included in Schedule "One," by threats and denunciations of temporal injury, and spiritual punishment, uttered during or immediately after Divine Service, and from the altars of their respective places of worship, and otherwise, as detailed in the evidence, intimidated and unduly influenced great numbers of the Roman Catholic electors of such County to vote for the said John Philip Nolan, or to refrain from voting against him. And further, it was proved that numbers of such electors who had promised to vote for the said William le Poer Trench afterwards had been compelled to vote for the said John Philip Nolan, or to refrain from voting for said William le Poer Trench, and had avowed they were so compelled by said intimidation and undue influence.

And I further report that, although I have found and reported that the Most Reverend John MacHale, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, and the Most Reverend John McEvilly, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway, were guilty of undue influence, it was not proved that the said Most Reverend John MacHale, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, or that the said Most Reverend John McEvilly, Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway, sanctioned or had taken part in such denunciations as before-mentioned. And the Most Reverend the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway proved that any such denunciations in a Roman Catholic chapel, and more especially if made against any person by name, are in direct violation of the ordinances of the Roman Catholic Church in force in Ireland, as enjoined by certain Synodical decrees furnished to the Court, and which are placed upon the Notes of Evidence.

And I have further to report that the Reverend Patrick Loftus, one of the clergymen whose names appear in said Schedules, was proved by the testimony of several faithworthy witnesses to have, in connection with such Election, denounced from the altar of his church, in the presence of his congregation on the Sabbath, the wife of a gentleman an elector for said County, and resident in his parish, (both he and his said wife professing the Protestant religion) and to have made other statements material to the inquiry, which the said Reverend Patrick Loftus denied on his oath.

and I, being satisfied of his wilful untruth, was then of opinion and so declared, and am now of opinion, that in his evidence before me he committed perjury.

And I have further to report to Mr. Speaker that the Reverend Peter Conway mentioned in said Schedules is the same Reverend Peter Conway mentioned in the fifth resolution of the Report of the Select Committee appointed to try and determine the Mayo Election Petition 1857, which report was brought before me during the inquiry.

And I have further to report that a system of intimidation prevailed throughout said County, for many weeks preceding said Election, to prevent voters recording their votes for the said William le Poer Trench, and that such intimidation was exercised, amongst other ways, by means of nocturnal visits to the houses of voters, and threats there uttered, and by the posting, and sending through the post office, threatening notices and letters to voters, and wives of voters, with a view to intimidate such voters from voting, as they had previously promised and intended, for the said William le Poer Trench.

And I further report to Mr. Speaker that on the day of the polling, at some of the polling places in said County, especially in the towns of Tuam, Ughterard, and Ballinasloe, violent mobs were organised and did attack voters who were proceeding to the poll, to vote for the said William le Poer Trench, and returning therefrom, and that the lives of voters and agents for the said William le Poer Trench were endangered by such mobs, and that in one part of such County the high road was cut across to prevent voters reaching the poll.

And I have further to report that the Reverend Patrick J. O'Brien, parish priest in the archdiocese of Tuam, who was the proposer of the said John Philip Nolan at said Election, publicly announced on the morning of the polling, at the polling place in Tuam, to a gentleman of the Protestant persuasion, who had there voted for the said William le Poer Trench, that "there would not be a hair of his head disturbed"—that nothing would be done to him—"that they were all renegade Roman Catholics, who would be exoriated."

I have further to report that the voters throughout the County were, on the day of polling, systematically conducted to the booths by the Roman Catholic clergy, who interfered actively in such polling, and were in so doing acting as the agents of the said John Philip Nolan.

And I certify that such acts and practices of the said Roman Catholic clergymen in the several ways and on the occasions to which I have referred, and, as otherwise fully detailed, not only in the evidence for and on behalf of the Petitioner, but upon the examination and cross-examination of the witnesses, lay and clerical, produced to give evidence for the said John Philip Nolan, was inconsistent with the free exercise of the franchise by the electors of said County and subversive of freedom of election therein.

And I have further to report to Mr. Speaker that, during the course of the trial, efforts were made to intimidate witnesses who had either given, or were about to give, evidence before me on such trial, in consequence of which I was obliged to commit to prison two persons, viz., Michael Roach and Patrick Barrett, for contempt of Court; the said Patrick Barrett being the person named in the evidence who was engaged actively, previous to such Election, insulting and intimidating electors, in the interest of said Petitioner, in language so obscene that a witness who deposed thereto refused to state it otherwise than in writing, as appears on the Notes.

And further that, in one case, a witness who was in Court and about to be called before me by the Petitioner's agent, was addressed by two Roman Catholic clergymen, the Reverend James Staunton and Reverend Patrick Lavelle, on the subject of the evidence he was about to give, and particularly told by the said Reverend James Staunton that "there were two ways of telling the truth," and otherwise cautioned, as appears on the Notes of Evidence, and the said witness was some days afterwards severely beaten on the high road, and was produced before me to make affidavit of the treatment he had so received, but in consequence of the then late period of the inquiry I was unable to do more than remit the case to the ordinary tribunals.

And I further certify that it appeared to me on the trial of such petition that certain questions of law required further consideration by the Court of Common Pleas before finally determining the matters referred to me, and that accordingly I should postpone granting this my Certificate until the determination of such questions by said Court of Common Pleas pursuant to "The Parliamentary Elections Act 1868."

And I further certify that I submitted such questions to said Court, in a Case prepared by me for the purpose, and that, said Case having come on before said Court for argument, the Court, after hearing counsel for said William le Poer Trench, and for said John Philip Nolan respectively, pronounced their judgment and determined thereon in answer to said questions to the following effect, videlicet: "That the electors who constituted the majority of said Respondent were fixed with sufficient knowledge of the disqualification of the said John Philip Nolan and should have acted on such disqualification, and refrained from voting for said John Philip Nolan. And further the said Court adjudged and determined that the said Honourable William le Poer Trench, there being no disqualification on his part, was entitled to be declared duly elected for said County."

And I beg to refer to copies of said Case, and said Judgment or determination, which I transmit herewith.

And I further certify that, having regard to said Judgment and determination, I have accordingly determined, and do determine, that the said Honourable William le Poer Trench was entitled to be declared duly elected for said County of Galway as representative in Parliament for said County. And I do accordingly certify that he was so elected.

And I beg further to state that the copy of the evidence given at the trial, as taken down by the shorthand writer of the House of Commons, and as furnished by him to me, accompanies this my Certificate.

Given under my hand this 11th June, 1872,

WILLIAM KROGH,

Second Justice of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, and one of the Judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

Schedule "One" in the foregoing Certificate referred to.

Captain John Philip Nolan.

Sebastian Nolan, esquire.

The Most Reverend John MacHale, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam.

The Most Reverend Patrick Duggan, Roman Catholic Bishop of Confert.

The Most Reverend John McEvilly, Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway.

The Reverends Patrick Loftus, Bartholomew Quin, James Staunton, Patrick Lavelle, Peter Conway, John Kemmy, Thomas Considine, John O'Grady, John Deely, Jerome Fahy, James Furlong, Patrick Cannon, Patrick Lyons, Patrick Kilkenny, Thomas Kerrins, Timothy Keevil, Coleman Galvin, Michael Byrne, Eugene White, Thomas Walsh, Patrick J. O'Brien, P. Melvin or Mullin, James Madden, William Manning, Malachi Greene, Patrick O'Meara, Patrick Coen, Francis Forde, William McGauran or McGovern, Francis Kenny, John McKeague or McKeirgue.

Schedule "Two" in the foregoing Certificate referred to.

The Reverends Patrick Loftus, Bartholomew Quin, James Staunton, Peter Conway, Thomas Considine, John O'Grady, Jerome Fahy, James Furlong, Patrick Cannon, Timothy Keevil, Coleman Galvin, Michael Byrne, Eugene White, Thomas Walsh, James Madden, William Manning, Malachi Green, Patrick Coen, Francis Ford, William McGauran or McGovern, Francis Kenny, John McKeague or McKeirgue.

WILLIAM KEOGH, Election Judge.

To the Right Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

COMMON PLEAS.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

In the matter of the Election Petition for the County of Galway, between the Honourable William Le Poor Trench, Petitioner; Captain John Philip Nolan, Respondent.

Case for the Determination of the Court of Common Pleas.

I hereby certify that the above Petition to which I refer came on for trial before me at Galway, on the 1st of April last, and that, said trial having been continued from day to day, at the conclusion thereof, on the 27th day of May instant, it appeared to me requisite that before finally determining as to that portion of the Petition which prayed that the said Petitioner might be declared duly elected, and that he should have been returned, I should, under the 12th section of said Act reserve certain questions of law for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, and that I should accordingly postpone the granting the Certificate directed by the said Act until the determination of such questions by the said Court.

I came to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that the said Respondent had, previously to the said Election, by himself and his agents, committed the offence of undue influence upon the electors in order to induce and compel such electors to give their votes for him or to refrain from voting against him at said Election, contrary to law and against the provisions of the statutes against such practices made and provided, and especially against the provisions of the statute 17 and 18 Victoria, chap. 102, section 5.

It was proved before me that the number of the electors on the registry for such County was 5,346, but that, making allowance for double entries and deaths, the real number of electors available to vote at the time of such Election, which took place on the 6th of February in this year, did not exceed 4,686, of these 2,823 voted for the Respondent, and 658 for the Petitioner. The Respondent was declared by the Sheriff duly elected.

It was further proved before me that such undue influence had been practised upon the electors of the County, and had been carried out in pursuance of arrangements made by the said Respondent and his agents previous to such Election, and especially during the months of November and December of the last year, and the month of January of the present year.

It was also proved that certain of the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church had, by letters written to and read at public meetings, and by resolutions adopted at meetings and conferences of the Roman Catholic clergy at which they presided, and which resolutions were printed, published, and made known throughout the County by the Respondent, and his agents aided and assisted in the exercise of such undue influence. It was also proved that many of the Roman Catholic clergy discharging ecclesiastical duties in said County had by their speeches at public meetings, held in various parts of the County commencing on the 19th of December of last year, and continued through the month of January in the present year, and by denunciations and threats of temporal injury and spiritual punishment uttered during and after Divine service, and in the presence of their congregations, had intimidated and unduly influenced the electors of such County, and that the said Respondent had made himself liable for their acts.

It was also admitted upon both sides on such trial that at least nine-tenths of the electors were members of the Roman Catholic Church.

I was satisfied that by the foregoing and other acts of intimidation proved against the Respondent and his agents the status of the said Respondent as a candidate qualified to be elected was destroyed, and that he was disqualified to be elected for the said County by such acts committed by him and his agents as hereinbefore described, and that such disqualification existed previous to the day of nomination for such Election, and that the knowledge of such acts, and especially of such intimidation and undue influence had become generally known through and amongst the great body of the electors throughout the County, and especially amongst those who afterwards voted for the said Respondent.

It was further proved before me, that large numbers of the electors who had previously declared their intention to vote for said Petitioner had been compelled to vote for said Respondent, or to refrain from voting for the said Petitioner, and had avowed they were so compelled by such intimidation and undue influence. It was proved that the exercise of such intimidation and undue influence had become publicly known amongst the electors of such County previous to the day of nomination.

It was further proved before me, that on the 3rd day of February, "being the day of nomination," the said Petitioner caused a notice to be posted at and in the immediate vicinity of the place of nomination for said County, and to be advertised in several of the newspapers published in the County, and to be extensively posted in the different polling-places for such County, cautioning the electors that said Respondent was disqualified from being elected for the said County as set forth in said Petition.

It was further proved that at each of the different polling places and of the respective polling booths the said Petitioner had persons stationed with copies of such notices with the view of serving them on the electors previous to their recording their votes at the poll.

It was further proved that these notices were served at each of the polling places (with one exception) on some of the electors previous to their voting, the numbers of such services varying considerably in different polling places, but not amounting in the aggregate of personal services to more than a few hundreds, and furthermore it was proved that attempts were made to serve numbers of such notices on the voters as they came to the poll, who either refused to receive them or were prevented receiving them by the confusion in the booths, sometimes by the agents of the Respondent, and frequently by the members of the Roman Catholic clergy who were engaged conducting the electors to the poll. In the excepted booth to which I have referred the person placed to serve the notices did not do so until after the electors had polled, having been told by one of the agents of the Respondent that was the proper time to do so.

It was further proved that numbers of these notices were scattered about on the floors and tables of the polling booths. They were all in the English language, and it was proved that many of the electors could not speak English.

It was, on the foregoing facts, contended before me, on behalf of the Petitioner, that, the status of the said Respondent being destroyed thereby, the Petitioner was the only Candidate before the constituency eligible to receive their votes and be declared elected, and that I should accordingly declare him duly elected.

It was however contended on the part of the Respondent that, notwithstanding the said Respondent being found ineligible, yet that the votes given to him were not thrown away, as the electors were not bound to act upon his ineligibility, even though made known to them by sufficient notice, until so declared by some competent legal tribunal; and, furthermore, that even if they were bound to act upon such ineligibility, though not so previously found, knowledge thereof was not sufficiently brought home to a sufficient number of electors to displace the majority of the said Respondent and to justify me in declaring said Petitioner duly elected.

I therefore request the opinion and determination of the Court of Common Pleas upon the following questions:

1st. Were the electors who constituted the majority of said Respondent fixed with sufficient knowledge of the disqualification of the said Respondent, and should they have acted upon such disqualification and refrained from voting for said Respondent?

2nd. Was the Petitioner, there being no disqualification on his part, entitled to be declared elected for said County?

WILLIAM KNOWN, 31st May, 1872.

Received and filed in Election Petition Office this 31st May, 1872. C. G. BUNKE, Master.

I certify foregoing to be a correct copy.

C. G. BUNKE, Master C.P.

COMMON PLEAS, TUESDAY 11TH JUNE, 1872.

In re the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, and the County of Galway Election Petition.

Honorable William De la Poer Trench, Petitioner;

John Philip Nolan, Respondent.

The Case stating certain questions of law for the determination of the Court having been called on for argument on the sixth day of June instant (the day duly appointed for the purpose) Serjeant Armstrong, with whom were Mr. Murphy, Q.C. and Mr. Perce appeared as Counsel on behalf of the Petitioner, and Mr. Macdonagh, Q.C., with whom was Mr. MacDermott, appeared as Counsel on behalf of the Respondent. Whereupon on reading said Case and on hearing Counsel the argument was adjourned until the seventh day of June instant (the succeeding day), on which last-mentioned day, the argument having concluded, the Court reserved judgment. And on this day doth adjudge and determine, in answer to the first question submitted to them, that the electors who constituted the majority of said Respondent were fixed with sufficient knowledge of the disqualification of the said Respondent, and should have acted on such disqualification and refrained from voting for said Respondent.

And, in answer to the second question submitted to them—whether the Petitioner (there being no disqualification on his part) was entitled to be declared duly elected,

The Court doth adjudge and determine that the Petitioner, there being no disqualification on his part, was entitled to be declared duly elected for said County.

C. G. BUNKE, Master,

Common Pleas, Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I beg to read to the House the 13th section of the Parliamentary Elections Act as the simplest mode of informing the House of the Motion I am about to make, and the rendering it unnecessary that I should make any statement, or give any reasons for the course I am about to pursue. The 12th section of the Act refers to the proceedings before the Election Judge, and then the 13th section provides "That the House of Commons, on being informed by the Speaker of such Certificate and Report or Reports, if any, shall order the same to be entered on the Journals, and shall give the necessary directions for confirming or altering the Return, or for issuing a writ for a new Election, or for carrying the determination of the Judge into execution, as circumstances may require."

The first proceeding therefore is, that the House shall order the same to be entered in the Journals of the House, and as a matter of course I make that Motion.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the said Certificate and Report from Mr. Justice Keogh, together with the Special Case and Order of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, be entered in the Journals of this House."

Motion agreed to.

MR. GLADSTONE: The further duty, as prescribed by the Act, is that I should move "That the Clerk of the Crown do attend this House to-morrow, at Two of the clock, with the last Return for the County of Galway, and amend the same, by rasing out the name of John Philip Nolan, esquire, and inserting the name of Captain the Honourable William le Poer Trench, instead thereof."

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: Sir, I rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman not to press his Motion this evening. It may be perfectly true that under the provisions of this very extraordinary Act this House has no power whatever to refuse to seat Captain Trench, who has been declared by the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland duly elected for the county of Galway; but it is of the greatest possible importance in a case of this kind—which is a case of first impressions—that the attention of the House should be called to the decision of the Court of Common Pleas; but, of course, it is utterly impossible to do so this evening, as we have not before us the Certificate of the learned Judge, nor the decision of the Court on which it is founded. I do not propose to raise any Motion to-night; but if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister will postpone this Motion until the Papers are in our hands—say to-morrow or Monday—I shall be prepared to move the Motion of which I gave Notice yesterday as an Amendment to this extraordinary Motion. I take it that it is of the utmost importance that this decision, which is one of the highest constitutional weight, and for which there is no precedent, should be calmly considered by the House, and that it should be clearly ascertained by the House whether we are bound to carry it out according to the statute. The learned Judges who decided the case in the Court of Common Pleas stated that there was no decision in point to guide them—that this was a case of first impressions; and that being so, I think that before this House directs the Return to be amended in the manner suggested by the Prime Minister, we should have an opportunity of entering our protest against the decision even if we are bound to carry it out according to the statute. I look on the decision of the Court of Common Pleas as one of the most dangerous decisions as affecting the rights of the electors of the whole country that could be made by any Court of Justice, and the more it is canvassed and considered, the more it will be found to be a decision that ought not to have been made. I say it with respect, but as strongly as I can, that, in my opinion, this decision goes out without authority and will return without respect, and therefore I think the House ought to have an opportunity of considering the decision. I do not propose in so doing to raise any question as to the unseating of Mr. Nolan, but to bring under the attention of the House the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, but which I am unable to do to-night from the want of the necessary Papers. I think I am not asking too much in asking to have the matter postponed for a few days. We can carry out the provisions of the statute, if we are bound to do so, quite as well on Monday as to-night; and in the meantime we shall have an opportunity of looking into the case.

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, if the Act of Parliament had given any discretion to the House, the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman would not have been unreasonable; but the House must bear in mind that it is absolutely powerless in this matter. In spite of the protest of a powerful minority, of which I happened to be one, which pointed out, when the Parliamentary Elections Bill was under discussion, that we were parting with the power of dealing with the seats of this House which the common law gave us, and handing it over to the Judges, the House deliberately agreed by Act of Parliament to the taking of all authority and discretion in the matter out of their own hands. The right hon. Gentleman, in proposing his Motion, did not refer to the previous section to that which provides for the finding of the Judges, to which the 13th section was merely confined. The 13th sub-section of the 11th section provides that—

"At the conclusion of the trial the Judge who tries the Petition shall determine whether a Member whose return or election is complained of, or any and what other person was duly returned or elected, or whether the election was void, shall forthwith certify in writing such determination to the Speaker, and upon such certificate being given such decision shall be final to all intents and purposes."

The next clause provides for an appeal to the Court above, whose decision shall also be final. So that we have absolutely no power whatever in the matter, but we are in this position—that having no power we are unable to deal with the matter at all, and that Captain Trench is entitled to his seat, as has been found by the proper tribunal; and, moreover, that he was entitled to it from the date of the election, now some considerable time ago. Therefore, in common justice, and in compliance with the Act, we are bound to proceed as rapidly as the forms under which we act will allow us to do to place Captain Trench in that seat which he is entitled to occupy.

MR. GLADSTONE: I was about, when my right hon. Friend who has just spoken rose, to remark that my right hon. Friend the Member for Clare had, in his speech, and in the procedure he suggested connected together two things which are really distinct. The one is whether the judgment of the Court in Ireland is a matter demanding or warranting the attention of Parliament; the other is, whether the attention of Parliament can only with propriety be called to it in the interval between our receiving the Certificate and Report of the Judge and our giving effect thereto. Now I quite agree with my right hon. Friend that this judgment is one of great importance, and while, of course, I give no opinion in relation to it, I admit that it is within the right or discretion of any hon. Member to call attention to it. No one can question the legitimacy of such a course, but I cannot see any connection between that and the duty we are now called upon to discharge. In the event of the House acceding to my Motion, it will remain perfectly open to my right hon. Friend or any other hon. Member to make any Motion he pleases, or give any opinion upon the judgment. On the other hand, it appears to us, on examining this section of the Act, that it is our duty neither to deny justice nor to delay it. I admit that we might be perfectly warranted in postponing our compliance with this positive injunction could it be shown that such postponement had a bearing upon something we were to do under the Act; but no discussion that can be raised can have the smallest bearing on the course which we are bound to take. As my right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie) has pointed out, we have parted with our powers as an independent portion of the Legislature in this matter. We are, therefore, now only called upon to perform Ministerial duties, and we must perform them with the same exactitude—I will add even the same submission and the same desire to set an example of obedience to the law—as the humblest agent of the law. It appears to me, therefore, that to delay compliance with the injunctions of the statute with regard to the consequences of the Certificate and Report of the Judge would tend to cast a doubt upon the dignity of the proceedings of the House, and would not really be warranted by the spirit and intent of the Act. I trust, therefore, the House will agree to the Motion I have made.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, being responsible for the introduction of this Act, I wish to say one word. The proposition which the right hon. Gentleman wishes to bring forward is that there should be an appeal to this House from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas. Now, without giving any opinion on the merits of that particular decision—quite unnecessary at the present moment—I beg to remind the House that the question whether there should be an appeal or not was brought under the consideration of Parliament, and was definitively decided in the negative.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Clerk of the Crown do attend this House To-morrow, at Two of the clock, with the last Return for the County of Galway, and amend the same, by rasing out the name of John Philip Nolan, esquire, and inserting the name of Captain the Honourable William le Poer Trench, instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. DOWSE): Sir, I beg to move that the Evidence taken at the trial of the Election Petition for the County of Galway and the Judgment of the learned Judge be printed.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: Sir, I wish to ask whether, as the Act expires on the 1st of August this year, and is proposed to be made permanent by a clause in the Corrupt Practices Act—as the working of the Act has been so well estimated by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House and out-of-doors—it is not worthy the consideration of the House whether the Act should be continued or not, or whether it had not better be amended by a separate Bill providing that Election Petitions shall be tried before three Judges instead of one, and that there shall be an appeal? It is of great importance to Irish Members—many of whom have to go on Circuit the first week in July—to know when the clause in the Corrupt Practices Bill, making this Act permanent, will come on for discussion, and I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will bring it forward some day in the present month.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I beg to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that he should add to his Motion that there should be also printed the Case that was laid before the Court of Common Pleas, and upon which that Court delivered judgment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse): The Case that was laid before the Court of Common Pleas is already before the House, and I have no objection to its being included in my Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE: In reference to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clare, when we come to consider what we shall have to do before many days elapse—the further order of Business after the disposal of the Scotch Education Bill and the Mines Regulation Bill, I will bear in mind what has happened to-night in reference to the Galway Election Petition, and we will make the best arrangements we can in reference to it.

SIR JOHN GRAY: When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland speaks of the Judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh, does he mean the shorthand writer's notes, or another document purporting to be the Judgment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse): I mean the shorthand writer's notes.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Copy of the Shorthand Writer's Notes of the Judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh on the Trial of the Galway County Election Petition [No. 241]:

Also the Minutes of the Evidence taken at the Trial of the said Election Petition, and the Appendix thereto [No. 241], be printed.—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— LUDLOW SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he is aware that the children attending the public elementary school of the parish of Ludlow were taken by the master to church at eleven o'clock in the morning on Holy Thursday; and whether this proceeding was not in violation of section 7 of the Elementary Education Act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have made inquiries into the facts of the case, and I find that some of the children attending the National School in Ludlow, and also that some of the children attending the elementary school, did, accompanied by the master, attend in church on the morning of Ascension Day. I find also that has been the general practice in that school, and also that the fullest opportunities were given to children not to attend in church whose parents did not wish them to attend. I find also that the day is not counted as one of the days for which money is given under the Code. It is counted as one of the holidays. Under these circumstances, I do not think the proceeding in question was a violation of the Elementary Education Act.

COLONIES—CROWN LANDS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he is cognisant of any negotiations having for their object surrender of the proprietary or the other rights of the Crown over waste lands in Natal; and, if so, whether he will inform the House what is the extent of these lands, and whether their present and prospective value has been estimated, and what is the number of the British population to whom they would be transferred; what conditions, favourable to immigration, would be made as to the application of the revenue accruing from sales and leases of these lands; the same with regard to Western Australia; whether there is not a probability that responsible Government will be immediately established in Western Australia, and in this event what course Her Majesty's Government will take with respect to the control and disposal of the Crown lands there; and, what is the extent of the waste lands that after such transferences would remain under control of the Crown in any part of the Empire?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, there are, in round numbers, about 3,000,000 acres of Crown lands in Natal. The negotiations relative to the projected railways in that colony comprise a proposal to transfer a large portion of these lands to the railway company. That has always been found one of the best ways of encouraging enterprise, of developing the resources of a colony, and promoting an increase of white settlers. The same has been done to a limited extent in Western Australia in the case of two companies within the last three years. The area of Crown lands is very extensive—upwards of 600,000,000 acres, of which about 1,500,000 acres have been alienated since the establishment of the colony in 1829. There is no probability of responsible Government being immediately established in Western Australia; and until there is such a probability, the hon. Member will hardly expect me to explain the course which Her Majesty's Government would take in such a contingency. The latter part of the hon. Gentleman's Question—namely, what is the extent of the waste lands that after such transference would remain under the control of the Crown in any part of the Empire, could only be answered by reference to the different colonies, involving a delay of many months before the information could be obtained with any approach to accuracy. The extent of these lands, however, is very large.

INDIAN LABOURERS IN THE MAURITIUS. QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether a day labourer (Indian) in the mountains is obliged to pay one pound for a licence to earn his living as a labourer; and, whether a sugar planter is subject to any licence on entering upon his business?

Mr. Macfie

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: It is quite true, Sir, that under existing regulations the old immigrants in Mauritius—that is, those immigrants whose indentures have expired—are required to hold a licence, for which they pay £1 per annum. This is to insure identification and to check vagrancy. It is also true that sugar planters are not subject to any licence, being easily identified and not likely to become vagrants. I may, however, remind my hon. Friend that the whole subject of the condition of the Indian immigrants in Mauritius is now under the consideration of a Royal Commission, and that this point, with others, cannot fail to receive their special attention.

LAND RETURNS—THE "NEW DOMESDAY BOOK."—QUESTION.

MR. WREN-HOSKYNs asked, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the Table of the House before the close of this Session, the Land Returns moved for elsewhere, and promised in this House, under the title of the "New Domesday Book;" and, whether those Returns will distinguish all the land held in mortmain by corporate owners, viz., Ecclesiastical, Charitable, Collegiate, Municipal, and belonging to Hospitals and Chartered Companies?

MR. STANSFELD said, in reply, that the Returns in question were being prepared upon information contained in the valuation lists, corrected as far as possible by the knowledge and information obtained by the clerks of the different unions, and as far as possible the Returns would distinguish all the land held in mortmain by ecclesiastical, charitable, collegiate and municipal corporations, and belonging also to hospitals and chartered companies.

POST OFFICE—IRISH MAILS—MILFORD. QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been drawn to the advantages of Milford as a Foreign and South Irish Mail Packet Station, and to the saving of time that would accrue to the cities of London, Manchester, Birmingham, and the Midland districts by the delivery thereat and despatch of mails therefrom?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, the subject of Irish mails had been frequently considered by that House. With regard to foreign mails, the steam packet companies ordinarily selected their own ports, and in doing so they were chiefly guided by commercial considerations. With regard to the Irish mail, the hon. Member must be aware that considering the distance between Milford and Waterford, and the comparative slowness of the steamers that ran from Milford to Waterford, there would be a loss of time even to the most southern parts of Ireland in sending mails by the Milford route. If the improvements which he understood were now being made at Fishguard, and by which a shorter route from England to Ireland might be made than by Holyhead, then no doubt the circumstances of the case would be altogether altered, and the Post Office would re-consider the subject.

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—TREASURY REVISION OF COSTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHARTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is prepared to state the alternative scheme to be adopted in lieu of the former system of taxation by the Treasury of the costs in criminal prosecutions; and, if not, when he will do so?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the Government had considered how best to give effect to the promise which was made by them on the withdrawal of the Motion of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), and had come to the conclusion that that might be done by the introduction of Amendments in the Public Prosecutors Bill, which would be before the House on Wednesday next. The effect of those Amendments would be to relieve counties and boroughs of the statutory obligations to which they were now subject in regard to costs in criminal prosecutions; and they would be laid on the Table in time for their consideration before the Bill was proceeded with, but not before Monday.

CRIMINAL LAW — COLLUMPTON MAGISTRATES—CASE OF JOHN WEBBER.

QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What is the result of the inquiry he has made into the conduct of the magistrates sitting in petty-sessions at Collumpton on Monday June 3rd, in the case of John Webber, a farm labourer?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he had received explanations from the magistrates on this subject. In the first place, he might observe that the decision itself at which they arrived had reference to one of the most difficult questions with which magistrates had to deal—namely, what is and what is not a contract, and for what time was that contract made; and he was bound to say that, after reading the explanations, the decision was honestly arrived at, whether it was a correct decision or not. With regard to the scene that followed, the chairman of the magistrates denied, in warm terms, the accuracy of the statement made by the person who had described the scene. No doubt the conduct of the magistrates, if correctly represented by that person, could not be defended; but as the accuracy of the statement was disputed the course to be pursued, in case of further action being taken, was to make distinct charges to the Lord Chancellor, who was the officer deputed by law to deal with such matters.

METROPOLIS—CHELSEA TOLL BRIDGE.

QUESTION.

MR. PEEK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the financial position of the Government toll bridge at Chelsea has improved or otherwise during the past two years; whether any of the land surrounding Battersea Park has within such period been sold; and, when the freedom from toll anticipated and intended to be provided for by the Act of 1858 may be expected?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, the balance of the debt charged on Chelsea Bridge up to 1870 was £101,604, and he was happy to inform the hon. Member that in March, 1872, it was reduced to £92,000. From that fact, and from the accounts which had been laid on the Table of the House, the hon. Member would be able to form his own conclusions as to when the debt would be entirely liquidated. With regard to the land around Battersea Park, three-quarters of an acre had been sold during the period named in the Question for the sum of £3,250.

RAILWAYS—COMMUNICATION WITH GUARDS—THE CORD SYSTEM.

QUESTION.

MR. HINDE PALMER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to the recent Report of Captain Tyler as to the failure on one of the leading lines of Railway of the cord communication between passengers and guards; and, whether he intends to take any steps for ascertaining the best and most certain system of communication which can be used, in compliance with the 22nd section of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that since the receipt of Captain Tyler's Report this subject had been considered by the Board of Trade, and the opinions of the Inspectors of Railways taken upon it. It appeared, on the whole, that the cord system had, to a great extent, proved a failure, and that among the many remedies suggested an electric system of communication was most likely to prove successful. His hon. and learned Friend was not quite accurate as to the functions of the Board of Trade. They had no power of initiative, either with regard to devising or prescribing any particular system of communication. What they could do was to withdraw the provisional approval which was given to the cord communication now in use on the Railways, and to call upon the Companies to substitute some better arrangement, and propose it for the approval of the Board of Trade. That was the course he meant to take.

SUEZ CANAL—INCREASE OF DUES—NET AND GROSS TONNAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. NORWOOD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to a notification of the Suez Canal Company, that on and after the 1st July next, the toll of ten francs per ton now levied on the net tonnage (or cargo capacity) of steamers will be charged on the gross tonnage; and, whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken as to the power of the Company, consistently with the terms of its Concession, to levy dues on that portion of the tonnage of a merchant steam vessel occupied by its machinery and fuel?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had not been taken on this subject, and he was not sure whether the Government would think it right to take their opinion as to the effect of the terms of a concession made by a Foreign Government to a Foreign Company. But with regard to the facts of the case, he had reason to believe, from information he had obtained at the Foreign Office, that the notification referred to had been given by the Suez Canal Company. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had taken steps at his request to secure full information on the subject from our Ambassador at Constantinople.

MR. NORWOOD inquired, whether it was true that the Italian Government had taken diplomatic action in the matter?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Board of Trade had not received any information of the kind from the Foreign Office.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT—DIGEST OF SANITARY LAWS.—QUESTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has completed the digest or code of existing Sanitary Laws for the use of the Local Authorities which he referred to as being in progress two months since; and, if so, whether he would give Members of this House the benefit of the information which it contains by laying such digest upon the Table of the House previous to going into Committee on the Public Health Bill?

MR. STANSFELD, in reply, said, the digest to which the hon. Member referred, and which was in course of preparation, was in the nature of a popular digest, and the hon. Gentleman might remember he called it a code mœcum of sanitary law. The object which he had in view was, that when the Public Health Bill became law the local sanitary authorities and their officers might have in their possession in an easy, intelligible, and popular form some kind of digest of existing sanitary Acts as affected by the Public Health Act. He had never, therefore, contemplated completing that digest until the Public Health Bill should have passed both Houses of Parliament. With regard to the second Question, no more complete digest of existing sanitary laws could be had than that contained in the Report of the Commissioners, which had been laid on the Table of the House.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, the Report contained 167 pages of printed matter, and therefore could not be said to afford the precise digest which would be useful to hon. Members.

ORDNANCE SURVEY—LINCOLNSHIRE. QUESTION.

MR. WELBY asked the Chief Commissioner of Works, How soon a new Ordnance Survey of Lincolnshire may be expected to be published, and on what scale or scales the maps will be drawn?

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that, according to the new principle by which the surveyors were to be guided, counties of the greatest importance would be first selected; but the selection would be qualified by a regard to the requirements of the War Office. At that rate Lincolnshire would probably be surveyed in the course of the next 10 years.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— ELECTION OF SCHOOL BOARDS. QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he proposes to introduce, in the present Session, a Bill to regulate the elections for School Boards; and, if so, whether such Bill will contain any provisions for the purpose of limiting the frequency of contests in parishes where the proposition to establish a School Board has been rejected?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he hoped to be allowed very shortly to introduce a Bill regulating the election of school boards. What its provisions would be he could not state to the House until the Bill was brought forward; but he might explain that a provision already existed which prevented the ratepayers or town council from renewing the consideration of the propriety of establishing a school board within 12 months of the rejection of a similar proposition. He thought that provision adequate.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—NATURAL HISTORY COLLECTIONS. QUESTION.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE asked the Chief Commissioner of Works, Whether he is able to inform the House how soon the new buildings at South Kensington for the reception of the Natural History Collections of the British Museum are likely to be commenced?

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that he regretted there had been considerable delay in commencing the construction of the new buildings at South Kensington for the reception of the Natural History Collections of the British Museum. The architect's sketch plans were sent in during May of last year, and certain questions arose with regard to them which occupied some time to consider; and the further plans were not ready until a much later date than was anticipated. When they were ready tenders had to be invited for the work, and the examination of plans and specifications took up considerable time. Difficulties had also arisen in consequence of the introduction into the building of terra cotta, which required particular precautions. He hoped that in the course of two months some competent contractor would be entrusted with the work.

LIQUOR LAWS IN THE COLONIES. QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When he will be prepared to lay upon the Table the Returns stating the different Laws in force in our various Colonies for restricting or prohibiting the Liquor Traffic, and the results of such Laws?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, he had received answers from most if not all the colonies respecting the different laws in force there for restricting or prohibiting the liquor traffic, and stating the results of such laws. There had been some accidental delay in the production of the Papers, which would be presented to the House very shortly.

NAVY—CAPTAINS OF MARINES.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he proposes to advance to the rank of Major the senior Captains of Marines, as is now about to be done in the corresponding seniority corps—viz., the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers?

MR. GÖSCHEN, in reply, said, he understood the proposal with regard to the Army to be to advance certain captains who had more important duties to perform than other captains to the rank of major, and not on account of the number of years of their seniority. That distinction, however, did not exist in the Admiralty. With regard to the senior captains of Marines, he would not say that the question was absolutely settled, for it was still under consideration; but he would be sorry to raise expectations that might afterwards not be realized.

ARMY—MARTINI-HENRY RIFLE.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has authorized Mr. Andrews, a carpenter and pattern maker in the arsenal at Woolwich, to proceed to Constantinople in order to practise with the Martini-Henry rifle, and thus to induce the Turkish Government to adopt it; whether Mr. Andrews is still in the public service; whether he goes to Constantinople at the cost of the nation; and for how long a time he has received leave to absent himself from his duties at Woolwich?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, the Secretary of State has not authorized Mr. Andrews to proceed to Constantinople. The facts of the case are as follows:—On the 7th of May Mr. Andrews, a carpenter employed in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, received leave of absence, on his private affairs, from the head of his department for one month, without pay. He has not yet returned. Mr. Andrews is still a carpenter in the Royal Arsenal, and he has not gone abroad at the cost of the public. This morning a letter was received from the agent of Mr. Martini, dated at Constantinople, the 4th of June, applying for an extension of the leave of absence of Mr. Andrews, who, I may observe, is one of the best rifle shots in England. Until this letter was received, the superintendent of the Royal Laboratory, the head of his department, was not aware that Mr. Andrews was at Constantinople, nor out of England, nor in any way employed by Mr. Martini.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

ARMY—SCIENTIFIC CORPS—PROMOTION IN THE ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT asked the Secretary of State for War, What number of First Captains of Artillery and Engineers would be promoted to be Regimental Majors under the proposed new Warrant; what numbers of them are borne in the British and Indian establishments respectively; what increase of regimental pay and allowances would it give in each case; what will be the increase in the Army Estimates for the numbers so promoted; what will be the increased cost to the Indian Government; and, does he propose to provide for the cost falling in the present financial year by a Supplementary Estimate?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the number of first-captains of artillery who will be promoted to be Regimental Majors under the proposed new Warrant will be, on the Imperial establishment, 155; on the Indian establishment, 128—making 283. The number of captains of Royal Engineers will be, on the Imperial establishment, 72; on the Indian establishment, 67—total, 139. When the new battalions are completed in the Engineers there will be 16 more, making a total of 155. Some of these, however, already hold brevet rank. The increase of regimental pay and allowances will be to the Royal Horse Artillery, 4s. 4d. a-day; to the Field and Garrison Artillery, 4s. 8d.; and to the Royal Engineers, 6s.; such officers as require forage also receiving forage allowance. The increase in the Army Estimates for the numbers thus promoted will be for the Royal Artillery, £13,084; for the Royal Engineers, £7,600—making £20,684. I am not precisely informed what the charge to India will be; but before the plan was adopted communication was held with the India Office as to the mode of payment, in order to avoid the great additional expense under the Indian contract system. Provision has already been made for the cost in this country in the Estimates of the present financial year, and no Supplemental Vote will be required.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
THE SAN JUAN ARBITRATION.
CANADIAN CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

MR. CORRANCE: Perhaps, under the present extraordinary circumstances, the Prime Minister will, without the formality of a Notice, give an answer to the following Question with regard to the negotiations as to the Island of San Juan. I wish to know—first, having reference to the telegraphic despatch from Berlin which has appeared in this day's papers—Whether Her Majesty's Government can give any information as to the unexpected or sudden presentation on the 10th instant by our Ambassador at Berlin of the British Answer respecting the St. Juan difficulty referred to the Arbitration of the Emperor of Germany; and, secondly, whether, in pursuance of the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman on Monday last, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, pending further negotiations, to proceed with any reference of the Canadian Claims or Questions on the basis laid down by the Washington Commission?

MR. GLADSTONE: I may say, in reply to the hon. Gentleman, that Notice of a Question is not insisted upon as a mere formality—it is necessary in order that Ministers may be able to inform themselves on the subject of the Question and so give an answer with perfect accuracy. I am in a condition to say simply this—that we have no official information—neither I nor the Foreign Office—with regard to the paragraph in the paper about a supposed unexpected or sudden presentation of a document by the British Ambassador relating to the Arbitration at Berlin on the Island of San Juan; there has been no suspension, so far as we know or are concerned, of any proceedings which are now going on at Berlin under the Treaty. That, I think, is a complete answer to that Question of my hon. Friend. I have now to address a Question on my own account to the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) as to a Notice standing on the Paper in his name for to-morrow, which discusses the general system of diplomatic negotiations, and affirms the desirableness that all treaty engagements should be laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament before being ratified, with a view to the cognizance by Parliament of negotiations before they are brought to a conclusion. To-morrow will not be a convenient day for bringing forward this subject. My hon. Friend kindly acceded to a request on a former occasion that he would postpone his Motion on general grounds; and there is now a specific ground for a further postponement, because Papers which will be laid on the Table to-morrow and will be in the hands of Members on Monday will, I think, throw some light—not directly, but still some real light—on the subject of his Motion.

MR. RYLANDS: I must express my regret that, for the second time, I have been asked to postpone my Motion, which, I think, is one of very considerable interest, and which it certainly appears to me derives very considerable illustration from recent events. And I regret it all the more, because I fear that, the Session being so far advanced, I shall probably not have another opportunity this year of bringing my Motion forward. However, under the circumstances stated by the right hon. Gentleman, and as I do not wish in any way to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, I agree to postpone the Motion.

MR. CORRANCE: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the latter part of my Question. ["Order!"]

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I wish to put to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government a Question of which I have given him private Notice—and I regret that that Notice should have been so short; but the incidents affecting the subject to which the Question relates change so rapidly, while they are of such great public interest, that it is exceedingly difficult to anticipate the course of events. I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can inform the House whether the statements which have appeared in the public journals to the effect that Mr. Fish has declined to concur in the application for the adjournment of the Arbitration at Geneva and that the American Ministers have dispersed from Washington, are correct? I also wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to assure the House that, in accordance with the Letter of Lord Granville, no application for adjournment will be made except on the joint application of the two Governments?

MR. GLADSTONE: I presume the Question of the hon. Baronet refers to the statement in one of the newspapers of to-day—I believe in The Daily News—which purports to be from their New York correspondent. That statement, as reported, is in reality an abridgment from the last communication which has passed from Lord Granville to General Schenck, the Minister of the United States. But, without saying more than that on its general tenour, I would observe that there is an important error in the latter portion of the statement—in, I think, the last line but two—and that error consists in the omission of the word “not.” As hon. Gentlemen will see, that error has a very important bearing on the meaning of the communication. Having said that, I will now say more specifically with respect to the Question of the hon. Gentleman—as to the concurrence of the American Government in any application for an adjournment—it is true the American Government have declined to be a party to a joint application for adjournment. And in stating that I do not think I should be doing justice to the American Government—though there is a certain amount of inconvenience in referring to Papers which are not yet on the Table—if I did not add that they have likewise pointed out the reasons for declining to be a party to any such application. That reason is that the American Government has had for its object from the first—though they have consented to deviate from their line of action on certain conditions—nothing in the world but the bringing before the Arbitrators everything there is now in the Cases. Consequently, it appears to them that they are not the parties to put any obstacle by any action of their own in the way of proceeding before the Arbitrators by a joint application. With respect to the American Ministers having dispersed from Washington, I have nothing to say, because I am not aware that we have received any information except with regard to Mr. Fish. What I understand with regard to Mr. Fish is, that Mr. Fish's health—I am afraid it has not profited by these negotiations, although he does not enjoy the sanitary advantages which we possess of sitting eight or nine hours a day in a Legislative Assembly—has suffered considerably, and it is, I believe, true, that he has retired from Washington to his country house. As to the latter part of the Question, I will only say that I think it must have arisen out of the error in the newspaper to which I have already referred. There is no statement in the Letter of Lord Granville to the effect that no application to the Arbitrators for an adjournment should be made except as a joint application. I am, of course, giving no information in the matter beyond stating that the report does not in this respect give a correct representation of what has actually occurred.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. OTWAY: I wish to ask a Question of the Prime Minister, the nature of which I have intimated to him. The subject has been referred to by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Corrance); but my Question differs from his, inasmuch as it relates to an answer which the right hon. Gentleman has already given in this House. The House is aware that the Treaty of Washington refers to other matters besides the so-called Alabama Claims—namely, the Canadian Fisheries, the San Juan Boundary, and the claims to be made before the Commission lately sitting at Washington. An hon. Member opposite—I think the hon. Member for Sussex—asked the Prime Minister the other day whether, supposing the Arbitration at Geneva were to come to an end, the other three questions, connected as they are with the Treaty of Washington, would come to an end also? The right hon. Gentleman, as I understood him, said, in reply, that, in his opinion, those questions would not necessarily fall with the failure of the Arbitration at Geneva. Now, Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House, very briefly, to this answer in relation to this very grave matter. In the 35th Protocol of the 3rd of May, after setting forth the history of the San Juan difficulty, and, after referring to the fact that the United States had on so many occasions refused to submit this question for Arbitration, it is stated that the Commissioners of the United States consented that it should be referred for Arbitration under the following circumstances—"Should the other questions in the Treaty be satisfactorily adjusted." Under these circumstances, and reminding the House of the conditions under which the joint occupation of San Juan is now held, and that the United States Government have declared that they would permit that joint occupation only until the question should have been settled diplomatically, I wish to ask my right hon. Friend whether he is satisfied, supposing the Arbitration at Geneva to come to an end on the 15th—and there can be no doubt in the mind of any man that on the 15th it will come to nought. ["Order!"] If my hon. Friend (Mr. Melly), who is so enthusiastic, will restrain his enthusiasm for a moment he will find that I am perfectly in Order. He has not been very long in the House and is probably not well acquainted with the Rules of Order. Supposing, I say, the Arbitration to come to nought on the 15th, I should like to know from my right hon. Friend, whether he is of opinion that the San Juan Boundary Convention can be maintained; and especially whether he has entered, or is about to enter, into negotiations with the Government of the United States on this subject.

VISCOUNT BURY: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I wish to put to him a further Question. We have learnt from the same sources of information as that from which my hon. Friend (Mr. Corrance) derived his intelligence, that if an adjournment is agreed to by the two Governments on the 15th, Lord Granville intends to lay before the Arbitrators the Argument on which he relies, and to accompany it with a document in the nature of a protest to save British rights in regard to the Indirect Claims. We have been told that Mr. Fish has stated in answer that any such document presented to the Arbitrators would be repelled with considerable indignation—and, in fact, would be considered by the American Government as completely putting an end to all negotiations. The question under those circumstances which I wish to ask my right hon. Friend is, whether this information is correct—that the presentation of such a document as Lord Granville intends to hand in will put an end to all negotiations; and, if so, in what way Lord Granville proposes to save British rights, supposing an adjournment of the Arbitration to be agreed upon?

MR. GLADSTONE: The answer which I gave the other night, and the more specific answer which was given by my noble Friend Lord Granville in the other House, was to the effect that the statement which appeared in the public Press on Tuesday last was substantially correct with respect to the document to which it referred. My noble Friend has no doubt read the papers which have since appeared, and has seen that in the course of the correspondence that document has passed away, and does not exist at this moment for any practical purpose. Another document of a subsequent date has proceeded from the British Government; and, therefore, it would be quite vain for me to go back to the discussion of the prior document, on which no practical issue at present depends—though I think that when the Papers come before the House it may form a most proper subject for any opinion or any judgment which hon. Members may deem fit to pass upon it. That is my answer to my noble Friend (Viscount Bury). As to the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Otway) I am bound to say he has propounded a most important matter. It is a question inter apices juris, to use a legal expression; but the answer which he supposes me to have given on a former occasion is one which in point of fact I never gave, for I have never been asked to pronounce any opinion in public on the point which he raises. The opinion which I gave the other day referred to a matter totally distinct, and my hon. Friend must, I think, have been misled by some accidental misreport of the words which fell from me on that occasion. I can easily understand how in the case of complicated questions, such as these on which discussions suddenly arise, and are hastily conducted in this House, misapprehensions of this kind may arise. The point presented to me in a distinct manner on a former day was this—whether, according to the belief and judgment of the Government, an adjournment of the proceedings at Geneva would have the result of intercepting the fulfilment of the Treaty in its other and distinct provisions—separable from those involved in the proceedings at Geneva. To that I replied, with some confidence, that, in our judgment, it would produce no such effect. We do not presume to give an authoritative opinion on International Law with regard to hypothetical cases, but our judgment and interpretation is that all the other provisions whatsoever of the Treaty may go forward just as if no such adjournment occurred. That was the purport of the answer which I gave on a former day, I may now add casually that by no proceeding, so far as we are concerned in connection with any portion of the Treaty, nor, so far as we are aware, by any proceeding taken by others, has anything been suspended because of the difficulties which have arisen on that portion of the Case which relates to the Alabama. I think that, under the circumstances, Questions so very large and important as those embraced in the remarks of my hon. Friend ought not to be made by me the subject of immediate reply. I may say, perhaps, that the Government have an opinion on the subject; but my hon. Friend will see that I have not given the answer, or anything akin to the answer, which has suggested his Question. That, I hope, will remove from his mind any belief that there is any occasion for that question. But I am quite aware of the purport of the passages to which he has referred with respect to the arbitration in the case of San Juan, and those passages were in my mind when I gave the answer on a former day with regard to the view which we take of those portions of the Treaty, other than those connected with the Alabama Claims.

MR. OTWAY: If I have misrepresented the right hon. Gentleman in any way I regret it. I do not wish to anticipate any statement which the right hon. Gentleman may make at another period; but there is one part of my Question which he has not replied to, and that is, Whether any negotiations or communications have been entered on with the Government of the United States in reference to the San Juan question?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think I have stated already that we have no information at all corresponding with the statement which recently appeared in the newspapers. We have no information with regard to anything special having occurred.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[Bill 31.]
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. Progress 11th June.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

V. TEACHERS.

Clause 52 (Teachers in office before the passing of the Act. Teachers appointed after passing of Act).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved in page 20, line 6, to omit the words "and every such appointment shall be during the pleasure of the School Board." He contended that under the Bill as it stood the tenure of the schoolmaster would be very precarious, and it was highly desirable to place him, as regarded his position, in a more stable and satisfactory position. The example of the parochial boards told in the same direction. He thought the Committee presided over by his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) had acted wisely in recommending that Inspectors of poor should be independent of the local boards, and he trusted the House would adopt his Amendment, and protect the teachers in a similar manner.

MR. ELLICE said, he did not think that the Lord Advocate properly appreciated the necessity and expediency of securing schoolmasters, once appointed to their situations, against dismissal on light grounds; and he should therefore like the right hon. and learned Lord to make clearer his views upon the subject. How had the House and the Government dealt with analogous matters of even less importance? Take the case of the Inspectors of poor referred to by his hon. Friend: they were appointed by the parochial boards, but when once installed into office they could not be dismissed except by permission of the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh. The same rule ought to apply to the schoolmaster. By what machinery it should be done, it was not for him to say—that lay rather with those in charge of the Bill. He fully shared in the distrust felt by his hon. Friend (Sir Edward Colebrooke) of the working of the local boards with respect to these appointments. In all probability, candidates would come forward and underbid each other. Other influences would also be at work, and he really believed, if no check was put upon the capricious dismissal of schoolmasters, it would result in injustice to the schoolmasters themselves, and injury to the progress of education. The popular election of schoolmaster was part of the Bill, and the experiment, however doubtful, must now be tried; but he hoped the Lord Advocate would take the question of the power of dismissal into consideration, and place that power in the hands of some body removed from local influences, and who might be relied upon to give independent and impartial judgments on all cases brought before them.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. M'LAREN said, he quite approved of the principle laid down by the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Ellice), that they should judge this matter by analogous cases; but he thought the analogous cases were strongly against the arguments which had been adduced. Take the case of banking establishments: there was not a clerk in those establishments who was not dismissible by the manager; but when good men were got there was always a desire to keep them. The same rule applied to railways, municipal officials, and partnerships. Take Heriot's Hospital—there the teachers were all appointed at the pleasure of the governors, and not one of them had ever been dismissed. By analogy, there could be no doubt that the people, having a direct interest in the schools, would take care to appoint good teachers, and having once obtained them, they would endeavour to retain their services. His experience showed that it more frequently happened that schoolmasters turned away scholars and parents, than that the latter dispensed with the schoolmasters. He approved of the clause as it stood.

MR. ORR EWING reminded the hon. Member for Edinburgh that the classes of persons to whom he had referred were not under a board of management elected by £4 constituencies, but were under boards of directors elected by shareholders, who generally selected men of position. They should remember, also, that it required considerable attainments to be a schoolmaster, and that that was a Bill for establishing a national system of education. If a clerk failed in one bank he could go to another, and if he failed in all he could go into a mercantile house—clerks could fill a variety of offices, but a schoolmaster had only one department; and if he should lose his position from the caprice of a school board, he would be ruined for life, for he was not likely to be employed by another board. Why should the Scotch people abandon the good system they had hitherto maintained? To give to local boards the power of electing a schoolmaster for a year, or to turn him off whenever they thought proper—not for any fault of his own, but because he belonged to the United Presbyterians or to the Free Church, or, what was more likely, because he belonged to the Established Church, the injury to the schoolmaster would be also an injury to the education of the country. He therefore supported the Amendment.

MR. BOUVERIE said, it appeared to be forgotten that an odd vote at an election of managers might make all the difference in the treatment of the schoolmaster, and whether a man should be turned out or not. What was required was a check against arbitrary and capricious power. He believed there was no axiom more true than that which said that all power was sure to be abused; and to that he would add, that the more insignificant the body that exercised the power, and the less it was subject to public opinion and to freedom of discussion, the more likely would it be to abuse such power as it possessed. He would suggest to the Lord Advocate to retain this proposal that the appointment of schoolmasters should be at the pleasure of the local boards, but to insert a provision making the approval of the Education Board necessary to the dismissal of a schoolmaster by any school board. Such power was at present vested in the central department in reference to the discharge of Poor Law officers in England, and in practice the system had been found to work well and fairly to all parties. The existing schoolmasters were equally worth regarding. Taking them all round, a more efficient set of men could not be found, and their present tenure was almost freehold. A schoolmaster's whole energies were wanted for the instruction of the children under his care, and his mind should not be turned to think how to secure his election under a new board, or how to prevent his dismissal if he too severely chastised a boy in his school. Moreover, in many of the country districts in Scotland the whole power under this Bill would pass into the hands of the laird or the great landed proprietor. He therefore considered the Amendment touched one of the most important points in the whole Bill, and he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate would see his way to accepting it.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided, That no principal teacher shall be dismissed without the consent of the Scotch Education Department."—(Mr. Bouverie.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that part of the Bill had received the most careful and anxious consideration from the Government. It was impossible to doubt that there would be advantages in giving a schoolmaster a life-tenure of his office; but it was just as impossible to doubt that there were corresponding disadvantages—and in Scotland he thought the disadvantages would largely preponderate. Indeed, there were many cases in which the rule of life-tenure had acted prejudicially in parishes in Scotland. The hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), who brought forward this Amendment, did not seem to approve of life-tenure any more than he (the Lord Advocate) did, but had only suggested that dismissal should not be at the pleasure of the local board. After the best consideration which the Government had been able to give to the matter, they had not been able to see any satisfactory means between the two extremes of holding office during pleasure and conferring a freehold. The right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, indeed, had suggested that there should be some check against the arbitrary or capricious exercise of power on the part of school boards, and that expedient had occurred to him (the Lord Advocate), but his right hon. Friend the Vice President (Mr. W. E. Forster) had convinced him that a Government Department could not satisfactorily interfere between a school board and its teachers. They must hold the school board responsible for the due conduct of their schools, for the appointment of proper teachers, and for not retaining teachers in whom they had no confidence. and they could not, consistently with the interests of the public service, interfere to compel a school board to retain teachers in whom they had ceased to have confidence. He did not think it likely that these boards would act in an arbitrary and capricious manner. His apprehensions were rather in a contrary direction. It was the custom of boards not to act harshly towards individuals, or to mar their prospects in this world. Experience showed that they rather shrank from performing their duty in cases where it was clear they ought to dismiss an unprofitable servant, and that the public service was apt to suffer from an unfit person being retained rather than that a fit person should be improperly dismissed. On the whole, he thought the interests of education would best be promoted by the boards being left without interference from without. They could hardly be held responsible if the teachers were to be independent of them, while to give the masters a right to appeal would hardly tend to the smooth working of the system. The other cases which had been referred to he thought were hardly analogous. He could not see any means of complying with the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, and must equally oppose the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. ELLICE said, he trusted that the Lord Advocate would accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock. All that he wanted was that, upon the master's dismissal by the board, he should have the power of appeal to the Education Department—and if the Education Department were not going to undertake any such duties, he wished to know what the board was for?

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that his views and those of his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock were identical, and therefore he would withdraw his Amendment in favour of the proposition of his right hon. Friend.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, it was curious to observe how the English Bill was quoted as a precedent in some cases, and was pronounced to be wholly inappropriate in others. The Lord Advocate said that there was no such modification introduced in the English Act as that now before the Committee; but it should be recollected that in England there was not a universal system of school boards as was proposed for Scotland, and also that some discrimination was used as to the places which were fit to elect school boards; while in Scotland school boards were to be universal, and in many cases they would be elected where suitable materials were wanting. He thought of all evils, one only excepted, this supreme power of the local boards over the schoolmasters was likely to be the greatest, and he (Mr. C. Dalrymple) could not help feeling the want of a Board of Education in Scotland, because the power of appeal might then be given to a central Board sitting in Edinburgh. He felt that some security should be given that these local boards should not act in an arbitrary manner, because, if they did so, the independence of the schoolmaster would be sacrificed.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he could not agree with the hon. Member, for he thought that if any appeal was granted at all, it should be to the Privy Council, and not to a Board sitting in Edinburgh. The Committee, however, had not only to consider the interests of the schoolmaster, but also of the children who were taught. The hon. Member for Dumbar-ton (Mr. Orr Ewing) had very justly remarked that peculiar qualifications were necessary for a schoolmaster, of which aptness for teaching was one. If, however, the power of dismissal was taken away from the local board, a man might be appointed a schoolmaster who, although very clever, might have no aptitude for teaching. The result would be that the board and the schoolmaster would always be fighting against each other. If there was to be any injustice done, he would sooner that it was done to the schoolmaster than to the children.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to point out that by previous Acts the office of schoolmaster, except in parochial schools, was to be held at pleasure; and he thought it an omission in the present Bill that a clause was not introduced providing that a recalcitrant schoolmaster should be removed at the will of the school board. He hoped the Committee would adhere to the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that as far as he knew, all experience was in favour of some check against the use of arbitrary power; he was, therefore, anxious to secure fair treatment for the schoolmasters by the local boards. All that had been said about the English boards did not hit the point, and he should look with terror on a proposal to give school boards in rural districts in England this power, for it would simply amount to handing the schoolmaster over to the squire and the parson. With a view, then, to gain the desired end, he would move to insert at the end of the clause the following words—

“ Provided no schoolmaster can be dismissed except with the sanction of the Scotch Education Department.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought, in the interests of education, that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was perfectly right in the course he had taken on this occasion. The question was whether it was advantageous to education that there should be an appeal in these cases from the local boards to any other body; and from the experience he had gained both from the working of the English Education Act and from a study of education, he could not but decide that it was not advantageous — because, in the first place, they made the local boards responsible, which they could not be if they had not the power to elect and dismiss their own officers; and, in the second place, because it was most important that the master should feel that his position depended upon his merits as shown by results. The result of the passing of the Amendment would be that in every single case where the schoolmaster incurred danger of dismissal he would appeal to the central Board; and they could not make themselves a judge in the matter without incurring great expense, because an inquiry would have to be made, and without interfering in such a manner as no local body would endure. If the Amendment was passed for the protection of the schoolmaster, a power would have to be given to the central Board for the protection of the children, and they would have to be empowered to insist on the dismissal of a schoolmaster where they thought it necessary. In fact, such an arrangement would entirely do away with the responsibility of the local board, which was the main principle of the Bill. It seemed absurd that they could not place the same confidence in the Scotch people with reference to education as they had reposed in the people of England.

MR. GORDON said, that the whole tenor of this Bill was not to leave a single shred of the old Scotch system in existence, but to put the educational system of Scotland on the same platform as the English system. By the Act of 1870 they placed in the hands of school boards the appointment of schoolmasters, and they continued the principle applicable to denominational schools—namely, that the schoolmasters would hold their office at the discretion of the managers. But what was the experience of the working of that Act of 1870? Was not the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), a month or two ago, opposed by the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, on the ground that they had not yet had experience of the working of that Act? He ventured to say that there had been no opportunity of trying it, for a month ago only about 200 or 300 school boards had been constituted—so that there had not been time to speak as to the experience of the working of the school boards. But in Scotland they had long had the working of the system of fixity of tenure, which he admitted was perhaps carried too far, inasmuch as there was a difficulty in removing the incompetent or inefficient schoolmaster. It was not, however, necessary that that difficulty should be continued. On the contrary, he had himself given Notice of a new clause repealing the Parochial Schoolmasters' Act of 1861, and giving the Board of Education ample power to get rid of an incompetent or inefficient teacher. There were attached to the schools of Scotland a large number of intelligent teachers who had studied at the Scotch Universities, and they had a very efficient class of teachers coming forward and offering themselves for schools. In 1872, when the question of an Education Bill was under consideration, he (Mr. Gordon) was in communication with the teachers, and from one and all of them he had this representation made—that if they were left to the mercy of local boards, there would not be that ample supply of good teachers which had been the cause and reason of the excellence of the Scotch schools, because just as the schoolmaster was, so would be the schools. He submitted, therefore, that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock was a right proposition. But the Vice President of the Committee of Council said they were putting too much upon the Scotch Department of Privy Council. But they did not want to have the powers vested in the Privy Council of regulating such matters as this. They were quite willing to leave in the hands of the Privy Council the administration of money voted by Parliament, but they wanted a Scotch Board to regulate these things, because it was felt that the Privy Council would be unwilling to undertake such duties as this. That was just one of the great difficulties they had in accepting an English Board of Management as regarded the schools; and the right hon. Gentleman himself, in 1869, when arguing for the appointment of a Board in Scotland, said it would be extremely inconvenient to administer two systems in the same office. He thought they would find it so, and that the Scotch schools would be brought down to the level of the simple elementary education which prevailed in England, so that they would get a very much inferior education to what they now had.

MR. FORDYCE said, he thanked the Lord Advocate for having refused to accept these Amendments. He (Mr. Fordyce) had had a little experience in the management of schools in Aberdeenshire, where the present system had reached its highest perfection, and if they wanted an Education Bill there at all, it was only to assist them in getting rid of inefficient parish schoolmasters. It had been found that men who became parish schoolmasters, after a certain time became inefficient, and it was impossible to get rid of them. There could not be a greater curse to the community than that state of things.

MR. ANDERSON said, that the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment and the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple) argued that the English Act was no analogy in this case, because under that Bill there were only school boards in populous places, where they would work well, and not in the less educated country parishes; but the right hon. Gentleman did not confine his Amendment to the rural districts, but would punish those large populous places, and lower their status, by depriving them of their control over the teachers for the sake of a few country boards which, he thought, would not be sufficiently educated to elect proper teachers. That was a mere suppositious case, too, for they had no reason to believe that there would be any such difficulty about local boards; indeed, he believed the best men in the parish would be elected. He did not share in that sympathy for the teachers which so many hon. Members professed, for it did not appear to him to be needed. He thought the demand for schoolmasters would be so extended by the Bill that the schoolmasters would have command of the field.

LORD HENRY SCOTT thought the Committee had already made a great mistake in not having a Scotch Education Department, which would manage this business in Scotland. It would be most unwise to commit the arbitrary power of dismissal to an elected body like the school board, and he did not think the board was a body which would obtain the confidence of the teachers themselves. If the Amendment were pressed to a division, he should vote on it.

MR. ELLICE suggested an alternative Amendment, providing that the dismissal of a schoolmaster should be reported to the Education Department, and confirmed by them after being reported upon by the Inspectors.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 42; Noes 84: Majority 42.

MR. M'LAREN moved, to add to the end of the clause the words—

“Provided, That it shall not be lawful for any teacher of a public school, appointed after the passing of this Act, to accept of any other office or perform any other duties for which he shall receive a salary or other emoluments, unless the consent of the School Board shall have been previously given by a minute duly entered in their minute-book, and agreed to at a meeting of the Board specially called for that purpose, of which due notice has been given; and all School Boards shall have regard to this restriction in fixing the salaries to be paid to all teachers of public schools who may be appointed after the passing of this Act.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should have no objection to the Amendment, provided the latter part of it was omitted.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, they had been told over and over again while discussing this Bill that they ought to follow the English Bill. Now, he failed to discover any such enactment as this in the English Act, and he wished to know why the teachers of Scotland were to be put in a worse position than those of England.

MR. M'LAREN said, this was not a theoretic proposition, and the absolute necessity for some such clause had been shown by long practical experience in Scotland. He knew cases where schoolmasters had also been poor-rate collectors, inspectors, agents, &c. His object by proposing this clause was to make the teacher dependent upon his profession and love that profession.

MR. ORR-EWING asked what was the use of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh? The local boards would be the best judges of what was best in this matter.

MR. M'LAGAN thought the Amendment was quite superfluous, because the whole power in the matter lay in the hands of the board.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the clause did not forbid the schoolmasters altogether from taking employment, but it would place in the hands of the school boards the supreme control in the matter, so that they would grant permission to the master to accept other employment only in exceptional circumstances—for instance, they probably would not object to masters teaching heritors' children or other duties which did not interfere with their regular work.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE remarked that the hon. Member for Edinburgh said his object was to make teachers love their profession, and his plan was to prevent them eking out the scanty income which the school boards would allow them. He should oppose the Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE admitted that masters ought not to accept other appointments without the consent of the board, but thought the Amendment scarcely necessary. He suggested the omission from it of the words “or perform any other duties.”

MR. M'LAREN said, he would accept the alterations proposed by the Lord Advocate.

Words struck out.

Amendment, as amended, put, and agreed to.

MR. M'LAGAN moved to add at end of clause—

"Provided always, That the amounts of annual Parliamentary grants received in respect of any school in any parish or burgh shall be paid in full to the teachers of such school in such proportions as the school boards may determine."

He moved the Amendment to give hon. Members from Scotland an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the question. It had been decided that the masters should not get the fees earned by them, and that there should not be either maximum or minimum salaries fixed, and therefore he thought there was a great force of justice in giving the masters the Parliamentary grants.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment, on the ground that the question raised in it had been already amply discussed and substantially decided.

MR. ORR EWING disputed the statement that there had been any decision, nor had the question been fully discussed. At present, grants went direct to teachers, and he did not see why the boards should be made the medium of giving these grants. It might be an economical mode of administration, but he did not think it would be an advantageous one. He should support the Amendment.

MR. MACFIE supported the Amendment, which he thought would be a stimulus to the energies of the teachers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 53 agreed to.

Clause 54 (Examinations of teachers).

MR. GORDON moved, at end of clause, to insert—

"Provided that for three years after the passing of this Act, it shall be lawful for the Scotch Education Department to grant certificates of competency without examination to teachers holding office in existing schools, who are upwards of 35 years of age, according to such conditions as may from time to time be fixed by the Department."

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed this Amendment, on the ground that this was a matter for the Code.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 55 (Certificates) agreed to.

Clause 56 (University degrees, &c.)

MR. GORDON moved, in page 20, line 38, to leave out from the beginning to "candidate," in line 42, and insert—

"Within six months after the passing of this Act there shall be constituted a Board for granting special certificates of competency to teach the higher branches in public schools; this Board shall consist of seven members, of whom one shall be nominated by the University Court of each of the four Scottish Universities, one by the Educational Institute of Scotland, and the remaining two by the Scotch Education Department; the members of the Board shall hold office for three years, and shall be eligible for re-election; and this Board shall have power, subject to the approval of the said Department, to draw up regulations for the examination of candidates, to establish two or more grades of certificate, and to conduct such examinations at such times and places as may be approved of by the said Department; and if any candidate shall produce evidence that he has passed satisfactorily in any subject or subjects a public University examination."

The University which he represented felt strongly on this matter, for this Bill was not like the English Act—a measure simply relating to elementary education. The standard of qualification was becoming lower every year, and had been adjusted to meet the bare requirements of the Code. He thought that the standard which had hitherto been maintained in Scotland should be continued, and that it should not be left to local boards to fix the standard of education in the higher branches. He submitted that his scheme would answer the purpose he proposed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought the Amendment only applicable to higher-class public schools.

MR. GORDON said, he meant to apply only to those which professed to teach the higher subjects.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Amendment would then apply to all public schools in which any other than elementary instruction was given. In that view it was wholly inconsistent with the clauses which had already been passed by the Committee. By those clauses a complete Code has been provided. It had not been found necessary to have such a board in England, and why should there be one in Scotland?

It was impossible for the Government to assent to the Amendment.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR supported the Amendment as practically a retention of the existing system, teachers being now examined by University examiners, and the Treasury meeting the cost of this. There was a comparatively low general standard, though higher than that of the Privy Council, but if the electors wished higher subjects to be taught the candidate was examined therein. Local boards would not be trusted by the Bill to examine elementary teachers, and, à fortiori, they ought not to be entrusted with the examination of teachers of the highest secondary instruction.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 56: Majority 15.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 57 (Removal of teachers appointed before passing of Act).

MR. M'LAGAN moved, in line 15, page 21, after "inspectors," to insert—

"Acting for the district in which the school is situated, and concurred in, after a separate inspection, by another of Her Majesty's inspectors appointed by the Board of Education, on the application of the schoolmaster, provided he shall make such application within fourteen days after intimation to him of the certificate of approval by the inspector of the district."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 58 (Retiring allowances).

MR. GORDON moved an Amendment defining 15 years as the minimum of service entitling to a pension, and two-thirds of the salary and emoluments as the maximum of pension.

THE LORD ADVOCATE pointed out that, in common with all extraordinary charges, the retiring allowances of teachers must be paid exclusively out of the local rates, and it was therefore a matter in which the ratepayers of Scotland were particularly interested. He quite agreed that it was for the public advantage that teachers should be allowed to resign; but the best persons to decide on its advisability in particular cases were the elected representatives of the ratepayers. He objected to the Amendment as making it compulsory upon the boards in every instance to pay a fixed retiring allowance, whereas the option should be left to the ratepayers.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE supported the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. M'LAGAN moved an Amendment allowing a teacher appointed at least 25 years before the passing of the Act to retire on two-thirds of his salary.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not assent to giving such a right to teachers. In many, and perhaps most cases, it would be a wise and kindly act for school boards to allow aged teachers to retire on a moderate allowance; but the clause as it stood allowed them to do so. He objected to making it a statutory obligation upon the ratepayers to provide one.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 59 (Higher class public schools.—Burgh).

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR proposed an Amendment providing that a University degree with practice in teaching should be essential as a qualification for the office of principal teacher in such schools, or that the examinations to be passed shall be such as may be determined by the Scotch Education Department.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that with every disposition to favourably consider any Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend, he could not accede to the present proposal. The belief that the school boards had no power in determining the qualification of teachers in the lower class schools, whilst the power was given to them in respect of the higher schools, was not correct. The Scotch Education Department would fix the standard up to which, at least, the teachers must come in order to entitle them to receive the Government grant; but the boards could themselves fix a higher standard in the elementary schools if they desired. The higher class schools did not participate in the Government grant at all, and they might be safely left their present management. The examiners to be provided for the teachers of these schools by the school boards must be professors in a Scotch University, or teachers of distinction in a higher class public school. It was not thought advisable that the Privy Council should interfere with schools which did not participate in the Parliamentary grant.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR thought what the Lord Advocate said was scarcely correct, and that little favourable consideration was given to the Amendments which were proposed. By Clause 54, the Scotch Education Department was to fix the standard for the elementary schools, yet the standard for the higher schools—the Etons and Harrows of Scotland—was to be left to the school boards. ["No, no!"] That was his reading of the Bill, and was the reading of everyone else whom he had consulted. He should like to know whether this Scotch Education Department, which they had inserted in the Bill, was a reality or a myth? If it was a reality, surely it would do something to keep up the character of the education of Scotland, and would grant this small boon. At all events, unless they found that this Scotch Department was something more than the Government thought it was, in his opinion it would be better to strike it out of the Bill altogether.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had looked at this Amendment with every disposition to adopt it if possible, but could not do so, because it introduced a new principle. Hitherto the Education Department had confined itself to fixing the standard for elementary schools, but if this Amendment were adopted, it would mean that they should be responsible for the standard of higher education. He was not now, however, prepared to go to that extent, though he did not say a time might not come when they might consider it advisable to do so not only in Scotland, but in England as well.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that all the Amendment asked was, that the Legislature should take the same precautions as regarded the higher and middle class education of Scotland that it proposed in the Bill to do for the lower class.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he was afraid the effect of the Amendment would be to do that which would prove detrimental to the interests of higher education; for it would introduce the new principle of the Department interfering with those schools, to which they did not contribute.

The Lord Advocate

MR. C. S. PARKER said, it seemed to him that the time had come when they must demand some explanation from Her Majesty's Government. It did not seem that the language of the Vice President of the Council was consistent with that of the Lord Advocate's, for in introducing the Bill, the Lord Advocate spoke of it as having the great merit of dealing with the higher education of Scotland, and that recommended the measure very favourably in Scotland; but they now heard the Vice President of the Council declare that his Department was so steeped in the lower education, that he declined to take any responsibility as to the higher education. If that was to be so, it was a question whether they had not better leave the high class schools out of the Bill altogether, rather than deal with them in this unsatisfactory manner.

MR. DALGLISH trusted the Committee would leave this question entirely in the hands of the school boards. So far as he was acquainted with education in Glasgow, it appeared to him that probably within a very short time the dead languages might be obliged to give way to the living, and German and French become more important than Latin and Greek.

Amendment negatived.

MR. GRAHAM moved, in page 22, line 17, after "provision," to insert—

"But any person who at the time of the passing of this Act, being a master in a higher class school, as specified in Schedule (C), is a member of council of any of the Universities of Scotland shall be deemed to be the holder of a certificate of competency for the office of teacher in any of the said higher class schools."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. GORDON moved to omit sub-section 4.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment, on the ground that the sub-section was a most useful one, as it provided that in certain cases the school boards might encourage higher education by relieving the teachers from the necessity of descending to the drudgery of teaching the lowest elements of knowledge, and otherwise to provide sufficient school accommodation for elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic. He had to remind the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. C. S.

Parker), in answer to his appeal, that both in moving for leave to introduce the Bill, and in moving its second reading, he had expressed his regret that he could not give any pecuniary aid to higher class schools.

Amendment negatived.

MR. M'LAREN moved the omission of sub-section 5, which provides with respect to higher class public or burgh schools that the fees to be paid shall be fixed from time to time, but at intervals of not less than three years, by the principal and the ordinary teachers, with the approval of the school board, and if they do not agree that their difference shall be referred to a person or persons to be named by the Lord Advocate, whose decision shall be final for three years. He said these schools were intended for the lower middle class, who ought not to be left at the mercy of the teachers in the matter of fees, particularly as part of the cost of the education was defrayed by endowment. Moreover, he could not see why the Lord Advocate should have power to interfere in the school arrangements, when the Government did not intend to give any money to the higher public schools.

Amendment proposed, in page 22, line 41, to leave out from the words "The fees to be paid," to the words "three years," in page 23, line 5. — (Mr. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was a suspicion that town councils had been disposed to fix the fees too low; and, as a matter of fact, the fees were remarkably low. It was, therefore, not unreasonable that teachers should have a voice in the matter, because their interests were identified with those of the public. With respect to the interference of the Lord Advocate in school arrangements, all he would do was to appoint a referee in the event of the teachers and the boards not being able to come to an arrangement about the amount of fees, and, for himself, he should be glad if the matter could be referred to any other authority.

MR. M'LAREN replied that it had been said local boards would do everything that was right and proper, and that there could be no better tribunal; but, when a practical test was applied, it was said they could not be trusted, and that the teachers must have an equal voice with them.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 166; Noes 120: Majority 46.

MR. BOUVERIE proposed to add words which would give power to the Loan Commissioners to advance money to improve public school houses.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that this question rather concerned the Chancellor of the Exchequer than the Education Department. He would not object to the insertion of the words, but it was possible they might have to reconsider them on the Report.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 60 (Higher class public schools.—Parish) agreed to.

Clause 61 (Funds) agreed to.

VI. MISCELLANEOUS—INSPECTION—CONSCIENCE CLAUSE—COMPULSION, &c.

Clause 62 (Evidence of Orders, &c. of Education Department) agreed to.

Clause 63 (Inspection) agreed to.

Clause 64 (Parliamentary grant).

MR. TREVELYAN, in moving in page 24, line 22, after "situated," to insert—

"But to the extent only of two-thirds of the grant which would be made to a public school according to the rates and under the conditions aforesaid," said, that Scotland was not at present under the Revised Code, but under the system by which money was given in augmentation of the salaries of school-masters and in aid of pupil-teachers. Under that System, Scotland now obtained £100,000 a-year; but as soon as the Bill should become law, Scotland would be brought under the Revised Code, and would get a large increase from the purse of the nation. When the Prime Minister announced, with regard to the English Bill, that an increase would be made in the Parliamentary grant, the ground of that increase was stated to be in order that denominational schools should not suffer by competition with the school board schools, but what he (Mr. Trevelyan) wished to see with regard to Scotland was, that while the denominational schools should not be placed in a worse position than that in which they were now, this Bill should not be made the means of bettering their position. Unless some such Amendment as this were agreed to, the Established Church in Scotland would be placed in a very cruel position; for at that moment the parish schools of Scotland were virtually the schools of the Established Church, and they would be placed under school boards, who would be able to turn them into anything they choose—even secular schools—and the Established Church would be placed in a position inferior to that of the Free Church. Moreover, there was no such necessity for giving this grant in Scotland as there was in England, for in England the grant materially aided the passing of the Bill; but the present Bill had been all but passed already, without any such step being taken. He would also point out the fact that the denominationalists in Scotland did not ask for the gift which the right hon. Gentleman seemed inclined to force upon them; but they might depend upon it, that if it were given the taste for such things would assuredly grow. He did not, however, ask for the discontinuance of the grant, but simply that it should not be increased, and he believed that his Amendment would greatly conduce to the good working of the measure.

Amendment proposed,

In page 24, line 22, after the word "situated," to insert the words "but to the extent only of two-thirds of the grant which would be made to a public school, according to the rates and under the conditions aforesaid."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. COLLINS said, the hon. Member had truly remarked that this was the backbone of the Bill; but he was asking the Committee now to reverse the decision they had come to on the Bill of 1870. He therefore hoped that the Committee would not consent to do for Scotland what they had declined to do for England. Mr. Lyulph Stanley, the late defeated candidate for Oldham, a distinguished member of the Birmingham League, having gone down there against the principle of denominational education, returned from that place quite favourable to that principle. After his three or four days' experience of Lancashire he had come to the opinion that it was not desirable to discourage denominational schools. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs, by his Amendment, did not propose to abolish those denominational schools, but he was taking the dirty course of trying to starve them by degrees.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. DICKINSON thought that there ought to be one national system for every part of the United Kingdom, whereas the Government, by their measures, had succeeded in establishing three, each entirely distinct and separate from the other. It appeared to him that those schools, to be national, should have one system which would meet the requirements of all classes. He should therefore, support the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he felt sure the Amendment was proposed in no unfriendly spirit, and he should have no hesitation in accepting it if he believed it would conduce to the good working of the Bill. He was as much in favour as his hon. Friend of the system of national as distinct from denominational education; and the object of the Bill was to establish a national system in complete harmony with the feelings of the people of Scotland—an object which, notwithstanding many wild words, he felt satisfied it would effect. It provided that aid should be given—"To all schools which, in the opinion of the Scotch Education Department, efficiently contributed to the education of the parish or borough in which they were situated;"

and if the schools, whether of Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, or any of the other denominations in Scotland, satisfied that requirement by providing a good and sound secular education, why, he should like to know, should they not share in the public money voted by Parliament for the purpose of promoting that education under the conditions under which alone they could obtain that money—namely, by submitting to inspection and to all the restraints of a Conscience Clause securing that the schools should be open to children of all denominations? Believing that the Amendment would not conduce to the good working of the Bill, he felt it his duty to oppose it.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 80; Noes 273: Majority 193.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to report Progress.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped the Motion would be withdrawn, and that the Amendment which stood in his name, and which was a corollary of the question just decided, would be agreed to.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. COLLINS moved to insert in page 24, after line 22, the following words:—

“Provided that such conditions shall not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it is or is not provided by a school board.”

MR. M'LAREN objected to the Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thereupon moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COURT OF CHANCERY (FUNDS) BILL.
(Mr. Baxter, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. William Henry Gladstone.)

[BILL 43.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now taken into Consideration.”

COLONEL FRENCH moved the re-committal of the Bill, as far as regarded Clause 21, his object being to leave out from the clause the proposal that the Accountant General should retire on two-thirds of his salary, and restore the clause to its original shape, allowing him to retire on his full salary.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “be” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “re-committed, in respect of Clause 21,” —(Colonel French,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. DICKINSON supported the clause as it stood, contending that the proposed retiring allowance of two-thirds was ample.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that originally the Bill provided that the Accountant General should retire on his full salary, which he thought was a proper provision; and he believed it would have been maintained if the hon. Member who had just sat down had not taken the House by surprise on the former occasion, when he moved the Amendment that was now embodied in the Bill. Under the circumstances of the case he (Mr. Crawford) should support the claim of the present Accountant General, to retire on full pay. Every holder of that office had held it during his life, and therefore he thought the one who at present held it was entitled to what he claimed, and not two-thirds of his salary, as was proposed to be given to him.

MR. HUNT said, it was much more pleasant to argue in favour of giving a gentleman his full salary than in the opposite sense, but that duty compelled him to take the latter course in the present instance. If the Accountant General had a statutory right to get his full salary, of course it was open to him to take it under the statute, but on that point he should like to have the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. If Mr. Russell was not entitled to his full salary under the statute, then he, for one, objected to his being treated with exceptional favour.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he did not agree with what had been just said. The salary was composed of three parts—£900 a-year as Accountant General, £600 a-year as Master in Chancery, and an allowance of £2,700 in lieu of brokerage on Chancery funds. The other Masters, when their offices were abolished, received as an allowance their full salary. If the brokerage had not been commuted, about the year 1852, this officer would for several years past have received £5,000 or £6,000 a year more than he had. The principal officers of the Court of Bankruptcy, when their offices were abolished in 1869, received their full salary as a pension, and he thought the only way to obtain the consent of the holders of such offices was to deal liberally with them in order to obtain their consent to the desired reform. He hoped, therefore, the House would reconsider its decision.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, that speaking without reference to the gentleman in question, with whom he was entirely unacquainted, he did not think it would be wise in such cases as the present, seeing that the Government were actually going to make profits out of the funds in question, to deal otherwise with the Accountant General than in the most liberal way. He pointed out that the Commissioners in Bankruptcy in Ireland had, in 1867, received their full salaries, and that the Accountant General virtually held his office on the understanding that he was to hold it for life.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK said, he was of opinion that the Bill as it stood did deal liberally with the officer in question, and remarked that the taxpayers must also be considered in the matter.

Mr. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he hoped that if the Government gave way in this instance the case would not be drawn into a precedent; and suggested that the clause should be so drawn as to convey no statutory right, but so as to leave the responsibility of fixing the amount of pension with the Treasury. This had been the course pursued, after much controversy, in the case of the Commissioners and other officers of the old Court of Bankruptcy.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he trusted that the House would think it consistent with its duty virtually to comply with the Motion now made, as he was perfectly satisfied that by so doing it would act in the direction of the public interest. There was no doubt that the Government were pledged to the Accountant General to do what they could for him, and that if they now insisted upon carrying the Motion, it would have the effect of preventing reforms. They must judge of this matter by the whole of the circumstances. This gentleman had held the office 33 years; he was Master in Chancery, and belonged to a generation now passed away, who were accustomed to receive much larger retiring pensions. All the other Masters in Chancery had retired on full pay, and the Accountant General virtually held the office for his life, and he might reasonably expect to be treated in the same way. All the circumstances taken together entitled him to retire on full salary. In the case of the officers in Bankruptcy, the Lord Chancellor had to state whether in his opinion they should retire on full pay, and he was quite willing to place this matter on the same footing.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 140: Majority 86.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 21 (Pension to present Accountant General).

Clause amended as follows:—

"The person who at the passing of this Act is the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery shall, after the commencement of this Act, receive during his life, by way of retiring pension, such amount as the Lord Chancellor shall, with the approval of the Commissioners of the Treasury, deem proper under the special circumstances of the case, provided that such amount shall not exceed the present salary and emoluments of the said office."

Bill reported; as amended, considered; Amendments made; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CUSTODY OF INFANTS BILL.—[Bill 93.]

(Mr. William Fowler, Mr. Andrew Johnston, Mr. Mundella.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. William Fowler.)

Debate arising.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. James Lowther.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 14th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Limited Owners Improvements * (154).
Report—Epping Forest * (150).
Third Reading—Gas and Water Orders Confirmation * (101), and passed.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

THE SUPPLEMENTAL ARTICLE.

Correspondence respecting Geneva arbitration: Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.—North America (No. 9, 1872).

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY inquired whether the Government had any information to give them in reference to the amended Article which had been proposed by Her Majesty's Government?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the Papers which he had just laid upon the Table contained the Supplemental Article as amended by the Senate in its correct form.

CRIMINAL LAW — RELEASE OF THE WHITEHAVEN RIOTERS—THE LATE MR. MURPHY.—MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE moved for copies of Correspondence relative to the release of the prisoners convicted of assault upon the late Mr. Murphy. He had also to ask whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to the indecent conduct of the Roman Catholic mob at Birmingham on the occasion of the funeral of the late Mr. Murphy. In making his Motion and asking his Question, he must observe that a coldblooded and deliberate murder was not a matter to be regarded lightly. No doubt, Mr. Murphy, who was connected with the Scottish Reformation Society had used language that was quite unjustifiable; but the way in which he had met his death rendered his case of no slight interest, and the crime one by no means to be excused. Mr. Murphy gave his lecture in a private room, where no one need go who did not choose to hear, and he there denounced—in strong language, no doubt—those views from which he differed. The Government had stated on a former occasion that the police went in ten minutes after the riot began and rescued Mr. Murphy; but that was not done until he had been so much injured that he died in consequence of his injuries. He would be told that the Judge, before whom these rioters were tried, had sanctioned their release, but it was impossible to understand on what grounds, as, in sentencing them, the Judge stated that he had never known a more cowardly and brutal attack of some hundreds on an unarmed man. The Government should also be extremely careful how they dealt in this case, lest it might be supposed that Mr. Murphy, having contributed to the defeat of Mr. Gladstone in Lancashire, might be said to influence them in their conduct. Her Majesty's Government, the other day, in Ireland, very properly sent a considerable body of police to prevent a collision between two priests heading two mobs. They also saw that a Republican lecturer—at the time of the illness of the Prince of Wales—was protected in Glasgow. In fact, they took care to protect their friends, but allowed a Protestant lecturer to be attacked at every place he went by organized mobs, one of which at last murdered him. Recalling the assistance the Conservative party received from the Protestant party in Lancashire at the last Election, he was sorry not to hear one word of reprobation from them on this and other occasions, when he had felt it his duty to bring this matter before the House. What had happened to induce the Government to mitigate the penalty which had been inflicted upon the rioters at Whitehaven? In his opinion there was nothing whatever to justify them in shortening the punishment to which these persons had been condemned—and certainly punishment ought not to be awarded to criminals in accordance with the number of friends they could bring to bear, and there could be no doubt that the release of these men had resulted in immediately renewed violence between the Roman Catholic and Protestant mobs, the former having assembled at the prison gates to give an ovation to these prisoners. He thought that such mal-administration could but bring the Executive into contempt. Besides, it was to be feared that the course which had been adopted by the Government would tend to promote violent encounters between parties who held opposite and extreme opinions.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to lay before this House all correspondence relative to the release of prisoners convicted of assault on the late Mr. Murphy, whether between the Roman Catholic chaplain of the jail in which such prisoners were confined, or with the visiting or other magistrates of the county or borough in which the conviction of the said prisoners took place, or with the Judge before whom the said prisoners were tried, and Her Majesty's Government.—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that with regard to the riot at Birmingham, referred to by the noble Lord, the attention of the Home Secretary had not been called to it, nor was there any correspondence in the Home Office relative to that riot. As to the first part of the noble Lord's Motion, he did not feel it necessary to vindicate his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary from the charges the noble Lord had insinuated against him; though he must say that the suggestion that the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of mercy was ever exercised with a view to religious or political influences was not to be justified. Neither did he mean to say a word as to the motives which had influenced the late Mr. Murphy or as to the mode in which he lectured. He did not wish to throw doubt on his conscientiousness and sincerity, however great his doubts might be as to the soundness of the judgment exhibited by Mr. Murphy in going about delivering such lectures as those which he had been in the habit of advertising. The facts were these—Mr. Murphy had advertised to deliver a lecture at a hall at Whitehaven. Some persons opposed to Mr. Murphy's views attempted to enter the hall; Mr. Murphy opposed their entrance—a scuffle ensued, in the course of which Mr. Murphy was hustled and injured. He afterwards died. Of the seven persons tried for the attack, five were sentenced to 12 months', and two to three months' imprisonment. After the former had been in gaol for nine months a memorial for the remission of the remainder of their sentence was addressed to the Home Secretary. Among the memorialists were seven magistrates, four members of the municipal body, and two clergymen. Before acting on that memorial his right hon. Friend took the opinion of the learned Judge who had tried the case (the Lord Chief Baron), and this was his answer—

Lord Oranmore and Browne

"I have very carefully considered the case of Dennis Doyle and others, convicted at the Carlisle Summer Assizes of last year of a riot and assault upon the late Mr. Murphy. There was much provocation, and the prisoners had all borne irreproachable characters, and though there was evidence that three or four of them took part personally in dragging about and inflicting some degree of injury upon Murphy, it certainly did not appear that they had assisted in the attempt to throw him over the bannisters, from which he had received the several hurts to which he had been subjected, and, considering upon the whole that the religious feelings of the prisoners were put to a hard test, and may be said to have been outraged by the perseverance of Mr. Murphy in publicly denouncing the observances and the practices of Roman Catholics, and that the agitation caused by these contentions and conflicts has now subsided, I would venture to observe that Her Majesty might well be advised to remit the sentence pronounced as to the yet remaining portion of the term of imprisonment."

In another letter to Mr. Bruce, Sir FitzRoy Kelly said—

"You are quite welcome to read my letters, and to add that I am quite convinced that none of the prisoners lately released intended to do more than prevent Mr. Murphy from lecturing."

What had been done in this case was in accordance with the precedents of the Home Office, but it would be wholly without precedent to produce the Papers moved for by the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, while bearing testimony to the scrupulous sense of honour which actuated the Home Secretary in the discharge of the duties of his office, must venture to question his discretion in this case. The release of these prisoners seemed to him to have been exceedingly unwise—the Secretary of State had overstepped his discretion in exercising the mercy of the Crown immediately upon the death of the person for assaulting and injuring whom these persons had been convicted. It was no excuse that the men were of excellent character. Wherever Murphy appeared to deliver his lectures a mob was organized for the purpose of putting him down. Was that to be the system under which we were to live? He thought not; he thought we were bound to allow men to deliver their opinions on religious questions. This was a very serious matter, and involved a very important principle. On several occasions it had happened that in a town where Murphy advertised to deliver a lecture some Roman Catholics went before the magistrates and swore that disturbances were likely to occur if the lecture was permitted, and the magistrates had thereon prohibited the lecture. This he condemned; it seemed very like saying—Only threaten a riot and we will put these lectures down. But we ought to teach those individuals who were ready to take the law into their own hands to exercise some discretion, and make them learn the lesson of being tolerant of the opinions of others. This state of matters should not be permitted to continue. On these grounds, he thought it had been extremely unwise of the Secretary of State to release these men.

LORD COLCHESTER said, he must join with the two noble Lords who had expressed regret that the Home Secretary should have seen fit to modify the full sentence of the law in this case. He did not wish to raise the question in any sectarian spirit, or to charge the Secretary of State with religious or political partiality, but he did regard his course as one prejudicial in regard to public policy. In some countries it was thought right to regulate and confine all public discussion within very strict legal limits—in others it was allowed full freedom by law; but if it were tolerated in its use, it was impossible to prevent its occasional abuse also, and still less could individuals be allowed by lawless force to exercise a restraint which the law declined to exercise for itself. He wished to speak of Mr. Murphy as he should of a person of any other opinions who assailed any other sect or party, and he urged that if the attack which caused his death were treated as venial, it was an authorization to any person to judge for himself what latitude of speech might be allowed to his opponents, and if he deemed them to have exceeded it to assail their lives. Mr. Murphy was not the only lecturer who was very offensive to the feelings of many of the community. There were the lectures of Sir Charles Dilke—there was, above all, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, whose effusions—which Mr. Murphy's did not—bordered on high treason. But those whom these lecturers displeased belonged mainly to the orderly part of society who would deprecate the thought of similar violence; and why should their feelings be entitled to less respect than those of Mr. Murphy's enemies?

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

CHRISTCHURCH ANNUAL FAIRS ABOLITION.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY asked Her Majesty's Government, Why the Secretary of State for the Home Department has abolished the annual fairs at Christchurch, notwithstanding a Petition signed by 300 persons, magistrates, farmers, and inhabitants of the town and district, remonstrating against it, and sent to the Home Office, in accordance with an invitation from that Department to them to state whether they objected to the abolition of the said fairs? There were two annual fairs at Christchurch, which was the centre of a purely agricultural district of considerable extent, and were of great importance to the locality. The owners of the fairs were burgesses elected not by a popular vote, but by each other; but with a total disregard of the local prejudices and necessities, they had petitioned the Secretary of State in the beginning of February to abolish the fairs. A counter remonstrance had been got up against this Petition, and the same had been forwarded to the Home Office. Neither the lord of the manor, nor any of the magistrates petitioned for the abolition of the fairs.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, the facts of the case as stated by the noble Earl were strictly correct. The memorial referred to by the noble Earl did not reach the hands of the Home Secretary until the order for the abolition of the fairs had been made. If the ownership was in the lord of the manor, the order as regarded these fairs would be ultra vires. He proposed that an inquiry should take place into the question, and he could assure the noble Earl that the matter should receive the attention of the Home Secretary.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). ORDER OF PROCEEDINGS. QUESTION.

LORD REDESDALE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of proceedings being opened before the Tribunal of Geneva, the decision of the Arbitrators will be first taken on the general principles which appear to render the American Claims inadmissible, and particularly on those set forth in the last paragraph in page 132 of the Counter Case presented on the part of Her Majesty's Government before any of the special Cases were entered upon? Both during the last Session and the present he had called attention to what he thought was an answer to the Claims put forward by the United States—namely, that the British Government could not be made answerable for injuries done by one part of the United States to the other—the two belligerents having since become united in one State. It now seemed that the principle for which he had contended was embodied in page 132 of the Counter Case presented on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The paragraph containing it was as follows:—

“If the relative positions of the Government of the Confederate States and its officers, to whose acts the losses in question are directly attributable, and of the British Government—whose neutrality they violated—towards the United States who now makes these claims, are justly estimated, the more difficult it will be to see how—upon the supposition of a want of due diligence on the part of Great Britain in guarding her own neutrality—any pecuniary compensation whatever can be claimed from Great Britain. The whole responsibility of the acts which caused these losses belonged, primarily, to the Confederate States; they were all done by them, beyond the jurisdiction and control of Great Britain; wrong was done by them to Great Britain, in the very infraction of her laws, which constitutes the foundation of the present claims. But from them no pecuniary reparation whatever for these losses has been, or is now, exacted by the conquerors; what has been condoned to the principals, is sought to be exacted from those who were at the most passively accessory to those losses, through a wrong done to them and against their will. The very States which did the wrong are part of the United States, who now seek to throw the pecuniary liability for that wrong solely and exclusively upon Great Britain, herself—so far at least as they are concerned—the injured party. They have been re-admitted to their former full participation in the rights and privileges of the Federal Constitution; they send their members to the Senate and the House of Representatives; they take part in the election of the President; they would share in any benefit which the public revenue of the United States might derive from whatever might be awarded by the Arbitrators to be paid by Great Britain. On what principle of International equity can a Federal Commonwealth so composed seek to throw upon a neutral, assumed at the most to have been guilty of some degree of negligence, liabilities which belonged in the first degree to its own citizens, with whom it has now re-entered into relations of political unity, and from which it has wholly absolved those citizens?”

The question was one of primary liability, and ought to be decided before any other matter was entered upon, because if ruled in our favour, all other inquiries would become unnecessary. If the other points were first determined and the verdict of the Arbitrators should be against us, a subsequent decision that this objection on principle was good, and that we were not liable to pay the damages we had been declared to have been justly subject to, would lead to very sore feeling against us in the United States. On the other hand, if the decision against the Claims was first given on the point he referred to, it would be some satisfaction to America to know that the reunion of their great Confederacy was the cause of their rejection.

Lord Redesdale

EARL GRANVILLE: With regard to the argument brought forward by the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) last year, and also in the present Session, I remember that on two occasions I said in answer to my noble Friend that while I gave no opinion either for or against the argument, I promised that it would be taken into consideration by Her Majesty's Government. The first duty of the Arbitrators would be to consider whether England had failed in the performance of her duties as a neutral by way of omission or commission, either under the three rules laid down by the Treaty of Washington or under the recognized principles of International Law. Supposing that they find that we have so failed in our duty in respect of any of the vessels, the Arbitrators may, if they think proper, proceed to award a lump sum in satisfaction of all claims, or not awarding a sum in gross, a Board of Assessors is to be appointed to ascertain the amount of liability in respect of each vessel indicated by the Arbitrators. In order to enable the Arbitrators to perform these duties, it was provided by the Treaty that each Government should present a case to the Tribunal. That has been done. The noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) seemed to complain that his views were not referred to in our Case, but the reason was that the document was confined to a statement of facts. Argument was reserved for the Counter Case. In our Counter Case, which was presented to the Arbitrators two months ago, the noble Lord will find that his argument is set forth, and I think he will also admit that it is stated in as clear a manner as it can be done. The next stage, if things had gone on perfectly smoothly, would have been for each party to present a Summary of the arguments on which it meant to rely. It was quite clear that he (Earl Granville) would be exceeding his duty if he were to state what was in that Summary, and still more so if he were to go further, and state the course which counsel would pursue—supposing that, after the Summary of points was put in, the Arbitrators should require an oral argument. He was, therefore, unable to answer in precise terms the Question which the noble Lord had put to him.

LORD REDESDALE said, it would be extremely awkward if the Case was not presented in such a way that this point would of necessity be first decided.

DANGEROUS EXHIBITIONS—WOMEN AND CHILDREN.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BUCKHURST rose to call attention to the state of the law with reference to the employment of Women and Children in public entertainments as acrobats. In these exhibitions women and children of tender years were often put in positions of the greatest danger—their lives might be said literally to hang upon a thread. There was no legislative provision which was sufficient to meet such cases. He had received an account from an eye-witness of what occurred at the Alhambra, where a little girl, not more than 12 years of age, risked her life in a fearful gymnastic feat, in which if she had not succeeded she must have suffered instant death. He had also received an account from an eye-witness of a performance at the Oxford Music Hall where two little boys (the youngest of whom could not be older than five or six years) were placed in imminent peril. He asked whether performances of this kind ought to be allowed in order to satisfy a morbid love of excitement? He admitted that it might be difficult to legislate on such a subject, but he thought there were instances in which legislative interference had taken place in circumstances somewhat corresponding. For instance, there was an Act of Parliament which forbade that boys of tender years should be employed as chimneysweepers, and there were also the Factory Acts. He would suggest to the Government whether it would not be possible to introduce some clause into the Metropolitan and County Police Acts which would give the police the power of discretionary interference where the lives of women and children were placed in jeopardy.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that the noble Lord had himself acknowledged the difficulty of legislating upon this subject, but any suggestion made by the noble Lord would be received with the deference which it deserved. He thought the legislation proposed by the noble Lord would be too restrictive, and approached to over-legislation. At present if the Home Secretary, upon receiving information that any dangerous exhibition was about to take place, he at once intimated to the manager of the place of amusement in question that he must abide by the consequences if an accident happened. He believed that in every case the warning of the Home Secretary had proved sufficient. Blondin, for instance, had been prevented by such a warning from carrying his child along the high rope.

LIMITED OWNERS IMPROVEMENTS

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for encouraging and facilitating the Improvement of Settled Estates by persons having limited interests therein—Was presented by The Marquess of SALISBURY; read 1^a. (No. 154).

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 14th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—William Felix Munster, esquire, for Mallow.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Elementary Schools (Certificated Teachers), Mr. Pease discharged, Sir Thomas Lloyd, Mr. Charles Reed, Mr. J. G. Talbot added.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Committee—R.P.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Bank Notes (No. 2)* [196].

Second Reading—Juries Act Amendment (Ireland)* [195]; Bakehouses* [54], debate adjourned; Church Seats* [194]; Mine Dues [177].

Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Queen's Bench (Ireland) Procedure* [126].

Committee—Report—Third Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2) (re-comm.)* [172]; Board of Trade Inquiries* [193], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

GALWAY COUNTY ELECTION.

The Clerk of the Crown attending according to order, amended the Return for the County of Galway.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Copy presented, — of Correspondence respecting the Geneva Arbitration [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.— North America (No. 9, 1872).

PARLIAMENT—CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—THE GALWAY ELECTION—JUDGMENT OF MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE: Sir, I beg to give Notice that this day fortnight I shall move and take the opinion of the House upon the following Resolution:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh in the case of the Galway Election Petition is calculated to degrade the character of the Irish Bench, and to expose the purity of the administration of justice in Ireland to just suspicion, and the liberties and franchises of the electors of Ireland to serious peril.”

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

“PROVISIONAL USE.”

NOTICE OF QUESTIONS.

MR. GREGORY: I beg, Sir, to give Notice that on Monday next I shall ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, notwithstanding the postponement of the reference to arbitration under Article I. of the Treaty of Washington, he proposes during such postponement to take the necessary steps for carrying out such other Articles of the Treaty as are not directly connected with such reference; whether he contemplates that during that period the Acts which may be necessary to carry out such of the Articles as relate to the Dominion of Canada, and on which the guarantee of this country for £2,500,000 is to be claimed, should be proposed to the Parliament of that Dominion, or whether the execution of such Articles is to remain in abeyance; whether he regards the stipulations contained in such Articles as dependent upon, or connected with, the reference to arbitration provided by Article I. of the said Treaty; or whether the same are independent provisions and binding upon the parties to the Treaty, whether such reference is proceeded with or not?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE gave Notice that he would on Monday ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the United States have, since the signature of the Treaty of Washington, availed themselves of the provisional use of the privileges granted to them by that Treaty in the Dominion of Canada, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland, and whether they will continue to do so in the event of the postponement of the Arbitration; and, whether the term “provisional use” does not imply that in the event of the failure of the Treaty the provisions of the Treaty with respect to the Fisheries must come to an end?

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

THE INDIRECT CLAIMS—COMMUNICATION OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN: Assuming, Sir, that the Papers which are about to be presented are still in course of preparation, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether the Alabama Treaty Papers about to be presented will include any communications from the British Commissioners to the Foreign Secretary, explaining how it happened that the proceedings at the meetings of the Commissioners were not recorded, so as to afford evidence of what passed between the Representatives of the two Governments with reference to the withdrawal of the Indirect Claims; and, whether the Papers to be presented will include the communication from the British Commissioners to the Foreign Secretary, by which—as stated by Sir Stafford Northcote—

“The Commissioners were distinctly responsible for having represented to the Government that we understood a promise to be given that those Claims were not to be put forward, and were not to be submitted to arbitration?”

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Question of my right hon. Friend may be very briefly answered. The Papers which I believe are prepared to be laid upon the Table of the House to-day—although I cannot speak quite positively upon the point, as my noble Friend is not present—are in continuation of the Papers previously presented. They will come down from the date of the last Papers presented to the latest date; but they do not go back to the prior proceedings, and consequently they do not contain any reference, unless it be some purely incidental reference. They do not purport to contain any reference made to the proceedings at the meetings of the Commissioners, nor any reference to the declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote) as to the responsibilities of the Commissioners in representing that they understood a certain promise to have been made.

MR. HORSMAN: Then, am I to understand that no information is to be given to Parliament on this subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: No information respecting this subject will be contained in the Papers which the Government are about to lay upon the Table of the House.

MR. HORSMAN: Since, then, we are not to have the information in the Papers, I will put my Question in another form. I wish to know—first, whether the Commissioners reported to the Government that the question of placing on record what passed on the subject of the Indirect Claims was ever raised before the Commission? I wish, in the second place, to ask, Whether, if that question was raised and discussed by the Commissioners, they stated to the Government the reasons for their determination not to place them upon record; and thirdly, I wish to ask, Whether any communication was made from the Commissioners to the Government stating that the withdrawal of the Indirect Claims only rested upon an “understanding,” and whether the Government approved that position?

MR. GLADSTONE: In order, Sir, that I may give a precise answer to two of the Questions of my right hon. Friend, I must ask him to be kind enough to place them on the Paper. With respect to the third, I think it is material to reply that I am quite confident—I may trust my memory on this point—no representation was ever made to the Government by the British Commissioners that our security for the exclusion of the Indirect Claims from the negotiations rested only upon an understanding between themselves and the American Commissioners.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

GENERAL CONTRACTS OF THE TREATY.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

QUESTIONS.

MR. CORRANCE: Sir, I wish to be allowed to make a preliminary statement in putting my Question, without being obliged to move the Adjournment of the House. [“Order!”] Then I will move that the House adjourn, and I think the circumstances justify me in asking the indulgence of the House. I owe an apology to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for having on a previous occasion put a Question of considerable importance without Notice. The position of the Prime Minister demands our utmost forbearance not only on account of the circumstances of the time, but of the situation which he holds in this House, and I should be the last to show any acrimony towards him, or trouble him with Questions except from a feeling of patriotism. On Monday last we received from him an intimation that parts of the Treaty of Washington might be proceeded with irrespective of other parts, and that he confirmed in his answer to the first part of the Question which I addressed to him yesterday. In that Question I introduced the San Juan subject simply as a test, for clearly, if that can go on to arbitration, so can other questions connected with the Treaty. I believe there are reasons why the San Juan question should be pressed to an immediate settlement, and I see nothing to prevent it. With regard, however, to questions connected with Canada there may be difficulties, and therefore I wish to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of making clear the answer he gave me on a former occasion. The Treaty was framed, as I imagine, with all its obligations and concessions, as a whole, and great concessions were made by Canada; and if necessary—which I do not imagine it is—I could produce documentary evidence to prove that those concessions were exacted from her by the Government for the sake of Imperial considerations, Canada surrendering important rights and privileges. Now, in the present state of the case those Imperial interests are likely to disappear, and Canada may be bound, nevertheless, by the concessions on record against her. That is not satisfactory, and unless I obtain a satisfactory answer I shall move on a future occasion—"That it is not in the interest of this kingdom or its dependencies in North America that any reference should be made or arbitration effected on the basis laid down in the Treaty of Washington." I now wish to ask, Whether, in pursuance of the announcement of the Prime Minister that it is competent to proceed to further arbitration upon all points unconnected with the Alabama question, it is his intention to submit to further reference any question or claims having regard to Canadian interests in respect to Fisheries or losses from Fenian invasion? In conclusion, I beg to move the Adjournment of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Corrance.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I am, Sir, unable to see the connection between the hon. Gentleman's Question and the preliminary statement with which he thought necessary to introduce it. The only notice which I need take of his statement is to enter my respectful protest against the assertion that assent to the Treaty of Washington was exacted from the Dominion of Canada by Her Majesty's Government. They have not the power—nor, if they had the power, would they have the will—to exact anything whatever from Canada, which they have recognized throughout as perfectly competent and entitled to judge for itself on any question affecting it. With regard to the Question, the hon. Gentleman, perhaps, through my fault, has misapprehended an opinion given by me which I thought yesterday I had sufficiently guarded against misunderstanding. I have not announced, without limitation, that it is competent to proceed to arbitration on all points unconnected with the Alabama question. I have not said, without limitation, that certain parts of the Treaty may proceed irrespective of other parts of it. What I have said is that, as far as we are informed, the adjournment at Geneva, which would arrest for the period of the adjournment all proceedings with regard to that portion of the provisions of the Treaty that is to take effect at Geneva, would not of itself in our view hinder the progress of other proceedings connected with the Treaty. As to the larger and more general question whether, as has been said, the Treaty is built in separate watertight compartments, so that the leaking or total failure of one does not affect the others, or whether the parts of it are like the wheels of a four-wheeled railway carriage, where when one comes to grief the others are sure to follow—that is a matter upon which I do not think any present necessity has arisen for my presuming to give an opinion on the part of the Government. I am bound, however, to say, after the misapprehension which has prevailed, that the Government must not be understood to have made or given countenance to any assertion that they can ensure the preservation of any portion of the Treaty, in case that portion of it which is to be prosecuted at Geneva should fall to the ground. As to the operative part of the Question, whether it is our intention to submit to further reference any question or claims having regard to Canadian interests as to the Fisheries or losses from Fenian invasion, what I would say is, that the question of the losses from Fenian raids as between ourselves and the United States, stands, like other diplomatic questions, to be dealt with according to the interests of the country, but it forms no part of any reference; and that with respect to the Fisheries, there has occurred in the natural progress of the provisions connected with that portion of the Treaty an interval. That interval is, however, totally independent of the proceedings at Geneva, and, as far as we are concerned, we have no intention of suspending any of these proceedings in consequence of an adjournment at Geneva.

Mr. Corrance

VISCOUNT BURY: Sir, I asked the right hon. Gentleman yesterday, whether, as stated in the newspapers, Lord Granville intended to submit the arguments on which he relied to the Arbitrators at Geneva, and whether Mr. Fish had stated that any reservation of the British Claims, such as Lord Granville intended to put in, would be regarded by America as tantamount to putting an end to further negotiations? The right hon. Gentleman replied that that alluded to a state of things which had then gone by, and that Lord Granville's communication, of which I spoke, was no longer in existence. He referred, moreover, to the telegrams which appeared in the newspapers yesterday, and thereby implicitly acknowledged their substantial accuracy. On examining them, however, I found the state of things had really occurred to which the main point of my Question alluded, and that Lord Granville intended to submit to the Arbitrators some document in the nature of a reservation of British rights with regard to the Indirect Claims. My question, therefore, did not refer to a state of things which has passed away, for I understand such a notice will be regarded by America as putting an end to further negotiations. I wish, consequently, again to ask whether such a state of things has arisen, or is likely to arise? I also desire to ask whether a telegram which appears in The Daily Telegraph to-day, purporting to give in full the amendments made in the Supplemental Article by the Senate, is authentic?

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked, Whether, with respect to a joint application for an adjournment of the proceedings at Geneva, the American Government had refused to join in an application such as had been suggested by Lord Granville, and if not, whether Her Majesty's Government had determined to make a separate application?

MR. SPEAKER: There is now a Motion before the House, that this House do now adjourn, and therefore it is only by the indulgence of the House that the Prime Minister can speak again. But he can do so if it is the wish of the House that the indulgence should be granted. ["No, no!" and "Withdraw!"] This circumstance marks the inconvenience of the practice of moving the Adjournment of the House on putting Questions. If the hon. Gentleman who moved the Adjournment of the House had confined himself to putting a Question, then the Prime Minister could have answered the Questions now put by the two noble Lords without irregularity.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, perhaps I may now answer the Questions so far as it is in my power to answer them. With respect to the Question of my noble Friend (Viscount Bury), I adhere strictly to the answer I gave yesterday. I do not think any advantage would arise to him or to the House in my entering into further particulars. As to the Question put by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Scott), the Papers which are now about to be laid on the Table, and which will probably be in the hands of hon. Members of the House before the next day of meeting, will tell for themselves what course has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he merely meant to ask a Question on a matter on which the people of this country were anxious—namely, whether a joint application for an adjournment had been agreed upon or not?

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he wished to ask the first Lord of the Treasury, Whether the American Government having refused to address a joint Note to the Arbitrators at Geneva, to postpone their sitting for eight months, Her Majesty's Government have asked alone on behalf of England for that postponement?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope, Sir, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not think it discourteous if I repeat to him that which I have already stated. Yesterday I said that the paper which appeared in The Daily News was an abridgment of a communication from my noble Friend (Earl Granville) to the Minister of the United States; but I pointed out that it contained a negative where there was no negative in the original communication. That explanation I observed in The Daily News this morning. That being so, I think it is infinitely more satisfactory to refer to the Papers that will be immediately laid before the House than to say anything further.

POOR LAW—CASE OF MR. GODING. QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, When a decision will be given by the Local Government Board on the charges against Mr. Goding, assistant overseer at Cheltenham, which were inquired into in March last by an Inspector of the Board; and what is the reason for the delay in arriving at a decision?

MR. HIBBERT said, that since the report of the Inspector on the charges against Mr. Goding, assistant overseer at Cheltenham, had been received by the Local Government Board, further statements had been made which would have to be considered, but there would be no unnecessary delay on the part of the Board in coming to a decision; he was, however, unable to say when the decision would probably be arrived at.

IRELAND—MURDER OF MRS. NEILL AT RATHGAR.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the statement in the public journals that Mrs. Neill addressed a letter to the Lord Lieutenant, specifying the priest by whom and other circumstances connected with the altar denunciation on the Sunday preceding her murder is true; and, if so, whether any measures were taken in consequence of such communication?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think, Sir, it would have been more convenient if the hon. Member had given a somewhat longer Notice of this Question, for it having appeared only in the Paper of this morning, I have been unable to get that full information which I should desire from Dublin. I hope the hon. Member will excuse me for calling attention to the grammar of his Question, which, I think, might be improved on further consideration. From the shortness of the time I have not been able to ascertain whether or not the rumour is correct that any letter was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant by Mrs. Neill. I am, however, aware that an inquiry has been made into an alleged denunciation by a priest, and the result of that inquiry is that that priest referred to the case of Mrs. Neill and her tenants from the altar, and offered to subscribe to the defence fund. He, however, advised the people to keep within the law, and commit no offence. So far as I am aware there was no denunciation from the altar.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would repeat his Question on Tuesday.

IRELAND—MASTERS AND ASSISTANTS OF NATIONAL SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. SMYTH asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Upon what authority restrictions have been imposed upon the masters and assistants of National Schools in Ireland, and upon those serving in

Mr. Hibbert

British Aided Schools; whether these young men must obtain the sanction of the Education Department previous to their appointment in the Civil Service; and, whether it is intended that the principle of reimbursing the cost of training applied to them shall be extended to students of all Universities, Colleges, and Schools which are receiving State Grants or enjoy public endowments?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, the restrictions referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend are imposed in virtue of a contract, by which the masters and assistants of schools receive a gratuitous education on the condition that their future services are available to the State as teachers. If they elect to leave the Education Department and seek employment in some other branch of the Civil Service, they are bound to repay the cost of training. No such condition appertains to the case of persons educated at State-aided Universities.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[Bill 31.]
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment proposed [13th June],

In page 24, line 22, after the word "situated," to insert the words "Provided that such conditions shall not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it is or is not provided by a School Board."—(Mr. Collins.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. M'LAREN said, he strongly disapproved of the Amendment; it was only the first of an important series of a most formidable character.

MR. SYNAN said, he could not understand how his hon. Friend and the other Scotch Members who professed to be the advocates of impartiality in all matters, could object to the Amendment.

MR. COLLINS said, that the Committee had already decided that schools whether denominational or otherwise, should be treated in the same manner, and the words of his Amendment were taken exactly from the English Act.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had said on the previous evening that he would accept the Amendment, if there was no opposition offered to it. Now, he (Mr. Trevelyan) believed there was a very great and reasonable objection in the Committee to adopt the Amendment, and that was, that it was useless to tie the hands of the Government, or of the Education Department in the future. No doubt the hon. and learned Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) thoroughly understood English education, but he appeared to apply his opinions to Scotch education without a sufficient study of the question, for if he would read the 2nd Report of Her Majesty's Commissioners on Education in Scotland, he would see that the denominational question did not stand on the same footing in that country as it did in England, because in Scotland there was merely a handful of Episcopalian and Roman Catholic children scattered throughout the country. If it were rendered necessary to set up separate schools everywhere for those children the cost would be something enormous; indeed, at a time when it was reported that 200 schools were wanted in different parts of the country to supply deficiencies, the Commissioners stated that there were actually 40 schools supported under the denominational system which were not required. The Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend, moreover, was in the precise terms of the Amendment which in his judgment wrought such harm in the English Act, and with which he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to be satisfied.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that though cordially agreeing in principle with the hon. and learned Member for Boston, he would urge him not to press the Amendment to a division.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that in preparing the Bill he certainly did not consider it necessary to introduce the words now proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Boston, although they were before him in the English Act. He omitted them, however, not because they expressed anything different from what was generally intended, but because they appeared to him to be altogether superfluous. The whole of the clause was in the language of permission, and in this respect it followed the wording of the English Act; that Parliamentary Grants might be made to the managers of any school which was, in the opinion of the Scotch Education Department, efficiently contributing to the secular education of the parish or burgh in which it was situated. The real objection to denominationalism was that it was a system over which we had no control, and that the schools were distributed—he would not say capriciously, but without exclusive reference to the educational requirements of the district. Now, if a school were found to exist where it was not at all needed, or to be what he might call “superfluous,” a certificate that it was efficiently educating children might not be sufficient to warrant a Parliamentary Grant being given to it; but the reverse would be the case if it appeared that the school was necessary in the place where it existed; and that rule would be construed as specially applying to schools attended by 20 children and under. As in Scotland, there were to be school boards everywhere, the words of the Amendment might be liable to misconstruction, and in his judgment the declaration was superfluous, otherwise the Government entertained no objection to the proposal. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, he should contend that, whether superfluous or not, the Amendment was accepted by the Lord Advocate last night, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman was bound to adhere to the position he had then taken.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, it was true that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had accepted the Amendment on the previous evening; but he remarked at the time that he should like to know whether it was accepted by that side of the House or not. For his own part he should vote against the Amendment.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate ought not to characterize as “superfluous” any school which was efficiently carrying on the great work of education, especially as the Parliamentary Grant was in the nature of a capitation grant. It was, if not essential, at all events highly desirable, to insert the Amendment, in order to make sure that a fair interpretation should be given to the words of the clause in Scotland. He was certainly under the impression that the right hon. and learned Lord accepted the words of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Boston last night; and he now called upon the Government to accept words which, according to their own argument, were either totally harmless, or else necessary to the fair working of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to explain the difference which existed between the system in England and that in Scotland. In England we had to deal with rate schools newly introduced—we had, in fact, to supplement an existing system; while in Scotland we had to deal with a national system in a state of development. It was quite possible that although a school might impart an efficient education to the children attending it, it might be superfluous, inasmuch as it might not be required to meet a demand for education in the district wherein it was situated; and where a second school was not wanted, it was undesirable that such a school should be established, because in such a case competition was of no great advantage. As regarded that particular Amendment, he understood his right hon. and learned Friend to have stated last night that the Government had no objection to it practically if it met with the concurrence of the Committee. He thought they were now in a position to say that if the hon. and learned Member for Boston pushed his Amendment to a division they should think it right to vote for it. At the same time he thought the hon. and learned Member was not acting wisely in pushing his Amendment forward, because if he failed to obtain a majority in favour of it, the principle he was advocating would be in a worse position than if he had not proposed the Amendment.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was glad that the honourable understanding of last night had been recognized by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, for he (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had relied upon it. The only object of the Amendment was to ensure that, with regard to the Parliamentary Grant, there should be no distinction between the mode of treating children in one school or another, provided that they satisfied the test required.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that what he really said was, that he should offer no opposition if there were none on the part of the House; and all he now did was to press the withdrawal of the Amendment, since it appeared to him superfluous. If, however, it were not withdrawn, he would vote for it.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that the wording of the Amendment rendered it inapplicable to the Scotch Bill, and it was also unnecessary, he therefore would counsel its withdrawal.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he hoped that would not occur, for he should not have assented to the adjournment of the debate last night but for the understanding that the Amendment would be adopted.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he regarded the Amendment as necessary, or, otherwise, there would be no protection for denominational schools if the school board were to decide whether these schools were required or not. He thought that the power ought not to be in the hands of the school board, but that it should be left to the Education Department, and he should hereafter propose an Amendment with that view.

MR. STAPLETON said, he also thought there were already words in the Bill which made the Amendment unnecessary.

MR. M'LAREN said, that last night the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate undertook to support the Amendment, if there was no objection to it on the part of the House; and thereupon he at once rose and objected to it, so that the right hon. and learned Lord was released from his obligation.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that as the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate agreed with him upon the merits of the Amendment, it was better not to leave the matter to the Scotch Board. They had had enough of "understandings" in other matters, and it was better to lay down in the Bill, as in the English Act, the principles of action which Parliament thought right. He must, therefore, take the sense of the Committee on the propriety of inserting that provision of the English Act in the Scotch Bill. A great deal had been said about superfluous schools, but the question could be more fitly discussed when sub-section (b) came under the notice of the Committee.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 109: Majority 94.

Mr. Beresford Hope

On the Motion of Dr. LYON PLAYFAIR, Amendment made, in page 24, line 23, after "that," by inserting—

"Due care shall be taken by the Scotch Education Department, in the construction of such Minutes, that the standard of education which now exists in the public schools shall not be lowered, and that, as far as possible, as high a standard shall be maintained in all schools inspected by the said Department, and provided that."

MR. TREVELYAN, in moving, in line 29, to leave out sub-section (b), and insert—

"No school, other than a public school, which shall be established after the passing of this Act shall receive any grant," said, that the Amendment bearing on the matter moved the previous night was very complicated, and in some respects invidious. The present proposition, on the contrary, was extremely simple, and its expediency was quite obvious, for it was to obviate the necessity of any expense being incurred for denominational schools set up after the passing of the Bill, which professed to provide a national system of education for Scotland. He also thought it entirely solved the religious difficulty, for the Vice President of the Council had stated that they got rid of the religious difficulty by putting the schools under the control of the school boards; and that the effect of the measure would be to give religious but not sectarian training—in other words, instruction in great moral truths. Now, the Government had had the good fortune to be able to place the whole of Scotland under the school boards, and all he (Mr. Trevelyan) and his Friends desired was to put an effectual check to Parliamentary grants being given to denominational schools. They were repeatedly told that in Scotland the children were very willing to attend schools belonging to other denominations, provided the secular education was good. Why, then, allow such schools to be set up? The result would inevitably be that in small populations perhaps 20 or 30 Episcopalians or Roman Catholics would demand a fresh school, and the power either of giving or refusing these fresh schools would be placed in the hands of the Education Department.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he must decline to accept the Amendment, for the clause as it stood was intended to carry out what appeared to be the opinion of the great majority of the House of Commons in 1869, when the Bill introduced by Sir James Moncrieff was discussed. The original proposal of that Bill was in accordance with the views of his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan); but it was objected that the effect of allowing denominational schools hereafter to be established might tend to give a boon or encouragement to that class of schools, unless some words of prescription were introduced which should limit the grant to those which might appear necessary; and the whole difficulty was to suggest words which should be effectual for that purpose. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) at that time suggested that in the case of schools which were reasonably required in any town or district they should have the benefit of the grant, but that those schools established with a proselytizing view should not have that encouragement. He (the Lord Advocate) accordingly had endeavoured to introduce words in the present Bill which might have such a restraining effect, and they were the words of this clause now proposed to be omitted. There were in large towns schools which could be proved to be needed, and to refuse them the benefit of the grant would amount to something like persecution. However, the Education Department were instructed to report annually on such schools. That brought the matter annually under the supervision of Parliament; and he (the Lord Advocate) hoped he had succeeded in providing such reasonable checks against abuse as would be satisfactory to the House. With the exception of Roman Catholic schools in large towns, those best acquainted with the subject did not anticipate that there would be any considerable increase in the number of denominational schools in Scotland.

MR. TREVELYAN, in explanation, said, he perceived that the omission of the words might create great difficulty, and he therefore proposed to withdraw his Amendment. ["No, no!"] If he were forbidden to withdraw it, and if a division took place, he himself should vote against the Amendment.

MR. COLLINS said, he regretted that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) intended to vote against his own Amendment. That hon. Member was strenuously fighting against a great principle of the English Act, and which was that all schools should be secular as regarded the school hours; and at Macclesfield a copy of the Ten Commandments had accordingly been taken down from the walls. It would be inconsistent with that principle to inquire, as proposed by the clause, into the religion of the children's parents.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the proposal of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate lay between that of the hon. and learned Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) and that of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), which were the two poles of opinion in the matter. It therefore seemed to him (Mr. Bouverie) only just that it should receive the support of both sides of the House. It was also desirable that some loophole should be left with reference, for instance, to the Roman Catholic population, which was numerous in some of the towns and burghs in Scotland, who would probably not attend the National Schools.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the main system hitherto prevailing in Scotland had been one of a public character, though the parish schools were certainly connected with the Church of Scotland, but there had been no attempt at proselytizing. One of the great advantages of schools receiving grants was that they would retain the benefit of inspection, which was a guarantee that the education would be bond fide and efficient. Were they going to set up a system in which there would be no competition whatever? Why should not the people be allowed to organize an independent school, provided the education imparted was efficient; and probably it might be superior to that given in the National School, and get a share of the public money? Did the Committee wish that every child should receive education under the inspection of the Government, and so bring home to them that secular knowledge which was so desirable and so necessary? If so, he thought adventure schools should have their share in the rates. It was a question of justice alone, for to the Imperial funds all contributed. By that policy no wrong would be done the Government, or the Exchequer, or the parents, if the grants were conceded on account of the efficiency of the secular instruction.

Mr. Collins

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in explanation, that the Government thought it would not be fair to prevent those taxpayers in Scotland who might prefer a school other than the public school from having an opportunity of participation in the grant from the taxes. But it would not be right or advisable to leave the question as it stood in the English Act, because, whereas in England they were supplementing the voluntary system, in Scotland they were developing a national system; and, accordingly, the principle of the clause was, that there should be no assistance to any future school unless the Department was satisfied that it was specially required in the locality where it was situated. He granted that there was something in the objection to the use of the word "denominational," and therefore the Government would have no objection to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stroud (Mr. Dickinson) to strike out the word "denominational," and insert "not being a public school;" but they could only consent to this being done on condition that the following words at the end of the section were struck out:—

"And that a majority of the children in attendance are of the denomination to which the school belongs."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the grant was to be given on the ground of efficiency alone. It stood to reason, therefore, that the better the teaching in a school the more likely was it to draw a large clientèle of scholars; but an inefficient school set up by private adventure would draw no children except those which could be influenced by its patrons. For that reason, the money should be given only to schools that were required, and not to those which were really useless to a neighbourhood.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, it must be the duty of the Privy Council to make such inquiries as to the wants of the locality before any grants were given; but the clause as it was originally worded was a very invidious one, and was directed against one particular denomination, and that not Roman Catholic. There was no question that Roman Catholics and Presbyterians would never build schools connected with their own denominations unless there was a considerable number of children to attend them. But the section as it was worded in the first instance, and as intended by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), who made the first suggestion about it, was particularly directed against the Episcopalians. They were a small minority of the population, and no doubt it was almost impertinence upon their part to come forward to lead the education of the country; but he did not think the hon. Member for the Border Burghs ought to take any exception to the clause as proposed to be amended by Her Majesty's Government.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, the suggestion to leave out the latter part of the section was, to a certain extent, satisfactory, as it removed an invidious distinction; but he thought it was equally invidious to allow the words "specially required" to remain in the section. A school might not be specially required, while at the same time it might meet certain wants of the district. As regarded the Episcopalian schools, he had presented Petitions to the House from Presbyterians, praying not only might discouragement not be given, but that even encouragement should be extended towards the promotion of these schools in Scotland, because of their efficiency. In fact, there was a system of teaching in some of the Episcopalian schools in Scotland of more effect than in some of the National Schools. He did not think there was the least reason to fear that the country would be flooded with unnecessary schools.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) would not persevere with his Amendment. On the part of the Government, as he wished the Committee to come to some decision on the subject, he was quite willing to leave out the sub-section and the words relating to a majority of the children; but he could not accept the suggestion to leave out the words "specially required."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he understood the Government meant to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stroud, which would enact that Parliamentary grants should not be made in respect of a school not being a public school established after the passing of the Act; and he wished to point out that that would exclude all public schools established before the passing of the Act. What was to become of them?

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he hoped the hon. Members on the Liberal side would consider what would be the effect of retaining the words the Government proposed to leave out. The only practical effect of retaining those words, and the only schools in Scotland which could not receive any grants under any conditions whatever, would be the Episcopalian. The Roman Catholic schools always had a majority of Roman Catholic scholars attending them, and the same might be said of the Presbyterian schools; but in regard to the Episcopalian schools, it had been found that only 31 per cent of the scholars of that denomination attended, the other 69 per cent being made up of those belonging to other persuasions. Therefore, if a mere majority was required, they would shut out the chance of any Episcopalian schools being formed. He thought there need not be the least fear in accepting the suggestion proposed by the Government.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the objection of the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) as to the effect the adoption of the Amendment would have upon public schools existing prior to the passing of this Act, would be met by inserting the words "not being a public school" after the words "after the passing of this Act," as proposed.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had a great dread of the effect of the Amendment suggested by the Government. The deputations which had waited on the Lord Advocate showed a unanimous desire to prevent the extension of denominational and proselytizing schools. Much harm arose where there was a multitude of small schools in the place of one larger one under efficient management. He therefore entreated the Government not to leave out the words requiring a majority of the children to be of the denomination to which the school belonged.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of the Lord Advocate, Amendment made by leaving out the word "denominational," in line 29, and inserting after the word "Act," in line 30, the words "not being a public school."

MR. DICKINSON moved, in sub-section (b), to omit the remainder of the sub-section after the word "Act," in line 30.

Amendment proposed, in page 24, line 30, to leave out from the word "Act," to the word "belongs," in line 34.—
(Mr. Dickinson.)

Question put, "That the words 'unless the said Department shall after due inquiry be satisfied that it is specially required in the locality where it is situated' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 250; Noes 99: Majority 151.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in sub-section (b), after the word "situated," the omission of all the words to the end of the sub-section.

Amendment proposed, in line 32, to leave out from the word "situated," to the word "belongs," in line 34.—
(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 260: Majority 178.

THE LORD ADVOCATE then proposed the following addition to Clause 64:—

"No Parliamentary grant shall be made in aid of building, enlarging, improving, or fitting up any school, except in pursuance of a written application by a school board containing the information required by the Scotch Education Department for enabling them to decide thereon, and sent to the said department on or before the thirty-first day of December One thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, but without prejudice to applications made prior to the passing of this Act being dealt with according to the existing laws; and, with respect to any parish situated in the counties of Inverness, Argyll, Ross, and Orkney and Shetland, where a school rate of not less than ninepence in the pound on the rateable value of such parish has been levied, such grants as aforesaid may be made of an amount not exceeding three hundred pounds for each school and one hundred pounds for each teacher's residence, without regard to the amount contributed by the school board out of the school fund or otherwise, or by local subscription, towards the building, enlarging, improving, or fitting up such school or residence; and in any parish so situated where a school rate of not less than threepence in the pound on the rateable value of the parish has been levied, the annual Parliamentary grant to a school shall not be reduced by its excess above the income of the school derived from fees, rates, and subscriptions."

MR. COLLINS said, he would not object to the clause being inserted, but thought that Scotchmen were getting that which was not given in England.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 65 (Conscience Clause).

MR. ANDERSON proposed, in page 25, line 5, to leave out the words "under this Act," the object of the Amendment being, he said, to make quite sure that the Conscience Clause prescribed in the Bill should apply to every school in receipt of public money. As the Bill was not one for giving Privy Council Grants, which, in fact, existed quite independently, it did not seem perfectly certain that this clause was not intended to except denominational schools from the Conscience Clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that his intention was that every school in receipt of public money should have the Conscience Clause, and he would be content with his declaration as a lawyer that that was the proper interpretation of the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had no hesitation in giving his hon. Friend the assurance for which he asked; but as a pledge of his sincerity, he had no objection to the omission of the proposed words.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

MR. STAPLETON said, he had an Amendment to propose which he hoped would meet with the approval of the Committee. The object sought to be attained was a very simple one. It was that all children in a public school should receive at least some moral instruction, which should be given during school hours, but that no religious instruction of a dogmatic character should be given during those hours. He proposed this Amendment, because he thought the Conscience Clause was one of which before long they should be almost as much ashamed as they now were of the penal laws of times past. He begged to move, in line 6, after "denomination," to insert—

"All children attending any public school shall receive moral instruction from the teacher of such school who may, subject to the control of the Scotch Education Department, use such extracts from the Bible or such other books as he may deem suitable, but no religious instruction of a dogmatic, doctrinal, or historical character shall be given in any such school during school hours."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was sorry that the Government must oppose the Amendment; but he trusted that the adoption of that course would not lead the Committee to suppose that they were the enemies of moral education being given in the schools, or that they opposed the introduction of the words on any other ground than that really they did not find a fitting place in an Act of Parliament. He might take it for granted that in all schools, whether public or private, which were properly conducted, moral instruction would be given to the children, and that every occasion would be taken advantage of in order to inculcate and impress moral lessons upon them. As to providing that for this purpose extracts from books might be used, he should consider that altogether unnecessary. The schoolmaster would use such books and such means as he thought fitted for the moral training of the children, but the words were not needed in a clause intended only to protect the children from having any dogmatic instruction forced upon them to which their parents objected.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, for the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins), moved an Amendment, in line 12, after "in," to insert words simply intended to carry out the principle of the Time Table Conscience Clause a little more clearly. The clause had worked well in England, and he did not see what objection could be urged to the proposal to insert the words of the English Act in the present measure.

Amendment proposed,

In page 25, line 12, after the word "in," to insert the words "the time or times during which any religious observance is practised or instruction given in religious subjects is given at any meeting of the school, shall be at the beginning or at the end, or at the beginning and at the end of such meeting, and shall be inserted in a time table to be approved by the Education Department, and to be kept permanently and conspicuously affixed in every school room; and any scholar may be withdrawn by his parent from such observance or instruction without forfeiting any of the other benefits of the school."—(Mr. Collins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment could scarcely be aware of the result of its introduction into Scotland. If it were agreed to, only the senior boys and girls in many of the schools would receive any religious instruction. The junior pupils who required that instruction would not get it, because it was the custom to give religious instruction at certain times of the day when they were absent, and thus the effect would be that in some schools where religious instruction was required, it would, perhaps, never be given at all.

MR. GORDON said, that in the English Time Table, provision was made for giving religious instruction four times a-day; but when they came to Scotland, where the want of a Conscience Clause was never felt, the 65th clause of the Bill they were now discussing provided for secular instruction during four hours at least; and it was provided that no religious instruction should be given and no religious observance take place except before the commencement and after the close of the secular instruction. It should be remembered that the children came at different hours—the more advanced pupils at an earlier hour, and the other pupils at a later hour; and it was impossible for the teacher to bring them all together for religious instruction without subjecting both himself and the pupils to great inconvenience. The English Act approached more nearly to their requirements in that respect in Scotland, and he wanted to know why they had not the same Conscience Clause? He submitted with great confidence that English Members would not be doing justice to Scotland if they subjected the schools of that country to a more fettered Conscience Clause than that contained in the English Education Act of 1870.

MR. ANDERSON, in opposing the Amendment, said, that he had opposed the proposition contained in the English Education Act for having religious instruction four times a-day, and he was glad that the Lord Advocate reduced the time to that which he had endeavoured to insert in the Bill. He thought religious instruction given twice a-day was quite enough, because if they took away the attention of the schoolmaster four times a-day for religious instruction, they should require to pay him for it, and no such provision was made for it in the Bill.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE was anxious that religious instruction should be given four times a-day instead of twice. He, therefore, hoped the Amendment would be agreed to. He had, however, no preference for a Time Table, believing that a Conscience Clause was sufficient, and that a Time Table was like elbowing out religion. He was surprised at the view taken by the Prime Minister the other night about a master being compelled to give religious instruction.

MR. GLADSTONE said, in explanation, that what he had said was, that it would be absurd to compel a master to give religious instruction in a case where all the children would withdraw from it.

MR. M'LAREN said, that there was a strong opinion in Scotland that the Bill as it stood was decidedly better than the clause now proposed. The Bill was a secular and not a religious measure, and looking to the principle on which it was founded, he did not think it would be wise to have religious instruction four times a-day.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, the Bill laid down that no religious instruction should be given, or that no religious observance should take place, except before the commencement or after the termination of the secular instruction of the day; but it appeared to him that those were the very times when the children would not attend to it. He would urge upon the Government the expediency of accepting the Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the clause was not intended to curtail the time for religious instruction, but to effect an equitable division of time for both classes of instruction. If it was the opinion of the Committee that four times a-day should be substituted for twice, he would have no objection to make the alteration.

MR. ORR EWING said, that the clause in its present form would be quite unworkable in populous towns, where the half-time system was in operation in regard to child labour.

MR. CRAUFURD hoped the Lord Advocate would stand by his own clause, and not be led by the Vice President of the Council to accept Amendments from either side of the House.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, what they on his side wished for was, that Scotland should receive the same treatment in this respect as England had received.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 139; Noes 149: Majority 10.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

And it being now Seven of the Clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the Clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

FRANCE—DENUNCIATION OF THE TREATY OF COMMERCE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GRAVES, in rising to call attention to the denunciation by the French Government of the "Treaty of Commerce" with this Country, and to the effect of the recent changes in the Navigation Laws of France upon British Shipping, and to move a Resolution, said, he would remind the House that the Correspondence which had passed between the two Governments of France and England had been presented to the House, and that no one who had carefully perused it could fail to be struck by the magnitude of the interests involved, or to notice how great a blow had been dealt at the trade and industry of both countries by the abrogation of the Treaty. It was the undoubted right of every nation to determine its own fiscal policy, provided that existing treaties and obligations were not violated; and if he referred for a moment to the causes that had led France to denounce the Treaty, it was rather for the purpose of expressing regret that she should have put an end to a Treaty which had brought into the closest alliance, politically and commercially, two peoples hitherto kept apart by prejudice, if not feelings of a stronger character. Nay, more, he was prepared to show that during the time the Treaty had been in existence France had been placed in the van of commercial progress; that she had gained for herself a distinction in the commercial world which she had never possessed before; and that her prosperity had been greater than she had ever before experienced. Those were circumstances which, he thought, ought to have influenced the statesmen of France; but he regretted to find they had ignored them, and had chosen to adopt a policy which, in his opinion, did not tend to promote the interests or the commercial prosperity of their country. No one could be prepared to make greater allowances than he was for the position in which France was placed, for burdens heavier than any which were ever imposed on a great nation had been suddenly thrust upon her; but he ventured to think that our sympathy would not have been less if she had acted in a more generous and just spirit in her commercial relations with this country, and if, instead of pursuing a policy of isolation, she had evinced a greater appreciation of the manner in which England had acted towards her during the last 12 years in sharing with France all that was valuable in her trade, and who had shown in all her commercial relations the deepest consideration for France. It was impossible, however, to read the Correspondence in question without coming to the conclusion that France desired not so much the denunciation, as a modification of the Treaty; that she sought for time to prolong the negotiations, and that her overtures were somewhat sternly rejected by the Government of England. He thought, therefore, he was justified in stating that Her Majesty's Government had assumed some responsibility for allowing a Treaty to terminate which by negotiations or modifications might have been kept alive and not denounced. They might deserve praise or blame for that, according to the views of hon. Members; but he trusted he should be allowed to state the grounds on which, as he conceived, Her Majesty's Government had seen fit to take up the position they had done. He did not want to trouble the House with long extracts from the Correspondence; but he might state broadly that Her Majesty's Government appeared to have been influenced by a fear or suspicion that any modification of the Treaty, however slight, would be a departure from the dogmas of Free Trade. When the Duc de Broglie waited on the Foreign Minister of this country to hand in the denunciation of the Treaty, he asked for further time for negotiation. He was told by Earl Granville that if the scheme—or rather the views—which M. Thiers had advocated in the French Chamber with regard to Protective policy could be retracted, Her Majesty's Government would be willing to listen to the overtures for the prolongation of the time. He questioned how far the Government had a right to consider that views advanced in a written message to, or in speeches delivered in, the Chamber of another country ought to be withdrawn as a preliminary to negotiations connected with a Treaty. For his own part, he thought it was rather an overstraining of the position of the Government, and he found it difficult to understand why, in obedience to theoretical doctrines, substantial commercial benefits should have been refused; for he thought it would not be controverted that Her Majesty's Ministers had been largely guided by the fear that any modification of the Treaty would be regarded as a retrograde movement on the part of France, and as a departure from the true principles of Free Trade on the part of England. What view did our able and zealous Minister in Paris take of the matter? His words were so impressive that he would venture to quote them. Lord Lyons, writing to Earl Granville on the 1st of February, said—

“Your Lordship is well aware that I myself think that the political results of an abrogation of the Treaty would be very injurious to cordiality between the two countries; that it would produce an impression that the friendship between them was diminished; and that the mere existence of this impression would have the effect of soon making it only too correct. On political grounds, therefore, I am very desirous the Treaty should be preserved; and I also confess that I do sympathize strongly with the French in their financial straits, and perfectly understand the annoyance which they feel at the restrictions which the Treaties impose on their adopting such measures as they themselves consider to be best calculated to supply their urgent need. It is natural, therefore, that I should look with some discouragement at the present state of the negotiation.”

His Lordship went on to say—

“On the other hand, if a proper ‘most-favoured nation clause’ were inserted in a new Convention with us, France would be precluded from carrying the Convention into effect so long as Treaties with any other Powers subsisted.”

Now, he was prepared to show that the absence of that “most-favoured nation" clause was likely to inflict the greatest injury on the maritime interests of this country, and that on this ground alone it would have been expedient to carry on the negotiations as Lord Lyons advised. There was a party in the country—and he believed it was represented in that House—who held that it was not the interest of England to have any treaties at all, and who believed it would be well if we abstained from making any. So far as commercial treaties were concerned, he did not share that opinion, for the simple reason that commercial treaties were the universal means by which international reciprocal advantages were secured; and we were taking a wrong view of our position if we said to all other nations—"Because you will not give us what we want in our own way, we decline to take what you want to give us in the way you are disposed to give it to us." If the Treaty of 1860 was not a retrograde step, why was the modification of it in 1872 to be regarded as a retrograde step? We might ride our hobby too far; and it was idle for us to say we would deal with other nations only upon our own terms. If that continued to be our commercial policy, we should, sooner or later, find ourselves commercially isolated, and our trade would be diverted into those more favoured channels fostered by reciprocal benefits. Our great natural advantages had hitherto rendered it unnecessary for us to foster our trade by artificial legislation; but now other nations were steadily increasing in commercial and industrial energy and activity, and if we did not pay more attention to commercial politics we might soon find a considerable diminution in our trade. It had often been said that in this country we required a strong commercial department in the Government; and it was impossible for anyone to read the despatches mentioned without coming to the conclusion that the sooner there was a Department in our Executive specially charged with the guardianship of our commercial policy the better it would be for our commercial interests. He knew that recently the Foreign Office had constituted a commercial branch. It was, however, an inferior one—though presided over by a zealous official—not such as he aimed at—a distinct department presided over by a responsible Member of Government charged with the surveillance of our trade at home and abroad. To-night he proposed to illustrate the injury done to our commercial interests by taking up the maritime branch, with which he was most conversant, and which more than any other had been subjected to exceptional treatment on the part of France. The Treaty of 1860—otherwise termed the Commercial Treaty—simply extended the direct navigation conceded by the Treaty of 1824, to the importation of cotton and jute from India and wool from Australia as freely in British as in French vessels; and it further provided by Article 5 of the Supplemental Convention that merchandise imported into France in British ships should be put on as favourable a footing as if imported into France in the ships of any third Power. In 1866 France, pursuing an enlightened policy, took a most important step in commercial progress, for she opened her whole navigation, except the coasting trade, to the nations which reciprocated with her perfect freedom, reserving to herself the coasting trade, which she had before and since restricted to her own flag. She also admitted ships to registration, wherever built, at a nominal payment of 1 franc a ton. In February last, however, a complete and disastrous change came over the policy of France. She then enacted that dues should be levied on all merchandise imported in foreign bottoms, and the dues ranged from $\frac{1}{2}$ franc to 2 francs for every 100 kilogrammes, with an addition of 3 francs a-ton when brought from European entrepôts. A further levy of 1 franc a-ton, as quay dues, embraced every vessel, whether French or foreign, and therefore no special complaint could be made in respect of it. She also levied a tax of from 30 francs to 60 francs a-ton upon every vessel admitted to registration built out of France. With that tax, probably, the French shipowner alone had to do; and if he were satisfied to pay 10 per cent more on new vessels, and from 20 to 30 and even 40 per cent more on old vessels, that was his question. He must soon find out that in the competition of these days he was too much overweighted to hold his own—he would be carrying a load which no energy or enterprise could overcome. It was quite true that a tax upon raw material equally affected the consumer; but it would have this additional disadvantage—that it would drive the flag of England from the import trade of France, resulting in an enhanced rate of freight to that country, because the tax amounted to from 20 to 50 per cent upon the freights, according to the countries from which the merchandise came. Was it possible, under these circumstances, for the manufacturers of the raw material in France to compete with the manufacturers of Germany, England, and Belgium? A Return, which he held in his hand, showed that the amount of shipping engaged in the foreign trade of France last year was 11,000,000 tons; 4,000,000 tons carried the English flag, 4,000,000 carried the French flag, and the remainder was distributed among other nations, for the larger part having treaties. Now, if the English tonnage—which was about one-third of the whole—was excluded, the inevitable result must be to give greater employment to favoured nations' ships—to raise freights, and thus enhance the value of the raw material to the French manufacturer. If France was pursuing this policy to benefit her own commerce and her own shipping interest we might not have any ground of complaint; but it so happened that seven or eight of the principal maritime nations had treaties with France which had several years to run, and which placed the shipping of those nations upon the same footing as the shipping of France, and the shipping of those nations was free from the differential dues levied on the shipping of England, which were so high as to be actually prohibitory. What was more curious still was, that these nations were the very nations from which France had most to fear in competition; and on that point he had no worse authority than the words of M. Thiers himself—

Mr. Graves

“It was not the shipping of England that France feared, but it was the shipping of those countries in which wages, food, and shipping were low and cheap, and which were, therefore, able to undersail the shipping of France.”

At an interview with Lord Lyons, M. Thiers himself said—

“It was not against the competition of English vessels that the French mercantile marine chiefly required protection. Its most formidable rivals were the smaller merchant navies—such, for instance, as those of Italy, Greece, Sweden, Norway, and Germany—whose ships were cheaply built, and took freights which English vessels would hardly accept; it was the competition of these ships which would destroy the merchant navy, and against which protective measures were imperatively required.”

It was strange that, with these opinions held by M. Thiers, so great a blunder had been committed that the very nation he did not fear in competition was the very nation excluded; while the nations that were feared—Germany, Austria, Italy, Sweden, Norway, Portugal, Holland, and others—were under the favoured nation clause. It was so clearly shown, by the evidence given before a Committee of this House which sat in 1859 or 1860, that the amount of extra freight caused by these differential dues was the exact measure of the increased cost of the raw material in France, that the French Government added a Supplemental Convention, which provided that jute and cotton from India and wool from Australia should be put on the most favoured nation footing. The evidence was instructive, and was as applicable now as it was in 1859. His hon. Friend below him (Mr. Liddell) put a question to one of the witnesses, and the answer was that the freight of jute from Calcutta to England was £3 per ton, and to France £4 16s.—which was equivalent to a differential duty of £1 16s. per ton; in other words, a French ship got £1 16s. a ton more than an English ship did. The price of jute in Calcutta was £18 15s. if laid down in Liverpool, and £21 if laid down in Havre. New trades, too, had sprung up in France since the Commercial Treaty was signed, and had been brought under his notice by French merchants. One of these was the trade in rapeseed, because British ships could bring it in at a low rate with cotton. That was an advantage to oil consumers; but it could no longer be carried on in British ships, which were almost exclusively engaged in this trade. So with regard to saltpetre and rice, which had been brought as ballast in cotton ships, and at a low rate of freight. These articles were the productions of our own Possessions—our own Empire; but, strange to say, English ships, by our present commercial relations with France, were precluded from carrying our own products to France, while the shipping of all maritime nations having treaties with France in our own ports not only competed with us, but took every ton of goods, while our vessels were wholly unavailable for that trade; and remember, that the flags thus favoured were those which M. Thiers himself had declared were the greatest competitors of France—those she most feared. If England were the greatest enemy France possessed, in place of a warm ally, she could not have adopted a policy more unfair to this country, or one more likely to strangle her own commercial prosperity, than that which he had described. The French trade with England was only about one-tenth of the trade of this country, while the English trade with France was one-fourth of her entire trade. Then if they compared the exports and imports of France with England for the four years preceding the Treaty with the last four years for which statistical Returns were completed, they would find that 22,500,000 tons had grown into 58,000,000 tons, or an increase of 158 per cent; while the total foreign trade of England in the same periods only increased 67 per cent. If they turned to the tonnage of France, which before the Treaty was 2,800,000 tons, it too had swelled up to 4,680,000 tons previous to 1869; while the coasting trade of France, which was a monopoly confined to the French flag, had declined 15 to 20 per cent in the same time. He would now state to the House why he considered France was not justified in adopting towards England this ungenerous and unfriendly policy. In the first place, it was contrary to the assurances of the Government of that country; for in the earlier stages of this Correspondence it would be noticed that M. Thiers and every Member of the Government who wrote or spoke on this question assured the Foreign Minister of England, through Lord Lyons, that whatever occurred, England would not be put on a worse footing than any other nation. On the 21st July Lord Lyons conveyed to Lord Granville M. Thiers' words—"He asked no concession from England which should not equally be obtained from other Treaty Powers." Again, speaking of M. Thiers, he assured me—"No country should be placed in a more advantageous position than England." The policy adopted, however, was entirely at variance with these assurances. His second objection was, that the levying of differential duties on merchandise imported into France under the British flag was a direct violation of the Supplemental Convention of 1860. That Convention provided that any concession granted to treaties to any other country should also be extended to England; while the original Convention declared that each of the High contracting Parties should give to the other all the advantages that either of them could give to a third Power. Her Majesty's Government, moreover, had, after consulting the Law Advisers of the Crown, deliberately declared to the Government of France that it was a violation of the Treaty. Despatch No. 92 left no doubt whatever as to the position of Her Majesty's Government on this question. It said—

"As the duties proposed to be imposed are to be levied not on the ships, but on the cargoes according to weight, they are duties on the importation of goods within the meaning of the Vth Article of the Convention of the 16th of November, 1860, and that having regard to the Treaties France has concluded with Austria and Sweden, no such duties can in the view of the British Government be imposed on goods imported in British ships, while such Treaties remain in force."

He knew that exception was taken to this view by the Government of France; but, as we were advised, no such duties could be levied so long as other Powers enjoyed the immunity secured by treaties. The third ground on which he took exception to the policy of France was one not alluded to in any way in the Correspondence between the two Governments, and he took for granted that it had not been present to the minds of Her Majesty's Ministers in dealing with this question. On the 11th July, 1866, a treaty was made between Portugal and France, extending to the shipping of Portugal all the advantages conferred upon the French flag; and an Imperial decree of July 27, 1866, guaranteed to England that the same privileges should be conceded to her shipping. He could not find that that decree had ever been withdrawn. It was true this Treaty was once called a Treaty of Navigation, and again of Commerce and Navigation; but the Treaty would be found recorded in the official register of Laws, No. 1521, as of Commerce and Navigation—call it, however, by what name they would, it was declared applicable to England, and the decree had never been annulled. The fourth and last objection he had taken was one to which he attached more importance than to any other; and he could not help thinking that by a high-minded and sensitive nation like France it would have greater influence than any he had previously stated. In 1866, when France opened her navigation laws she did so on one condition—that only those nations which returned perfect freedom to her should confer complete reciprocity in return. It was not unnatural that under those circumstances England should claim the right of free navigation from France; but France refused it, stating that there were exemptions and inequalities in the English ports, which subjected the traders of France to taxation from which our own citizens were free. That was so; but a measure was at once passed in this House for the purpose of purchasing all those inequalities and exemptions, and we actually paid as much as £1,600,000 for that object. England, having thus fulfilled her part of the contract, was admitted to the privileges enjoyed by the French flag. Now, his contention was—and he advanced it as the strongest part of his argument—that England had purchased her maritime freedom, and it was not within the province of France to withdraw from the engagement without violating the honourable understanding which had been come to. Now, he should just like to turn to the future for a moment, for he found that throughout the French despatches the future was constantly in the mind of the French Minister, who always appeared to be considering whether England would retaliate. France, however, received from England an assurance that there would be no retaliation, and that the denunciation of the Treaty would make no difference in the friendly feelings of England towards France. M. de Remusat says, in Despatch 75—

“ We accept with perfect confidence the assurance that England, faithful to her principles, will never return to the retaliating duties of a previous age.”

Lord Granville, over and over again, repeated the friendly pledges; but he asked hon. Members whether they did not perceive, in contrasting the tone of the earlier despatches with the later despatches of Lord Lyons, that there was a cooling in the feeling between the two countries? It was impossible that it could be otherwise; and he asked, whether it was wise or consistent with the actual state of the case that the English Government should persistently tell the French Government that the denunciation of the Commercial Treaty would make no difference in the relations between England and France?

He certainly thought it was a mistake, and that it would have been fairer to France if they had faithfully told its Government that, as certainly as with the Treaty had grown up a common intercourse and a mutual interest in each other's welfare, so as certainly with its termination must these sentiments diminish. They would have shown a truer appreciation of the real issues involved, and they might not now have to lament the absence of their commercial bond of union. What said the Foreign Minister of France, in despatch 36—

“ It would produce a considerable disturbance in the commercial relations of the two peoples, and a cooling of the political relations of the two Governments.”

What was the action taken by Spain when informed of these differential duties? Why, when Spain, who had no commercial Treaty with France, was told that these differential duties would be levied in France on her shipping, the Spanish Minister threatened to return to the old navigation laws of his country and levy duties on French shipping, and the result was that the French Government had actually exempted Spanish vessels from contribution, while it was vexatiously enforced against the shipping of England. With regard to retaliation, if the great injustice to which he was now calling the attention of the House continued, a great change might come over public opinion in this country, and a demand for retaliation, which it would be impossible to suppress, might arise. He did not mean by retaliation the reverting to the differential duties of a previous age; but there were many ways of retaliating besides direct ones—already some were pressing on public attention. Take Portugal, as an illustration. France, by a liberal Treaty with Portugal, had completely diverted our woollen trade to Portugal. Remove the alcoholic standard by which we now levy duty on wines, and place the wines of Portugal and Spain on the same footing as the wines of France—the result of such a measure would be the loss to France of the woollen trade with Spain and Portugal, and its restoration to England. There were other ways which he might point out, if time permitted, for promoting our own interests, and which would inevitably be resorted to if France refused to do justice to us. He would conclude with a Motion, to which he believed no exception could be taken; a Motion, indeed, which might equally as well have been submitted to the French Chamber of Deputies as to the English House of Commons. He hoped that it might not be supposed that he wished to interfere with the province of the Executive Government of this country, who had declared that the levying of these duties in France would make no difference in the friendly feeling of England, and therefore he desired to appeal to the public opinion of France. He would like to see that public opinion exercise its influence on the French Government, and endeavour to bring them back to a policy which had done France infinite credit; and he was glad to see some indications that that was the case, for the able Representatives of Bordeaux and Marseilles had strongly protested against the present policy of France—the great centres of commerce in France had remonstrated, and within the last few days the Deputies of Havre had been excluded from the Chamber of Commerce of that city because they were instrumental in passing the vexatious and obnoxious law of 1872. These were the hopeful signs which justified him in appealing to the public opinion of France as to whether this policy was wise or just. He believed that it was neither one nor the other. He was thoroughly persuaded that if it were persisted in it would prove, not only injurious to British commerce, but more disastrous to France than the Armies of Prussia had been, and must inevitably impair a friendship which, in the true interests of both countries, it was very desirable to foster and extend. It was in that belief he ventured to submit a Motion which was unexceptionable in its terms, but which would enable the House to record its opinion upon the important question at issue. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. LIDDELL, in rising to second the Resolution which had been so ably moved by his hon. Friend (Mr. Graves), said, he believed there was not a single commercial man either in or out of the House who would not regret that the existing Treaty was about to lapse. Not viewing the question merely as it affected particular interests, but taking a broader view, it was a matter for deep regret that a great international bond of union was about to be severed by the abrogation of this Treaty, which had in the course of a few years created a European Zollverein; for such treaties were the best guarantees we could have of peace, being, as they were, the cause of intimate friendship between the commercial men of both countries, whose influence would always be on the side of peace. Moreover, he was afraid, when it became known that the first link in the chain of these alliances had been broken with the sanction of England, it would have a bad effect on the morale of other countries in their desire to strengthen the chain. He was further sorry that the warning tones of their own Ambassador had not had a weightier influence on the Government. M. Thiers, himself a Protectionist, told Lord Lyons that, in his opinion, the Treaty should be preserved, for to do away with it would throw the international commercial relations back into chaos. He (Mr. Liddell) did not wish to see that deplorable result ensue. Then, again, the French Minister of Commerce, a Free Trader, stated that the sweeping away of the Treaty would only encourage the Protectionists of France. He (Mr. Liddell) did not want to encourage them, believing that the bonds of trade and commercial relations were the means of framing those friendships which were the strongest bulwarks of national union. In that sense he considered that the French Protectionists were not the best friends of England; whereas the French Free Traders undoubtedly could be claimed as such. He regretted that the matter had been discussed with France on the basis of principle rather than on the basis of figures and results; and more especially when they considered the present financial position in which France was placed as one of the contracting parties; for a stern declaration of principle was not calculated to convince; but if it could be shown that the French were gainers by the Treaty, that might have some weight with them. And it could be proved beyond question that the French were gainers by the Treaty. The tonnage of ships having direct trade with England had enormously increased, and this alone would be a conclusive argument with some. With regard to the question of "principle," Mr. Cobden, who negotiated that very Treaty, and as true a Free Trader as any Member of the present Government, always went on the principle,

Mr. Graves

When he could not obtain all he wanted, just to take as much as he could get. It was not unnatural that the statesmen of France, at a time of unexampled pressure, should turn to Customs duties in order to meet the pressure which was put upon the resources of the country. The amounts they had hitherto levied from that source were small as compared with ourselves and the United States; but it was to the mode in which those duties were to be levied that objection was chiefly to be taken. What would be the effect of the new policy on France? The imposition of heavy duties on the raw material, though it might for a moment benefit the French manufacturer, must be paid for by the general consumer in the shape of higher prices, and that at a moment when the country was suffering under the burden of £25,000,000 of new taxation at least. Was not, he would ask, to raise the price of almost every article of common consumption a most suicidal policy under those circumstances? The result of the raising of the duties had been that a contraband trade in foreign articles had sprung up in France, and especially in the Provinces bordering on the Belgian frontier, to an extent which was wholly without precedent. He found that the imports of coffee during the first two months of 1870 amounted to the value of 13,000,000 francs, while in the corresponding months of 1872 they had, he believed, fallen to the value of 500,000 francs. He also found that the imports of colonial sugar during the first two months of 1870 amounted to the value of 13,750,000 francs, and that they had in 1872 fallen to the value of 11,750,000 francs. The value of the cocoa imported had in like manner fallen from 1,750,000 francs to 500,000 francs, and of tea from 266,000 to 116,000 francs. There was, therefore, a very remarkable falling off of Customs Revenue, so far as all the articles of consumption among the lower classes of the people were concerned. So great, indeed, was the amount of contraband trade that Petitions had been presented by the various Chambers of Commerce to the Government, imploring them to re-consider their decision. Under those circumstances, he thought it most desirable that an expression of opinion should go forth from the English Legislature showing that they felt for the people of France—that they considered them weighed down by an amount of taxation which had been rendered necessary by the war, and which was wholly unparalleled in the history of that or any other country; and that the French Government were taking that opportunity of making the consumers pay dearly for every article which they used. They ought to consider the difficulties of the French position, and he regretted that more conciliation had not been shown in the negotiations, believing that if that had been the case the results would have been more favourable, and that the Treaty might have been saved, even at the sacrifice of a certain amount of rigid principle. He was glad, however, to find one consoling passage in the negotiations which had taken place, and that was the expression of Lord Granville, that although the Treaty had been denounced that did not stop the negotiations; and he on that ground hailed with satisfaction the Motion of his hon. Friend behind him, for he believed that a friendly voice issuing from that Assembly, to the effect that the best interests of France were imperilled by the new policy, would strengthen the hands of those in that country who had steadily resisted the alteration of the law, as well as the hands of Her Majesty's Government in dealing with the subject. Taking that view, he most cordially seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the recent action of the French Government in imposing 'Differential Duties' on merchandise carried in British Ships in the 'Indirect Trade,' is inconsistent with the policy mutually agreed upon between the two Countries in 1866; and that such policy, whilst likely to entail serious injury upon French Trade and Manufactures, is calculated, in the present circumstances of the 'Carrying Trade,' to inflict injury upon British Shipping, and to impair the relations and intercourse between the two Countries, which have grown up under recent commercial arrangements, more especially when it is considered that other European flags are (under Treaties recently made with them) free from the restrictions now imposed upon British Shipping,"—(Mr. Graves,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. NORWOOD said, that when the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) was put on the Paper some weeks ago, he believed it had reference to a grievance which was severely felt by the shipping interest, and he came down to the House prepared to indorse the statements of the hon. Member in support of the allegations which he had made, and with which he entirely agreed. But he had been somewhat taken aback by the speech of the hon. Member, for it opened up questions he did not think were raised by the terms of his Motion as it stood on the Paper. He could not, for instance, agree with the interpretation which his hon. Friends the Mover and Seconder of the Motion before the House put upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in reference to the matter, for the whole of the Correspondence showed that Her Majesty's Government were deeply sensible of the unfortunate financial position in which France had been placed by the late war. Indeed, the Government, so far from saying, as had been imputed to them, that nothing would induce them to modify the Treaty, had expressed great willingness to consider any proposals of a purely fiscal character calculated to relieve the French Exchequer. The whole argument, however, of M. Thiers during the negotiations was, that France detested the Treaty on the ground that it had injured her commerce, but that she was willing to modify it not for her own benefit, but for the advantage of British commerce, and in order to maintain her own friendly relations with this country—to which Her Majesty's Government replied that this country had derived no special advantages from the Treaty, and that it was impossible for them to turn their backs upon the commercial policy which had been so successful in this country for many years. The hon. Member for Liverpool and his Seconder had made some extraordinary economic statements; but they had also destroyed the arguments which they themselves brought forward, for instead of continuing what he was about to call their cursing of the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government they had turned round and blessed that policy, characterizing the course followed by the French Government as one which could not fail to end in disaster to that country. He, for one, concurred in the terms of the Motion which had been brought forward; but he was surprised that it had been made the shield from behind which to level an attack upon Her Majesty's Government and the Free Trade policy which had been so successfully carried out in this country. There was, however, a complete answer to one branch of the attack made by the hon. Member for Liverpool. The hon. Member said Her Majesty's Government had always allowed it to be believed that nothing would induce them to alter the Commercial Treaty arrangements with France, notwithstanding any action that might be taken by that country in respect to our commerce; whereas the words of Earl Granville in a despatch to Lord Lyons, dated 19th January, were, that whatever course the French Government took with regard to the Treaty, Her Majesty's Government would never dream of resorting, by way of retaliation, to a Protectionist policy; but, at the same time, the noble Lord adverted to the unreasonableness of the French Government in expecting the Government of Great Britain to continue in the observance of those provisions of the Treaty which interfered with the fiscal liberty of this country. Passing on to the Motion before the House, he (Mr. Norwood) must express his strong conviction that the conduct of the French Government in relation to the differential duties on British shipping was hostile in character and not for a moment to be defended. He admitted, as a general principle, the right of the French Government to change their fiscal policy as the altered circumstances of the country required it; but he maintained that these differential duties ought not to have been levied until the expiration of the Treaty. As an illustration of the hardships inflicted by these duties, he might mention that quite recently an order was transmitted from London for the conveyance of flax to France from Russia; but English and Danish ships were excluded from the charter, because of the differential duty they would have to pay; and in an order for a steamer to convey sugar from Manilla to Marseilles a British flag could only be accepted at 20 francs per ton reduction. Although British shipping was thus placed under serious disadvantages the French people would themselves suffer heavily from these duties, in consequence of the increased price they would be called upon to pay for their imports, and this would be specially the case when deficient harvests in France called for large imports of grain from the Black Sea and Baltic. The British Government, moreover, had, up to the present time, paid upwards of £1,600,000 in extinguishing local differential dues on foreign shipping, and therefore they had a right to ask in return that France would abstain from imposing restrictions upon British commerce. As the hon. Member for Liverpool had introduced party politics into his speech, it would be well to remind the House that this large expenditure was chiefly incurred by a Conservative Government, and to express an opinion that the Government in question made a mistake in not availing themselves of the opportunity in 1867 of negotiating a Treaty of Navigation between the two countries. By remaining staunch to the principles upon which this country had for years carried on its commercial proceedings Parliament would strengthen the hands of the Government in any future action on the subject, and foreign countries would see that we had not been induced to abandon our principles by any temporary advantage which a renewal of the French Treaty might possibly have given to our manufactures. The Free Trade party in France was strengthening day by day, and only a fortnight ago M. Thiers was defeated in his own Assembly on a question connected with the taxation of raw materials. It should be borne in mind, too, that although a retaliatory policy was altogether out of the question the abrogation of this Treaty set us at liberty just as much as it did France, and that if the Treaty were allowed to expire within the next few months, we could pursue whatever fiscal policy we might deem most conducive to our own interests. He was not sorry for that, for he had long been of opinion that it was our minerals—coal and iron—which made us the foremost commercial nation of the world, and, surely, we might fairly debate whether it was wise to part rashly and hastily with this great birthright? By-and-by some one might suggest in that House—and some Minister might think it right to consider—whether we ought not to be chary in allowing foreign nations freely to take our coal in order to manufacture articles in opposition to us. The hon. Member for Liverpool had alluded to Spain and Portugal. Now, he had always thought our wine duties were not fairly assessed as regarded those two countries. There was in Spain and Portugal an abundance of generous and good wine which we never saw in this country, but which our middle and lower classes would be very glad to have. The Spaniards and Portuguese, too, were of opinion that the 1s. duty was a great bonus to France and unfair to them, and he was bound to say he rather agreed with them on this point, especially as the alcoholic test was no longer supported even by financiers, the manufacture of spirits out of wine being known to be a costly operation. Therefore, if the French gave up the Treaty and our goods were shut out of France, it might be wise to try to find new markets. Supposing we were to impose a uniform duty of 2s. a gallon on French, Spanish, and Portuguese wines, the English people might be greatly benefited, our trade largely increased with the Peninsular, while France could not, under the circumstances, raise an objection to such a proceeding. His hon. Friend had entered upon debateable ground, and, while he differed from him on many points, he agreed with him in others, and in none so fully as in the generous sympathy he expressed for France. He should be only too glad to see her raised from her difficulties and receiving reasonable assistance from us; but, at the same time, he was of opinion that we, as a great Free Trade nation, ought not to turn our back on the policy we had adopted, and to give other nations reason to believe that we did not place entire confidence in our policy of Free Trade.

Mr. Norwood

MR. BIRLEY said, the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) had regretted some debateable points which, as he alleged, had been raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves); but he ventured to say that the last thought in the mind of his hon. Friend was to raise a party question on the present occasion. It would be a great mistake to suppose that the cost of an article to the manufacturer or consumer was to be measured by the rate of freight. It was of the highest importance to a commercial country to possess seaports and great entrepôts for storing the produce of other countries and its own manufactures. These were the markets which attracted traders from all quarters, and which gave the greatest commercial stimulus to the manufactures of this country. It was in this way that Manchester and Liverpool acted and reacted on each other reciprocally, and it should have been the study of the French people to have made Havre and Marseilles great emporiums like Liverpool. There was no point on which the French manufacturers dwelt so much in the great inquiry before the Imperial Commission some years ago as the cost to which they were put in bringing their raw material from foreign parts to the manufacturing towns of France. That enhancement of the cost much exceeded the freight, and he maintained that the interest of France in the Commercial Treaty was far greater than that of England, though that of England was pretty considerable. With regard to the recommendations of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, he would remark that the cotton trade of Lancashire had been much disappointed with the action of the Treaty. It was supposed that very great benefit would accrue to that trade, and that the exports to France would be very large indeed; but that expectation was not fulfilled, and the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, feeling it would be dangerous and objectionable to go back from the principle on which we set out—namely, that we would not be parties to the increase of duties.—advised the Government not to depart from that principle. He greatly doubted whether we possessed sufficient information to enable us to take a clear view of the action of the Treaty. Two years ago there seemed to be an instinctive objection to any inquiry as to the results of the Treaty, lest it should be proved that the benefit to this country had so largely exceeded the benefit to France that the French Government might be inclined to raise their duties. He was tempted to ask where our Board of Trade was? It appeared to him to have become almost effaced. The Foreign Office had taken a certain degree of action in this matter; but that Office knew very little about commercial subjects, although he wished to join in the tribute which had been already paid to the zeal and ability of Lord Lyons by the commercial community, and must say that the noble Lord had fully maintained the high character he had won for himself in so many foreign appointments. While differing in some respects from his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, he should fully support the Motion, because he believed that every word of it was strictly accurate, and that we had great reason to complain of the conduct of France in regard to the differential duties imposed on our shipping, and to regret the decision she had arrived at with regard to the Treaty.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, he did not pretend to have any great technical knowledge of the subject under notice, the importance of which was much greater than a merely technical consideration of it would imply; but he wished to point out that there was some discrepancy between the Resolution as it stood on the Paper and the speech in which it had been introduced, for the Resolution had reference to the navigation duties, but the Commercial Treaty had been mixed up with them in a manner which was foreign to the subject, and what British interests were suffering from at present was the action of the French Government in regard to the navigation duties. The subject was a very large one, and opened up the question whether the course which we had taken during the last 20 years as pioneers in the cause of Free Trade was the right one, or whether a pedantic adherence to some of the principles of Free Trade had not prevented us acting in its spirit. In fact, the Commercial Treaty was one thing and the navigation duties another, and our whole rights with regard to the navigation duties were regulated by the Treaty of 1826, which was made in the time of Lord Liverpool, and was limited simply to direct trade. Down to 1860 nothing whatever passed between France and England with respect to commerce, and the Treaty of that year was absolutely a commercial Treaty. A few months subsequently, however, there was a supplemental Convention, and that was the Alpha and Omega of our International relations with France in regard to navigation duties, for by that Convention articles could be carried into France in British bottoms, though those articles did not come direct from England. The Treaty of 1826 regulated the direct trade, and everything outside the direct trade was, of course, outside that Treaty. There were Treaties with Belgium, the Netherlands, and Portugal, and in 1866 the Austrian Government had concluded a Treaty with France in which the indirect trade was thrown open prospectively to Austria, and certain concessions had been made upon our part, to which the hon. Member for Liverpool had alluded. But why, he should like to know, had money been expended by us in the case of these navigation duties without our having obtained a receipt? It appeared to him that the action of our Government on that occasion resembled the conduct of a man who paid money over the counter, but did not take a receipt; and that we had only to blame ourselves for being debarred from those benefits which must accrue until the Austrian Treaty had expired to all those other countries which were in possession of the carrying trade of Europe.

Mr. Birley

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he could assure the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) that he entirely concurred in the remarks he had made, and the sympathy he had expressed with France under her commercial and financial embarrassment; and he shared with him in the regret he expressed that she had thought fit to make those changes in her navigation laws which had proved so detrimental; but, on the other hand, he could not agree with him when he said that during the course of the negotiations between this Government and that of France during the last 12 months, we had sternly refused all overtures on the part of France for the modification of the Commercial Treaty. On the contrary, he thought anyone who went through the Correspondence on the Table must come to the conclusion that although Lord Granville had expressed in the name of the English Government his sympathy with France under her present condition, and his anxiety as far as in him lay to assist her under her fiscal difficulties, still he felt as a Minister of the Crown and the English people he could not agree to those proposals which were of a retrograde and restrictive character. As there had been no discussion up to that time with reference to the part which the Government had taken with regard to France during these negotiations, it might not be inopportune to review very briefly the course which the Government had pursued on the question of the modification of the French Commercial Treaty; and afterwards glance at that portion more immediately connected with the changes which France had made in the navigation laws. It was nearly a year ago that Lord Lyons was informed that probably some change would be proposed by the French Government in the Treaty of Commerce with England made in 1860, but the negotiations were not fairly commenced until July last year, when M. Ozeune came over from Paris, and made certain proposals, which were in the first instance considered to be so vague that certain questions were addressed to the French Government, to which a categorical reply was asked on the part of the English Government. It was not until three applications had been made that any reply was received; but in the meantime, while the assent of the French Assembly to the imposition of the duties on raw material was doubtful, the French Government were frankly told that it rested with them when they pleased to announce the denunciation of the Treaty. The French Government complained that our answer had been delayed, and stated that as they could not agree to our proposals no resource remained but to denounce the Treaty. But our Government could not agree in the assertion that they had by any delay at all cumbered the action of the French Government. They explained to the French Government the great magnitude of the commercial interests involved, pointed out the necessity of frequent consultation with our Chambers of Commerce, and reiterated their inability to accept proposals of a Protectionist tendency. While these negotiations were going on, however, M. Thiers stated in the French Assembly that under the Treaty France had a right to impose duties on raw materials, and in return attention was drawn to the fact that the Treaty required that corresponding Excise duties should be imposed on similar raw material produced in France. The negotiations continued, and at last it was suggested that matters which did not require the consent of the French Assembly might still form a basis of negotiation between the two Governments. Lord Granville, in reviewing the final policy of the Government, in regard to these last proposals, stated that Her Majesty's Government could not depart from the general principles of Free Trade, which formed the basis of the commercial policy of the Treaty, and that the denunciation of the Treaty would be a step towards its extinction, although it would not necessarily preclude further negotiation. In fact, the negotiations continued until within a week of the 15th of March, when the denunciation took place; and there was no ground for the apprehension of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) that in consequence of the denunciation coldness would arise between the Governments, for M. de Rémusat, in announcing to the Secretary of State the result, expressed a hope that the cessation of the Treaty, if it must be final, would not be followed by any lessening of the intimate relations which had existed for so many years between France and England, and the maintenance of which was of so much value to both nations. Arrangements were consequently made for its terminating that day year, during which time negotiations might continue; and, at the same time, assurances were repeated that there was no intention of returning to a more Protective system than the one set forth in the hitherto rejected proposals. He (Viscount Enfield) thought it would be admitted by the House that although the French Government might feel some disappointment in the matter, yet that Lord Granville, acting in entire consistency with the duties imposed upon him, could not very well agree to the modifications proposed, and was perfectly justified in not accepting the proposals of the French Government, they being of a retrograde and Protectionist tendency. He would refer now to the question more immediately brought under the notice of the House by the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool with regard to the changes which France had made in her navigation laws injurious to British shipping, and with regard to which it might be said that the Treaty of 1826 related solely to the direct navigation between Great Britain and France, and might be terminated at a year's notice. The Treaty of Commerce of January 23, 1860, however, expressly reserved French differential duties in favour of French shipping, in Article 3. By the supplementary Convention and the annexed tariff of November 16, 1860, British and French vessels might carry to France jute and cotton from British India and wool from Australia on equal terms. British vessels were also allowed to convey to France these commodities from British entrepôts. Subsequent to the repeal of the English navigation laws in 1849 complaints were made on both sides of the Channel as to certain restrictions which pressed relatively upon the shipping of both countries. Explanations ensued, and in doing so, the French objected to certain "local exemptions" in some parts of the United Kingdom. These freed vessels belonging to certain ports, and not others. A French law of 1866, however, enabled the Government to relieve foreign shipping from previous differential treatment on condition of reciprocity. Correspondence ensued, and Her Majesty's Government applied to Parliament to extinguish these exemptions, and the French Government in return extended benefit of the new law to British shipping. Its provisions were—1. The suppression of tonnage dues in French ports from January 1, 1867, except when levied for improvements on all ships alike. 2. The suppression from May, 1869, of "surtaxes de pavillon" or surcharges on the flags. Both countries carried out these arrangements. The French Government fulfilled their engagements to English ships by the decree of June, 1866, and the English Government passed a Bill through Parliament to abolish the local exemptions complained of, pecuniary compensation being granted to the parties whose rights were affected thereby. When Lord Lyons reported the introduction of the Bill to repeal the law of 1866, he was instructed to remonstrate on the probable injury to British shipping interests. M. de Rémusat and M. Thiers disclaimed any intention of placing British shipping at a disadvantage. The new law was promulgated on the 2nd of February, and by it [Blue Book, page 147] "Surtaxes de pavillon," surcharges on the flag, or differential duties, were imposed as follows:—1. On goods imported into France in foreign vessels from European countries and the basin of the Mediterranean. 75 centimes per 100 kilogrammes weight. 2. From countries out of Europe this side of Cape Horn and Cape of Good Hope, 1 franc 50 centimes. 3. From countries beyond the Cape, 2 francs. Surtaxes d'entrepôt, 3 francs per 100 kilogrammes, were imposed on goods the produce of countries out of Europe on importation into France from entrepôts, warehouses, or market-places in Europe. The Customs circular issued, moreover, defined the new law as strictly applicable to British shipping only, for Austria, Belgium, Italy, Holland, Portugal, Sweden, Norway, Zollverein were exempted in virtue of Treaties. Her Majesty's Government at once remonstrated on these grounds—(1.) Unfriendly character of the policy of imposing this differential treatment on British trade in comparison with other countries; (2), as being opposed to the arrangement come to in 1866; (3), as being differential duties on merchandise, not on ships, in fact Customs and not navigation dues, from which England might claim exemption under the "most favoured nation" Article of the Treaty of 1860. By the French Treaty of 1860, Article 3, it was understood that the rates of duty mentioned in the preceding Articles were independent of the differential duties in favour of French shipping, with which duties they should not interfere. The local exemptions were—(1.) Exemptions in favour of freemen, which were expiring daily, and which were only reserved for those who were living and had claims in 1835. (2.) Exemptions in favour of ships registered at particular ports. (3.) Exemptions in favour of persons residing at particular ports. The effect of the proceedings of the French Government on French trade was most unfavourable. Consul Mark, writing from Marseilles, pointed out the disastrous effects which this law on the Mercantile Marine would have on the trade and commerce of that port. He said—

Viscount Enfield

"The heavy 'surtaxes de pavillon' will stop the large carrying trade hitherto carried on by British and Greek vessels in the Mediterranean, and will drive it into the hands of the mercantile navies of France and Austria, which, however, are not large enough to supply the great demand. A consequent rise in freights will take place, and the French consumer will be the ultimate loser."

The new duties on the transfer of ships to the French flag were also a bar to the purchase of foreign vessels—of which large numbers built in Canada had been annually bought — and Consul Mark added—

"In 10 years the shipbuilders of France could not supply the deficiency. Should the ensuing harvest in France be short, serious inconvenience therefore would be felt throughout the country from the want of vessels to convey corn from the Black Sea and elsewhere to meet the want; and Marseilles must either cease to be the great grain and wheat emporium it was now, or the new duties must be renounced as quickly as they had been imposed. British vessels had been largely engaged in conveying oil seeds to Marseilles for its soap manufactories. This trade would now cease, and great injury be caused to those engaged in it. The amount of shipping in the Port of Marseilles and other French ports had greatly diminished, and the commercial community at large were loudly protesting against the new taxation."

The question for the House, therefore, was whether they would agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool; and with regard to that, if Her Majesty's Government had from the first been remiss in representing to the French Government the injurious effect which the navigation laws of France would have upon our shipping, he could understand that the House would be anxious to accept the Motion; but the Correspondence would show that the Government had been as strong in their opinions as the hon. Member himself. The Correspondence, in fact, was not yet closed, for within the last 10 days further communication had passed, and the Secretary of State had not neglected to reiterate his objections, and to urge as forcibly as he had done in the despatches of the Blue Book the injurious effect which the policy of the French Government would have upon our shipping. He (Viscount Enfield) hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would accept the assurance that the subject was not closed, and though it would be premature and hazardous to affirm that our representations would have the desired effect, he could say that no effort would be spared by the Secretary of State to press on the French Government how wise and just it would be both in their interest and in our own to relax the restrictions now imposed upon British shipping.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) had expressed surprise that the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) had been converted into an attack on Her Majesty's Government. But if it could be called an attack on the Government it must be admitted to be a very moderate one. The hon. Member for Hull, however, attacked the preceding Government on account of the negotiations which were carried on with the French Government in 1866 and 1867. He should be glad to assume the entire responsibility of those negotiations, but it did not belong altogether to the Government of which he was a Member. The negotiations had been commenced before that Government came into office, and the credit belonged to that extent to the Government which preceded them. In 1866 the French Emperor of his own will abolished certain tonnage dues in French ports which bore hardly on foreign shipping, and in doing so he expected that the nations concerned would give a corresponding advantage. There were in certain English ports exemptions which placed vessels belonging to particular corporations and classes in a more favourable position than all others, including, of course, the French. The Emperor said unless we abolished these privileges, he could not extend to English ships exemption from French dues. As the hon. Member for Hull had pointed out, these privileges were equally disadvantageous to vessels trading from Bristol to Hull as to vessels coming from Havre or Bordeaux. These exemptions were bad in themselves, inasmuch as they gave a monopoly to individuals. Therefore, when they were abolished we abolished hindrances to our own trade as well as to the trades of foreign countries. When it was said we had paid our money and taken no receipt, this did not accurately state the nature of the transaction. As a matter of fact, we got value before we had paid anything, for the Emperor took our word for our bond; he removed the tonnage dues with regard to England on the 1st of January, and it was not until February that a Bill was introduced to abolish the exemptions. Each trusted the other, and, if anything, the French trusted us the most. The abolition of the exemptions imposed no burden on the Imperial Exchequer, because compensation to the parties who had benefited by them was paid out of harbour dues. In fact, we remitted no payment, but we made all pay alike. What the hon. Member for Liverpool and others felt was that the Government viewed without regret the termination of the French Treaty. An idea had grown up that Treaties of Commerce had gone out of favour with the Government, who wished for Free Trade that should not be hampered by the restriction of Treaties. This was very much his own idea, and Treaties could be justified only when the object was to induce nations to take steps in the direction of Free Trade which they otherwise would not take. Mr. Cobden never committed himself to the approval of such Treaties in the abstract, though he felt, of course, that there was a justification for the Treaty he negotiated. That Treaty should be considered in relation to the position of the Emperor at the time. The Emperor was a Free Trader, the bulk of the French commercial classes were Protectionists. The Treaty enabled the Emperor to overcome their opposition. Now, however, matters were reversed, and the Government was Protectionist while the bulk of the population was in favour of Free Trade. When all nations were imbued with principles of Free Trade, Treaties of Commerce would be worse than useless. But as yet it was difficult to say what nations were Free Traders, and, after the speech of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) and a Motion made in this House last year, whether our manufacturers were wholly Free Traders; and therefore there might be advantage, not only to ourselves, but also to other countries, in resorting to Treaties to place trade upon a stable basis, and prevent its being interfered with by capricious and interested changes. He would not defend the whole Treaty, many of the details of which were settled in haste. He had already taken exception to its provisions affecting coal, which were not popular in this country, and to the absence of a "favoured nation clause;" but still, if we were to wait until other nations were converted to Free Trade we should have to wait for generations. The Treaty had been of the greatest advantage to France and to this country; but France would be far worse off than us without it. Our commerce was more elastic, and would find new channels. However, the French nation was not now Protectionist. The controversy between M. Wolowski and M. Duchataux showed this; and, so far as popular songs were indicative of a nation's opinions, those of Beranger might be referred to as highly eulogistic of Free Trade. Protection, he wrote, was a stagnant pool; Free Trade a river which carried abundance and comfort to wide districts. Roubaix and Lille had complained of the operation of the Treaty, and denounced Free Trade; but, on examination, they proved to have become wonderfully prosperous under it, and to be rapidly extending their bounds. The Committee on the Budget appointed the other day contained 21 Free Traders to 7 Protectionists. Our Government was right in refusing to entertain proposals of higher duties, if they were absolutely protective and were not accompanied by countervailing Excise duties. The French Government had hardly learnt the grammar of Free Trade, and they did not see, for example, in the case of the sugar duties, that, while fighting against salaries and pensions, they were, by giving bounties to the refiners, taking a far larger amount of money out of the pockets of the people, and enriching the few at the expense of the many. M. Thiers said the French nation had been ruined by the English Treaty; but M. Chevalier said M. Thiers was the only man in France who believed it. The hon. Member for Hull in mentioning Portuguese wines, seemed to suggest that we might retaliate. He (Mr. S. Cave) thought that retaliation was a word which ought not to be heard in that House on the subject; and, so far as the French Treaty went, we were at perfect liberty to make any reduction in the duties on Spanish and Portuguese wines. The French could not complain if we lowered them. This question had been often considered while he was in office, and it had been considered solely as a question affecting our Inland Revenue. He should be sorry to think that the lowering of the duties on Spanish and Portuguese wines should be considered as a measure of retaliation on France, and that it should not rather be regarded as a step taken by ourselves in our own interests. This particular question, however, might suggest this consideration — that where legitimate trade was impeded, illegitimate trade sprang up. The saying of M. Chevalier that the policy of M. Thiers was protection tempered by smuggling had, he thought, considerable justice in it. The hon. Member for Liverpool had, in his opinion, done good service in bringing the question before the House. The tone of the debate was sufficient to show that we were not disposed to act in anything like a virulent spirit towards France; on the contrary, that we deeply sympathized with her, and regretted to see that she was by her policy aggravating the burden of her heavy liabilities. But the House of Commons was simply stating—that which it had a perfect right to do—what the effect of the change in French policy would be on this country. There could, so far as he could see, be no more reasonable subject of discussion for a commercial nation. Trade had been very much interrupted in its course by the action of the French Government, but it would, no doubt, find another course before long; so that France would, in all probability, lose more than we should. In the meantime, however, the interruption of our amicable commercial relations with that country was a subject for regret, and it was but reasonable, under the circumstances, that such complaints as the House had listened to that evening should find expression, and that the Government should be asked to make the matter a subject of remonstrance in their communications with the French Government. He hoped very much from the good sense of the French people; but he must at the same time, as an Englishman, protest against our shaping our conduct in the present or in any other case in accordance rather with the feelings of foreign Powers than in accordance with our own convictions. An entirely independent policy was the only policy worthy of a free, a great, and an enlightened nation.

Mr. Stephen Cave

MR. RATHBONE said, he had listened with great pleasure to the speech which had just been delivered from the opposite benches, and that it was because he sympathized most heartily with the French people in their sufferings, and because he sincerely desired their speedy restoration to prosperity, that he was glad to find there was no hint of retaliation from our Government during the progress of the negotiations. He was, at the same time, of opinion that the conversion of the French people to Free Trade—which was, he believed, making rapid progress—would not be hastened by our showing any symptoms of yielding in our principles, or by seeming to cling too anxiously to the Treaty as if it had been made only in our own interest. Though the Treaty had been spoken of as a bargain, it was in reality no bargain at all, and the allegation of M. Thiers that it had been made in the interests of England was far from placing it in its true light before the French people. Let France be allowed to learn her own lesson undisturbed by any violent efforts to retain the Treaty on our part, and be had no doubt she would find out the direction in which her interests lay.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the subject was one in which he took a deep interest, and he was the more anxious to make a few observations with respect to it because he had been asked by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) "What has become of the Board of Trade?" That question he must interpret as expressing the surprise of the hon. Gentleman that no despatches signed on behalf of the Board of Trade were to be found in the Blue Book. He should, however, be sorry that the hon. Gentleman should labour under any delusion on that point. The reason why there were no despatches signed on behalf of the Board of Trade was that it was not the Board of Trade but the Foreign Office which carried on all negotiations with foreign nations. But although the Board of Trade was not a negotiating, or, in such cases as the present, an acting Department, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that many of the despatches which appeared in the Blue Book had been written only after consultation with that Department, and that it furnished the Foreign Office with all the information at its command. It would be a great mistake, therefore, to imagine that the Board of Trade had been either idle or indifferent to the great question before the House. The House, he might add, had, he thought, great reason to be obliged to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) for having brought the subject before them, although he might be hypercritical in saying that his observations, in common with those of other hon. Members, ought to have been addressed to a French rather than to an English Assembly, for the quarter in which an impression was to be made was over the Channel, rather than in this country. Nevertheless, he thought it most advisable and advantageous that there should be an expression of opinion in the House of Commons on the part of the leading representatives of the commerce of this country, and he trusted it would not pass away without result. He felt that this country had grave reason and full right to complain of the differential dues on our shipping that had been imposed by France: indeed, from some things in the Papers before the House he could not help hoping that the policy that had been adopted was one for the moment, and that it was not the final determination of the French Government. It was not long since that the Representative of the French Government informed us that there was no intention of inflicting any such special disadvantages on British shipping, and that what they were about to do would have no such effect; but it was too well known that the result had been very different, thereby showing that the change had been made without knowledge of what the effect of the alteration of the French law would be. He hoped, however, that what had been said would have the effect of inducing the French Government to take a more friendly course towards this country; and, if so, the hon. Member for Liverpool would have reason to congratulate himself if he should contribute to that result.

Mr. Rathbone

MR. M'LAGAN said, that the manufacturers in this country of paraffin oil had been subjected to great losses for what had been decided to be breaking of contract arising from the alterations which the French Government had made in the duty on that article, and he hoped the British Government would use its influence to obtain redress for the English manufacturers. The duty on paraffin oil was under the Treaty 5 per cent, and there was a stipulation contained in it that it should not be increased more than 25 per cent, but it had been increased to 88 per cent, whilst American petroleum had only been increased to 78 per cent. He trusted that it would not be thought too late to remonstrate with the French Government on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) had called the attention of the House to a subject which, it was easy to foresee, must necessarily come under debate. From the speeches which had been delivered it was plain that this was a subject of great pain and embarrassment, and that it was more easy to give utterance to sentiments of dissatisfaction and regret than to suggest a remedy for the inconvenience complained of by the country generally. He, however, hoped and believed that the hon. Member for Liverpool would considerably decline to press his Motion to a division, for though it might be a question with some hon. Members whether the Government had urged with sufficient energy on the Government of France the various causes they had of complaint, still what the House would wish would be to leave the Government in a condition in which they could address the Government of France with the utmost freedom with respect to the matter, and they would be more able to use that freedom in the spirit of friendship and frankness if no decision were given on a Motion of this kind by the House of Commons; because, though hon. Members who had spoken had been most considerate in the language they used with respect to the Government of France, yet any Motion of that nature must assume the appearance of a modified Vote of Censure in the eyes of the French Government. He could not, however, hesitate to admit that Her Majesty's Government felt that they were seriously aggrieved by the proceedings of the French Government in this matter, and in respect to the very important subject which bore injuriously on the shipping of this country, though more injuriously on the French nation. The hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. M'Lagan) had referred to the duties on a certain class of oils. With regard to that point, the English Government had pressed on the French Government, in very decided terms, what they conceived to be the duty of France with regard to those breaches of contract of which the hon. Member complained; but up to that time it had not been in the power of Her Majesty's Government to obtain any satisfactory answer to those remonstrances. In some quarters it had been thought that the Government, in some portion of their conduct, had shown some want of sympathy for the peculiar condition of France; but he must say that the sympathy they felt for France was one of the reasons why the urgency of their remonstrances with the French Government had been less than it might have been under other circumstances; and although the Motion before the House did not mention the great subject of the French Treaty, yet it was impossible that the Treaty, which formed the principal subject of our deliberations during an anxious and protracted Session, should not have formed a large portion of the staple of the debate. It had also been said that Her Majesty's Government had shown a want of consideration for the necessities of France;

but they had at all times been most careful to convey to the French Government that any proposition they made that was of a fiscal character, and which the French Government considered required modification, would meet with our ready and most favourable consideration, although according to our experience, fiscal necessities were not best met by the re-imposition of protection, but rather by liberating the industry of the country. The hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) had complained of a too rigid adherence to principle; but the principle upon which the Government had acted was that commerce would be best served and peace secured by allowing each country to regulate its own fiscal tariff according to its own interest and requirements. That was not only the Government's opinion; similar views had been expressed on the other side of the House, and that opinion was the result of long experience. For five or six years previous to 1845 the Board of Trade, with which he was then associated, endeavoured to make reciprocal arrangements with European nations and signally failed in every instance, because those nations uniformly believed the motives of England were selfish. Accordingly, Sir Robert Peel and his immediate successor resolved to leave the consideration of the subject to the independent action of each country. In 1860, however, an entirely new state of things arose; but in conducting the negotiations with France this country bargained for nothing. The concessions made were offered because they were good in themselves, and because granting them would promote Free Trade—the chief object in view. That statement needed only one qualification. To a certain extent this country, by making the French Treaty, did interfere with its own fiscal arrangements, and bound itself to do certain things; in fact, it sacrificed its freedom of action to a certain extent, but did so for certain benefits. He did not take a very favourable view of the taxation of coal, which had been referred to; but it was not desirable to be tied even in a matter of that kind. The agreement come to with regard to wine and spirits undoubtedly restrained our commercial liberty, and now that France drew back from continuing that agreement it must not be forgotten that by doing so she gave us back fiscal liberty. The French nation should comprehend that although Parliament might denounce the motive of retaliation, still it reserved absolutely the power of dealing with the wine and spirit duties as the interests of the country might dictate. But he was anxious in stating this to say also that the Government did not contemplate using the liberty which the country regained by the denunciation of the Treaty. The French Treaty had been productive of enormous good. It had allayed political excitement, which might have assumed dangerous proportions; it had extended trade, and produced a season of prosperity at a time of need; it had not—with some few exceptions, such as the Coventry trade—caused British industry to suffer, and it had led the people of Europe generally to make progress in the direction of Free Trade. Many European countries had made arrangements between themselves which England had failed to make with Continental States. The reason that they had succeeded when England had failed was, because the commercial superiority of England was so paramount that other countries could not disabuse from their minds the feeling that any suggestions coming from us must be dictated by selfish motives, and, if adopted, must result in disadvantage to themselves. No small advantage from the French Treaty, however, was that, besides enormously extending commerce and intercourse between the two countries, it had done wonders in extending kindly feeling. It had given a new character to the relation between the Englishman and the Frenchman; and lastly, it had the effect of developing in France itself a vigorous, intelligent, Free Trade party of native growth. Why, then, it might be asked, did we not make some sacrifice during the recent negotiations on this subject? The House should not forget the peculiar position which the two Governments relatively occupied. Regarding those results with the liveliest satisfaction, the Government could not forbear from taking all possible measures to preserve the Treaty; it forbore from pressing the matter to the utmost for fear of awakening that old feeling of jealousy with which the advances of England had usually been met. M. Thiers, the most able of all the champions of the Protective system, had expressed himself as having always disapproved the Treaty, and as having always preferred commercial liberty; but, out of sincere desire to maintain moral and political union with England, he was ready to forego those opinions and continue the Treaty in a modified form. It was never contended that the French wanted the Treaty for its own sake; it accepted the arrangement merely as a favour to England. Supposing we had contrived to concoct some new adjustment of duties, remaining under all our obligations, retaining all the restrictions on our fiscal liberty, and conceding here and there to France, what would have been our position? We, too, should have held this language—"We prefer our liberty as you prefer your liberty; but we consent to prolong the Treaty as an act of favour to you." That would have been to continue the Treaty on a hollow basis. The true basis of commerce is an exchange of benefits; but that would have been an exchange of sacrifices. That is a groundwork upon which it is totally impossible to erect any solid fabric, either of commercial or national union. The Treaty was formed in the earnest hope that it would lead to further development; and if in 1860 any one gifted with the endorsement of prophecy had been able to foresee that in 1871 that France would hark back in the course on which it had entered, he would have raised a far more formidable barrier in our way at that moment than any of the arguments we had to encounter. It was not a perfect measure in itself that the Treaty was adopted. They had been taunted that the Treaty on the part of France did not embody the doctrines of Free Trade. There was in it, undoubtedly, a great deal of a rather strong Protective element, but it was a movement onward in the adoption of the principle of Free Trade; it was expected to be followed by a second and by a third in the same direction; and not to have adopted it would have been a great responsibility for those who were firmly fixed in the belief that the principle was a sound one—namely, that commercial freedom was best promoted, and national union best promoted by the independent action of each country. And now, he must say, on that melancholy occasion there was one element of consolation, and that was the intelligence, the fidelity, the strength, the resolution of the free traders of France. They were not embarrassed by our help. Reference had been made to M. Chevalier. He never heard that that gentleman regretted that we declined to accept the offers of the French Government. Hon. Members saw on the floor of the French Assembly the strength of those sentiments, and their endeavour to organize themselves with such force and sanguine energy. In every other respect he must admit the situation was a melancholy one, and there was no one to whom it brought deeper sentiments of regret than to himself, for the authors of the French Treaty were the Emperor of the French and Mr. Cobden, and after those distinguished persons no one was more responsible for it than himself. It was melancholy to think that a measure so beneficial—he might almost say so blessed in its results, speaking of its moral and pacific consequences—should now have become the subject of denunciation by the Government of France. All they could do was to recognize the disposition of the French Government to mitigate the moral and political evils which could not be separated from its denunciation. If the multiplication and extension of friendly and mutually beneficial intercourse between England and France had been a great good, the comparative restriction of that intercourse was a great evil. All they could do was to reciprocate cordially the expressions of goodwill to the Government of France—to appeal to the Government of France to let their acts run in a course, as far as possible, parallel to their professions, convinced that they were made with the utmost sincerity—to take care that, on their part, they exhibited towards them that warm sympathy which their circumstances demanded, and those sentiments of friendship of which the Treaty was the symbol and the most powerful prop. In that spirit they would endeavour to act, not forgetting that so far as specific causes of complaint were concerned nothing was to be gained by a remiss or unmanly tone. They would steadily represent to the Government of France in friendly language whatever they thought matter of right and equity in the treatment of British interests. He was satisfied his right hon. Friend near him was right when he referred to the difficulties they had experienced in administration, and when he expressed a sanguine hope, from the large and increasing prevalence of sound views in France, that the causes of regret which they now experienced would, ere any long time had elapsed, cease to operate, and that they would again see in action all those means of beneficial intercourse the temporary diminution of which they now so much deplored.

MR. MACFIE said, he entirely agreed in the opinions expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and hoped that England would soon recover her commercial liberty.

MR. GRAVES, acting on the advice of the Prime Minister, asked permission to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

MINE DUES BILL.—[Bill 177.]

(Mr. Lopes, Mr. Gregory.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [12th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. MAGNIAO was proceeding to urge objections to the mode in which the measure had been introduced, when—

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present. House counted; and 40 Members being found present,

MR. STANSFELD, reserving his liberty of action in reference to the recent decision in the Court of Queen's Bench, in which an appeal had been carried to the Court of Error, said he would assent to the second reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday 26th June.

BANK NOTES (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bill to provide for the safer transmission of Bank Notes, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Mr. BACKHOUSE, Mr. MUNTZ, Mr. ROBERT FOWLER, and Mr. KINNARD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 196.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 17th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act (1870), The Lord O'Hagan added.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Board of Trade Inquiries * (155); Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2) * (156).

Committee—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation * (116); Parliamentary and Municipal Elections (117-157).

Report—Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2) * (122).

Third Reading—Epping Forest * (150), and passed.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA).

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE ARBITRATORS.—QUESTION.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, no doubt your Lordships will be glad to hear from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—if he is in a position to give the House such information—Whether there is truth in the report which has appeared in the ordinary channels of information—namely, that the British Agent at Geneva had put in before the Arbitrators the points of arguments in the British Case? If the noble Earl is able to state further what has been the course of proceedings at Geneva to-day, I am sure your Lordships will be glad of any information upon this subject also.

EARL GRANVILLE: There are so many reports of what has been done at Geneva, and those reports clash so one with another, that I do not know to which report the noble and learned Lord refers. It was decided by the Arbitrators to keep their proceedings private for the present, and therefore—to say nothing of the respect which is due to that high Tribunal—I am sure your Lordships would not wish that I should set such a bad example as to state what I may know privately. In the Papers which I presented to your Lordships' House on Friday your Lordships have the means of seeing the course which we intimated would be taken by us in case the proposals we made to the Government of the United States should fail. I have no objection to state that that course has been taken.

LORD CAIRNS: I am not sure that the statement of the noble Earl is quite intelligible to your Lordships—certainly it is not to me. In the Papers two courses were suggested hypothetically. One was that the points of our arguments should be put in under protest and with reservations; the other was that they should not be put in at all. Would the noble Earl say which of those two courses has been adopted?

EARL GRANVILLE: We have not put in the points of argument.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS BILL—(No 117.)

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Lord President.)

LORD DENMAN said, he had taken the course of moving that the Committee be deferred for six months, because he believed that the Bill could not be amended so as to become workable. Although he was perfectly satisfied that if their Lordships assented to the passing of the Bill they would deeply regret it; yet as it appeared to be the wish of their Lordships to consider the measure in Committee, he should not press his Amendment to a division.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Denman.)

EARL GRANVILLE reminded the noble Lord that in the discussion on the second reading it was understood that no opposition would be offered to the progress of the Bill, whatever might be done during its consideration in Committee. He thought it was not in accordance with that understanding to discuss the merits of the Bill on the Motion for going into Committee.

LORD CAIRNS desired to make a few remarks before the House went into Committee. The schedules of a Bill were usually considered complimentary to the clauses of the Bill, but in this case one-half of the clauses themselves had been taken out of the body of the Bill and transferred to the schedules. In the Bill of last year there were 54 clauses; but in the Bill of this year no fewer than 27 clauses were put in the schedules, while just the same number were in the body of the Bill. The usual course was that their Lordships should take the clauses, consider them seriatim, and decide upon their merits; but here there was a clause which enacted that the schedule to this Act, and the notes thereto and directions therein, should be construed and have effect as part of the Act. If this system were persevered in, all the provisions of a statute might be placed in the schedule and a single clause be deemed sufficient for the body of the Act.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, there was no wish to limit the consideration of the provisions of the Bill. In the Commons every provision of the schedule had been discussed as fully and as keenly as any part of the clauses. He could assure the noble and learned Lord that the Government would offer no objection to their Lordships considering every article in the schedule as they pleased.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the Affirmative.

House in Committee accordingly.

Procedure at Elections.

Clause 1 (Nomination of candidates for Parliamentary Elections).

LORD CAIRNS moved, in page 2, line 3, after ("candidate") insert—

"If after the adjournment of an election by the returning officer for the purpose of taking a poll one of the candidates nominated shall die before the poll has been taken, the returning officer shall, upon being satisfied of the fact of such death, countermand notice of the poll, and all the proceedings with reference to the election shall be commenced afresh in all respects as if the writ had been received by the returning officer on the day on which proof was given to him of such death; provided that no fresh nomination shall be necessary in the case of a candidate who stood nominated at the time of the countermand of the poll."

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he did not object to the provision.

Amendment, with verbal alterations, agreed to.

LORD COLCHESTER moved to omit the clause, his object being to leave nominations as they were at present. If nomination days were abolished, the excitement now displayed when candidates were being proposed would be exhibited on less convenient occasions in the course of the canvass or the election, and in a not less objectionable form. He thought that the ancient system to which they had become accustomed ought not to be abolished without sufficient reason for it being shown.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON took an entirely different view of the importance and value of this clause. In his opinion it was one of the most valuable clauses in the Bill—especially in the way in which it bore upon the moral, orderly, and quiet character of elections. He could well understand attachment to ancient modes of proceeding; but on the other hand he must say that it appeared to him that these public nominations had no real bearing upon the result of the election, whilst they gave constant opportunities for disorder of various kinds. The clause also had been passed in the present and previous Session in the other House of Parliament by large majorities. He must also point out that the omission of this clause would necessitate numerous other Amendments in the Bill, which the noble Lord had not even taken notice of.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Poll at Election).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had now to propose the important Amendments of which he had given Notice. He proposed after the word ("candidates") in line 7, page 2, to insert—

("Each ballot paper shall have an official mark on the back and a number printed on the face, and shall have attached a counterfoil with the same number printed on the face :

"Every voter, on application to the presiding officer, shall receive a ballot paper, and the presiding officer shall in the presence of the agents of the candidates (if any) enter on the counterfoil of the ballot paper the number of the voter on the register, and shall enter on the copy of the register with which he is supplied a cross or other mark denoting that the voter has received the ballot paper, but not showing the particular ballot paper which he has received :

"The voter shall place a cross or other mark in the figure of a square printed opposite the name of the candidate or each candidate for whom he votes :

"The voter having thus marked on the ballot paper the candidate or candidates for whom he votes shall fold the ballot paper so as to show the official mark on its back, and shall exhibit to the presiding officer such mark, and then in the presence of the presiding officer put the ballot paper into the ballot box :

"At the close of the poll the presiding officer shall in the presence of the agents of the candidates or such of them as may be present seal up the counterfoils of the ballot papers and send them by the earliest practicable post to the clerk of the crown in chancery :

"Any ballot paper on which a cross is put opposite to the names of more candidates than the voter is entitled to vote for, and any ballot paper having anything written thereon other than the mark or marks made by the voter, shall be void, and shall not be counted.")

His Amendments, as their Lordships would perceive, opened the whole question of personation. Personation was deemed by the promoters of the Bill so serious an offence that by the 24th clause it was declared to be a felony, punishable with two years' imprisonment with hard labour. That being so, it seemed to him to be absolutely necessary to provide some machinery by which the vote could be traced—because, without this, the offence could hardly be proved. The Amendment would enable the vote to be traced. When the Marquess of Hartington introduced the Bill of 1870, he said that he desired that the vote should be secret; but yet he thought that there should be power of tracing the vote. Being anxious to avoid all controversy on this point, he (the Duke of Richmond) had taken as his Amendment certain provisions of the Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government in 1870. He should, therefore, await with some curiosity the arguments by which the noble Marquess who had charge of this Bill (the Marquess of Ripon) would oppose those securities which it had been thought necessary to include in a Ballot Bill having on it the name of "the Right Hon. John Bright." The noble Duke then moved the first paragraph.

An Amendment moved, in Clause 2, page 2, line 7, after ("candidates,") to insert—

("Each ballot paper shall have an official mark on the back and a number printed on the back, and shall have attached a counterfoil with the same number printed on the face.")—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he was not surprised that the noble Duke should have avoided any allusion to the real nature of the Amendment—the Amendment affected a vital portion of the Bill now before them. He admitted that following the vote in order to a scrutiny would not be possible under the Bill as it now stood; but the Amendment would not only provide for following the vote in order to a scrutiny, but it would in effect make the Ballot optional. It would go even farther than

The Duke of Richmond

this, for it would render secret voting almost impossible. The noble Duke had declared that his Amendments were copied from the provisions contained in the Bill proposed by the Marquess of Hartington, on behalf of the Government, in 1870. But that Bill not only did not render the Ballot optional, as the Amendment did, but it contained most careful provisions against it—it provided that the voter should go into a secret compartment and there vote; and there was a penalty for infringing the secrecy of the vote. The tu quoque argument had no effect whatever upon him, because the Amendment had really nothing whatever to do with the previous Bill. The noble Duke could hardly pretend that this sham Ballot would ever have had the support of Mr. Bright. An optional Ballot meant a system under which any amount of intimidation might be exercised, only in another way and at another stage of proceeding than was the case at present. Now, the object of the secret Ballot was not so much to guard against intimidation from individuals as intimidation from classes, and classes were not amenable to general public opinion, but only to the opinion of those composing their own body: but an optional Ballot left the voter open to all the evils which the Bill was meant to remove. The Amendment, however, rendered secret Ballot impossible. His noble Friend had boasted that he had copied the Bill of Lord Hartington, but in doing so he had made a most important and most significant departure both from that Bill and from the Amendment of Mr. Ward Hunt. He hoped their Lordships would not pass a sham. It would be better for them to reject the Ballot altogether than to inaugurate a system which would be a mere pretence of secrecy, and which would be sure of rejection in the House of Commons.

LORD CAIRNS said, the noble Marquess, in the mode in which he met the Amendment, had taken a course which might be convenient to himself but which was not the most convenient to their Lordships. He had made a long and interesting speech on the question of a permissive or optional Ballot, but he had sat down without saying one word upon the Amendment proposed. His noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) had said that the Motion now before their Lordships was the first of a series of Amendments which he intended to propose, which, no doubt, would raise that extremely important question—the amount of secrecy which their Lordships would impose on the voters of the United Kingdom, whether they desired secrecy or not. That, however, was not the purpose of this Amendment, which was how to follow and detect personation. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) was utterly wrong in representing his noble Friend as saying that his Amendments were nothing more than restoring the Bill to the position of Lord Hartington's Bill. This Amendment did nothing more than restore that Bill on one important and exceptional point—he had taken certain securities against personation out of the Bill of 1870, and had argued that if they were thought necessary by the Government when they introduced that Bill, the same Government being answerable for the present Bill, the noble Marquess could not very well object to those securities now. He (Lord Cairns) would not follow the noble Marquess into the question of permissive or optional Ballot; but he rose to satisfy their Lordships of the propriety of the Amendment, and to show that without this Amendment the Bill would be the source of the most unmitigated mischief, vice, perjury, and fraud in every district of the country. The Bill provided that personation when discovered should be a felony. Their Lordships were very well aware that there was not a large constituency in the kingdom in which they would not find a great per centage of names of men who were dead or absent, and that as regarded the seaport towns it might happen that a substantial part of the electors might be absent at the time an election came on. With regard to all these dead men, and also with regard to the names of persons who were alive and in health, any person who was disposed to do so might go up to the polling-booth and represent that he was the person described on the register under a particular name, and demand a ballot paper. There was no reason why he should not get it unless he was detected on the spot—an extremely unlikely thing. Having got the ballot paper he must mark it, and put it into the ballot box, and in process of time it was taken out and counted as an absolute vote for the candidate in whose favour it was given. The Bill further provided, indeed, that if the real voter afterwards came forward he might satisfy the Returning Officer that he was the true person on the register and demand a second ballot paper. The ballot paper was then to be given to him and his vote was to be marked upon it; but it was not to be put into the ballot box, but into a separate bundle of tendered votes. When the time came for declaring the result of the election those tendered votes were not to be counted; but on any scrutiny or petition they might be brought in question, and if proved to be votes tendered by the proper persons they were to be received. What, however, became of the vote received meanwhile from the improper person? What became of the false, fraudulent, and vicious vote in the ballot box, and which was counted as a vote for him for whom it was given? Their Lordships would be surprised to hear that the spurious votes were still to be counted as good votes. True, if it could be brought home to the candidate or his agent that a personated or false vote had been given with their privity or connivance a vote might be struck off from the aggregate votes of that candidate for the bad vote so traced home. But in 99 cases out of 100 they could not prove such privity or connivance, and in many cases neither privity nor connivance might exist; and yet the fraudulent vote remained triumphant, and was counted. Would any Member of the Government stand up and say that that was a pure, proper, and desirable mode of conducting an English election? If the man was absent or dead, and could not come forward, the vicious vote would remain without any counteracting vote. These were the provisions in the present Bill. Now, Lord Hartington's Bill did meet this case, and Lord Hartington himself said that it was necessary to meet this case. That there might be no dispute he would read the enactment in Lord Hartington's Bill. The second provision of the Bill ran as follows:—

“Each ballot paper shall have a number or letter or other distinguishing mark printed on the back thereof, and have attached thereto a counterfoil with the same number or letter or other distinguishing mark printed on its face.”

Now, the object of that was obvious—it was to identify the counterfoil with the ballot paper. The 10th provision ran as follows:—

"Every voter, on application to the presiding officer, shall receive a ballot paper, and the presiding officer shall, in the presence of the agents of the candidate, enter on the counterfoil of the ballot paper the name of the voter and number on the register."

Since Lord Hartington's Bill the Government in the House of Commons had introduced a further provision that there should be on the back of every ballot paper what was called an official mark, and it was to be a new mark for every election, and to be kept secret and only within the knowledge of the Returning Officer. The noble Duke was only desirous to identify at the proper time the counterfoil with the ballot paper. If the Government, therefore, would not render its fulminations against personation idle and useless, it would accept the Amendment and give a means of detecting personation when committed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble and learned Lord had been very ingenious in finding fault, in the first instance, with the course taken by his noble Friend the Lord President in opposing the Amendment. He (the Lord Chancellor), however, thought that his noble Friend was perfectly justified in the line of argument he had adopted on that occasion. The whole scheme of the noble Duke's Amendments pointed to one end—namely, to reserve to the voter the power of disclosing the mode in which he had voted if he thought fit, and in effect to render the Ballot entirely optional. If the noble Duke succeeded in his object—if they once rendered the Ballot optional—they might as well put an end to the whole Bill. He looked on the noble Duke's Amendment as, in fact, substituting for the present Bill an entirely new measure for that which had come up from the other House. The Bill was one for insuring the power of secret voting; the Amendments would make it a Bill to insure the discovery of a man's vote. If they told the voter that he might, if he thought fit, disclose his vote, they practically told him that he must disclose it whenever pressure was put upon him by any person having the power and the desire to make him discover how he had exercised his franchise. Those who wished for secret voting thought it could only be reasonably secured by nobody knowing how the voter had voted. The effect of the Amendment would be to destroy the protection which the voter would otherwise feel that he had for the secrecy of his vote. The machinery for detecting personation had been omitted because it was found that perfect secrecy could not be maintained in conjunction with it. It was thought best to give up the machinery for detecting personation rather than to give up secrecy, because it was better that a dozen or so of bad votes should be recorded than that tens of thousands should be intimidated or coerced. Provision was made for correcting those bad votes in cases when the election was challenged; because in all cases where bribery or intimidation was proved it would be assumed the vote was recorded in favour of the briber, and it would be struck off accordingly. But what effect would the Amendment have in detecting the offender? How did it punish the false voter? What machinery would it provide for detecting a man who came up to tender a false vote? If the man was known when he came up there might be a remedy. But if there was any advantage in the Amendment, it seemed to him to be purchased at a disproportionate expense. It would be a worse evil in large towns with 12,000 or 14,000 votes, to deprive them of this security because there was a possibility of mistakes in a few cases. Allusion had been made to seaport towns, and the ease with which personation could be committed in such places from the number of the absentees. But the absentees would be known to the agents of both candidates, and the non-voters who would act as personators would also be known. Detection would, therefore, in most cases follow upon the vote being tendered. Altogether the mischief would be reduced almost to nothing, and would be of no consequence as compared with the evil of coercion.

EARL GREY said, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) had at present done no more than to raise the question as to whether it should be in the power of a properly constituted authority to conduct a scrutiny and identify votes by means of a number on the ballot paper corresponding with a number on a counterfoil. In that proposal he concurred, and he was quite prepared to alter the Bill on the principle that secrecy should be maintained, and should be compulsory, except that a scrutiny should be possible when abuse was suspected. He did not agree with the Lord Chancellor that the abuse was infinitesimal. It would be virtually impossible subsequently to prove any misconduct on the part of the Returning Officer, while his conduct would frequently be exposed to suspicion. The proposal now made by the noble Duke was substantially the same as that of Lord Hartington, which the Government accepted two years ago. It was in no way inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, and he was utterly at a loss to understand the extraordinary change of opinion on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Could a course adopted by the Cabinet on two previous occasions, after due deliberation, be so utterly wrong, or was it that Her Majesty's Government had determined at all hazards to gratify the extreme portion of their followers?

Lord Cairns

LORD ROMILLY said, he cordially concurred in desiring to repress personation, and thought this could only be done by largely increasing the number of polling places and leaving them open to people acquainted with the neighbourhood and its inhabitants.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET wished to know from the Government whether they would or would not introduce the exact words of Lord Hartington's Bill. If they did he should be satisfied. They were now discussing the question of getting a knowledge of the voter, and he should like to know why the Government deviated from the proposition which they brought forward two years ago.

EARL GRANVILLE admitted that the question of the noble Duke was a perfectly fair one. The answer was, that at that time the matter had not been fully argued. Now, however, the case was different, and it was too much to ask the Government, after the case had been argued on both sides, to adhere to a proposal which they did not approve.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the Amendment he proposed was substantially the same as the proposal made in 1870 by Lord Hartington. He had no objection to alter "in the face" to "in the back," and in originally proposing it in the former shape he could assure the noble Marquess opposite that he had no sinister object. The offence of personation was a very serious one, and one which the Government Bill in its present form would, as he believed, do very little to meet.

On Question? their Lordships divided:—Contents 162; Not-Contents 91: Majority 71.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

CONTENTS.

Beaufort, D.	Mount Edgcombe, E.
Bedford, D.	Nelson, E.
Cleveland, D.	Powis, E.
Manchester, D.	Radnor, E.
Marlborough, D.	Romney, E.
Norfolk, D.	Rosse, E.
Richmond, D.	Rosslyn, E.
Rutland, D.	Russell, E.
Somerset, D.	Sandwich, E.
Wellington, D.	Shaftesbury, E.
	Sommers, E.
Abercorn, M. (D. Abercorn.)	Stanhope, E.
Bath, M.	Stradbroke, E.
Bristol, M.	Strange, E. (D. Athol.)
Bute, M.	Strathmore and Kinghorn, E.
Hertford, M.	Tankerville, E.
Queensberry, M.	Verulam, E.
Salisbury, M.
Winchester, M.	Bangor, V.
	De Vesci, V.
Abergavenny, E.	Doneraile, V.
Airlie, E.	Gough, V.
Amherst, E.	Hardinge, V.
Annesley, E.	Hawarden, V. [Teller.]
Bandon, E.	Hereford, V.
Bathurst, E.	Hill, V.
Beauchamp, E.	Hood, V.
Bradford, E.	Lifford, V.
Brownlow, E.	Sidmouth, V.
Cadogan, E.	Strathallan, V.
Coventry, E.	Templetown, V.
Dartmouth, E.
Denbigh, E.	Carlisle, Bp.
Derby, E.	Gloucester and Bristol, Bp.
Devon, E.	Hereford, Bp.
Doncaster, E. (D. Buccleuch and Queensberry.)	Abinger, L.
Feversham, E.	Arundell of Wardour, L.
Fortescue, E.	Bagot, L.
Gainsborough, E.	Bolton, L.
Graham, E. (D. Montrose.)	Boston, L.
Grey, E.	Braybrooke, L.
Harrington, E.	Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
Harrowby, E.	Brougham and Vaux, L.
Hillsborough, E. (M. Downshire.)	Buckhurst, L.
Home, E.	Cairns, L.
Jersey, E.	Chelmsford, L.
Lanesborough, E.	Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)
Lauderdale, E.	Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
Leven and Melville, E.	Clinton, L.
Lonsdale, E.	Clonbrock, L.
Lucan, E.	Colchester, L.
Macclesfield, E.	Colonsay, L.
Malmesbury, E.	Colville of Culross, L.
Manvers, E.	Congleton, L.
Morton, E.	Conyers, L.

Delamere, L.	Overstone, L.
De Ros, L.	Penrhyn, L.
De Saumarez, L.	Raglan, L.
Digby, L.	Ranfurly, L. (E. Ran-
Dunmore, L. (E. Dun-	furly.)
Dunsany, L.	Ravensworth, L.
Egerton, L.	Redesdale, L.
Ellenborough, L.	Rivers, L.
Elphinstone, L.	Ross, L. (E. Glasgow.)
Fisherwick, L. (M. Done-	Saltersford, L. (E. Cour-
gal.)	town.)
Fitzwalter, L.	Saltoun, L.
Foxford, L. (E. Lime-	Sheffield, L. (E. Sheffield.)
rick.)	Sherborne, L.
Grantley, L.	Sinclair, L.
Hartismere, L. (L. Hen-	Skelmersdale, L.
riker.)	[Teller.]
Headley, L.	Somerhill, L. (M. Clan-
Heytesbury, L.	ricarde.)
Kenlis, L. (M. Head-	Sondes, L.
fort.)	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)	St. John of Bletso, L.
Kesteven, L.	Stratheden, L.
Lilford, L.	Strathnairn, L.
Monteagle of Brandon,	Talbot de Malahide, L.
L.	Thurlow, L.
Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)	Tredegar, L.
O'Neill, L.	Tyrone, L. (M. Water-
Oranmore and Browne,	ford.)
L.	Vivian, L.
Oriel, L. (V. Masse-	Wharnccliffe, L.
reene.)	Wigan, L. (E. Craw-
Ormathwaite, L.	ford and Balcarres.)
Ormonde, L. (M. Or-	Wynford, L.
monde.)	Zouche of Haryngworth,
	L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Hatherley, L. (L. Chan-	Sydney, V.
cellor.)	Torrington, V.
Devonshire, D.	Manchester, Bp.
Grafton, D.	Ripon, Bp.
Saint Albans, D. [Teller.]	Winchester, Bp.
Ailesbury, M.	Acton, L.
Iansdowne, M.	Annaly, L.
Ripon, M.	Auckland, L.
Abingdon, E.	Balinhard, L. (E. South-
Albemarle, E.	esk.)
Camperdown, E.	Belper, L.
Clarendon, E.	Boyle, L. (E. Cork and
Cowper, E.	Orrery.) [Teller.]
De La Warr, E.	Calthorpe, L.
Ducie, E.	Camoy, L.
Durham, E.	Carew, L.
Granville, E.	Charlemont, L. (E. Char-
Innes, E. (D. Rox-	lemont.)
burghe.)	Churchill, L.
Kimberley, E.	Clermont, L.
Lovelace, E.	Clifford of Chudleigh, L.
Morley, E.	Dacre, L.
Portsmouth, E.	Dinevor, L.
Spencer, E.	Dormer, L.
Falmouth, V.	Dunning, L. (L. Rollo.)
Halifax, V.	Ebury, L.
Leinster, V. (D. Lein-	Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and
ster.)	Kincardine.)
Powerscourt, V.	Eliot, L.
	Erskine, L.
	Foley, L.

Granard, L. (E. Gra-	Mostyn, L.
nard.)	Oxenfoord, L. (E. Stair.)
Greville, L.	Penzance, L.
Hare, L. (E. Listowel.)	Poltimore, L.
Hastings, L.	Ponsonby, L. (E. Bess-
Hatherton, L.	borough.)
Houghton, L.	Robartes, L.
Howard of Glossop, L.	Romilly, L.
Kenmare, L. (E. Ken-	Rosebery, L. (E. Rose-
mare.)	bery.)
Kildare, L. (M. Kildare.)	Rossie, L. (L. Kinnaird.)
Leigh, L.	Sandys, L.
Lurgan, L.	Saye and Sele, L.
Lyttelton, L.	Seaton, L.
Meldrum, L. (M. Huntly.)	Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.)
Meredyth, L. (L. Ath-	Sudeley, L.
lumney.)	Suffield, L.
Methuen, L.	Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
Minster, L. (M. Conyng-	Vaux of Harrowden, L.
ham.)	Vernon, L.
Monck, L. (V. Monck.)	Wenlock, L.
Monson, L.	Wrottesley, L.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND then moved the insertion of the next paragraph, which was, he said, consequent upon the Amendment which had just been carried—

“Every voter, on application to the presiding officer, shall receive a ballot paper, and the presiding officer shall, in the presence of the agents of the candidates (if any) enter on the counterfoil of the ballot paper the number of the voter on the register, and shall enter on the copy of the register with which he is supplied a cross or other mark denoting that the voter has received the ballot paper, but not showing the particular ballot paper which he has received.”

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that, considering the vote which their Lordships had just given, he should offer no opposition to this Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved to insert the following paragraph:—

“The voter shall place a cross or other mark in the figure of a square printed opposite the name of a candidate or each candidate for whom he votes. The voter having thus marked on the ballot paper the candidate or candidates for whom he votes, shall fold up the ballot paper so as to show the official mark on its back, and shall exhibit to the presiding officer such mark, and then in the presence of the presiding officer put the ballot paper into the ballot box.”

He thought this was the proper time at which to raise the question of secrecy, although the rules by which it was proposed to secure the secrecy sought by the Bill had been relegated to the schedules at the end. Up to the present moment the Committee had not dealt with the subject of secrecy. It was useless for noble Lords opposite to contend that the Bill before the Committee provided a Ballot of absolute secrecy, because it allowed an illiterate voter to have his voting paper filled up by the presiding officer in the presence of the agents of the candidates. It might be perfectly right that the illiterate voter should have the power of recording his vote in that manner, but by making such a concession they entirely gave up the idea of secrecy. If that were so, why should the great majority of the people of the country, who took a pride in voting openly, be compelled to gratify the whim of a small minority to vote in the manner provided by this Bill? When they came to the latter part of the Bill he would propose, by an Amendment to the schedule, to provide that the voter should, if he thought fit, go into a secret compartment, and there fill up his paper before giving it to the presiding officer; but he held that if the Committee were consistent, they ought to accept the Amendment which he now proposed.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, it was impossible that he could accept the Amendment. No doubt, the real object of the Amendment was to provide an optional Ballot, and he was obliged to the noble Duke for the very fair and candid manner in which he had stated the case. He had very little to add to what he had recently addressed to their Lordships, for he would not detain them by repeating the arguments he had already advanced. He had only to say that, in his judgment, it would have been far wiser to have rejected the Bill upon the second reading than to adopt an Amendment which would have the effect of making the Bill a pure delusion and a sham. The noble Duke had referred to those provisions in a later stage of the Bill by which persons suffering from certain disabilities might adopt a system of voting not altogether secret. He should be quite prepared to consider a proposal to strike out those provisions, in order to make the Bill perfectly consistent with itself; but, of course, there must be, in all human systems, points of difficulty. They could not make blind men, or men who could not read, do the same things as men who could see and read, and such difficulties must be met in the best way possible. But to say, because exceptions were made to meet difficulties—some of them of a physical character—they were therefore to abandon the whole principle of the Bill, seemed to be altogether inconsistent with a reasonable course of legislation. The real question their Lordships had now to consider was, did they or did they not intend effectually and really to give the protection of secrecy to the electors of this country? If they did not, then this Bill had better be rejected; if they did, in his judgment, the only right and reasonable course was to deal with the measure in such a manner as would secure that secrecy, instead of leaving intimidation precisely as it was at present, and merely shifting its point.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the argument which had been pressed upon them with the greatest force in favour of this Bill, was that the country by its silence during two Sessions of discussion, and especially by the result of certain recent elections, had declared its readiness to have the principle of secret voting imported into its legislation. They were told also that this Bill came before them with the strong and earnest sanction of the House of Commons, and that by adopting an Amendment such as that proposed by the noble Duke, by which the Ballot would be rendered optional, they would be sending back a sham to the House of Commons and would disappoint the country. He ventured to take issue on both those propositions. He did not believe that either the real sense of the House of Commons, or, still less, the real sense of the country was that which Ministers desired them to believe. As to the sense of the country, the matter was clear enough. At the very elections on which noble Lords opposite relied so much, and which they (the Opposition) were taunted with not having noticed, the candidates won, not in consequence of their adoption of the Ballot, but because they avowed a preference for the optional rather than the secret Ballot. What stamp had the House of Commons put upon the Bill? They might have a perfectly compulsory or a perfectly optional Ballot; but it was obvious they could have no compromise. The whole strength of the Government, with perfect consistency, had been devoted to making the Bill entirely compulsory. Their Lordships knew how strong the Government was in the House of Commons, and that when the House of Commons voted on a Government proposal other matters beside the mere merits of the question were considered. Yet, in spite of these influences, the House of Commons had taken the whole sting out of the Bill, when they expunged the penalties and gave to illiterate and other persons facilities which were absolutely inconsistent with the principle of secrecy. He maintained that if the House of Commons had been really in earnest in regard to the principle of secrecy, all the penalties would not have been taken out of the Bill; for the House of Commons would not have been content with forbidding things in an Act of Parliament when it shrunk from attaching any penalty to an infraction of the statute. This was, he thought, a very intelligible view for the House of Commons and the country to take. It was very reasonable that they should take the view expressed by the Prime Minister in Yorkshire last year, when he said that everybody ought to have the protection of the Ballot who desired it. For his own part, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) thought the sustaining influence of publicity ought to be given to everybody, whether he desired it or not; but, at the same time, he could quite understand the other view—that publicity should be secured to those who desired it, and secrecy to those who desired that. They had been told by the noble Marquess the President of the Council that under an optional Ballot the voter would be intimidated into making known his vote—that only the point of intimidation would be shifted. This objection, however, was equally applicable to all contrivances which might be adopted for the protection of voters. Even if they passed the Bill in its most stringent form, the agent or customer, or whoever was supposed to intimidate the voter, would still effect his purpose by telling his victim not to go to the poll. For his own part, he disbelieved all this talk about intimidation. It did not exist in his part of the country at all events. But if intimidation existed anywhere, and if there were any of their Lordships who desired to coerce their tenantry, he could only say that, however close they might make the secrecy of the Bill, and however sharp its penalties, he could undertake to know the vote of every tenant on his estate. Nothing would be easier than to keep away from the poll those over whom influence was exercised, and so neutralize their votes. No contrivance could prevent those who had such influence from exercising it if they wished to do so, and the victim chose to submit. But these arguments about intimidation were founded upon a misconception of the existing relations of English society. Englishmen would assert their opinions, and he utterly disbelieved that any body of Englishmen worth mentioning, having real convictions of their own—that was a qualification on which he very much relied—would be, or had been, so base as to sacrifice them to any pressure whatever. But if there were individuals who wished to put pressure on individual voters, no legislative devices could prevent the action of social forces. The system of optional Ballot, so far from being a delusion and a sham or an idle compromise, offered in reality, from the point of view of the advocates of the Ballot themselves, the wisest course they could adopt. Starting from the point at which their Lordships arrived the other evening, when they determined that it was desirable, if possible, to legislate upon this subject, he maintained that they ought to give Englishmen as much liberty as they could. The Bill proposed to introduce a new system, strange to the inhabitants of this country and alien to our political life. Could such a system be introduced suddenly and without notice—not by the desire of the people, but as the result of a Parliamentary intrigue? Could it be expected that the people would yield a hearty allegiance to the mere law if violent restrictive penalties were attached to it? If an attempt were to be made to force them to adopt a system of secret voting, would it not be wiser to lead them up to it quietly, to induce them to examine the machinery at work, to appreciate its value, to have all their difficulties and apprehensions removed by experience—to move towards it, in short, in the gradual and tentative manner in which we had moved towards every change that had proved beneficial and permanent in this country? The people of this country did not like and would not submit to violent and hasty changes. It was the nature of our legislation to lead them towards all reforms gradually, and whenever an attempt had been made to disregard the tradition of the country in this respect, the law had been gradually worn away and pulverized by the steady and passive resistance of the multitude, who were unwilling to accept the sudden application of a novel principle. He believed their Lordships would act wisely in accepting the Amendment, which offered the only chance of a solution of the question, and the rejection of which would leave the question to be settled after violent and acrimonious controversy, when it might now be adjusted temporarily, and ultimately settled in the sense desired by the Government by gradual and cautious legislation.

The Marquess of Salisbury

EARL COWPER said, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had stated that the other House had not manifested any strong wish for compulsory secrecy; but he (Earl Cowper) thought that if the noble Marquess would turn to the debates and divisions which occurred in that House he would find reason to doubt the accuracy of his statement. He thought that if there were one thing which more than another showed the worthlessness of an optional secrecy, it was that no attempt had been made to argue that the Bill would be of any use if it were passed with this Amendment in it. He could understand this Amendment being supported by the opponents of the Ballot and by those who voted against the second reading of the Bill; but if the Amendment were to be accepted the victory gained on the second reading would be no victory at all, and the House would place itself as much in opposition to the wishes of the country as it would have done had it thrown out the Bill on the second reading. For one, if opposed to the Ballot, he would rather have rejected the Bill in a straightforward manner than have proposed to defeat its object by introducing this Amendment.

EARL GREY said, he had supported the last Amendment because it was necessary to insure fairness; but he could not help thinking that this Amendment was not consistent with what was called the principle of the Bill, upon which he hoped their Lordships would not engraft it. It was quite clear that if their Lordships adopted it, it would not be accepted by the other House; and then either their Lordships would be compelled to reverse their decision, or they would be held up to the country as having taken a course which was not straightforward in order to defeat the object of the Bill. On these grounds, he thought it was not desirable to adopt the present Amendment.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, that, while he had voted against the measure, which he thought was a most unworthy one, now that their Lordships had accepted the principle of the Bill, he would be no party to an Amendment which would palpably reduce the Bill to an utter unreality. Nothing could be more obvious than that intimidation would be just as easy under this Amendment as it had been hitherto. It would be rather too strong a measure for public opinion to attempt to prevent a man voting at all; but it would be quite practicable to say—"Unless you vote publicly I shall assume that you have voted against me," and the result would be just the same as at present. He therefore hoped the Amendment would be negatived.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE thought there was much to be said in favour of both secret and open voting, but this new proposal for optional secret voting appeared to him to combine the disadvantages of both secret and open voting. He considered that under the optional system of voting intimidation would be even easier than under the existing system. He believed, also, that bribery under the optional system would be much worse than it was at present, and detection more difficult, because a person who desired to receive a bribe would be able to prove to the person who offered the bribe that he had voted for a particular person and to conceal his vote from every one else. This assertion of his was not founded upon mere theory but upon experience and upon evidence which was to be found in Parliamentary documents. He was astonished to hear the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) say he had never heard of a case of intimidation, and he could only ask the noble Marquess whether he had ever read the evidence given before the Marquess of Hartington's Committee?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It has never been presented to us.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE: It was in their Lordships' library, where he was reading it the other day. That evidence adduced scores of cases of intimidation by landlords in Wales. They heard much the other night about bribery and intimidation being practised in America, but it so happened that the particular States in which those practices prevailed were States in which secrecy was optional. It was optional in the States of New York and South Carolina, which were referred to the other night, but it was compulsory in Massachusetts, which was free from the bribery that existed in the other States. As to France, the evidence showed that the voting, though nominally secret, was in reality not so. There was a great and an unjust pressure placed upon voters. In Australia, with compulsory secrecy, there was no intimidation, and little bribery; and that fact only bore out what one would naturally expect. At all events, where secret voting was optional there was bribery, and where it was compulsory there was no intimidation—he would not say there was absolutely no bribery, because it was impossible to suppress it altogether, but there was very little indeed. The Amendment was quite inconsistent with the principle of the Bill. If they adopted the Amendment it would be said by those who were not friendly to their Lordships' House that their object was to allow intimidation to continue, in order to preserve the influence of the landlords. He hoped their Lordships would not adopt the Amendment, which was entirely at variance with the principle of the Bill.

LORD CAIRNS said, he altogether denied that this Amendment was an attempt by a side wind, or in an underhand way, to get rid of a Bill which had passed the second reading. Nothing could be fairer and more above-board, both in regard to the second reading and this Amendment, than the course taken on this occasion by his noble Friends. They had given their reasons for not exercising the influence they had to induce their Lordships to reject the Bill on a second reading; but they stated distinctly at the time the character of the Amendments which they would propose in Committee. On the other hand, he denied the right of any noble Lord to define to their Lordships the principle of a Bill after it had been read the second time, when that definition was made with a view to strengthen the opposition to the Amendment. He thought this one of the most important clauses of the Bill. The provision as to open nominations was a very good thing; and the maintaining of the secrecy of the poll until the close was also a very good thing. Indeed, he believed that by the keeping of the poll secret till the close they would get rid of nine-tenths of whatever bribery remained in the country. But so far as any desire in favour of Ballot existed out-of-doors, he believed that among the great body of electors the desire was only for a permissive Ballot; that there should be no imposition of secrecy on any voter who did not wish it; but that every man might, if he wished, record his vote in secrecy. This was the kind of Ballot which the Prime Minister declared it to be his wish in Yorkshire to establish—that secrecy should be provided for those only who desired it. That was the principle on which he supported this Amendment. It was quite consistent with the principle of the Bill and with the feeling out-of-doors in regard to the Bill. He would recommend the noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) who spoke about intimidation to read the evidence given before Mr. Justice Keogh, and his decision in the case of the Galway Election Petition. That was a case in which intimidation of the most alarming character had been resorted to; but was it for the purpose of making persons vote? Nothing of the kind. It was known how the persons were going to vote; respectable men—farmers, professional men, clergymen—were met coming into the town to poll; they were mobbed, pelted with stones, and their lives endangered, to prevent them from voting at all. Was there a single word in this Bill to check or cure this gigantic evil—this disgrace to the country? Could that which was done on a large scale towards voters whose opinions were known not to be done on a small scale by the customer as against tradesmen, by trades unions as against a member of the union? Of course it could; and if this Bill passed in its integrity they would be only shifting the point of intimidation from one place to another. On the ground that they had no right to impose on any man secrecy of voting against his will, who desired to record his vote as he had done before, openly—on the ground that they had no right to constrain that man, to crush him into a silent voter, unable to declare the opinion he conscientiously maintained, he should support this Amendment.

The Earl of Airlie

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he did not believe that anyone on his side had attributed to noble Lords opposite an intention by this Amendment to get rid of this Bill by a side-wind. What they said was this—that it would be an inconsistent part if their Lordships, after voting for the second reading, should adopt an Amendment which would substantially defeat the Bill. That was their contention; and for himself he believed that this Bill would become substantially waste paper if this Amendment should pass. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) would lead their Lordships to believe that the Amendment was in accordance with the views of those who out-of-doors were in favour of Ballot. He entertained a very contrary opinion. If there were no feeling in the country in favour of the Ballot, how did it happen that at those elections which had recently been held the successful candidates had expressed their approval of the Ballot?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: They were in favour of an optional Ballot—Ballot without the tread-mill clauses.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY mentioned the Oldham election, where Mr. Lyulph Stanley was a candidate.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: But Mr. Stanley was the unsuccessful candidate.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: At any rate his experience did not harmonize with that of the noble Marquess as to the feelings of the people on this question, nor was there any concurrence in their experience with regard to intimidation, which the noble Marquess had said was very rare indeed. He (the Earl of Kimberley) feared it was only too rife. Intimidation was not only open—it was often indirect, and if it was only removed by this Bill one step, that might be a very good step in advance. It was perfectly obvious that an optional Ballot was no Ballot at all, and he did not think it would be worth while to pass such a measure into law.

LORD ROMILLY expressed his surprise at hearing the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) say that the people of this country did not wish for the protection of the Ballot. Had he gone through as many contested elections as he himself had done, he would have arrived at a different conclusion. Electors had over and over again come to him and said that they were sorry to feel obliged to vote for him, and that they would vote against him if they could; while others, again, told him that they desired to vote for him, but must vote against him, and that they wished they had some protection. By secret voting he understood a system by which the voter would not be able to prove how he had voted, but that he should be at full liberty to make any statement he pleased as to how he had voted. He thought it was impossible for any one who really knew the facts seriously to say that the people of this country did not want the protection of the Ballot.

LORD CAIRNS denied that he had said that the people of this country did or did not desire the Ballot. What he had said was that he was persuaded that those people in this country who desired the Ballot desired the kind of Ballot which would give the protection of secrecy to those who desired that protection; and that those who desired to vote openly should be allowed to vote openly.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the explanation just made by the noble and learned Lord opposite was perfectly fatal to the Amendment of the noble Duke. That Amendment would be entirely incompatible with giving the protection of secrecy to those who desired that protection.

On Question whether to insert? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 83; Not-Contents 67: Majority 16.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

CONTENTS.

Bedford, D.	Harrowby, E.
Marlborough, D.	Lanesborough, E.
Norfolk, D.	Lonsdale, E.
Richmond, D.	Mount Edgecumbe, E.
Rutland, D.	Russell, E.
Wellington, D.	Shaftesbury, E.
	Stradbroke, E.
Abercorn, M. (D. Aber-	Verulam, E.
corn.)	Wilton, E.
Bath, M.
Bute, M.	Bangor, V.
Exeter, M.	De Vesci, V.
Hertford, M.	Gough, V.
Salisbury, M.	Hardinge, V.
Winchester, M.	Hawarden, V. [Teller.]
	Hereford, V.
Amherst, E.	Hill, V.
Beauchamp, E.	Hood, V.
Bradford, E.	Sidmouth, V.
Coventry, E.	Strathallan, V.
Dartmouth, E.	Templetown, V.
Denbigh, E.
Doncaster, E. (D. Buc-	Gloucester and Bristol,
cleuch and Queens-	Bp.
berry.)	Hereford, Bp.
Faversham, E.
Graham, E. (D. Mont-	Abinger, L.
ross.)	Bagot, L.

Boston, L.	Headley, L.
Braybrooke, L.	Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Buckhurst, L.	Kesteven, L.
Cairns, L.	Lilford, L.
Chelmsford, L.	Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)
Clinton, L.	Oranmore and Browne, L.
Colchester, L.	Oriel, L. (V. Massereene.)
Colonsay, L.	Ormathwaite, L.
Colville of Culross, L.	Redesdale, L.
Delamere, L.	Saltoun, L.
De Ros, L.	Sinclair, L.
De Saumarez, L.	Skelmersdale, L.
Digby, L.	[Teller.]
Egerton, L.	Sondes, L.
Fisherwick, L. (M. Donegal.)	Stratheden, L.
Fitzwalter, L.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)	Tredegar, L.
Grantley, L.	Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)
Hartismere, L. (L. Heniker.)	Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Canterbury, Archp.	Churchill, L.
Hatherley, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Clifford of Chudleigh, L.
Devonshire, D.	Congleton, L.
Saint Albans, D. [Teller.]	Dormer, L.
Somerset, D.	Dunsany, L.
Ailesbury, M.	Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.)
Lansdowne, M.	Erskine, L.
Ripon, M.	Foley, L.
Airlie, E.	Granard, L. (E. Granard.)
Camperdown, E.	Greville, L.
Cowper, E.	Heytesbury, L.
De La Warr, E.	Howard of Glossop, L.
Duoie, E.	Kenmare, L. (E. Kenmare.)
Durham, E.	Kildare, L. (M. Kildare.)
Fortescue, E.	Leigh, L.
Granville, E.	Lurgan, L.
Grey, E.	Lyttelton, L.
Jersey, E.	Meldrum, L. (M. Huntly.)
Kimberley, E.	Meredyth, L. (L. Athlumney.)
Morley, E.	Methuen, L.
Nelson, E.	Minster, L. (M. Conyngham.)
Powis, E.	Monson, L.
Rosse, E.	Mostyn, L.
Spencer, E.	Poltimore, L.
Halifax, V.	Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.)
Sydney, V.	Romilly, L.
Torrington, V.	Rossie, L. (L. Kinnaird.)
Ripon, Bp.	Saltersford, L. (E. Courtown.)
Belper, L.	Saye and Sele, L.
Blachford, L.	Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.)
Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.]	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Brougham and Vaux, L.	Sudeley, L.
Camoy's, L.	Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
	Vernon, L.

Consequential Amendments made.

LORD COLCHESTER moved, in page 2, after Clause 2, insert—

“If any elector signify to the returning officer his desire to vote otherwise than by personal attendance, the returning officer shall, not less than three days before the day fixed for election, forward to him a ballot paper together with a ticket containing the voters name and number on the register, and the voter shall secretly mark his vote upon it and place it in a closed cover or packet, and send it together with the ticket under an outer cover to the returning officer who shall place it in the ballot box on the day of election.”

The noble Lord said he proposed this Amendment because he believed the system of personal attendance at the poll was the source of every evil connected with contested elections.

EARL COWPER opposed the Amendment on the ground that it would give rise to as much bribery and intimidation as at present existed. The proposal was reported against very strongly by the Committee of 1870 on the ground that it would make bribery and intimidation easy, and it had been made twice in the other House, and was each time rejected by considerable majorities. Few dependent voters could resist a landlord, or a £10 note in a private room with a ballot paper to fill up. It would likewise open the door to the distribution of forged papers, which it would be difficult to identify.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY had always thought the arguments in favour of voting papers to be very strong. No doubt they might in some cases lead to mischief; but that mischief, in his mind, would be very slight when compared with the serious injury sometimes inflicted upon electors who had the misfortune to live a long distance from the polling place. Considering that the strength of the Liberals was generally to be found in towns, and that of the Conservatives in the country, he was not surprised at the aversion of the former to such an arrangement as that proposed. As, however, this question had been discussed on several occasions, he should advise his noble Friend not to press it, but rather to turn his attention to the more practical object of increasing the number of polling places.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Offences at Elections.

Clause 3 (Offences in respect of nomination papers, ballot papers, and ballot boxes.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved in Clause 3, page 3, line 19, after (“punishable”) insert—("Any offence specified in this section shall, if committed by the returning officer or his clerks, be punishable with imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour");

line 23, leave out

("returning officer at such election") and insert ("Secretary of State for the Home Department").

LORD ROMILLY deprecated the adoption of the Amendment. In the House of Commons it was complained that the Bill was overweighted with penalties, and on such a charge as that contemplated by the noble Lord, and with such a penalty, it would be found practically impossible to convict.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY observed that all that the noble Lord opposite proposed to do was to render the punishment heavier in the case of the Returning Officers than in other cases. Hitherto the Government had poured out all their wrath upon the unfortunate elector; but what in his case was a mere crotchet was in the Returning Officer a crime. He trusted that the Amendment would be adopted.

After some discussion—

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he would undertake to give the Amendments and suggestions consideration before the bringing up the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Infringement of secrecy).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved, in page 3, to leave out from the beginning of the clause to ("interfere") in line 32, and insert—

("No officer, clerk, or agent in attendance at a polling station shall communicate before the poll is closed to any person any information as to the official mark or.")

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, what Her Majesty's Government desired in reference to this branch of the subject was to prevent the possibility of candidates availing themselves of the votes of corrupt electors. It was well known that in most boroughs there were a certain number of voters who were notoriously corrupt, and who "hung back" in order to sell their votes. If the agents of the candidates were allowed to be within the polling-places and to keep a record of the voters who applied for ballot-papers, the object of the corrupt candidates and voters would be gained. He did not think his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) desired that that state of things should arise, and as the Amendment was not necessarily consequential upon the proposals which had been already adopted he must ask the opinion of their Lordships upon it.

LORD CAIRNS agreed as to the importance of preventing corrupt practices in the conduct of elections; but he thought it perfectly legitimate that the candidates or their agents should be enabled in the course of an election to ascertain who had not voted, in order that their support might be solicited. But the clause contemplated the presence of an agent at a polling station, and it would be idle to prohibit the giving of this information to candidates or their agents, because it could be as easily obtained by persons standing in the streets outside the polling-places as by agents who had access to the interior of the polling booths.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it was important that the prohibition should be maintained. The only reason why the knowledge as to who had not voted could be desired, was that intimidation or bribery might be brought to bear upon them. If the agents were informed as to the names of the persons who had voted, they would be able, at critical points in the progress of elections, to "put on the screw" on those who had not.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was absolutely startled by the facility with which Her Majesty's Government took alarm. It now appeared that it was an utterly wrong thing to ask anyone who had not voted to go to the poll. He remembered that in University contests some years ago, the supporters of the different candidates used every argument, and exercised every influence—if he might use the word—to induce the electors to record their votes, and it never occurred to any man that there was anything wrong in that. Now, however, it appeared that in regard to the poorer classes of voters, it was quite wrong to ask any one of them to vote. That was the only ground on which the argument of the noble and learned Lord could be justified. But even if this new political Decalogue were true, this clause would not attain the object he had in view. If a man should at any time drop a single word as to which candidate he had voted for he would be liable to "summary conviction before two justices of the peace and sentenced to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour." The Legislature would have this sword of Damocles hang over the unfortunate man's head for the rest of his life. Why, the very thought of it would drive a man mad, and to obtain relief he would probably rush home at once and divulge the terrible secret at once to his wife or friends so as to get it off his mind. Parliament had no right to inflict this fearful curse on a man who had voted, and he hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would adopt the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the stringency of this clause was greater than he had ever before seen. Not only would the officers, clerks, and attendants, and the persons who supplied the voting papers act under alarm and anxiety, but it would exercise a new form of intimidation over the voters and deter them from voting at all.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 63, Not-Contents 36; Majority 27.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment of Law.

Clause 5 (Division of boroughs and counties into polling districts.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed an Amendment by which the polling-places to be provided by the authorities should be so assigned as that every elector resident in a county should have a place not more than "two" miles distant from his residence—instead of "four" as provided by the clause. The great object which those who promoted this Bill had in view was to enfranchise the greatest number of individuals, and enable the greatest number of persons throughout the country to exercise their right of voting. The Amendment he proposed had the advantage of giving every voter who wished to exercise his right an opportunity of doing so, by enabling him to walk to the polling-place, and it would thereby do away with one great source of expense and inconvenience attending elections—namely, the conveying the voter to the place of voting. A working man could, under the Amendment, record his vote in his meal time without losing his day's labour. He was at a loss to understand why Scotland was to be excluded from the operation of this part of the Bill, because Scotland required a multiplication of polling-places more than any other part of the United Kingdom. It was only reasonable that a man should be able to record his vote at the least trouble and inconvenience to himself, and on that ground he moved the Amendment.

Amendment moved, page 4, line 11, leave out ("four"), and insert ("two.")—(The Duke of Richmond).

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, the question was a purely practical one; and those who were competent to form an opinion believed that with the increased number which the lesser distance rendered imperative, it would be impossible in many districts to find suitable polling-places and competent and responsible presiding officers. It was believed that these arrangements would often be difficult with the greater distance named by the Bill; and the difficulty would be increased by reducing the distance—particularly in respect to presiding officers, because with optional secrecy for the unhappy voter, it would be more than ever necessary that the officers should be trustworthy persons. It must be borne in mind that the Bill fixed four miles, subject to the discretion of the local authorities to reduce it; but the Amendment would make the shorter distance imperative. Scotland was excluded because it was believed to be absolutely impossible to find the requisite number of presiding officers there even for the greater distance.

LORD DENMAN said, he should have supported the Amendment if he had thought it to be a practicable one; but he did not believe it was on account of the difficulty of finding the requisite number of presiding officers.

LORD CAIRNS questioned the right of the noble Marquess the President of the Council to assume that optional secrecy would increase the difficulty of multiplying polling-places, and as to the voter being made "unhappy" by giving him the option of voting openly or in secret, he might thank the Government, with whom "unhappy voter" had become a favourite expression. To walk four miles to a polling-place, and four miles back was a serious task, and the difference between doing that and walking two miles there and two miles back was so great, that the question was well worthy of their Lordships' consideration.

The Marquess of Salisbury

LORD ROMILLY said, he should be obliged to support the Amendment, because he believed the multiplication of polling-places the only effectual remedy against personation, and necessary to the reduction of the evils against which the Bill was directed.

On Question, That the word ("four") stand part of the clause? Their Lordships divided:—Contents, 49; Not-contents, 68: Majority 19.

Then the word ("two") inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Use of school and public room for poll).

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY moved to omit the words, "any room in a school receiving a grant out of moneys provided by Parliament." This provision affected many persons interested in Church schools, and from the diocese of Manchester alone no fewer than 60 Petitions were presented the other night, on the ground of the interruption of the arrangements of the school and the interference with the proper work of education. That, he might observe, would be especially aggravated by the tumult and distraction of an election. He hoped the Government would withdraw the proposition.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the object of this Amendment was the same as one which he had himself placed on the Paper; but as he feared his went too far and would prevent the use of any room other than a school-room, he should be content to take the Amendment of the most rev. Primate. He could not conceive anything more out of place, or more detrimental to good order, than to allow election proceedings to be held in school-rooms. Besides, as the number of attendances at school entitled managers to receive the Parliamentary Grant, the arrangement might interfere with the money a school was entitled to receive from Government.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH understood the provision had been inserted at the instance of the Education Department; but he hoped they would revise the decision they had come to.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH pointed out that schools received grants of public money for the performance of specific duties, and urged that when they had discharged that obligation it was unjust to impose another upon them.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he presented three Petitions in deprecation of this clause from persons in Worcester and Birmingham practically acquainted with the subject. He believed it would be a serious impediment to education, and he hoped the Government would give way on this point.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that the clause was not the invention of the Education Department, as had been suggested, but was proposed last year by a Conservative Member in "another place." He feared that in many places there would be difficulty in finding rooms suitable for the purpose of polling—the choice would often practically lie between the school and the public-house.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY suggested that as they were now engaged in the process of reforming public-houses, which when the Licensing Bill of the Government was passed, these houses would be places where nothing that was wrong would occur, and where virtue would be enshrined. It would be a most happy arrangement that purified elections should be carried on in purified public-houses.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that although estimating highly the probable good effects of the licensing measure of the Government, he was afraid that, after it was passed, public-houses would still not be the very best places in which to hold Parliamentary elections.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, this concession would only be graceful on the part of the Government, and he hoped they would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing on that question.

On Question? Amendment agreed to; words struck out; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 agreed to.

LORD COLCHESTER moved to insert, after Clause 11, the following:—

"This Act shall not come into operation with regard to the manner of taking votes in any county or borough where by a poll taken by ballot according to the provisions in Clause 3 the majority of the electors shall decide that votes continue to be given openly as before the passing of this Act : and the returning officer shall cause such poll to be taken not less than one week or not more than four weeks prior to an election, at the requisition of any five registered electors."

He trusted their Lordships would give a fair consideration to that proposal, and not be led to reject it for the sake of obtaining uniformity of system where the circumstances were the very reverse of uniform.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON opposed the Amendment. It would be very objectionable that different modes of election should prevail in various parts of the country, and he would draw attention to the difficulty which the Returning Officer would have in carrying out the latter part of the Amendment in the absence of precise information as to a forthcoming election.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY distinctly remembered that Sir Robert Collier proposed and Mr. Childers strongly supported a provision exactly like the present one. It had, therefore, found favour among orthodox Liberals.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 12 (Prohibition of disclosure of vote).

Clause 13 (Non-compliance with rules).

Clause 14 (Use of municipal ballot boxes, &c. for Parliamentary Elections,) and vice versa.

Clause 15 (Construction of Act).
—severally agreed to.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that when last Session he moved the rejection of the Bill on the ground of want of time, he referred to one or two subjects which he thought would require consideration should a Bill of the same nature again come before the Legislature. One of these related to the payment of the expenses of candidates. He greatly regretted in the interest of the working-classes that the proposal to throw the expenses of elections on some public fund had been rejected by the House of Commons; but unfortunately it was against privilege to handle such subjects in the House. But there were two other points which he then pointed out as worthy of special attention, upon which he was now about to ask their

Lord Colchester

Lordships' opinion. He had placed two Amendments on the Paper, one proposing that the poll should be kept open until 8 in the evening, the other that the public-houses should be closed on the day of the poll. He urged the adoption of these provisions on this ground, among others—that they had been pressed upon him by a deputation of 40 representatives of the trades of London, and a number of delegates from Lancashire and North Yorkshire. The delegates who had waited upon him differed as to the mode in which opportunity should be given to the working classes to ballot, but they were all unanimous in asking for some special facilities. One of the arguments used by the deputation which had waited on him, was that under the present system the reckless idle fellow would not be indisposed to leave his work regardless of the inconvenience to his fellow-workmen and his master, while the honest workman who shrank from throwing the work upon his fellows would be debarred from voting; so that by closing the poll at 4 many of the best class of workmen were practically disfranchised, and that, under an extended suffrage, was a serious evil. It had been said in answer it would be dark at 8 in the winter time; but the working classes replied they were quite able to take care of themselves, and as for the roughs, they were more than a match for them. The working classes were quite ready to accept the responsibility, if only the opportunity were given to them of recording their vote. In London at municipal elections the polling was always kept open up to 8 o'clock, and he had been assured by men of many years' experience that by far the best men came towards the close of the poll. If his second Amendment, requiring the public-houses to be closed on the polling day, were accepted, there would be no possibility of mischief resulting from the proposal to keep the poll open until 8. The same deputation strongly urged that the public-houses should be closed during the polling hours, alleging that they offered great facilities for bribery when men were half drunk. The working classes were very determined in the matter, and—to use the words of the deputation to which he had referred—they asked their Lordships to grant the boon the Commons had dared to refuse. Great difference of opinion would arise upon the vote given with respect to the question of an optional or a compulsory Ballot, but no difference of opinion existed among the classes most concerned upon the point he now submitted. He had never seen such unanimity, and he was sure that if the Bill were passed without these provisions it would be received with the greatest possible contempt by the people, who would never relax their efforts until they had obtained that which they regarded as essential to their honour and security. The noble Earl concluded by moving the 1st clause.

Moved, after Clause 15, to insert the following:—

“At every contested election of a member or members to serve in Parliament for any borough or borough county in England or Wales after the passing of this Act, the polling shall commence at eight of the clock in the forenoon of the day fixed for that purpose by the returning officers, and no poll shall be kept open later than eight of the clock in the afternoon; and so much of the Act five and six William the Fourth, chapter 36, as limits the hours of polling to four of the clock in the afternoon in respect of borough elections is hereby repealed.”—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

LORD DENMAN said, the municipal elections took place at a stated time, but the example would not apply to Parliamentary elections, which might be held at any time of the year.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he regretted the course adopted by the House of Commons with regard to the first of the noble Earl's proposals, and he was ready to admit that there was great force in the argument with which he urged his present proposal. But it must be obvious to their Lordships that a general extension of the polling time until 8 o'clock would not answer. He was anxious to offer every facility to the working classes to record their votes, but nothing would be so bad as to carry on elections in the dark.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY desired to state the reasons why he should support the Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury). He fully concurred with much of what had been said by the noble Earl, but he viewed the Amendment in connection with a larger principle. It was quite true that this Bill would probably put an end to what he might call positive compulsion—that was, that no man should be able to force his dependents to the poll. But he was not quite sure—and this was a very important point, but one which he had not heard hitherto alluded to—whether it would put an end to negative compulsion? It would, he feared, be easy for a large employer of labour, who knew that his workmen differed in opinion from him as to such questions as to the distribution of wealth, or the tenure of land, for instance, by adjusting the hours of labour on the polling day in a particular manner, or by other means, to prevent their voting. He would give an instance which would appeal as forcibly as possible to noble Lords opposite. He would take the case of a Liberal manufacturer having in his employment 400 Conservative working men, and he was sure he could not put the case more strongly. Such a man, by preventing his workmen from voting, might seriously retard the progress of that Conservative reaction which the country was watching with such interest. It was in the hope that the Amendment might to a certain extent remedy the danger of the repression of votes that he should vote for it.

LORD CAIRNS said, that the Amendment, as worded, seemed to leave too much to the discretion of the Returning Officer. He feared such a power as this would lead at times to the suspicion that the hour of closing the poll was appointed to suit the convenience of the side to which the Returning Officer belonged. It had been stated “elsewhere,” too, that polling after dark, as would often be the case under this clause in the winter months, would lead to tumult and rioting. Again, there were boroughs as large as counties, and it would not be advisable that voters should have to go a considerable distance after 8 o'clock at night. He quite agreed it was desirable that every restriction should, as far as possible, be removed which tended to prevent the working classes from recording their votes; but, although no doubt the noble Earl's proposal was aimed in that direction, he could not but see that it was attended by difficulties which rendered its adoption in its present shape inadvisable.

The Earl of HARROWBY, Lord LIFFORD, and Lord DELAMERE offered some observations which were not audible.

The Question being put, and some of their Lordships declaring themselves

Content, and others Not-Content, the Chairman of Committees declared the Not-Contents have it; and whereon

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY challenged the decision, protesting that he would take the sense of the House even if he had to walk into the lobby alone.

The Question having been again put; their Lordships divided:—Contents 87; Not-Contents 72: Majority 15.

Resolved in the Affirmative; Clause added to the Bill.

LORD CAIRNS: After what has happened, it is absolutely necessary that I should ask your Lordships to report Progress. Her Majesty's Government are clearly ignorant as to the course they ought to take with regard to this Bill. Almost the only Member of the Government who has taken any part in guiding the discussion upon this Bill is the noble Marquess the President of the Council, who, upon the Amendment of the noble Earl, rose in his place and gave us to understand that the Government were opposed to the noble Earl's proposition. Although greatly impressed by the motives of the noble Earl in bringing his proposal forward, yet, feeling the weight of the arguments used by the noble Marquess, I expressed my opinion that it would be unsafe for your Lordships to accede to the Motion in its present form. I do not think there is any one of your Lordships who heard what occurred who was not under the impression that Her Majesty's Government was going to oppose the proposal of the noble Earl. When the Question was put from the Chair I heard a great number of voices on the other side of the House challenge the passing of the clause; yet every Member of Her Majesty's Government, including the President of the Council, went into the lobby with the noble Earl. My Parliamentary experience is not so long as that of many of your Lordships; but I must say that in all my experience in either House of Parliament I never knew a course to be adopted by any Government similar to that which has been adopted on the present occasion. I hope it will be distinctly understood that Her Majesty's Government, having, by their spokesman, sought to induce your Lordships not to accept the proposal of the noble Earl, nevertheless, at the last moment, turned round, and went into the lobby in support of the Amendment they had just opposed.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the inference to be drawn from what the noble and learned Lord had just said was, that the proposal of the noble Earl would not have been carried if those who supported it had known that the Government would vote for it. Now, what was the fact? The President of the Council had expressed regret that the House of Commons had not adopted in effect, though not in exact terms, a proposal similar to that of the noble Earl. With that view, he had made a suggestion, which, however, the noble Earl thought fit to reject. The noble and learned Lord laid it down in positive terms, that it was a matter of the greatest importance that every restriction against the labouring classes recording their votes should be removed; and as he (Earl Granville) entirely agreed, he could not vote against the proposal of the noble Earl, considering it contained a principle which would be well worthy of consideration and adoption, in a modified form, when they came to consider the Bill on the Report.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that if the noble Earl was of that opinion, he thought the noble Marquess the President of the Council was not justified in the speech which he had made. So surprised was he (the Duke of Richmond) to see the Members of the Government going into the lobby with the noble Earl that he remarked to a noble Marquess near him that the Government must be voting under some mistake, because the speech made by the President of the Council was directly opposed to the arguments of the noble Earl who had made the proposal. The Motion was that the first of the noble Earl's new clauses be added to the Bill; and the noble Marquess told them that he could not support that Motion. He thought that was a position which the Government might very reasonably take, and therefore he thought that the statement of the noble Marquess represented the views of the Government. He must say that it was extremely inconvenient that on a Bill of this importance, and upon an Amendment of which due Notice had been given, the Government should not have previously taken counsel as to the course that they ought to pursue. If the views of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary were correct—that the proposal should be modified, and that the time ought not to be distinctly fixed at 8 o'clock—then it was for the noble Marquess to make that suggestion, and he should have said to the noble Earl—“If you will withdraw your clause and agree to the terms that I think right, then I will not oppose your proposition, but will endeavour upon the Report to bring forward a Motion that will meet the case.” So far from doing that, the noble Marquess distinctly opposed the proposition of the noble Earl. He (the Duke of Richmond) repeated that that was not the way in which a Bill of this importance should be discussed upon a Motion of which Notice had been given. They had a right to hear the opinion of the Government stated; and what he complained of was that the noble Marquess had laid down the course which the Government intended to take without giving them any notice whatever that they were going to vote in the directly opposite manner to that in which they had spoken. They gave no intimation whatever that having spoken one way they would vote another.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I am quite sure that nothing could be further from the intention of the noble Duke who has just sat down than to misrepresent in the slightest degree anything said either by myself or any other Member of your Lordships' House; but the noble Duke has somewhat forgotten what I said, or I failed to make clear what I intended to say on this subject. What I said was that I regretted the course which the House of Commons had taken in striking out a clause the object of which was to lengthen the hours of polling, and so afford greater facilities to the working classes in the exercise of the franchise. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) pointed out the peculiar wording of the noble Earl's clause, which provided that the poll “shall not be kept open later than 8 o'clock.” That wording seemed to indicate the intention of the noble Earl to be that the poll should not always be kept open till that hour.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: The Amendment has been in print for some days, and perhaps some Member of Her Majesty's Government will state whether when they came into the House they meant to support the noble Earl's Amendment.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I cannot give any information as to what we thought yesterday, or at any other time. What I am concerned to do is to explain the course which Her Majesty's Government have taken. Now, I maintain that in assenting to the clause of the noble Earl, we have done what is perfectly consistent with the statement of my noble Friend behind me (the Marquess of Ripon). What he said was that he thought 8 o'clock would be too late an hour at certain times of the year; and the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) said he agreed with my noble Friend that it would at certain times of the year be convenient to keep the poll open to a later hour than at present. The clause we have passed provides that no poll shall be kept open later than 8 o'clock in the afternoon—thus leaving it optional whether the poll should remain open till that hour. I admit that the clause is imperfect and that it will require to be altered on the Report; but still I contend that voting for the clause is perfectly consistent with the view we have taken—namely, that it is desirable that at certain periods of the year the poll shall be kept open till 8 o'clock.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Earl speaks as if there were no power of amending any clause which has been proposed to the House. Instead of voting for that which he did not approve, the noble Earl might have moved some words to make it such as he did approve. However, I only rise to suggest that in voting against that which their principal spokesman had advocated, Her Majesty's Government were perfectly consistent with themselves, because, in reality, they were voting against that which Mr. Forster voted against in the House of Commons. I believe the right hon. Gentleman voted against having the poll open till 8 o'clock. It is obvious enough, however, that until the division was called the Government never dreamt of voting with my noble Friend; but having had an unfortunate evening, they thought they would take this opportunity of somehow getting a vote in their favour.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Marquess who says we have had an unfortunate evening, and the noble Lords who support him, are evidently disappointed at not having the monopoly of spoiling the Bill. I suppose it is the opinion of the noble Marquess—though it is not ours—that the last Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) has had some effect in spoiling the Bill, and if so, of course, he and those who support him will be consistent in continuing the course of action which has been going on the whole evening, and in rendering the whole Bill as unlike the measure which came from the House of Commons as can possibly be conceived. As regards the particular question on which the division was taken, it was one of detail, and my noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) wished to make such a variation in the hours of polling as would give the working men every opportunity of exercising the franchise, and our vote was perfectly in harmony with the speech of the Lord President. There is nothing in the clause to prevent us from bringing up on the Report an Amendment to the effect that a variation in the hours of polling should be made at different periods of the year, but that the polling should never be continued after 8 o'clock.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: This is such a singular instance of consistency on the part of the Government, that I think I ought to draw attention to it. I believe that Her Majesty's Government made in the other House a proposal in regard to this question of keeping open the poll, and that on the proposal being found unacceptable they acted as they did on the present occasion—they spoke one way and voted another.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH: During the long time I have been in this House I have known many learned Lords who sat on the Woolsack. But all those noble and learned Lords, whatever their views may have been, have held them with dignity and firmness—with judicial firmness, and with the appearance at all events of judicial moderation. We have heard the noble and learned Lord opposite speak often in this House, and twice in the course of this evening, and I must say he never rises to address your Lordships without showing acrimony and bitterness, and imputing motives to his political opponents.

EARL GRANVILLE: I must protest against the language used by the noble Marquess. I can only attribute what has fallen from him to the ignorance which is natural in consequence of his having been absent from the House up to a very short time ago. The notion that my noble and learned Friend is wanting either in moderation or dignity is one which I never before heard even whispered by the opponents of Her Majesty's Government. I regret extremely that an imputation should have been cast upon us of any unfairness towards the opposite side of the House; but I cannot help thinking that noble Lords opposite, accustomed as they are to exercise a despotism in this House—[“Oh, oh!”]—

LORD CAIRNS: I rise to Order. The noble Earl has already spoken.

EARL GRANVILLE: Why, we are in Committee at this very moment, and any noble Lord can make remarks as often as he pleases. [“Oh, oh!”] I repeat that the noble Lords opposite, with the enormous power they wield in this House—[“Oh, oh!”]—Am I saying anything which is not true? Noble Lords opposite are so accustomed to have their own way in matters of this sort, that they cannot conceive any course being taken except for us to vote and be beaten on every Amendment they propose. What is there unfair in what we have done? Putting all other questions aside, it comes to this—that if the noble Duke opposite had known more clearly than he seems to have done the line of voting we should take, he would have been able to exercise his influence over Members of his own party in order to prevent them from voting in the way they thought right.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: After the very pointed manner in which the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary has just alluded to me, your Lordships will not think it extraordinary if I rise to make a few remarks. The noble Earl has stated that if I had known the manner in which Her Majesty's Government were going to vote, I should have exercised my influence to induce noble Lords on this side of the House to vote in a way contrary to that which they thought right. I have not had the honour of a seat in this House for so long a period as many noble Lords whom I see round me; but I have sat in this House upwards of 10 years, and I think I never before heard in it so personal a remark as that which has just fallen from the noble Earl. My Lords, the noble Earl stated that as we on this side of the House were the majority, I was in the habit of exercising what he is pleased to call a despotism—that is to say, that I have the power and also the inclination to direct the noble Lords whom I now see around me to vote on every occasion in the way I prescribe, and that I am the despot who rules noble Lords on this side of the House. Now, my Lords, let me point to what happened last week. I call as witness the noble Earl opposite who had charge of the Licensing Bill (the Earl of Kimberley). I want to know whether anything like despotism was exercised on this side of the House on any occasion; whether there were not occasions—certainly there was one occasion—when, if I had urged noble Lords on this side to take the course that occurred to my mind, I could not have carried Amendments which noble Lords opposite would have thought hostile and injurious to the Bill? After what happened on that occasion the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has no right to tell me that I exercise a despotism over noble Lords on this side of the House. More than that—he has no right to make personal remarks, and to impute to me motives which, if I held them, would render me unworthy to sit in this House, and to hold the position I have the honour to hold. It is an imputation that I venture to appeal to noble Lords on this side to vote contrary to their views and wishes, because, forsooth, we are anxious to be in a majority on every occasion. I regret that matter of so personal a character has been introduced by the noble Earl, and, feeling so strongly upon it, and that the noble Earl has not a tittle of foundation for the language he has used, I have taken the liberty of making these remarks.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE:—I move that the Clerk at the Table do read the Order of the House relating to Asperity of speech.

The Clerk at the Table accordingly read the 18th Order of the House, as follows:—

“To prevent Misunderstanding, and for avoiding of offensive Speeches, when Matters are debating, either in the House or at Committees, it is for Honour Sake, thought fit, and so ordered, That all personal, sharp, or taxing Speeches be forborn, and whosoever answereth another Man's Speech shall apply his Answer to the Matter without Wrong to the Person: and as nothing offensive is to be spoken, so nothing is to be ill-taken, if the Party that speaks it shall presently make a fair Exposition, or clear Denial of the Words that might bear any ill-construction, and if any offence be given in that Kind, as the House itself will be very sensible thereof, so it will sharply censure the Offender, and give the Party offended a fit Reparation, and a full Satisfaction.”

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: The Motion before your Lordships is that the Committee report Progress. I move as an Amendment that the next clause of the Bill be now read.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES said, the next Question was that the second clause of which the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had given notice should be inserted in the Bill.

Moved, after the above inserted clause, to insert the following clause:—

(“That on any day fixed for polling at any contested election for any borough or borough county in England or Wales after the passing of this Act, it shall not be lawful for any licensed victualler or person licensed to sell beer by retail to be drunk on the premises, or not to be drunk on the premises, or any person licensed or authorised to sell any fermented or distilled liquors in any part of England or Wales, to open or keep open his house in any borough where a polling place is situated for the sale of beer, wine, spirits, or any other fermented or distilled liquors between the hours of eight of the clock in the forenoon of such polling day and eight of the clock of the afternoon of the same day, if the polling shall so long last, except for refreshments to a bona fide traveller or a lodger therein.”)—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

LORD DENMAN said, the only clause relating to public-houses was contained in the Ballot Bill of last year; but that contained a penalty of £20, so that the clause would require consideration in “another place” before it could be adopted.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had no difficulty in stating what course the Government would pursue. They were of opinion that the clause related to a matter which would be better dealt with by the Corrupt Practices Bill. In order not to mislead the House he might inform their Lordships that the Members of the Government were about to vote against the clause.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 43; Not-Contents 133: Majority 90.

Resolved in the Negative.

Application of Part of Act to Scotland.

Clause 16 (Alterations for application of Part I. to Scotland).

LORD COLONSAY moved to insert words in sub-section 5, providing for the increase of polling-places in certain districts of Scotland.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL opposed the Amendment. The provisions of this part of the Bill were quite inapplicable to Scotland. The sheriffs of counties had complete power satisfactorily to regulate the subject.

Amendment, by leave of the Committee, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 17 to 32, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 33 (Short title).

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, that the Act should continue in force till the end of the year 1880, said, that if the Act produced all the good results its promoters anticipated, there would be a general concurrence of opinion in favour of its renewal; and the objections of those who entertained grave doubts as to its working would in a considerable degree be modified if it were known that at the expiration of that period the Act would be impartially reviewed and its defects remedied by the aid of enlightened experience. A great deal had been said of the results of the system of secret voting in our Australian Colonies; but he denied the correctness of the analogy, for the circumstances of those colonies were very different from those of this country, and it did not follow that because the Ballot had succeeded in Australia it would therefore succeed in this country. Their Lordships ought, therefore, to pause before committing themselves to its permanent adoption. No doubt Parliament always had the power of revising in one year what it had done in a previous one; but he wished to secure that after a given time, this particular legislation should undergo reconsideration. He was anxious that that system, if Parliament in its wisdom adopted it, should receive a full and fair trial. He did not think that one General Election only would be sufficient to test properly the working of a measure so wholly new as the Ballot; but if, as he proposed, the Bill was continued in operation till the end of 1880, two General Elections at least must necessarily occur in the interval.

Amendment moved, at page 19, at end of Clause 33, to insert—

("and shall continue in force till the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty, and no longer, unless Parliament shall otherwise determine; and on the said day the Acts in the fourth, fifth, and sixth schedules shall be thereupon revived; provided, that such revival shall not affect any act done, any rights acquired, any liability or penalty incurred, or any proceeding pending under this Act, but such proceeding shall be carried on as if this Act had continued in force.")—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON thought it highly undesirable to enact that a Bill of that nature and magnitude should be of temporary duration, so that Parliament in a given year would be forced to reconsider it, whether the Business of the country or the then state of public affairs might render such a course convenient or otherwise. It was competent for Parliament at the end of eight years—or in one or two years, if it thought fit—to amend that or any other Bill after it had seen how it worked, or even to repeal it altogether. But to provide that Parliament should take up again in 1880 that question which for the last two years had given rise to such lengthened discussions was a proceeding almost without precedent, and one that might impose on a future Parliament a burden which might be very inconvenient.

LORD CAIRNS said, there were several precedents for the Amendment, and even so recently as the Irish Land Act provisions had been inserted which fully justified the present proposal. Moreover, every provision in this Bill was of such a tentative and speculative kind that if ever there was a measure which ought to be limited in its duration in the first instance it was this one. The advocates of the Ballot thought it would have a great effect in checking bribery, intimidation, and similar matters. Other persons thought that an erroneous expectation. Nothing but experience could prove which of those opposite views was correct. They had been told that the state of things in regard to elections in Ireland could hardly be worse than it is. Well, time and experience could alone test that. He (Lord Cairns) was himself of opinion with many others that this Bill would turn out in practice to be a gigantic scheme of disfranchisement—that those voters who could not read and write would be disfranchised, from the great reluctance which such persons felt to come forward and confess their ignorance; while those who could only read and write imperfectly would be disfranchised from the difficulty they would experience in filling up their ballot-papers, and from the nervousness and uncertainty which would always attend their execution of the operations prescribed by the Bill. Nothing but time could show whether the Bill would be popular with the country, and if it were distinctly understood that the whole matter must of necessity be reviewed in the year 1880, people would express themselves upon its working with that in view.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 106; Not-Contents 69: Majority 37.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

FIRST SCHEDULE.—(Rules for Parliamentary Elections.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed an Amendment in sub-section 26, which provides that “the declaration of inability to read” shall be made “before a justice of the peace,” and on the production of that declaration have their voting papers filled up by the presiding officer, a provision giving the presiding officer that power on the declaration being made in the first instance before himself. He did not believe it possible that the voters who desired to vote under this provision would be able to find the necessary time to visit the magistrate, even if they knew where to find him. In all probability, too, the demands made upon the magistrate would be beyond his ability to perform, and as working men could only devote certain portions of the day to such work, the magistrate might be called upon just as he was handing a lady down to dinner to attend to these declarations. He proposed the Amendment, because he believed that the proposal contained in the Bill would practically disfranchise a large number of working voters.

Amendment moved, page 24, lines 25 and 26, to leave out (“produces such declaration as hereinafter mentioned,”) and insert (“declares.”)—(The Duke of Richmond).

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON opposed the Amendment. He did not believe that any very large number of voters would find it necessary to avail themselves of the provision, nor could he see that it inflicted any hardship upon those who would vote under it.

LORD CAIRNS said, the object of the Amendment was to enable as many voters as possible to exercise the franchise. On the other hand, according to the noble Marquess, the Government were so enamoured of the principle of secret voting that in order to carry it they would willingly run the risk of disfranchising any number of voters, who, if they voted at all, could only vote openly. The declaration was not a declaration of inability to spell, but of inability to read, and he desired to know why the working voter who could not read should be placed in a worse position than a Jew, for whom the presiding officer might fill up a paper on a declaration being made before him that the voter was a Jew and had conscientious objections against writing on a Saturday. The poor elector, moreover, had to make this declaration before a magistrate between the day of nomination and the day of polling. How was that to be done? He was told that at the last election at Manchester 77,857 persons recorded their votes, and he did not believe he was exceeding the fair proportion if he estimated the voters out of that number who could not read at 10,000. He should be glad to know how it could be expected that these 10,000 voters should be able between the day of nomination and the day of polling to find time to go before magistrates for this purpose, or find magistrates sufficiently numerous and disengaged to attend to these declarations. The Bill, too, made no provision for the distributing of these declarations, and did not state where they were to be obtained.

In fact, everything was to be done by magic. An honest man could have no object in making a false declaration; but the Government, rather than run the risk of destroying the symmetry of the scheme of secret voting, preferred to make the disfranchisement of a large number of voters certain.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY believed that if even 10,000 voters out of the number referred to by the noble and learned Lord opposite were unable to read, it would be too much to assume that they must necessarily avail themselves of this clause; for, as the list of candidates would be numbered, it would be no difficult matter for a voter who could not read to place his cross opposite to the number of the candidate for whom he desired to vote. No doubt, the question was one of considerable difficulty. He thought the best course would be to maintain the clause in its present form, because, if voters were put to some little trouble in order to make their declarations, the probability of the responsibility being shirked and the declarations being lightly or fraudulently used would be diminished.

THE EARL OF POWIS referred to the fact that in a previous clause it had been decided that voters should not be required to go more than two miles to poll. Now, if the present clause was adopted the "illiterate voters" might, in thinly-populated districts, have to go five or 10 miles in order to find a magistrate to take their declaration.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 59; Not-Contents 91: Majority 32.

Resolved in the Negative.

Words struck out.

Then the word ("declares") inserted.

Further Amendments made.

LORD KINNAIRD said, he had placed Amendments on the Paper to exclude agents from the polling-places to secure greater secrecy, but as the Bill had been amended in a contrary direction he would not press them.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

SECOND SCHEDULE.—(Forms.)

THIRD SCHEDULE.—(Provisions of Registration Acts referred to in Part III. of the foregoing Act.)

Lord Cairns

FOURTH SCHEDULE.—(Acts relating to England.)

FIFTH SCHEDULE.—(Acts relating to Scotland.)

SIXTH SCHEDULE.—(Acts relating to Ireland.)

Severally agreed to.

The Report to be received on Friday next, and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 157.)

House adjourned at half past Twelve o'clock, A.M., till half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 17th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Hon. William le Poer Trench, for Galway County.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Pawnbrokers, nominated.

Report—Tramways (Metropolis) [No. 252].

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Admiralty and War Office Rebuilding* [200]; Victoria Park* [201]; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Acts Amendment* [202].

First Reading—Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing)* [198].

Second Reading—Courts of Law (Scotland) Agents* [136], Review of Justices' Decisions* [190].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 3)* [171].

Committee—Report—Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension* [183]; Fires* [7-199]. Considered as amended—Customs and Inland Revenue [106].

Third Reading—Queen's Bench (Ireland) Procedure* [126], and passed.

Withdrawn—Municipal Corporation Acts Amendment* [24].

REGISTRARS OF DEEDS, &c. (MIDDLESEX).—QUESTION.

MR CUBITT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Registrars of Deeds for the county of Middlesex have as yet adopted a uniform system of fees, and reduced the fees charged to the scale prescribed by their Act, and if the records are still deposited in a building which is not fireproof; whether he can state the amount of emoluments received by the two surviving Registrars and by the Treassury in the years 1870 and 1871, and whether the fees of the vacant Registrarship are still divided between the two Registrars and the Treasury; if he can inform the House that no steps will be taken by the Lord Chief Justice to fill the vacant Registrarship; and, if Her Majesty's Government, pending the re-introduction of a general measure for the transfer of land, and the consequent abolition of the Middlesex office, contemplate taking any steps to put a stop to the existing abuses in the office as reported by the Royal Commissioners?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had reason to believe that no alteration had been made in the system of fees for registering deeds in the county of Middlesex since a Question was put on that subject two years ago. The fees were regulated partly by Act of Parliament and partly in accordance with the advice of eminent counsel; and the records were deposited in a building which he believed was not actually fireproof, but for the security of which considerable expense had been incurred. He was informed that in all respects it was as fireproof as the building in which wills were deposited, and that every possible precaution was taken against fire. The emoluments of the Registrars in 1869 were £2,561; in 1870 they were £2,145; and in 1871, £1,911; and they were still divided in the same manner as that which he described when he answered the Question put two years ago. He might state, however, that one of the Registrars had recently died, and that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Suspensory Act which would deal with the matter provisionally, until such time as the whole matter came up for settlement under the Land Transfer Act.

ARMY—MILITIA CAMP, APPLEBY. QUESTIONS.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether his attention has been called to the arrangements made by the Control Department at the Militia Camp near Appleby; if it is true that the straw for the men's bedding, which was due on the 3rd of June, was not delivered until the 7th instant; that the bread was (for some days especially) of an inferior quality; that the wood supplied for cooking purposes was green and utterly unfit for use; that scales were sent without triangles upon which to hoist them; and that the pumps having failed to furnish an adequate supply of water, a water cart was sent, but no horses being provided or authority given for the receipt of tenders for that purpose until ten days after the arrival of the cart at the Camp, it could not be used, and water had to be brought from a considerable distance, thereby necessitating the employment of men upon fatigue duties when they would otherwise have been engaged at drill; and, who is responsible for these arrangements?

MR. WHITWELL said, he wished also to ask the right hon. Gentleman, If his attention has been drawn to the fact that of the three regiments that were camped together, one regiment ran away with a barrel of beer from the stores, and that complete disorder ensued; whether he has heard of a case, where the men being refused beer, they commenced an onslaught on the publican's premises, and broke the whole of the glass in the window with the exception of two panes; and whether it has been reported to him that there were a number of unlicensed houses selling liquor to the soldiers in addition to that provided by the canteens to a considerable extent—to the extent, as he had been informed, in one instance, of several hundred barrels?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, my attention has not been called to the unsatisfactory nature, as alleged, of the arrangements made by the Control Department at the camp near Appleby, until my hon. Friend placed his Question on the Notice Paper, nor to the details quoted by the hon. Member for Kendal. Since then, however, inquiries have been made into the matter, and as the result of those inquiries is not, in my opinion, satisfactory, a Court of Inquiry will be appointed to investigate the circumstances and complaints brought forward by the hon. Gentlemen. I shall be prepared to answer my hon. Friend's Question when the result of the Court of Inquiry has been communicated to me, of which I will give them notice.

EDUCATION—THE NEW CODE, 1871— EVENING SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, with reference to an answer given by him on the 1st March last, Whether he is now in a position to state what decrease there is in the number of Evening Schools and Scholars inspected during the past owing to the regulations of the New Code?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that he could not state precisely what was the decrease in the number of evening schools and scholars inspected during the past year, owing to the regulations of the New Code, because the year for which the Returns were made did not expire till the 31st of August. But as the night schools were generally held during winter, he might state that the number of the schools had decreased from 2,100 to 1,300, but he could not give any information as to the number of the scholars. He would take that opportunity of stating what were the requirements with regard to night schools. The House would be aware that, under the Revised Code, before the passing of the Education Act, only 40 meetings were required to enable a school to receive the Parliamentary Grant, and each scholar was required to attend 24 times before coming up for examination. It was proposed, in the New Code, to make the number of meetings 80, and the number of attendances 50 for the year; but it was ultimately decided that the number of meetings should be reduced to 60, and the attendances to 40. That arrangement was to have lapsed this year, but Lord Ripon and himself had determined to continue it, believing that a less number of attendances would not give a school a right to receive public money.

WORKSHOP REGULATION ACT (1871).

QUESTION.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, looking to the fact that in many parts of the country, such as the nailing districts, the Workshop Act is at present a dead letter, owing to the insufficiency of inspection, it is his intention to take any steps to give effect to the Act by adding to the number of Inspectors in such districts, or otherwise?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he could not admit that the Workshop Regulation Act (1871) was a dead letter in many parts of the country, for since the Act was passed last Session there had been a great number of prosecutions instituted under it. In Mr. Baker's district alone no fewer than 70 such prosecutions had been instituted. Great difficulty was experienced owing to the fact that the Act applied to a much more ignorant class than the Factory Acts dealt with, and a knowledge of its provisions had to be brought home to that class. That was being done with the greatest possible speed, and an addition of eight sub-Inspectors had recently been made to the force whose duty it was to carry the Act into operation. He was informed that quite as much progress had been made in carrying out the Act as under the circumstances was possible. It was many years before the Factory Acts could be fully enforced, and therefore the hon. Member should not be surprised at some difficulty having been experienced in bringing the Act into working order, because the difficulty was far greater in dealing with men carrying on the petty trades to which the Workshop Act applied.

Mr. C. Dalrymple

WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS) VICTORIA PARK.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked the First Commissioner of Works, What steps have been taken since the 11th of March, when this subject was brought under his notice by a question in this House, to have the Bathing Ponds in Victoria Park cleaned out and improved; and, when he expects such work to be completed?

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that steps had been taken to obtain a supply of fresh water for the bathing ponds in Victoria Park by means of boring, and that the necessary works would be completed in a short time. It was not desirable to empty the lakes during the present warm weather, but when the proper season arrived they would be cleaned out. It was impossible to say how long the latter operation would take.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.

QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention during this Session to deal with the subject of Police Superannuation; and, if he will allow the system of commutation of Pensions to be extended to Annuitants under any proposed alterations he may be pleased to make?

MR. BRUCE said, he regretted that he would be unable to introduce a measure on the subject of police superannuation during the present Session; but whenever such a Bill was brought in, full consideration would be given to the suggestion of the hon. Member as to allowing the system of commutation of pensions to be extended to annuitants under any proposed alterations it might be found desirable to make.

CUSTOMS' DEPARTMENT—OUT-DOOR OFFICERS—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether there were not sixty out-door officers of the Customs Department of the Port of London, from fifteen to twenty-seven years' service, who, after special recommendation, are employed to act as examining officers and gaugers for an average period of seven years, yet who are subjected, in respect to half the vacancies occurring in the examining officers' and gaugers' department, to a competitive examination with young officers of five years' service, who have never acted in the same capacity; and, if so, whether an arrangement could not be made by which the competitive examination would be limited to officers of practical experience, and thus prevent young and inexperienced officers from superseding tried men of many years' service?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, the facts stated in the Question of the noble Lord are generally correct, with the exception that the young officers who are allowed to compete must have not less than five years' service; but I think that the arrangement which he suggests would not be so beneficial to the public service as that which at present exists, and which, while it gives sufficient consideration to practical experience, at the same time is a great encouragement to young men of superior intelligence and ability,

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE LEGISLATION THE RESOLUTIONS—QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will make a statement of the steps which Her Majesty's Government propose to take to give effect to the Resolution of the House of March 22nd in favour of the reform of Private Legislation?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that this subject was under consideration and would not be allowed to drop. He would remind him that the share of responsibility which he had undertaken was mainly to ascertain whether the system of Provisional Orders could be improved and extended. He was engaged in carrying on that inquiry by all means in his power; but it was an inquiry which could not be confined to the Board of Trade, and for that purpose he was in communication with other Departments of the Government, but he was not in a position to tell the right hon. Gentleman positively when he could give him information upon the subject. He might add that there were Resolutions before the House proposed by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. F. S. Powell), which were of an interesting character, and that there was also the question how far the inquiry which had been conducted for so many weeks by the Railway Committee upstairs, which was now coming to a close, might have a bearing on the subject.

CRIMINAL LAW—FREEMASONRY—CASE OF DAVID FARRELL.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether on the occasion of an inquest held at Sutton, in the county of Dublin, before Dr. Davys, Coroner, on the body of the boy David Farrell, who was killed at Baldoyle Races, in consequence of falling under the railway carriages, a witness named Strahan gave the following evidence:—

"There was a very large crowd assembled on the platform, and amongst them five or six respectably dressed men, who had formed themselves into a kind of triangular wedge, and were pushing along the crowd, parallel to railway line. Their conduct, he believed, was monstrous, and, as the result of the pushing, he saw people thrown off the platform on to the rails. Almost directly afterwards he heard the shout that a boy was killed. He knew one of the men engaged in pushing, but as he was a brother Freemason, he could not reveal his name;"

whether the witness was justified in refusing to reveal the name of the incriminated person on the ground that he was a "brother Freemason," or whether there is any such legal privilege for Freemasonry; if not, whether the Coroner was right in not requiring the witness to state the name of the person whose improper conduct he stated led to the fatal result?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, reference was made in the Question of the hon. Member to a statement that had been made at the Coroner's Inquest held on the body of a boy named David Farrell, who was killed at Baldoyle Races in consequence of falling under the railway carriages. A witness stated that he knew one of the men engaged in pushing when several persons fell off the platform, but that as he was a brother Freemason he could not reveal his name. In reply to the Question he (Mr. Dowse) had to say that this witness was not justified in refusing to reveal the name of the person on that ground, neither had he ever heard of any such privilege being claimed before. The Coroner had placed himself in communication with the Government, and had pointed out that no evidence had been given incriminating any of the five persons who had been pushing, and to whom the witness Strahan referred, adding that it was on this account he had not thought it necessary to insist upon the witness revealing the name. The Report which had been received from the Constabulary substantially confirmed the Coroner's statement. He might add that the gentleman referred to by Mr. Strahan had written to the papers, giving his name, and admitting that Freemasons had no such exemption as had been claimed for them. The Coroner was not justified in declining to ask the name, and instructions had been given to the Crown Solicitor to see whether there was ground for proceeding farther in the matter, and no doubt, if there was, Mr. Strahan would see cause to state the name of the person he referred to at the inquest.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN RICHARD DYMOND.—QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the proceedings in the case of John Richard Dymond, sentenced by the Aberdeen Circuit Court on the 26th April 1872, to penal servitude for five years for a fraud upon the

Mr. O'Reilly

Scottish Legal Burial Society; and, whether there is any objection to the production of the precognitions taken in the case, for the information of the Royal Commission on Friendly Societies?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, my attention was called some months ago to this case when the proceedings were originally instituted, and the matter was brought to trial in the ordinary Court of Justice, resulting in the conviction of the prisoner upon his own confession. I may say that it is against the rule for the Crown Office to produce the precognitions; but I have taken upon myself to order their production on some occasions where it might be done without detriment to the public service, and would serve some useful purposes. I have desired information in regard to this particular case, and I have to inform the right hon. Baronet that I think the present a suitable occasion for relaxing the ordinary rule, and therefore the precognitions for which he asks will be produced.

INDIA—DRAFTS ON LONDON.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can give the House any information with reference to certain alleged purchases by the Bank of Bengal of a large amount of private Bills of Exchange drawn at Calcutta upon London, on account of the Government of India; and of Five-and-a-half Promissory Notes of the Public Debt of India in London under orders of the Bank of Bengal on the same account?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, no full and official account of the transaction alluded to by my hon. Friend has yet reached the Secretary of State in Council, but I know that certain purchases both of bills and of Government securities were made by the Bank of Bengal on behalf of the Government. For such purchases no sufficient authority had been given, but under the circumstances the Government of India did not consider it necessary to cancel them, although it clearly intimated that nothing more must be done in the same direction without explicit sanction. It may be convenient if I add that what has happened will not interfere with the regular drawings of the Secretary of State for India.

NAVY—THE "THALIA" STORESHIP. QUESTION.

MR. A. GUEST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been drawn to the Statement in the Public Journals, that the "Thalia" storeship has been selected to convey a large number of Supernumeraries to China, although her scuttles do not admit of being opened when at sea, and that the War Department on a recent occasion refused to recognize her as a vessel fit for the transport of troops, and if there is any foundation for this statement?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, in the first place, the Thalia was not a storeship, but a corvette of six guns, specially constructed to carry a certain number of supernumeraries, she having been designed, like her sister ship the Juno, to take the place of some of the old paddle steamers. The Thalia was a perfectly new ship, and had as yet scarcely done any service. She had not been selected to carry a number of supernumeraries, but to replace her sister ship, the Juno; and there had been no correspondence with the War Office on the subject of conveying supernumeraries. The lower deck of the Thalia was constructed precisely on the same principles as that of an ordinary frigate; her scuttles could be opened in the same weather, and the persons below would have the same amount of comfort or discomfort as the crew of an ordinary frigate.

POST OFFICE—THE TELEGRAPH CLERKS.—QUESTION.

MR. SYNAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the classification of Telegraph Clerks forwarded by the Postmaster General has been approved of by the Treasury; and, if not, whether it is likely to be so; and, when the new classification will be issued by the Treasury?

MR. BAXTER said, in reply, that a classification of the telegraph clerks had been forwarded by the Postmaster General to the Treasury, along with a very voluminous Report concerning other branches of the subject. That Report was now under consideration; but, at present, he was not able to announce that any decision had been come to.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

"PROVISIONAL USE."—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the United States have, since the signature of the Treaty of Washington, availed themselves of the provisional use of the privileges granted to them by that Treaty in the Dominion of Canada, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland; and whether they will continue to do so in the event of the postponement of the Arbitration; and, whether the term "provisional use" does not imply that, in the event of the failure of the Treaty, the provisions of the Treaty with respect to the Fisheries must come to an end?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: As this question bears directly upon the Colonial Department, my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government has requested me to answer it. I shall do so according to the best of my ability. My hon. Friend will really find the answer to the first part of the Question in the Papers which have been presented to Parliament. The Government of the United States applied for the provisional use of the privileges granted to them by the Treaty of Washington in the Dominion of Canada, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland during the fishing season of 1871—that is, last year. In the exercise of her undoubted right Canada refused to allow that provisional use, and the fishermen of the United States have consequently been, and continue to be, excluded from the Canada fisheries. Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland granted the permission, and Newfoundland has continued to grant it during the present season. With regard to the latter part of the Question—which refers to the meaning and signification of a word in the English language—I should hardly presume to instruct my hon. Friend; but I think he and the House will probably concur with me in the opinion that the words "provisional use" mean a use which is temporary, and contingent on the occurrence of something else. That something else I take to be the legislation necessary to carry out the provisions of the Treaty by the Imperial Parliament and the Colonial Legislatures on the one hand, and the Government of the United States upon the other; and, if that legislation do not take place, I apprehend that without doubt the provisional use will fall to the ground.

INDIA—MISSION FROM TALIFOO.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State has received any communication from the Government of India respecting a mission which is reported to have been sent from Talifoo; and, whether any arrangements have been made for the reception of such mission?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to my right hon. Friend, I have to say that we did receive such a communication, and that the arrangements proper under the circumstances have been made.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (METRIC SYSTEM) ACT (1864).

QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he intends to bring forward any measure to relieve persons who, acting under an Act of Parliament passed in 1864, which declared "it is expedient to legalize the use of the Metric system of Weights and Measures," make use of the same, but who, according to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, are liable to be prosecuted if such weights and measures are found in their possession; and, whether he intends during the present Session to bring in a general measure for the regulation of weights and measures?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Question was to a certain extent founded upon a misconception of the Act to which it made reference, for, while the Preamble of the Act declared that it was expedient to legalize the use of the metric system of weights and measures, the enacting part only legalized contracts made in metric terms. The Standards Commission had, however, recommended the permissive legalization of the metric system, and he might say that any Bill he might bring in on the subject of weights and measures would endeavour to carry that suggestion into effect. He did not see, however, any prospect of introducing such a Bill during the present year.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

IRELAND — GALWAY ELECTION PETITION — MR. JUSTICE KEOGH'S JUDGMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. P. SMYTH asked the Chief Secretary of State for Ireland, When theorthand writers' notes of the evidence taken at the trial of the Galway Election Petition and of the judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh will be in the hands of Members?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that as the subject was one which did not officially come within his control, he had no power whatever over the time when the notes of the evidence taken at the trial of the Galway Election Petition and the Judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh would be in the hands of Members. He had, however, made inquiry of the printer, and he was informed that the Judgment would probably be printed and ready for distribution on Thursday next; but that the notes of evidence, which were extremely voluminous, might not be ready for three weeks or a month.

MR. O'CONOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the late decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, which introduces into Parliamentary Election Law the principle that a candidate at a contested Election may obtain a seat without having polled a majority of votes in a constituency; whether the introduction of such a principle was not disapproved by the Government and rejected by the House when proposed in a modified form by the hon. Baronet the Member for Reading on the 25th April last; and, what steps the Government are prepared to take to give effect to the wishes of the House, as expressed on that occasion?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my attention has certainly been called, in common with that of most hon. Members of the House, to the late decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland. I am very sensible of the great importance and even the urgent character of some of the considerations involved in that judgment; but I do not see that any advantage would arise—and I hope my hon. Friend will be inclined to agree with me—from any fragmentary announcement with respect to a matter of so much importance. I think we should approach the question as a whole,

MR. O'CONOR asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been drawn to the judgment lately delivered by Mr. Justice Lawson, in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, in which that learned judge is reported to have stated that the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868 required amendment; if so, whether he still proposes to re-enact and make permanent that Act in a single Clause of the Corrupt Practices Bill, which by its form precludes the possibility of any amendment to it being placed on the Paper?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he had nothing to add to the intimation which had been given the other evening on this subject by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, in answer to his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen).

IRELAND—GALWAY ELECTION PETITION—OUTRAGES ON MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.—QUESTIONS

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether any and what steps have been taken at the instance of the Lord Chancellor, or the Government of Ireland, in vindication of the dignity of the judicial Bench, on account of the outrages to which it has been subjected in the person of Mr. Justice Keogh for his recent judgment in support of freedom of election?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have had no communication from the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Mr. Justice Keogh, or any one connected with the Government of Ireland on the subject, and I apprehend possibly that those who are interested in it will look to the circulation of the Judgment and Evidence in the Galway Petition Case among the Members of this House as the proper time for entering upon the question.

Afterwards—

COLONEL STUART KNOX, in reference to the answer just given by the Prime Minister to the Question of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), said he desired to learn, Whether the Government of this country were not interested in the treatment accorded to the Judges in Ireland, and whether they viewed with indifference such conduct as burning them in effigy and otherwise insulting them? He should be glad to know to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred as "those who are interested in it," and whether an opportunity would be afforded to the House of discussing the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in saying what I did upon the subject, I referred to the natural interest which my right hon. Friend behind me, and other hon. Members, no doubt, take in a subject of so much importance. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite would scarcely suppose I am to proceed upon the assumption that it is the business of the Cabinet to punish persons who burn Judges in effigy. For such offences I believe the ordinary process of law will be found sufficient.

COLONEL STUART KNOX: Will the right hon. Gentleman direct that process of law to be put into force?

MR. GLADSTONE: I understand that has already been done without any directions being necessary, and that the persons who took the liberty of burning a Judge in effigy have been proceeded against according to law.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON. TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION (GENEVA). PROCEEDINGS AT GENEVA.

QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE: I wish, Sir, to ask my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, Whether the statement contained in the telegrams from Geneva is correct, that the arguments under the Treaty of Washington have been put in by both Powers before the Court of Arbitration?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I may, perhaps, be allowed to ask another, of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to know, Whether, under the circumstances detailed in Mr. Fish's telegram to General Schenck of June 9, and Earl Granville's reply of June 10, the application for an adjournment of the Geneva Arbitration can with propriety be entertained by the Arbitrators without the assent and under protest of the United States Government? I ask this Question because there is a passage in Mr. Fish's telegram which I think is important, and which seems not to be easily reconciled with the statement made by Earl Granville.

Mr. Fish, in his telegram of the 9th of June, says—

“In my despatch of June 2, I said that, in the opinion of this Government, the Arbitrators have the power to adjourn either on their own motion or on that of either party, and that if the arguments be put in on both sides on 15th and Great Britain moves for an adjournment we will assent.”

Earl Granville, in his letter to General Schenck next day, says—

“In the meantime, the High Contracting Parties not being in accord as to the subject matter of the reference to arbitration, Her Majesty’s Government regret to find themselves unable to deliver the written Argument which their Agent is directed to put in under the Vth Article of the Treaty (although that Argument has been duly prepared, and is in the hands of their Agent), or to take any other step, at the present time, in the intended arbitration.”

It being doubtful whether the United States Government, under the circumstances, will or will not assent, I wish to know whether any motions of this kind can with propriety be made?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will first answer my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bouverie) with reference to the latest information which we have from Geneva. It is not a correct statement which he has referred to in the newspapers of this morning, that the two Summaries of Argument have been lodged before the Arbitrators, so far as the British Summary is concerned. With respect to the Question of the noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil), I may say that he is quite right in the reference which he has made to the telegram of Mr. Fish, dated the 9th of June, and also with regard to the reply of Lord Granville of the 10th. That reply does not give textually and verbally the effect of the proceedings at Geneva; but it is perfectly correct with reference to the point to which the noble Lord has referred—namely, the delivery or non-delivery of the written Argument. I have already stated that the written Argument has not been delivered by the British Agent; and I understand the Question of the noble Lord to be this—Whether it would have been possible for us to make a request for an adjournment without the delivery of the written Argument in full view of the declaration of Mr. Fish of the 9th of June, to the effect that the Arbitrators had power to adjourn on their own motion, or on that of either party; and also to the effect that if the Arguments on both sides were put in by the 15th, and Great Britain should move for an adjournment, then the American Government would assent. Undoubtedly, under that declaration of Mr. Fish we had no power whatever to hold the United States Government bound to assent to the motion for adjournment. But although the declaration of Mr. Fish stated that the United States Government would assent to the motion for an adjournment if the Arguments were put in, it did not state the converse—namely, that if the Arguments were not put in, they would not assent to a motion for adjournment. The application for adjournment was made by the British Government, in conformity with the announcement in the Papers in the hands of hon. Members on Saturday. The proceedings of the Arbitrators are secret, and it would not be consistent with our duty or respect to them to refer to that which they have not disclosed; nor, may I add, would it be consistent with duty, or with that sentiment of gratitude which we are all bound to feel towards Gentlemen who have undertaken labours of so important and delicate a character on behalf of the two countries. I may, however, say that we are given to understand that probably the Arbitrators may again adjourn from their meeting to-day for the period of twenty-four hours.

MR. BOUVERIE: I rise to ask another Question. The right hon. Gentleman having stated—when the Papers were laid before the House—that the Government would be anxious that the opinion of the House should be expressed in a discussion, I wish to know, Whether the Government propose to lay further Papers on the Table, and to ask the judgment of the House on the Papers submitted to it?

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend has referred to a declaration which he says I made; but I am not conscious of having made any declaration with reference to the Correspondence. That an opportunity will be given to hon. Members to express any opinion they may entertain is obvious from the presentation of the Papers; but I certainly have not made any such statement on the part of the Government. I do not know that any such statement would be necessary at any time; and, undoubtedly, it would be premature in the present circumstances of the case.

Lord Eustace Cecil

SUPPLY — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £37,255, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for Law Charges, and for the Salaries, Allowances, and Incidental Expenses, including Prosecutions relating to Coin, in the Department of the Solicitor for the Affairs of Her Majesty's Treasury."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in replying to several objections made the other evening against the expense incurred in the Mint prosecutions and against the counsel appointed to prosecute, said, that he must object to the statement made on that occasion, that the men employed were young and inexperienced hands, for, on the contrary, it appeared from a Return which he had had made, that the average standing of the counsel appointed to conduct those prosecutions was over seven years. Out of 60 or 70 members of the Bar appointed there was only one member of less than four years' standing, and in many cases the appointments were given to gentlemen who had been at the Bar 10, 12, or 14 years. According to the statement of the Solicitor to the Treasury, there was now no instance of two counsel being employed except in the case of the County Palatine and the Central Criminal Court. The whole matter had been under the careful consideration of the Government, and his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Wheelhouse) was perfectly welcome to see the confidential Report of the Solicitor to the Treasury with respect to it. The recommendations in that document were to the effect that, although it would not be right to take away those appointments from the gentlemen by whom they were at present held, no vacancies should be filled up, and that there should be only one counsel employed for the future. In the case of the Post Office, in which hitherto it had been usual to employ two counsel, he (the Attorney General), in conjunction with the Postmaster General, had agreed that there should henceforward, so far as depended on them, be only one counsel, and that no vacancies should be filled up. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wheelhouse) had referred to the scale of fees; but it was, he thought, scarcely worth while that the time of the House of Commons should be taken up in discussing so miserable a matter as the difference between two and three guineas given in that way. Seeing that the average cost of the prosecutions for the Mint was only £12 he could not think that the expenditure was excessive. The whole question of Government prosecutions was, of course, a very serious one. It had been the subject of very elaborate Reports, both on the part of the present and former Solicitors to the Treasury, and was under the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So far as he could judge from the evidence before him, the appointment of regular counsel and the maintenance of a regular staff in the case of the Post Office and the Mint had resulted in making the prosecutions only slightly more expensive than others; while with respect to the number of convictions the results had been very satisfactory, showing that the cases had been very well got up. That being so, it would, in his opinion, be unwise to get rid of the present system.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he still contended that those appointments were given to gentlemen whose standing at the Bar did not entitle them to be placed over the heads of others. He did not complain that they should be given to men after seven or ten years' standing, but that young men of four years' standing, even though they might have a large Assize or Sessions practice, should have conferred on them, to the exclusion of their seniors at the Bar, the privilege of prosecuting briefs of the Mint and the Post Office. The matter involved one of those small economies which it was just as well to look after, and he could see no reason why three guineas should be paid for services the ordinary charge for which was one guinea. It was said that the Mint and Post Office prosecutions were generally successful; but then, seeing that the depositions were taken in the first instance, and then sent up to town, and that they were only proceeded upon when there was a strong case, it was scarcely to be wondered at that the percentage of convictions was large; in all other cases the prosecutions were abandoned. These matters might be miserable; but hon. Members who had been returned to look after the interests of their constituents ought to be careful not to pay too much regard to the adage—"De minimis non curat lex."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that if for nothing else, he thought it must be quite clear that the Committee was greatly indebted to the hon. Gentleman who first brought this subject forward for extracting the declaration from the Attorney General, that the Government had the subject under their consideration.

MR. WHARTON expressed a hope that these prosecutions would continue to be conducted by the same able gentlemen who had been in the habit hitherto of conducting them, and that proper fees would be paid for the transaction of the business.

MR. WEST said, he was of opinion that the conduct of these prosecutions ought not to be in the hands of the Government, but that they ought rather to fall into the common routine of ordinary prosecutions. The expenses in connection with these prosecutions were very great, and it was for the Government to show that they were more efficiently conducted than other prosecutions throughout the country. He should therefore move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £2,500, the expenses connected with the prosecutions relating to coin.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £34,755, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for Law Charges, and for the Salaries, Allowances, and Incidental Expenses, including Prosecutions relating to Coin, in the Department of the Solicitor for the Affairs of Her Majesty's Treasury."—(Mr. West.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the greater expense of the Mint prosecutions was caused by the fact that they were efficiently conducted, and it was important in the interests of the poorer classes that the Government should have the charge of prosecutions instituted for the purpose of keeping the coin of the Realm pure. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Wheelhouse) spoke of a number of cases which were not prosecuted at all. Well, no doubt in those cases, according to the opinion of his hon. and learned Friend, the Solicitor to the Treasury had exercised a very wise discretion.

Mr. Wheelhouse

MR. WEST, on the contrary, said, he thought the learned Gentleman had exercised a very unwise discretion in overruling the decisions of the magistrates.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must submit that if those cases had been in the hands of private individuals, the public would have had to pay the expense of prosecuting them in addition to those already charged.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £150,623, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, &c.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he had to complain of the capricious manner in which the expenses of prosecutions that had been allowed by the magistrate were cut down by the Treasury, and to express a hope that, unless legislation took place that Session on the whole subject, some clear explanation would be issued, for the guidance of the magistrates, of the principles on which the Treasury acted in the matter. The subject of complaint was the more remarkable, and the more to be regretted, as a scale of fees had been agreed upon by the magistrates, and was understood to have received the assent of the Secretary of State. In reference to that, the magistrates did not dispute the right of the Treasury to revise the fees and costs of prosecutions; deductions, however, should not be made haphazard, but on some understood principle. He knew of an instance in which the whole cost of prosecution had been disallowed, and on the ground that the name of the prisoner was not in the calendar, the reason being that he had been on bail. That was an illustration of the insufficient knowledge that was but too frequently to be observed in the officers of the Treasury, whose duty it was to certify the costs of prosecutions.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN, in confirmation of the remarks of his hon. Friend, said, that the greatest inconvenience was occasioned to the magistrates in the county he represented (Lancashire) by the system of deductions made by the Treasury, so much so that they had been driven to the necessity of communicating with the Treasury on the subject.

MR. BAXTER said, it was admitted on all hands that the present practice with regard to the costs of criminal prosecutions was not only not satisfactory, but had been very generally distasteful all over the country. On Wednesday next the Home Secretary would lay before the House the views of the Government on the subject in the shape of Amendments to the Public Prosecutors Bill; but the Government would not pledge themselves to make any alteration before that discussion decided the fate of the Bill.

MR. HUNT said, he thought that the Government were adopting a somewhat unusual course in tacking Amendments on to a Bill that was in the hands of a private Member, who might, if he chose, decline at any moment to proceed with it. It rested with them to say whether that Bill should proceed or not. The Government ought to take charge of the Bill and be responsible for its conduct. At present the right hon. Gentleman merely proposed Amendments to the Bill, which met with considerable opposition in the House.

MR. BRUCE said, that the Amendments proposed by the Government had been put down on the Paper after full communication with the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill; and he believed that, on the whole, they met with his approbation, and that they would remove many of the objections to the Bill, especially with regard to the amount and uncertainty of charges. There was reasonable ground for hoping, therefore, that the Bill would pass through Committee on Wednesday.

MR. WHARTON said, he would suggest that the Vote should be postponed till the Public Prosecutors Bill came before the House, because that measure might be the means of introducing many material Amendments.

MR. BAXTER explained that if any such Amendments were made the money asked for would not be expended.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £131,799, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Court of Chancery in England as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."

MR. WEST said, he was of opinion that the number as well as the salaries of the officers attendant upon the Lord Chancellor should be reduced. The Lord Chancellor's first secretary received £1,200 per annum, his second secretary £400 per annum, his third secretary £400 per annum, his gentleman of the Chamber £500 per annum, and his pursebearer £500 per annum. He thought that these officers were unnecessarily numerous, that their salaries were by far too large, and though not familiar with the mysteries of the office, he thought that the Lord Chancellor's secretary should be content with the same amount as that given to the secretary of the Prime Minister, and the more so, seeing that he and his colleagues were constantly being promoted to high and lucrative offices in the State. The Lords Justices' clerk had only £500 a-year, the Premier's two secretaries £600 between them; and the Speaker's £500 a-year. As to the embroideress, the sum was paltry; but if they got rid of her they might get rid of the pursebearer too, although the latter deserved a salary if it were really earned, and if there were any work for him to do. Another curious item in the Estimates, which was increasing year by year, was the travelling expenses of the Masters in Lunacy. They were gentlemen advanced in years, who were much respected, and to ask them to spend £1,200 a-year in travelling was simply inhuman. This was, in any view, a large sum, and ought to be reduced. He would accordingly move the reduction of the Vote by £3,470—namely, £2,400 on the salaries of the Lord Chancellor's officers, £1,000 on the travelling expenses of the Masters in Lunacy, and £70 for the Lord Chancellor's purse.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £128,329, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Court of Chancery in England as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."—(Mr. West.)

MR. BAXTER said, he must confess that, without some explanation, the Committee might fairly demur to passing the Vote. As for the Lord Chancellor's secretary, it must be admitted that important duties devolved upon him, as intimately associated with the highest legal, judicial, and political position. All these salaries had been taken over by Act of Parliament some years ago, when they were transferred from the Suitor's Court, with the distinct understanding that the gentlemen then holding the offices should hold them for life. It was a principle on which that House was very slow to act to reduce salaries when they were transferred from one fund to another. Power had been taken by section 14 that when certain vacancies occurred the Treasury was to determine whether they should be filled up or whether the salaries were to be continued at their old figure, and that power would be exercised at the earliest possible opportunity. The same thing held good with respect to the travelling expenses of the Masters in Lunacy. As to the embroideress of the Lord Chancellor's purse, Lord Hatherley, on being communicated with some time ago, replied that the purse, being exhibited on State occasions and on the Woolsack at the sittings of the House of Lords, it was necessary that it should have a respectable appearance, adding that the lady employed was upwards of 70 years of age, and that she had received £64 7s. for the work. The Treasury thereupon expressed a desire to be consulted, on her death, before any new arrangement was made.

MR. HUNT said, with reference to the recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee last year, that the Treasury should obtain the control of the salaries in the Court of Chancery, he had expected from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement that the Lord Chancellor, whose consent was necessary, would be likely to co-operate, and that action would be taken to carry out the recommendation. At the beginning of this Session, however, the right hon. Gentleman, when questioned by him (Mr. Hunt), spoke of difficulties which would prevent anything being done at present. Now, difficulties were sure to be raised to the transfer of control from lawyers to the Treasury; and, presuming that they consisted in obtaining the consent of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Colleagues, he would advise Parliament next year, unless the Government initiated legislation in the matter, to make a considerable reduction in the Vote, so as to bring those gentlemen to their senses.

MR. BAXTER said, in reply to the hon. Gentleman, that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not lost sight of the recommendations of the Select Committee, for the legal officials of the Treasury had been deputed by his right hon. Friend to make a thorough inquiry, and in a few days their Report would be presented, when it would be the duty of the Government to deal with the matter. It was not intended that things should remain as at present.

Mr. Baxter

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. West) for breaking fresh ground in the interests of economy, for he (Mr. Lusk) was satisfied that the money paid for law charges was too much. The embroidery of the purse showed how even in small matters things went. He wished to understand the nature of the Petty Bag Office, and he felt convinced that the Masters in Lunacy did not require travelling expenses to the extent of £1,200 a-year each.

MR. HERMON said, he hoped there would not, as last year, be a Supplementary Vote of £14,000 on this head. He was glad to find that the 316 persons included in the Vote had mostly reached their maximum salaries, so that the increase could not exceed £5,074 per annum.

MR. BAXTER explained that the Supplementary Vote of 1871 had been rendered necessary by the changes effected in the dates of payment.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he did not think the officers of the Court of Chancery generally were too highly paid. The registrars had most important duties to perform, and the principal secretary to the Lord Chancellor had no sinecure; but he would admit that some of the other salaries of the secretaries might be reduced. With respect to Masters in Lunacy, he supposed that the charges for their travelling expenses were not made when they were not incurred, and that the charge was not allowed without the production of proper vouchers.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he should like to know whether the charge for travelling expenses would be made the subject of inquiry? He did not think it would be fair to sweep away all these offices of ancient date at once.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the 19th section of the Act made it imperative on the House not to alter these salaries and expenses. But the Government were so much struck with the enormity of these charges that they were now conducting a correspondence on the subject with a view to their reduction.

MR. DICKINSON said, whatever might be the fact, he did not think that any Act of Parliament justified an addition to the salaries of the Masters in Lunacy. He, therefore, thought the best course would be to strike off a lump sum from the Estimate until the Government could see their way to some reductions.

MR. WEST said, the Secretary of the Treasury was under a misapprehension in supposing that the Committee could not reduce the salary of the secretary to the Lord Chancellor because three years ago that salary was guaranteed to the secretary. The fact was, that the secretary of the Lord Chancellor had been changed many times, and was removable any day. He quite agreed with what had been said with reference to officers for life, and would not press that matter further. In fact, he had limited his proposition to a reduction of the salaries of the officers of the Lord Chancellor. The answer given about the Masters in Lunacy was unsatisfactory. Their scale of charges was probably the same as at the time when a Master in Lunacy travelled with four post horses from London to Carlisle, and returned to London with four post horses; and, surely, the amount charged then was far in excess of their actual travelling expenses now.

MR. RYLANDS said, he wished to know whether the hon. Member intended to take a division on any particular items, or whether it would not be desirable to propose the reduction of a moderate lump sum. He should like to know what the Treasury were disposed to do in that case? Many of the offices which had been referred to were sinecure offices. If they were life appointments they could not be got rid of without compensation on their abolition. If the holders were entitled to their full salary it would be better to let these officials disappear from the Votes, even if they should appear on the pension list.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought the charge for the Lord Chancellor's private secretaries was excessive, and hoped his hon. and learned Friend would follow the advice given by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt), and take the division on the Vote to cut off a lump sum.

MR. DILLWYN said, he should vote with his hon. and learned Friend whether the division was taken on a lump sum, or on some special item. There were 316 officials employed in the Court of Chancery, and though he knew nothing about the requirements of the Court, he could not for a moment suppose that such an army of retainers would be necessary.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had listened with some surprise to the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, who admitted that he knew nothing whatever about the matter, and yet assumed that the 316 officials who were employed could not be wanted. The hon. Member had not the least idea of the nature of the duties they were called upon to perform, and seemed to consider the number employed a sufficient ground for reducing their salaries by a lump sum, but he altogether differed with the hon. Gentleman in that view of the matter. It was said, first, that the Lord Chancellor's secretary held a sinecure; and, secondly, that he was overpaid. But the Committee did not want "the secondly" if the first were true, because any man would be overpaid by receiving any salary for a sinecure office. The fact was, however, the office was no sinecure, and the holder had very important duties to perform. The salary paid to the private secretary of the Prime Minister had been compared with that of the secretary to the Lord Chancellor. But that was a mistake, for the private secretary to the Prime Minister, in addition to that office, held a very important office in the Treasury, and also an office at Court, the duties of both of which he was bound to discharge, and for all of which he was paid. Therefore, if the Committee wanted to know what the country paid to the private secretary of the Prime Minister, they must add up all the sums which that gentleman received, and not take simply his salary of £300 a-year as private secretary. Gentlemen in the House of Commons considered £1,200 a-year for the salary of the Lord Chancellor's secretary as something very extravagant; but the Lord Chancellor could not be a bad judge of the amount required to secure a fit man for the office. A gentleman from the Bar was taken for the office, who was expected to be so highly qualified that it was usual, after a certain period of service, to appoint him to a judicial position, and he had to assist the Lord Chancellor in judicial and quasi-judicial matters. He did not think the salary in any degree too large, or that a competent man could be obtained for a less sum.

MR. WEST said, he would endeavour to meet the wishes of the Committee by taking the Vote on a lump sum. He therefore would move to reduce the Vote by £2,000.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £129,799, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Court of Chancery in England as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."—(Mr. West.)

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the suggestion made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) had been misunderstood. What his right hon. Friend had suggested was, that if the Government would undertake to legislate on the whole subject at an early date under the cognizance of the Treasury, it would be better not to divide now. He understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was prepared to give a pledge to that effect; and therefore, although he thought that some alteration should be effected in the Vote, yet as it might cause hardship to some innocent persons, he should not be disposed to vote for the Amendment.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that although he agreed to a certain extent with some of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, he yet thought it essential to go to a division. The Vote for the Court of Chancery was the scandal of the Estimates, and it was a scandal which ought to be abated.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the case had been put a little too widely, and he must remind the Committee that, with regard to a great many of the salaries in the Court of Chancery, the faith of Parliament was pledged. The whole Vote was not, therefore, available for reduction, and the Committee must judge for itself what salaries were open to its jurisdiction. As far as the Treasury were concerned, he should be happy to give a pledge; but many of the judicial salaries were by statute in the patronage of the Judges, who had the power of resisting effectually any reduction suggested by the Treasury. Therefore, the mere interference of the Treasury would not effect what was desired, and the Committee must consider what effect might be produced on the minds of the Judges by any vote which it might give. If he led the Committee to suppose that the Treasury could reduce those salaries, he should be simply misleading them.

The Solicitor General

MR. MUNTZ said, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had quite convinced him of the necessity of dividing, because it was evident that the Government were not in a position to pledge themselves on the subject.

MR. HUNT said, an inquiry had taken place into the subject of the salaries of the Court of Chancery, and that inquiry would result in a Report. Would the right hon. Gentleman, when that Report was completed, undertake to lay it upon the Table of the House? If so, the House would be in possession of all the information which was at the disposal of the Treasury; and then the House would be very likely to give an expression of opinion which would greatly strengthen the hands of the Treasury.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as he had not seen the Report, he could make no promise on the subject.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 62; Noes 89: Majority 27.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £46,616, to complete the sum for the Common Law Courts.

(5.) £29,318, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £324,954, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the County Courts."

MR. WEST, in moving the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £9,160, on account of the travelling expenses of the County Court Judges, said, the Government had promised three years ago to look into the subject; but he found that, notwithstanding that promise, the item for these expenses had been increased. The gentlemen who filled the office of County Court Judges were gentlemen of the highest position, receiving £1,500 and £1,800 a-year each, and the amount they received for travelling expenses raised their salaries on an average by more than £200 a-year. On the Whitehaven Circuit, for instance, the Judge, who only sat for 128 days in the year, received £450 a-year for travelling expenses; and on the Salford Circuit the Judge, who had only to go to Bacup, Oldham, Rochdale, and Saddleworth—and only to those places on 45 days in the year—received £500 for travelling expenses, or over £10 a-day; while, as a matter of fact, a first-class return ticket from Salford to Oldham could be purchased for 1s. 6d. Then, again, on the Liverpool Circuit there were two Judges, and they had only to go to Ormskirk and St. Helen's, neither of which places was more than a 25 minutes' railway journey from Liverpool. To those towns they went on 44 days in the year, and yet one of the Judges for his half share of the work received £220 for his 22 days' travelling. Another gentleman sat 79 days; he had not a yard to travel, and yet he was paid £150 for travelling expenses, and that was a recent appointment; whilst the gentleman who had to travel from Brompton to Brentford 15 times only received £50. Another gentleman, who had to make 16 journeys, received from £50 to £60 for travelling expenses. His proposition was to equalize these charges. He would give those who travelled £100 a-year each extra, and those who did not travel would be paid no travelling expenses; and he should, therefore, take the sense of the Committee upon the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £315,794, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Salaries and Expenses of the County Courts."—(Mr. West.)

MR. JAMES said, he was unable to appreciate the self-sacrificing spirit of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had brought the subject forward, seeing that he had received so many distinguished marks of favour, that he should now turn his hand against his brethren. He had no doubt it must have grieved the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich to make the Motion, especially as he had told them that he was living on terms of friendship with many of these learned Judges; but it would have been much better if his hon. and learned Friend had made some personal inquiry of those gentlemen before taking taking them en bloc, for the way in which he had treated those gentlemen was scarcely the way one would have thought he would have treated his official brethren. It showed that he probably wished to chasten those he loved, and punish them for their unanimity of feeling with himself. A greater injustice than that the Judges who travelled should all be paid an equal sum could scarcely be conceived. Mr. Ingham, on the Whitehaven Circuit, was paid £450 travelling expenses; he attended 15 Courts, travelled 5,000 miles a-year, and he was occupied 128 days; and yet his hon. and learned Friend proposed that he should have no more allowed than the gentleman who travelled from Brompton to Brentford 15 times a-year. The same objections applied to Liverpool, Manchester, and other places where the Judges did not reside on their circuits. He would contend it was to the advantage of a County Court Circuit that the Judge should not reside on it, because he went to discharge his duties without any political or private bias, or from any particular acquaintances or friendship with those who practised before him. It was, moreover, a most inequitable proposition to put these gentlemen on the footing proposed; for every day heavier and more important duties were being put upon these gentlemen, and it would be false economy to cut down their remuneration. Without they were treated liberally men of ability would not undertake the discharge of the duties.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that whatever argument might be drawn from the insufficiency of the pay of the County Court Judges, all that the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich complained of was that travelling expenses were allowed where they were not incurred. He (Mr. Neville-Grenville) therefore trusted that the Committee would not allow their attention to be withdrawn from the real proposal before them, but would make progress when they had the opportunity in the way of a reduction of expenditure.

MR. BAXTER said, it would be quite out of place for him to enter upon the general question at the present time, seeing that the Vote, as a whole, would have to be reconsidered when the Commission appointed to inquire into matters of this kind made its Report. He thought it would be improper to make a fixed allowance to Judges for their travelling expenses; because if such a course were adopted, some Judges whose travelling expenses were very small would be large gainers by the transaction; whereas others whose circuits were very extensive would be equally large losers. The Committee, moreover, must bear in mind that in that sum was included subsistence allowance when the Judge was away on circuit from his home. Since the pledge given in 1870 there had been a careful investigation into every new case that had come before the Treasury, and the question of travelling expenses had been carefully looked into and placed on a more equitable basis. He found that the arrangement for the travelling expenses in Cumberland was made in 1858, for Liverpool in 1862; and at Manchester the amount was fixed in 1869, and the Government had not gone back and altered what was done so many years ago. In the case of the County Court Judge of Salford, which was the only one of those referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich, for which the present Government were responsible, the travelling expenses had been reduced from £500 to £100, a sum that could scarcely be regarded as excessive.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he must repeat the question he had put to the Government during the discussion upon the last two Votes—namely, whether Her Majesty's Government considered that County Court Judges had a vested interest in the sum annually allowed them for travelling expenses, or whether those expenses were liable to revision during the time those offices were held by the present Judges?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government did not pretend for one moment to countenance the assumption that County Court Judges had any vested interest in their travelling expenses; but, at the same time, he could not approve the proposal for giving Judges a fixed sum all round for travelling expenses. All that the Judges and the public had to do in the matter of travelling expenses and maintenance was, that the Judges should be fairly indemnified in those respects.

MR. R. SHAW, in expressing his objection to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich, said, that he was informed by Mr. Ingham, the Judge of the Whitehaven County Court, that he had to travel 5,000 miles annually on his circuit, and that every 6*d.* of the £450 allowed him for his travelling expenses was actually expended for that purpose. The 15*s.* a-day allowed Judges for hotel expenses obviously did not cover what they had to pay.

MR. WEST said, he was quite satisfied with the result of the discussion and the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had been quite prepared for the personal attacks made upon him, and should persist in his attempt to cut down legal expenses, none of his figures having been controverted. He wished to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, it had been shown that sums of £3 and even £10 a-day had been made for these travelling expenses. These charges ought to be exposed, and he therefore thanked the hon. and learned Member on having preferred the interests of the public to those of his own profession. He was prepared to contend that if each County Court Judge received £100 a-year for travelling expenses, that would be ample remuneration.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY called attention to the late hour sittings of County Court Judges and Recorders, which he hoped the Lord Chancellor would put a check to. He thought they ought to be restricted from sitting later than 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(7.) £68,460, to complete the sum for the Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Courts.

(8.) £9,938, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court of Registry.

Mr. Neville-Grenville

(9.) £3,830, to complete the sum for the Land Registry.

MR. BOWRING called attention to the fact that, whilst the salaries and expenses of this office—which more than any other ought to be self-supporting—amounted to £5,330, its receipts were only £650, and he saw little prospect of any change in this respect. He would ask the Solicitor General if he could hold out any hope of an improvement in the case of this office, from which so much was at one time expected?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was sorry to state that the office had proved a very great failure, and that the salaries were paid for next to nothing; but it would be impossible to abolish the office without giving compensation to the officers to an extent which would be little less than their salaries; and it was hoped that within another year there would be established an effective Land Registry Office, in which their services would become valuable to the public.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £10,117, to complete the sum for the Police Courts (London and Sheerness).

MR. WHEELHOUSE expressed a hope that something would be done to make these Courts convenient to the suitors. At present their state was disgraceful.

MR. BAXTER said, he would make known in the proper quarter the representation of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) £168,234, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

MR. BOWRING said, he must call the attention of the Home Secretary to the strain which was put on the Registrar of Habitual Criminals. That gentleman, he said, was extremely overworked. He had never had more than one or two days' vacation in a year, and he was now very ill through overwork; and, moreover, he thought the time had come when he might be made a permanent servant of the Crown, instead of being temporary, as at present.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished the Home Secretary would state how the superannuation fund of the metropolitan police was managed. When would the measure which had been promised on the subject be introduced?

They were a class of public servants which should not be forgotten.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he thought it was desirable that the City police and the metropolitan police should receive the same pay; because in consequence of the difference between the pay of the City police and that of the metropolitan police the men were constantly moving from one force to the other.

MR. BRUCE said, the Habitual Criminals Registry was established only two years ago as an experiment, and had proved exceedingly useful, and he thought that it would every year become more and more useful. While it was merely an experiment it would not have been judicious to appoint a permanent officer; but he would see whether a more permanent character could now be given to the department. He could bear testimony to the excellent manner in which the Registrar had performed his duties, and was exceedingly sorry to hear that his health had suffered so much from his assiduity; and he would see whether something could not be done to lessen the pressure of the duties. As to the superannuation fund of the metropolitan police, it was in a much more satisfactory condition than that of the City police. He fully admitted the necessity of dealing with the question of superannuation by a Bill; but his hon. Friend (Mr. Alderman Lusk) must admit that the Government had introduced a sufficient number of measures. As to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Wheelhouse), he believed the metropolitan police was never more popular than now, if he might judge from the small number of resignations and the large number of applications for admission into that force. He presumed that the difference between the two forces was this—The City was very full in the daytime, but at night it was very much deserted; enormous treasures were collected there, and the portion of the municipal police who were engaged during a part of the night as watchmen was larger than that portion of the metropolitan force who were engaged in similar work. He had nothing to do with the management of the City police; it now worked in perfect harmony with the metropolitan police, and he did not think it was his duty to take any steps towards equalizing the rate of payment of the two forces.

MR. RYLANDS said, he hoped he was not right in thinking that his right hon. Friend had said it was his intention to place the police of the counties and boroughs generally on the same footing with regard to superannuation as the metropolitan police.

MR. BRUCE explained that what he had said was—"on a more satisfactory footing than they were at present."

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £289,500, to complete the sum for the County and Borough Police (Great Britain).

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he wished to express his satisfaction that there had been some decrease in this Vote, especially in the victualling department, for there was a strong opinion out-of-doors that the diet of convict prisoners was very much better than it ought to be—better than that of the poor or lunatics, for example.

MR. BRUCE said, that Colonel Henderson, when at the head of the convict establishments, effected a reduction of £30,000 a-year, and Captain Du Cane also had greatly reduced the expenses. But it should be remembered that our three chief convict establishments—Chatham, Portsmouth, and Portland—more than paid their own expenses through the labour exacted from the men. It would be impossible, however, for men to work unless they were treated tolerably well.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £336,895, to complete the sum for the Convict Establishments (England and Colonies).

(14.) £252,220, to complete the sum for the County and Borough Prisons, &c.

(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,045, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, England."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in moving to reduce the Vote by £15,545, said, that the expenditure at the Broadmoor establishment was absolutely excessive, and when compared with that at other similar asylums was positively enormous. Till 1849 criminal lunatics were either sent to prison or to county asylums.

In that year the Irish Government agreed to the establishment of a separate asylum to which persons acquitted of crime on the ground of insanity might be sent. That was the origin of Dundrum Asylum, which had been conducted with the greatest benefit to the country and also with the utmost economy. The whole Vote for it was only £5,573; whereas that for Broadmoor, including repairs, amounted to £32,000. The latter contained 471 patients, at an average cost of £60 each; whereas Dundrum, with 167 patients, figured for only £33 each. In the former the charge for diet was £16 5s. per head; in the latter it was only £13 6s. Broadmoor had 125 male and female attendants, or one to every 3½ lunatics, Dundrum having only 22 attendants, or one to every 7½. The Superintendents of these two asylums were paid respectively £900 and £400 a-year each. The chaplain at Broadmoor had £400, and £18 18s. for a substitute when he took a holiday, and there was a Roman Catholic chaplain, who received £50; whereas only £100 was allowed for the religious services at Dundrum—a Protestant chaplain at £40, and a Roman Catholic one at £60. There was a steward at Broadmoor with £290, while a similar officer at Dundrum had only £45, and the chief attendants at each received £150 and £40 respectively. At the larger establishment there were four clerks, with salaries amounting to £565; at the smaller there was only one, with a salary of £80. The fact was, that the attendants at Dundrum were disgracefully underpaid. The Report of the Commissioners of Lunacy of October, 1868, clearly showed that Broadmoor was not successful while Dundrum was. The Commissioners pointed out that at the former place there were not those amusements which were suitable to the condition of the patients, and that some were isolated in separate cells for many months together. The Report, in fact, showed that the large expenditure in Broadmoor was one of which the country had no reason to be proud. On the contrary, the asylum at Dundrum was shown to be efficient beyond all precedent in the history of lunatic asylums. Broadmoor, he might add, would never be efficiently conducted so long as it was under its present management—that of the Directors of Convict Prisons. It ought to be placed under the Lunacy Commissioners, who would visit it unexpectedly and frequently in the year, instead of only once, and whose recommendations should have some authority with the Secretary of State. In England criminal lunatics were treated as prisoners; whereas in Ireland they were treated as patients, and the result was in the latter case efficiency, and in the former the reverse. A considerable improvement, it was but fair to add, had of late, he believed, been made at Broadmoor; but in the last Report of the Commissioners they stated that, although the mortality there was small, the health of the establishment was not satisfactory, chiefly because fever, which had existed there for some years, continued to prevail. He would impress upon the Committee that, if these insane persons were treated as criminals, their affliction would be greatly aggravated. At Broadmoor some of the patients were, until quite recently, kept almost like wild animals, while at Dundrum every endeavour was made to soothe their temper. He was aware that some years ago the Superintendent of Broadmoor Asylum received a fatal injury; but that was an accident to which all persons attending upon the insane were liable. He moved to reduce the Vote for the Lunatic Asylum at Broadmoor by £15,545—namely, from £29,545 to £14,000, being an amount calculated on the same scale as Dundrum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £8,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, England.”—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

MR. BRUCE said, he was glad that the hon. Member had brought this subject forward that night, because when the same statements were made some six weeks ago, without Notice, he was not then prepared to answer them. He would now, as shortly as possible, traverse every statement made by the hon. Gentleman, with the exception of one. He would not deny that the expense at Broadmoor, taken all in all, was greater than at Dundrum; but he broadly denied that the difference was anything like that stated by the hon. Gentleman, and he also specially denied that the patients at Broadmoor were treated as criminals. The Broadmoor Asylum was constructed in 1860 under the superintendence of Sir Joshua Jebb, and it certainly was not a fortunate construction, for it had ever since been a source of considerable expense, and was only now brought into a good condition. The hon. Gentleman said that the asylum was under the management of the Directors of Convict Prisons, and that the inmates were treated as criminals. The fact was that a special Act of Parliament was passed, placing the asylum under the supervision of persons chosen by the Government. The most active of these managers were Sir William Hayter, who lived close by; Lord Hylton, formerly a distinguished Member of that House; and he might add that he had had the satisfaction of appointing his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) to take part in the conduct of the asylum. Under these circumstances, it could not be credited that the management would be so bad and vile as had just been described to the House. The hon. Gentleman had taken the amount of the Estimate for the present year, and divided it not by the number of persons proposed to be admitted in this year, but by the average number for the last 10 years; for the fact was that the hon. Member stated that Broadmoor Asylum contained 471 patients, and Dundrum 167, and that the cost of the former was £29,545, and of the latter £5,547; whereas the number of patients which it was proposed to receive at Broadmoor during the present year was 563, and at Dundrum 180. Again, in the expense for Broadmoor was included cost for rent, taxes, fuel, light, and furniture, amounting to £1,089, together with the proportionate cost of controlling the expenditure borne by the Office of Works, giving a further sum of £199 15s. 9d. If similar items for the Dundrum Asylum were taken into the account, the cost of that asylum would be £7,141 15s. 6d., and that made a considerable difference in the comparative cost of maintaining the inmates. The difference of the annual cost of maintaining a lunatic at Broadmoor and at Dundrum would, therefore, be not £27, but £14 16s. The Treasury allowance for the maintenance of a Broadmoor patient was £20 a-year, and for a Dundrum patient £13 6s.; but to the latter must be added the produce of the farm and garden, amounting to £2 9s. The contract price of meat also was less at Dundrum than at Broadmoor. The hon. Gentleman had contrasted the salaries at the two places; but in fixing the salaries the Government had to look at the professional remuneration prevailing at those places. As to the chaplain at Broadmoor, the hon. Gentleman forgot that the chaplain lived entirely among the patients; whereas the chaplain at Dundrum lived at Dublin, or wherever he liked, giving only occasional attendance at Dundrum. Whereas the offices of steward and matron at Broadmoor cost respectively £290 and £175, the same offices only cost £110 and £90 at Dundrum. Then as to the wages of the warders. He found that the wages of those persons had been reduced to the lowest rate for which the services of competent men could be obtained. The hon. Member had brought a charge against the management of Broadmoor that, in spite of a very high rate of payment, they were unable to keep their attendants for any long time. It must be borne in mind with regard to that, that while the Report on Dundrum was drawn up by the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, under whose management that prison was, the Report on Broadmoor was made by the Commissioners of Lunacy, who had no official connection with that prison, and who, therefore, had no motive for extenuating any imperfections that might exist; and, under these circumstances, it was not surprising that there should be more criticism in the one case than in the other. In spite, however, of this fact, the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland had attributed the constant change of attendance at Dundrum to the low rate at which the warders at that prison were paid. The truth was, that the picture of the state of affairs at Broadmoor was almost too favourable, and he left it to the hon. Member for Berkshire to verify the vivacity and expression in which the Commissioners of Lunacy had indulged with reference to it. The hon. Gentleman had argued that because the class of persons confined in both these asylums were criminal lunatics, therefore their treatment must be the same in both instances, and that the same difficulties of management must be met with equally in both asylums. There were, however, many important differences that distinguished the two cases. In the first place, Broadmoor, large as it was, was unable to receive all our criminal lunatics, a large proportion of whom were, therefore, confined in the county lunatic asylums, the worst cases only being sent to Broadmoor. It was a singular circumstance, and it had been commented on in the last Report of the Lunacy Commissioners, that the most dangerous class of lunatics were not those who were acquitted on the ground of insanity, but those who became insane after they were convicted, and it was principally these latter who were sent to Broadmoor. Thirty or forty of such lunatics had been sent to Broadmoor in the course of last year, while not one single such case had been sent to Dundrum last year, and only one in the year before last. There was thus at Broadmoor a class of lunatics incomparably more dangerous than those at Dundrum, and consequently it was necessary to employ a much greater proportionate number of warders for their care. The larger number of warders at Broadmoor was also partly attributable to the original defects in the building, which rendered it necessary that the number of attendants should be larger than usual. The hon. Member had stated the other day that the health of the criminal lunatics at Broadmoor was wholly unsatisfactory—as bad as it well could be; owing to deficient drainage and the general defective construction of the asylum, the mortality was greater than that in any similar institution in Great Britain. But he (Mr. Bruce) was fortunately in a position to show from statistics he held in his hand that the death-rate at that lunatic asylum was far below the average of such institutions. He begged to call the hon. Member's particular attention to the following figures:—

“The number of deaths to 100 of the daily average numbers resident in each year from 1864 to 1869 inclusive, was in county and borough asylums, 10·85; in registered hospitals, 7·63; in metropolitan licensed houses, 10·97; in provincial licensed houses, 8·27; in naval and military hospitals, 11·02; and in the Criminal Asylum, Broadmoor, 2·96.”

Those figures were taken from the Lunacy Commissioners' Report of 1870, and they proved that Broadmoor was far more healthy than Dundrum, where, according to the hon. Member's own statement, the mortality was 3½ per cent per annum. Had the hon. Member ever been to

Mr. Bruce

Broadmoor? It was situate on the summit of a hill of loose sand; it was about the most healthy spot in England, and the only subject for astonishment was why anybody should ever die there at all. The hon. Member said that the Lunacy Commissioners' Report found fault with the treatment of the criminal lunatics confined at Broadmoor. He entirely denied that the language of the Commissioners was such as to allow of such an inference being drawn. Their remark applied merely to a particular class of criminal lunatics; and even on that point their views were completely opposed to those of Dr. Meyer, who lost his life in consequence of injuries inflicted upon him by a lunatic, and who was celebrated for his knowledge and skill in the treatment of lunatics. It was not for him to decide when doctors disagreed, but it was clear from the language of the Commissioners that they referred not to the treatment of criminal lunatics generally at Broadmoor, but to a particular class of them only. In a passage in their very last Report the Commissioners said—

“We have had every evidence at our visit that Dr. Orange is discharging with great ability the very important and anxious duties incident to the superintendence of this asylum.”

In fact, through the whole of that Report there was not one single word of censure upon the management of this asylum. In conclusion, from the facts he had stated, he maintained that the expense incurred in the management of Broadmoor was not larger, as compared with Dundrum, than the difference in the cost of labour and provisions and in the class of persons confined in it would fully account for; that the death rate was lower in the former than in the latter; and that the inmates were properly treated in the former. He thought, therefore, he was justified in saying that the charge made by his hon. Friend was greatly exaggerated, and based upon insufficient grounds, and he believed that the House would do well in refusing to reduce the Vote.

DR. LUSH said, he must exonerate the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) from having improperly brought forward this subject, he having been misled by the figures contained in Government Papers. On the contrary, he thought the hon. Member deserved great credit for the boldness with which he had brought this subject under the notice of the Committee. It was clear that the dangerous class of criminals sent to Broadmoor had not in former years been treated with the humanity which was elsewhere shown towards such patients, and which the scientific acumen of the present day proved to be the most effectual treatment; and there could be no doubt that bad sanitary arrangements had at one time produced an exceptional rate of mortality at that establishment. The right hon. Gentleman had shown the necessity for a considerable staff; but the proportion of the staff to the patients appeared excessive. As to the mortality, it was not fair to compare a place with selected lives to pauper asylums like Hanwell. He remembered an asylum containing 300 patients of the same class, which was under his observation, in which during four months there was not a single death. It did not appear on the Estimates that anything was charged for rent; but if there was, the cost of other items would, of course, be reduced. With regard to the expense of the patients, expense ought not to be an object in such a case to a country like our own. The unfortunate persons who were confined at Broadmoor ought to be regarded not so much as prisoners, but as persons afflicted with mental aberration, and as such the most careful attention should be paid to them, and the most elaborate means should be adopted to restore them, if possible, to health. Holding that opinion, he could not support the reduction of the Vote.

MR. HENLEY said, it was difficult for anyone not acquainted with lunatic asylums to understand the magnitude of this Vote. The cost of patients at Broadmoor was nearly £1 a week per head, while in county lunatic asylums the average was about 9s. 6d., and at Dundrum it was only 12s. He might be told that the patients at Broadmoor were of a peculiar class, and no doubt they were; but he was not so certain that they required more attention than a great many of the helpless and troublesome patients who were to be found in general asylums. At Broadmoor there were 563 patients, and at Dundrum only 180, and everybody knew that as the number of patients increased the charge for the staff ought to diminish. In the Irish asylum the proportion of the staff was 1 to 5½ patients, but at Broadmoor it was 1 to 3½; and the only way in which he could account for the difference was by supposing that the Irish, who had the reputation of being less manageable than the English when sane, became more manageable when insane. In county asylums the proportion of attendants was 1 to every 8 or 10 patients, and it was clear that either the county asylums were not doing what they ought, or else Broadmoor was doing a great deal more than it ought. At the same time, he did not think the hon. Gentleman opposite would be justified in reducing the Vote by one-half; but the matter was one which the Government ought to look carefully into, with a view to seeing whether some reduction could not be made, for at present the expense of the Broadmoor Asylum seemed to be almost profligate.

MR. WALTER said, he regretted to hear the expression "profligate" applied by his right hon. Friend to Broadmoor, for, as one of the Visiting Board, he might be supposed to have some little responsibility for its management. His right hon. Friend, who was or had been a visitor with himself of a county asylum, was mistaken in supposing that the attendance required by criminal lunatics was of the same kind as that required for ordinary asylums. Ordinary pauper lunatics were of a more helpless, imbecile class, including many old and many very young persons, and what they chiefly required was good nursing, and a nurse could obviously manage more patients than a warder could manage criminals. The class of lunatics at Broadmoor, on the contrary, required not so much good nursing as strict superintendence. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce) had conclusively shown that the hon. Member for Galway was mistaken in supposing there was a material difference—indeed, he doubted whether there was any—between the cost of maintenance at Broadmoor and Dundrum. Including items not taken into account by the hon. Member, it was almost exactly the same. Considering that out of the Vote of £29,545, £11,629 was for victualling, and £9,671 for attendance, there was clearly only a very small margin for reduction. A more serious item than rates and taxes was the cost of fuel and light, which was no less than £2,400, whereas Dundrum was not credited with sixpence on this head. He did not know whether among the other facilities possessed by Dundrum was the ability to do without light and fire; but if not there must be some omission in the Estimate, or these necessities must have been obtained from unknown sources. Any Member comparing the two accounts would remark that at Broadmoor there was a reduction on the current year of £651, while at Dundrum there was an increase, though a very small one. He was not unwilling to see the salaries of the officers of the Dundrum Asylum raised to what might be deemed to be a sufficiently high standard; but there was no margin, in his opinion, for making any reduction in the expenses of Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum. The authorities were at the present time doing all in their power to reduce the expenses of that establishment, and had only recently introduced Australian beef as part of the prisoners' food, thereby effecting a very large saving. Broadmoor, no doubt, was expensive, and always had been; but then it should be remembered it was one of the finest places in England, and, moreover, the prisoners had many miles of beautifully-gravelled paths to walk in, which greatly tended to restore their health. No doubt it was a much more expensive establishment than Dundrum; but Broadmoor had not one item of expenditure that Dundrum had—namely, £16 a-year for the services of a bandmaster. He should likewise be very glad to see such an item in the Vote for Broadmoor, as music, no doubt, tended very much to humanize and amuse the inmates. He would not recommend the House to make any alteration in the amount of expenditure incurred for Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum.

Mr. Henley

MR. PIM said, that the allowances in respect of the patients at Broadmoor were far more liberal than the allowances in respect of the patients at Dundrum, a fact, which he thought was clearly proved by the Estimates, proving that £3 6s. was the amount for clothing an inmate at Dundrum, whilst at Broadmoor £4 5s. was required.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought the Secretary for the Home Department would admit that, though he had traversed, he had not successfully traversed, all the statements he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had made.

What he had said was drawn from actual knowledge of the case, and was without error; and what he wanted to show was, that the asylum at Broadmoor was based on an entirely different and more expensive system than that which had been carried out with so much good effect at Dundrum; and he did not wonder that such was the case when it was remembered that the management of the asylum was carried out under a special Act of Parliament by gentlemen who knew nothing whatever of matters relating to the treatment of lunatics. He would not divide the Committee on his Amendment, but hoped the Home Secretary would investigate what had occurred at Dundrum and what had ensued at Broadmoor.

MR. STACPOOLE hoped that the Royal Commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the condition of the Civil servants in Ireland would also inquire into the management of Dundrum Asylum.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, that the sum for the lunatics at Broadmoor was most extraordinary and extravagant, as anyone acquainted with lunatic asylums, exceedingly expensive as they were, must know. While it was admitted that it was absolutely necessary that more expense should be incurred for lunatics than other persons, that only showed clearly and conclusively that the charge for these asylums ought to be removed from local to public taxation.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated that all those who had any experience as local authorities in the management of lunatic asylums must be astonished at the enormous expense at which lunatics were taken care of by the Government. The hon. and gallant Gentleman thought that a conclusive proof of the necessity for removing the charge for lunatics from local to Imperial taxation. He could concur neither in the conclusions nor the premises of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. His inference was quite the opposite—namely, that it was much better that the expenditure should be under the charge of those who had the deepest interest in keeping it low, than in the hands of the Government, whose interest was comparatively remote.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, that under the existing law the Home Secretary had the right, which he frequently exercised, of removing from Broadmoor criminal lunatics whose term of sentence had expired, though they still continued lunatics. Many of those persons were of a dangerous character, and the staff of the county asylums was not adequate to their superintendence and control. The establishment at Broadmoor had ample means of taking care of them, and what he would ask was that, instead of removing dangerous lunatics to the county asylums when their sentence had expired, the Home Secretary should retain them at Broadmoor, and charge the counties with the cost of their maintenance.

MR. BRUCE said, he had not overlooked that point; but unfortunately the establishment at Broadmoor was not large enough to take in all that wanted admission. It was, therefore, impossible to retain those who ought to be sent away when they were constantly refusing those who ought to be admitted.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(16.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £16,850, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, of Miscellaneous Legal Charges in England."

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that there were 85 Revising Barristers, of whom 84 had sat 797 days, or an average of less than 10 days each man, notwithstanding which 15 assistant Revising Barristers had been appointed at a cost to the country of £2,055 this year, £2,398 last year, and £3,330 the year before. He was told that the Judges had by statute the power to appoint assistant Revising Barristers, and if they did that the House of Commons was bound to pay them. But he had shown that these assistant Revising Barristers were unnecessary, and therefore he begged to reduce the Vote by £2,000, the sum inserted in the Estimates to pay for additional aid.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £14,850, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1873, of Miscellaneous Legal Charges in England."—(Mr. Neville-Grenville.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was quite true that the Judges had by statute the power of appointing a certain number of assistant Revising Barristers, and the persons so appointed were to be paid by the country. He was not going to deny that in many cases that power of appointment had been exercised in a manner which he should be sorry to stand there to defend, and, therefore, the Government were quite prepared to take by Act of Parliament a control over that power of appointment by the Judges, should Parliament think fit to confer it. But to refuse the Vote would be to interfere with the power which the Judges at present possessed, and if the Committee chose to do that, the Government would be prepared to ask Parliament to pass a Bill on the subject. If Parliament refused to pass such a Bill hereafter the Government would have no alternative but to introduce a Supplementary Estimate.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that if the money were not voted, it was unlikely that assistant Revising Barristers would be appointed.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, that as they had a Bill before them for improving the manner in which the registration was made, which would leave the Revising Barristers little or nothing to do, and as they were told that if that Bill were thrown out the Government were prepared to adopt any measure that would reduce the expenses by improving the preliminary stages of the registration, and rendering the Court of the Revising Barrister merely one of appeal, it would be better to wait the result of such legislation before they reduced the Vote.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, it was an unsatisfactory thing for a constituency to be handed over to an assistant Revising Barrister. In the constituency which he represented 2,200 voters had been struck off the register through a decision given by one of these temporary assistants.

Question put, and agreed to.

(17.) £53,858 to complete the sum for Criminal Proceedings, Scotland.

MR. McMAHON said, he begged to call the attention of the Home Secretary to the fact that, while in Scotland, where there was a Crown prosecutor, the cost of criminal prosecutions for, say, 3,500,000 people was £71,000, the expenditure in England, if the same system were established there, would be at the same rate upwards of £500,000, instead of about £200,000, as at present. He hoped that the Ministers would consider the cost of Crown prosecutors, before they introduced the system proposed by the Bill to be debated next Wednesday.

MR. MUNTZ moved that the Item of £700, "to meet the expenses of Procurators Fiscal about to be appointed," be omitted from the said Vote.

MR. HERMON complained that the Government gave no explanation with regard to this Vote.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would remind the House that the principle adopted in Scotland was to pay for the performance of public services by public money. When the accounts of the Procurators Fiscal were beyond a certain sum, their fees were commuted to a salary at a considerable saving to the public Revenue.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he doubted, looking at the Estimate, whether justice was not done in England as satisfactorily as in Scotland, and at a less cost proportionately.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he wished to add that in Scotland the community were released from any expenditure for private prosecutions. The real question was, whether it was expedient on the whole that the expenditure of a prosecution should fall on the individuals who suffered from crime. At all events, it had been the custom for some centuries in Scotland for the State to pay: whereas in England a man who had suffered already by robbery was sometimes obliged to go to great expense to punish the depredators. There was a very great public economy effected in the manner in which these matters were managed in Scotland, and so far as the community was concerned probably no money was better spent than that expended in the department of public prosecution.

MR. WEST said, that before Wednesday, when the Public Prosecutors Bill would be brought forward, the Government ought to be prepared with an estimate showing the cost of adopting the system in England.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £42,121, to complete the sum for Law Courts, Scotland.

(19.) £22,574, to complete the sum for the General Register House, Edinburgh.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to ask for some explanation as to what had been done by the Treasury to fulfil the duties imposed upon them by the Act passed some years ago? The total Vote was put down at £30,000, but it appeared that there was some £5,000 or £6,000 a-year received more than was expended, taking it at its lowest amount. That had long been a crying grievance in Scotland, and the people were anxiously looking forward for the time when the transfer of land in Scotland would be relieved from the burden, for it pressed very severely on small transactions in land. The surplus arose, no doubt, before the Act of 1868 was passed, but owing to the changes then made, it was necessary to construct a scale to cover the emoluments of the register in the smallest places in Scotland. In Glasgow, Edinburgh, and other large towns in which there were a large number of transactions, this enabled matters to be dealt with so economically that there was a large surplus; so much so, that people were led to expect that when the whole of the registries were concentrated in Edinburgh, the Government would receive a much larger surplus, and be able to carry on the transactions with such economy that they would be able to reduce the amount of the fees payable throughout Scotland. They had been waiting patiently until the different offices had been absorbed, and the compensations had been awarded to the various officers who held these offices in different parts of Scotland. As he understood, the transactions were all closed, and they were awaiting in anxious expectation to hear from the Treasury what result had been arrived at. It was a duty under the Act specially imposed—and not as a mere power—upon the Treasury to fix the scale of fees for the future. He trusted his right hon. and learned Friend would be able to explain what steps Her Majesty's Government had taken in fulfilment of the just expectation of the people of Scotland, and when he was doing so, to take notice of a very important question which had been raised by those who were watching these transactions in Scotland—namely, the question how far the compensation for the different offices which had been absorbed was to be thrown upon the fees in future, and how far they were to be paid by the Treasury? Legal opinions on the subject had been taken, and laid before him, and especially the hon. and learned Member for Richmond had been consulted, as well as Mr. Anderson, who had given a distinct opinion that it was not in the power of the Treasury to charge in future upon the fees received. It was, they said, undoubtedly a charge upon the Treasury, and it was one on which they were entitled to claim and levy taxes to provide for compensation. He believed that the accumulation received by the Treasury would be more than a hundred times sufficient to pay for the compensation; but whether that were so or not, he held in his hand the highest legal opinion on the subject, and trusted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would inform Scotch Members what relief Her Majesty's Treasury were prepared to afford in this respect.

MR. BAXTER said, he was not surprised at the question having been asked. His hon. Friend had understated his case. Since 1846 a sum of £145,372 had been paid into the Exchequer from the fees of the Register Office in excess of expenditure. It was obvious that Government had no right to obtain a profit from this source, and a pledge had been given some time ago that the fees should be reduced so as merely to cover the expense of the office. The delay in arriving at a decision had been caused by the necessity of taking advice as to whether the new scale of fees should be fixed so as to provide for the superannuation of the district Registrars of Sasines. The Treasury had concluded not to do so, and they had directed the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland to make out the new scheme accordingly.

Vote agreed to.

(20.) £17,700, to complete the sum for Prisons (Scotland), &c.

(21.) £58,411, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions (Ireland).

(22.) £33,525, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery (Ireland).

(23.) £20,612, to complete the sum for the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland.

(24.) £6,350, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland.

(25.) £9,216, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Court, Ireland.

(26.) £8,643, to complete the sum for the Court of Probate in Ireland.

(27.) £1,310, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court of Registry, Ireland.

(28.) £11,240, to complete the sum for the Office for the Registration of Deeds in Ireland.

(29.) £2,227, to complete the sum for the Registration of Judgments, Ireland.

(30.) £75,323, to complete the sum for the Police Courts, Dublin.

(31.) £658,139, to complete the sum for the Constabulary Force, Ireland.

(32.) £32,500, to complete the sum for Government Prisons, &c. Ireland.

(33.) £45,855, to complete the sum for County and Borough Gaols, &c. Ireland.

(34.) £4,073, to complete the sum for the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland.

(35.) £1,610, to complete the sum for the Four Courts Marshalsea, Dublin.

(36.) £43,920, to complete the sum for Legal Expenses, Ireland.

(37.) £45,568, to complete the sum for Salaries and Allowances of Governors, &c. in certain Colonies.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he must express his extreme satisfaction with the general aspect of the Colonial Votes this year, as an evidence that they were carrying out the policy long ago recommended and pursued by parties on both sides of the House. They were getting the colonies gradually to take their share, in common with those at home, in the expenditure necessary for their own affairs, both civil and military. He should like the Under Secretary for the Colonies to explain what progress was being made in that line of policy, as regarded the concentration of government that had been happily inaugurated in the Leeward Islands, inasmuch as practical measures of that character were much more valuable than the vague discussions on abstract colonial questions which were too frequently introduced in that House. It was a fair thesis for a debating club, whether Colonial Representation could be introduced in that House, or a Congress formed of all the Empire, on common concerns. No one wanted more than discussion to disabuse his mind of such vagaries. The scattering English troops to maintain the British flag in all quarters of the globe, in distrust of British colonial troops, was a sentiment which experience dissipated. But the concentration and self-support of colonial governments was a practical concern of great importance. It had been proposed by Mr. Pope Hennessy that the government of Labuan should be united to that of the Straits. Labuan was now in a flourishing condition, and the reason for uniting that island to the Straits had been clearly pointed out by that Governor who had made it so. Labuan having been formed into a government at the request of a number of English merchants, had been so well presided over by that gentleman that it had, at last, after much failure, paid its own expenses, and the recommendation in question was based on the fact that the colony was too small to furnish adequate materials en permanence for its administration or for the formation of a Legislative Council. It had been said, on the contrary, that if Labuan was a flourishing colony, why not leave it alone? But it appeared to him that the more the people showed that they could manage their own affairs, the more incumbent it was upon this country to see that they should not be needlessly and extravagantly burdened, and that no unnecessary government should be imposed upon them. He believed that if the proposed union should be effected the salary paid to the Governor might be reduced by one-half, which would amply suffice for the local secretary of the Straits Governor. He wished to know whether the Government intended to act upon the recommendation of Mr. Pope Hennessy, the carrying out of which would not only reduce the expenditure of the colony, but greatly improve the efficiency of its government?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that after a careful perusal of Mr. Pope Hennessy's Minute, he had come to the conclusion that there was much that he proposed that might be effected by a judicious arrangement between the two colonies without imposing a union upon them. He did not, however, pledge the Government against this union; but certainly the wishes and interests of the Straits settlements should be consulted in the matter as well as those of Labuan. It might be that as time progressed, and as the circumstances of the two colonies came to be fully considered, this union might be found to be desirable. But the course which the Government had thought it right to take had been this—Labuan had only lately become a self-supporting colony, and it had hardly yet been sufficiently proved that the self-supporting nature of Labuan would continue to exist. They had therefore thought it desirable that a little time should be afforded in order that the true condition of Labuan might be ascertained, and they had instructed Sir Henry Ord, the Governor of the Straits settlements, to consult with the present Governor of Labuan, and report upon the whole bearing of the question. When the Government had seen that Report they should be able to take a broad and just view of the question, and to decide whether or not a union was desirable. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire had alluded to the increase in the Estimate for the Leeward Islands. The fact was, that for future economy and the better management of these islands it was thought desirable that they should be confederated, and it had been found necessary to make sacrifices at first in order to secure a permanent benefit. One of the items of cost had arisen from the necessity to providing the Governor with a steamer to visit the different islands, and that steamer had cost £13,200. The islanders had also asked that £4,000 or £5,000, the salaries of governors and administrators hitherto, should be voted to them for five years as a grant in aid to enable them to make the necessary arrangements. The Treasury had not pledged themselves to this for five years, but he hoped they would do so, believing that federation would result in economy and good management, and that the charges on the Imperial Revenue would gradually disappear. As to the federation of the Windward Islands, the Government thought it would be well to wait and see the experiment of the federation of the Leeward Islands carried out before they proceeded any further in that direction.

MR. RYLANDS wished to know why a salary of £2,200 was paid for a governor of the Bermudas, seeing that the Bermudas were only a military station? He also wished to know what reason there was for a continuance of the Vote of £2,500 for clergy in North America, and whether that was an expiring Vote?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that Bermuda was a naval station of great importance to England, and it was not so much for the colony as for ourselves that this salary was paid to the Governor.

MR. R. N. FOWLER wanted to hear some explanation of the reduction of £8,000 in the Vote for Malta, and of £5,158 in the Vote for St. Helena.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, the Vote for clergy in North America was an expiring Vote, diminished £238 by the death of some of the recipients. The charge for Malta of £8,000 last year, which did not now re-appear, was owing to the construction of waterworks from which Imperial interests received benefit, and in respect of which a charge upon Imperial funds was therefore justified. The Vote for St. Helena was in respect of charges—including Governor's salary and mail subsidies—which the local revenues had lately proved quite unable to meet, and which therefore the Treasury had paid, to be repaid according to the directions of the Secretary of State.

Vote agreed to.

(38.) £2,976, to complete the sum for the Orange River Territory and Island of St. Helena.

(39.) £79, to complete the sum for Mixed Commissions, Traffic in Slaves.

(40.) £8,906 to complete the sum for Tonnage Bounties and Bounties on Slaves, &c.

MR. RYLANDS said, he objected to the system of allowing the Navy to claim bounties. He believed many of the claims were questionable.

MR. BAXTER said, the hour was too late to allow of so large a question being discussed. Every claim went before a Court.

Vote agreed to.

(41.) £7,410, to complete the sum for the Emigration Board.

MR. MACFIE urged the propriety of adding some Members of Parliament, colonists, or friends of the working classes to the Board, in order to carry out its original purpose of directing a flow of emigration and utilizing the tracts of land belonging to the Empire.

Vote agreed to.

(42.) £4,500, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter.)

[BILL 106.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE moved the addition of a clause exempting from the duties on inhabited houses any tenement occupied for the sole purpose of any trade or business, or of any profession, vocation, or calling, when inhabited as to part thereof by a servant or other person employed for the protection or care of such tenement and not being otherwise an inhabited dwelling-house. The clause proposed was in substance identical with one previously approved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which had only been rescinded by a majority of 1, upon a division taken quite unexpectedly.

New Clause (Enactments in Schedule repealed, and in lieu thereof exemption from inhabited house duty of trade and business premises under care of servant only,) — (Mr. Alderman Lawrence,) — brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. R. N. FOWLER supported the clause, which would be a great boon to the City of London.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was the duty of the Government to propose taxes, and it was the function of the House to consider the propriety of exemptions. The House, after full debate, had rejected the clause by a majority of 1. He did not propose to go into the merits of the question, but the Government thought it their duty not to press the matter again on the House.

MR. CRAWFORD supported the clause, and expressed his surprise at such a decision, and contrasted it with the conduct of the Government in the case of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery. He hoped the House would show that it did not approve of such inconsistent behaviour.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought that the question required further attention.

MR. GLADSTONE defended the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was in such cases very nearly an established rule for the Government to acquiesce in the judgment of the House unless some strong public necessity rendered it imperative to disturb the decision. The decision arrived at the other night was not a surprise, but the spontaneous expression of the opinion of the House. At the same time he must admit that the question was not in a satisfactory position. It required a further investigation, but on a somewhat larger scale. In omitting one anomaly it might have rendered more glaring other anomalies. It would, therefore, be the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give his careful attention to the subject before he could be called on again to make financial proposals to the House.

MR. BARNETT hoped the House would still adhere to the decision they formerly gave on this subject, and adopt the clause of the hon. Alderman.

ALDERMAN SIR JAMES LAWRENCE said, this question affected not London alone, but also Liverpool, Manchester, and every large town in the kingdom, and it was not fairly submitted to the House when it was previously under discussion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 80: Majority 29.

MR. MACFIE moved an Amendment in Clause 4, page 2, line 34, to leave out after "goods," as far as and including "accordingly," in line 37, and insert "absolutely prohibited to be imported," the result of which would be that articles which professed falsely to be of British manufacture would be prohibited from being imported even for exportation. He made that proposal in justice to British manufacturers and as a testimony to the truth.

MR. MUNDELLA supported the Amendment.

MR. BAXTER saw no objection to it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE REBUILDING BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill for the acquisition of property for the purpose of erecting thereon a new building at Whitehall for the Admiralty and War Office, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. BAXTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 200.]

VICTORIA PARK BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill to confirm an Agreement for the purchase by the Metropolitan Board of Works of certain land adjoining Victoria Park, and for the appropriation of such land as part of the same Park, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 201.]

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Bill to amend the several Acts relating to the Drainage and Improvement of Lands in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND and The Marquess of HARTINGTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 202.]

PAWNBROKERS BILL.

Select Committee on the Pawnbrokers Bill nominated:—Mr. WINTERBOTHAM, Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH, Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS, Sir WILLIAM BAGGE, Mr. CARTER, Mr. ORR EWING, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. RICHARD ARKWRIGHT, Mr. PLIMSOLL, Mr. ARTHUR GUEST, Mr. GRIEVE, Mr. CHARLES HENRY MILLS, and Mr. WHITWELL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Ordered, That the Report and Evidence laid before Parliament by the Select Committee on Pawnbrokers, in Session 1871, and the Report of Dr. Hancock on the Law of Pawnbroking in Ireland, be referred to the Select Committee on the Bill.

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 18th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Queen's Bench (Ireland) Procedure* (159); Court of Chancery Funds* (161); Customs and Inland Revenue* (162); Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension* (163).

Second Reading—Appointment of Commissioners for taking Affidavits* (183); Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (184); Trusts of Benefices and Churches (151); Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) and Act (No. 2, 1864) Amendment* (180); Board of Trade Inquiries* (155).

Committee—Baptismal Fees* (128-160).

Report—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation* (116).

Third Reading—Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (122).

TRUSTS OF BENEFICES AND CHURCHES BILL.

(The Lord Bishop of Carlisle.)

(No. 151.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to remove doubts which had been entertained as to the validity of certain trusts for the exercise of ecclesiastical patronage. The single clause of which the Bill consisted provided that the powers and provisions of the Acts of Parliament which authorize the assignment or limitation of the patronage of churches or ecclesiastical benefices with cure of souls should be held to authorize assignments or limitations of such patronage with such consents and under such circumstances as are declared by the said enactments, so as to vest the same patronage in any number of corporations sole not exceeding five, or in one or more of such corporations. It was provided that the Bill should have a retrospective operation as to patronage heretofore assigned.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

ARMY—THE PURCHASE AND THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS.

ADDRESS FOR A COMMISSION.

LORD ABINGER, in moving the Address, of which he had given Notice, for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into alleged injustice towards certain officers of the late Purchase Corps by their supersession by officers of the Scientific Corps, said, it was, perhaps, hardly to be expected that a Member of the Opposition should receive a satisfactory answer when objecting to something that was being done by Her Majesty's Government; but he thought the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War might have given him a more sufficient answer than he did when he brought this subject forward on a former occasion.

—because it was one which had in no respect a political bearing, but which the whole Army watched with the greatest interest. The Question he asked on a former occasion was as to what steps Her Majesty's Government proposed to take to remedy the injustice done to the officers of the late Purchase Corps through their supersession by the officers of the Scientific Corps. On that occasion the noble Marquess denied the alleged injustice; that the supersession would only apply to a small number; and, lastly, he argued that the effects of the system would be only temporary. Temporary it would be in one sense, for this reason—that life was short. And after the Purchase officers—against whom the supersession applied—had all died out, the injustice would survive only in the memory of their families. On the former occasion he (Lord Abinger) stated that the number of officers of other branches of the service who would suffer by the supersession of 300 officers of the Artillery and the Engineers was 815. He must modify those figures to some extent—that was to say, that the cases of great injustice were not so numerous as this—but there could be no doubt that the number of captains who would suffer in this way was very considerable. He held in his hand a tabular statement on the subject, which had been examined by a hon. and gallant Member of the other House of Parliament, who, though on a bed of sickness, was still as ready as ever to give all the assistance in his power to his brother officers. He alluded to Colonel Anson, the Member for Bewdley. As the tabular statement was a mass of figures, he would not trouble their Lordships by reading it in detail, but it shows that 560 captains of 17 years' service in the late Purchase Corps would be superseded by 50 captains of Artillery and Engineers, of whom 49 had only the same length of service, while one was junior to the 560. While 50 officers of Artillery and Engineers, having 18 years' service, superseded 279 officers in the regular Army having the same length of service. When he came to captains in the late Purchase Corps of from 25 up to 30 years' service, he found that no less than 44 of them were superseded by not less than 300 officers of the Artillery and the Engineers, while one captain of 30 years' service was superseded by 344 officers of the Artillery and Engineers who were junior. It was impossible, therefore, to say that this supersession was unimportant. He had received a letter from an officer of 21 years' service in a Cavalry regiment. He had bought all his steps, had served nine years in India, and had waited a long time for his promotion—he was still a captain; and he complained that the Government prevented him from purchasing his majority, while a large number of officers of Artillery and Engineers would pass over his head by this supersession, and would have over him all the advantages of military seniority. The tabular statement showed that of officers of 21 years' service there were 68 who were superseded by 188 officers of Artillery and the Engineers. He thought he need not go further to convince their Lordships that the officers whose case he had ventured to bring under the consideration of the House had a very strong one. The Secretary of State had stated in another place that £20,600 would be the expense of the scheme. The promotion in substantive rank would involve an increase of pay of from 4s. 2d. to 6s. 6d. a-day; but to give the officers of the late Purchase Corps brevet rank would involve an increased pay of only 2s. a-day, which would amount to about £10,000 a-year. Now, though officers valued rank very much more than pecuniary reward, he thought that what he had suggested would only be just, and he was sure the country would not refuse to find the money for it. The officers of the Artillery and the Engineers were about to receive a permanent advantage; but this became a serious question when it was proposed to give them that advantage at the expense of so many officers in the other branches of the service. Let their Lordships take the case of a battalion of 1,000 men. It would have three Field Officers; or take 1,333 men, the proportionate number of Field Officers with them would be four. To a garrison battery there were 158 men; so that to 1,264 men in the Artillery there would be six Field Officers. The proportion of Field Officers would therefore be one-third more in the Artillery. The new system was a sop given to certain officers in order to enable the Government to get over the retirement difficulty. If it were fully carried out, the result would be that the number of Field Officers in the battalions of the Line, the colonial corps, the battalions of the Guards, and the regiments of Cavalry, exclusive of extra Field Officers to regiments in India, would be 564, while the number in the Scientific Corps would be 760. He trusted he had shown reasons why their Lordships should adopt the Motion which he now begged to move.

Lord Abinger

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Commission may be issued to inquire into the alleged injustice towards the captains of the late Purchase Corps occasioned by their proposed supersession by the first captains of the Scientific Corps; and further to inquire whether the intended advancement of the first captains of the Royal Artillery and Engineers to the rank of field officers would have the effect of removing the slowness of promotion in those corps, and as to the best means of remedying the same; and that in the meantime and until the report of the Commission the publication of the Royal Warrant on this subject be delayed.—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that although no one regretted more than he did that the noble Lord (Lord Abinger) should have thought it necessary to put this Motion on the Papers of their Lordships' House, he was not sorry that he should have this opportunity of supplementing by a few words the explanation which he had given in answer to the noble Lord a few nights ago. In the discussion on the occasion to which he referred, statements were made by noble Lords who spoke with great authority, to which he was not on the moment able to reply; and he was now anxious to show that Her Majesty's Government, in electing to pursue this course with regard to the Scientific Corps, had not either lost sight of or ignored many of the arguments then put forward. Her Majesty's Government felt it to be their bounden duty to face this difficulty and deal with it in some way or other; the course which the predecessors of the present Government had pursued in reference to the question pointed in this direction; and had the difficulty been avoided by the present Government they would have justly incurred the reproach of their Lordships' House, the public, and the service. The present Government came into office with the inheritance of some materials of great importance as bearing upon the subject under discussion. First, they had the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons on Army Retirement of 1867; and, next, they had the result of the investigations subsequently made by the War Department when Sir John Pakington was at its head, and which were extremely valuable. Now with regard to the Report of the Committee of 1867, he specially wished to refer to it because its recommendations were difficult to carry out. One of the principal recommendations of the Committee involved a retirement—in one case compulsory and in another optional—after 22 years' service. The Government did not desire to adopt the scheme for two reasons—one of great, the other of paramount importance. The first reason was, that the scheme would have been inordinately costly. It would have raised the retirement in the Royal Artillery in time of peace from £42,400 to £81,146 as a minimum, and £119,989 as a maximum, and that of the Engineers from £18,285 to £54,678 as a minimum, and £77,477 as a maximum. That was one good reason for not adopting the scheme; but there was another which weighed still more with the Government, founded on the interests of the service. It could easily be understood that in the interests of the taxpayer there could be no greater error than that of offering exceptional inducements to officers in the prime of their intellectual and physical vigour, and who were both possessed of ability, and whose military experience had reached its most ripe stage of usefulness, to abandon the service to which they were of such value and transfer their abilities to civil employments. He believed one officer of the Ordnance Corps had been taken without any money as a partner in a firm, solely on account of his proficiency in the particular branch in which that firm required his assistance. After much consideration of all the circumstances, and reluctant to adopt the scheme of the Committee of 1867, the Secretary for War determined to improve the position of the officers of the Scientific Corps, not by any scheme of retirement, but by endeavouring to proportion their rank to their responsibilities and the importance of their duties. In order to arrive at a fair opinion of these positions and responsibilities his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War looked, in the first instance, to the practice of foreign countries; in the second place to the precedents and indications contained in the history of our own service; and lastly, and most important of all, to the position of the commanding officer of a battery. In Russia, a battery consisting of eight guns was commanded by a lieutenant colonel: in Prussia, a battery consisting of six guns was commanded by a captain—but a Prussian captain in the Infantry was a mounted officer, and commanded 250 men. In France a battery of six guns was commanded by a captain, but there was a very large proportion of young officers both in the Artillery and Engineers. Looking to the precedents in our own service the Secretary for War found that in the Peninsular and the Crimean Wars the commanding officers of batteries, though captains, had been ranked for reward and brevet with the officers commanding regiments. After the battle of the Alma, Lord Raglan required a return of the captains commanding batteries; they were mentioned with the officers commanding regiments; they got the Bath, and were all promoted. Then, looking to the responsibilities devolving on the officer commanding a battery at the present day, his right hon. Friend considered that the command of a battery of field artillery was more akin to the command of a wing of a regiment than to the command of a company. Having regard to all the considerations, and having considered various proposals, the Secretary for War came to the conclusion that the first captain of Artillery should have the rank of major. He did not wish to detain their Lordships, or to weary them with figures; but he might say that the total additional expense which this scheme involved would be £27,000 less than that of the scheme recommended by the Committee of 1867. He had looked as carefully as he could into the objections enumerated by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Abinger) to the course which the Government had proposed, and they seemed to resolve themselves into two main groups. The first set of objections amounted to this—that a grievous injustice was done to the officers of the Line, because by what it was proposed to do a very large number of them would be superseded by those first captains of Artillery being made majors. The second objection, if he understood it rightly, was that there would be very great military inconvenience—if he might use that expression—on account of the large predominance of field officers of Artillery as compared with the field officers of the Line which would result from their scheme whenever any body of the troops were brought together. When the noble Lord said their scheme involved supersession, he, for one, admitted at once that it did; but the question their Lordships had to decide was not whether there was some supersession, but whether its amount was inordinate or unfair. He was prepared to show that the supersession involved in their scheme was slight in its degree and temporary in its character; and further, that if the periods of promotion which were laid down by Sir John Pakington, which were universally accepted, and all pointed in this direction, were to be carried into effect—if they were so to arrange things that a captain of Artillery, after spending 18 years in the service, was to be no longer a captain—they could not attain that end by any means, unless they sacrificed the interests of the service by removing from it officers in the prime of their career, without having at least as much supersession as was involved in the present scheme. Their Lordships had been told on two former occasions what, in the opinion of noble Lords opposite, that supersession would amount to. On the last occasion the figures given by the noble Lord who moved the present Address were, if he remembered rightly, that 331 Ordnance officers would be put over the heads of 823 officers of the Line. [Lord ABINGER said he had qualified that statement.] He was glad to hear that, because those figures needed very considerable qualification. The figures formerly given by the noble Lord—and he was not sure that his present figures were not open to the same criticism—appeared to involve this fallacy—namely, that the whole of those officers of the Ordnance Corps to be promoted to the rank of major were juniors to the whole of those officers of the Line whom, according to the noble Lord, they were about to supersede. Now, he objected to those figures, and still more to the particular case which had been quoted as an illustration of the mischief they were doing. The officer selected on a recent occasion as a typical instance of that alleged injustice was an officer of the Indian Engineers. It was, he thought, scarcely right to take Captain Ducat as a fair instance of that supersession. Captain Ducat, who was an Engineer officer, was four years junior to the youngest of the Artillery officers to whom the statement related; and again, he was a member not of a non-purchase, but of a Purchase Corps. He was informed that the Bombay Engineers were, strictly speaking, a Purchase Corps; and it was owing to the fact that they were a Purchase Corps that Captain Ducat had attained the position to which some noble Lords had adverted. Another peculiarity about that officer's case was that he was a member of one of the smallest corps in the whole of the Engineers; so that in that corps the steps were much more rapid than if they took an instance out of any other corps of Indian Engineers. With regard to the actual extent of the supersession which their scheme would involve, that point had been very carefully inquired into by the War Office actuaries, and the result of their inquiries showed that there would be 34 officers only who would have a less period of service than the average service of the Line on attaining the rank of major. That average was a little under 18 years. [Lord ABINGER said he did not proceed upon averages.] The noble Lord objected to averages, but in a large comparison of that kind he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) thought averages were the only thing they could possibly look to; and he told the noble Lord candidly that he would rest the main part of his defence on averages. The actuaries went on to tell them that during the next two years it would take an Ordnance Corps officer 17 years to reach his majority, whereas in the Line about 18 years was the period; so that for those two years there would be a slight supersession. After those two years they were told that the services would stand in a somewhat similar footing for two years longer, and soon afterwards the Ordnance Corps would attain their normal period of promotion, which would be $2\frac{1}{2}$ years. The Government were, however, pledged to maintain promotion in the Infantry of the Line, at an average of about 18 years; and, therefore, after a very limited period it would be the Artillery and Engineers who would have the disadvantage, and the Line would have the advantage in respect to promotion. The noble Lord (Lord Abinger) complained of the great injustice done to senior captains of the Line by that supersession; but it was those very officers who would be the greatest gainers by the change recently made. The reason why those senior captains had been stagnant as to rank was because they had been purchased over: the Government had made arrangements which would enable them to rise at a proper period, and they would be gainers by what had been done. There was only one other comparison which he wished to make—namely, that between the injustice, as the noble Lord called it, of the limited and temporary supersession under the Government scheme, and the wholesale injustice which the noble Lord and others had acquiesced in. He was surprised to hear it said that those senior captains felt that supersession to be a slur upon them. He asked what must have been the feelings of the whole Ordnance Corps when, under the purchase system, they were superseded time after time and year after year by the Line? If there was a slur now, it must have been ten-fold greater under the old system. He now came to an argument which a noble and gallant Lord on that side of the House had brought forward some nights ago, and which had embarrassed him (the Marquess of Lansdowne) when the noble Lord used it. He stated that the flow of promotion was inconsistent with the fact that in a brigade of Artillery there would be 32 captains and subalterns and 14 Field Officers, while in the Line there would be 30 captains and subalterns and only three Field Officers. That argument, he must admit, seemed to him one that was very difficult to answer, but he believed the explanation of the difficulty was this—there were several facts which required those figures to be very much modified. In the first place, the Line had, and the Artillery and Engineers had not, an unattached list—and that circumstance must be borne in mind as affecting that calculation. In the second place, experience told them that the Artillery and Engineers would always be the arm which men desiring to devote their whole life to the service in what might be called a professional sense would select in preference to the Line. ["No!"] He thought that experience had unquestion-ably taught that. Under the purchase system, out of 1,000 officers who entered the Army 627 retired before they reached the rank of Field Officer. Of course, that difference would not continue to exist in the same degree when purchase was abolished; but they were justified in anticipating that there would always be some difference of that kind between the two branches of the service. A third fact bearing on the difficulty to which he referred was that the Government had pledged itself distinctly—in the event of other means failing—to maintain the promotion to the rank of major in the Line at or about the standard period of 18 years. So that, if everything else failed, they might reasonably expect that whatever Government was in office something would be done to keep promotion in the Line in a proper condition. With regard to the contention that under the change the number of field officers in the Engineers and Artillery would be wholly disproportionate as compared with those in the Line—he maintained that this was only apparent. There were, it was true, 14 field officers to the 1,600 men forming the brigade of Artillery, and only three to the 1,000 men forming the brigade of Infantry. But the proportion of Infantry to Artillery was 16,000 Infantry to the brigade of Artillery; so that the Infantry field officers would number 48 to 14 of the Artillery, or in the proportion of nearly four to one. Another argument was that by giving majorities to the captains of Artillery a distinct inducement was offered to them to remain in the service instead of going out to increase promotion, so that things in the future would be worse than they were in the past. But at present officers in the Artillery were not in the habit of retiring, except from ill-health; so that even on the assumption that promotion to the rank of major would be an inducement to these officers to stay on, what the Government had done had not made matters worse. He had been obliged to go into details in order to explain the grounds upon which the changes had been made. The conclusion at which the Government had arrived, and which he had endeavoured to state to their Lordships was this—it was incumbent on the Government to provide some remedy for the stagnation of promotion in the Scientific Corps, and the remedy proposed would, in their belief, cause less disturbance than any other that had been suggested. Some disturbance was inevitable. The noble Lord had spoken of injustice, and, truly, injustice had been done—but it was not of the present day, and it was this very injustice that the Government sought to remedy. He trusted their Lordships would assist in carrying out a scheme which public opinion demanded, and to which the Government had very good reason to adhere.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I must express my great satisfaction at the very calm and moderate manner in which this subject has been introduced, and I believe the House will agree with me that my noble Friend who has just spoken (the Marquess of Lansdowne) has replied to the arguments advanced against the proposals of the Government in a manner highly to his credit. For my own part, as the representative of the whole Army, I cannot but feel very strongly on this question; but speaking on behalf of the Army as a whole, I wish to divest myself in dealing with this question of all preference to any particular branch of the service, and I should desire that the same feeling should pervade those composing the different branches when considering any change that is proposed, because it is necessary for the good of the service that the most cordial good feeling should exist between all branches whenever and wherever they may be brought together. No doubt differences of opinion will arise among a large body of men on questions of justice and injustice, and the subject may be argued with strong feelings on both sides. I am glad that upon this occasion nothing approaching the acrimonious has been imported into the discussion, and I feel sure the service as a whole will not be injured by discussions conducted in the spirit in which this has been taken. Otherwise I should deprecate any discussion whatever, because it cannot but be injurious that a large portion of the service should be encouraged in the feeling that they are being treated unfairly. There is no doubt that, when the members of any profession get accustomed to a state of things which is acknowledged in a general way to be defective and fruitful of injustice and hardship, they accept the injustice and hardship because they found it to exist, and they bear it without question; but immediately that something new is set afoot the feeling of injustice revives, and in any reform that is proposed the smallest injustice and hardship is magnified, and by being constantly dwelt upon the proposed change is liable to the severest criticism. This is essentially so in this case. I was myself the person who originally brought this subject forward as regards stagnation of promotion, and I cannot but recollect that both sides of the House admitted it to be a question difficult to settle—as all questions must be that involve organic changes. It was felt that injustice existed in the Ordnance Corps; promotion was slow, and the present scheme has been designed to put the Artillery and the Line on the same footing in regard to promotion. There is no injustice in this as a matter of principle. It is obviously advisable that promotion should go on pari passu in every branch of the service. I make these remarks to show that, although it was I who originally brought forward the question which led to these changes, I at the same time strongly feel the objections to organic changes, and am distinctly of opinion that they should not be entered upon without a clear gain. Promotion in the Artillery was so bad in consequence of the large augmentations which took place in 1854 and in 1857—especially among subalterns—as to take away all spirit and hope for the future. That was a state of things which it was impossible to overlook; and I have been repeatedly during past years requested by successive Secretaries of State to suggest some means of improvement. The matter was referred to a Committee of the House of Commons, which made a Report; but the scheme suggested by that Committee was pronounced too expensive to secure the concurrence of Parliament. Another scheme was suggested by which the difficulty was sought to be overcome by creating the rank of major in the Ordnance Corps; and the Government decided that it would be better to adopt this proposal than to give such large retiring allowances as would make it worth while to go out. The Secretary for War under the late Government (Sir John Pakington) laid down standard periods, on the basis of which the right hon. Gentleman wished to calculate actuarially what ought to be the periods for promotion in the Ordnance Corps, and for a captain the periods named were 12 years, for a major 18, and for a lieutenant colonel 25 years. That proposal was based on the opinion that it would secure a better flow of promotion essential to the public service than any scheme of retirement which could be reasonably put forward. I agree that the essential point is to secure such rapidity of promotion as would give elasticity to the service; and if there be any argument needed in support of the change in addition to the ordinary requirements of the public service, it may be found in the fact that the Artillery, which in times past was a less important arm, has now come to be regarded as of the highest value. Your Lordships should bear in mind that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, when questioned on the subject last year, said he could not enter into the question of retirement: he said that the question was too large a one to be then considered, and that promotion would be kept very much at the point at which it then stood in the Line. I also understand that if this promotion be now granted, and that it should be found to be in excess of the Line hereafter, the Line would be brought up to it. The Line, therefore, has some security for the future. There is, no doubt, a considerable difference of opinion as to whether promotion is better obtained by this scheme or by a system of retirement. For my own part, I am not adverse to a system of retirement, and though, no doubt, it would lead now and then to our losing a good officer, I do not so much mind that, because I think we can always replace him. At the same time, it must not be carried to too great an extent, because in that case the service would suffer. I think if we could adopt some medium course by which we could have a reasonable system of retirement, at the same time not exceeding the expenditure which Parliament could be reasonably called upon to grant for the purpose, we should arrive at what would really be the proper and normal point for promotion in the Army. I do not think it much matters whether promotion in the Ordnance Corps and in the Line is exactly on a level. With an increased flow of promotion in the Ordnance Corps there will be no lack of candidates. I do not deny that there is a great deal to be said in favour of the principles of promotion either by advancement in rank or retirement. I am anxious that the House should see I do not wish, as far as I am concerned, to disguise the difficulties of this question. It is one of the most delicate subjects it is possible to conceive; but, at the same time, I believe that everything that has been done has been done with the best desire to promote the interests of these corps and of the service generally; and whatever may be the feelings and sentiments of individuals on the subject, I am convinced in my own mind that the proposition submitted by the Government was one which the Secretary of State for War honestly desires to put forward in the best interests of the Army in general, and without any undue advantage to specific corps.

The Marquess of Lansdowne

LORD SANDHURST: My Lords, it is with regret that on this occasion I find myself compelled to adopt a course in opposition to the Government. But the question which is involved is one of so much importance to the Army at large, and is one which so much affects not only the present but the future administration of the Army in most weighty particulars, that I should be wanting in my duty if I were restrained by party allegiance from recording the convictions which I hold in relation to it. My Lords, the question comprehends the consideration of equity in the largest sense on the part of the Government towards a great body of officers in the service of Her Majesty. I entirely agree with what has been said by the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches with regard to the extraordinary difficulties attending the question of the promotion of the officers of the Artillery and Engineers, and the insurance of a due flow of promotion in those corps. I also entirely agree in the necessity of preventing angry feeling between the different corps of Her Majesty's service, and of avoiding causes of heart-burning, disappointment, and irritation. The illustrious Duke has very accurately described what are the feelings of officers with reference to the point of supersession. It has been very truly said that there is no point on which officers feel so acutely—are so sensitive, so touchy. Well, my Lords, if this be so—and there can be no doubt of the truth of it—what is so likely to produce feelings of acerbity and disappointment, and to promote that heart-burning and jealousy between different portions of the service, as a leap-frog exceptional promotion in favour of one portion and to the disadvantage of all the others—a leap-frog process which is entirely at variance with the conditions hitherto understood by officers at large since they entered the Army? It was my lot, when serving in another quarter of the globe, to assist at deliberations with regard to operations of promotion in the Indian Armies of a character somewhat analogous to that under consideration. My voice was, unfortunately, not listened to. I was of opinion that promotion of an exceptional character, with new institutions, should not be adopted—at all events, to affect the existing generation. The warnings which I ventured to utter were unavailing, and the consequence was that a feeling arose in the Armies of India—a feeling which was not confined to the officers in that country only, but which was developed and extended even in England. Thus, we had Committees sitting in London, formed of officers of those Armies, for the purpose of influencing the Legislature and of exercising a direct control over the Executive. Surely I am not wrong in saying that nothing can be more dangerous, nothing more mischievous, nothing more contrary to our constitutional principles, than such a state of things. This state of things was caused by the exceptional system of promotion then adopted. First one set of officers was touched, then another. It was impossible to meet all the claims of different kinds that arose, and it ended at last in concessions being made which very severely taxed the revenues of India. I do not apprehend now any serious consequences of this character; but, still, I say that the forbearance of our officers cannot be a reason for us, if we contemplate what I believe to be an injustice. Let us view this consideration from another point. The rank of major was merged in that of lieutenant colonel in the Royal Artillery, as I understand, a few years after the Peninsular War, in order to give them the advantage of two steps at once, for the purpose of accelerating their promotion. About 15 years ago Government followed suit in this lery, the rank of major being merged in matter in the Indian regiments of Artillery—that of lieutenant colonel. This was felt most keenly in the seniority services of India, as it entailed very serious disadvantages on the officers of the other arms. It actually occurred, when I had the honour of being Commander-in-Chief in the Presidency of Bombay, that the Adjutant General of that Army considered it incumbent on himself to memorialize Government regarding the injury thus done to him. Thus, my Lords, we had the spectacle of an adjutant-general, the representative of discipline, memorializing the Government against what he conceived to be a personal injustice to himself!

The Duke of Cambridge

Let us now reflect on what is the case under consideration. A great organic reform was carried last year in the face of a strong opposition. That organic reform caused a large body of officers in the Army to lose the advantages which they believed had been secured to them by a great expenditure of money on their part. If you consider the fact that the system then abolished was an old and established one—one which had come to be a part of the habits of this country—one which, though nominally against the law, had the acquiescence of the Legislature and of the highest Executive—if you think of the advantages taken away from the officers who had spent their money, with a view to those advantages, I believe you must admit that there is a large consideration due to them; that a great point of equity is involved before we add to the disadvantages they have already incurred. I, as you know, was an ardent advocate for the abolition of purchase; but I felt that the opponents of that measure had a very strong argument when they said that officers below the rank of lieutenant-colonel had bought the right to purchase onwards, and so, if they could, obtain more rapid promotion. This consideration particularly affects the rank about to be prejudiced by the favour shown to the first captains of Artillery and Engineers; for it was with a view to the ultimate promotion to the rank of lieutenant-colonel that officers in the Cavalry gave from £5,000 to £6,000 for a troop, and officers in the Infantry from £2,000 to £3,000 for a company. Thus, these officers expended large sums of money, not merely for the purpose of exercising subordinate commands, but in order to obtain the right of purchasing onwards to the higher regimental ranks, and no compensation was afforded them when they lost that great privilege. And now it is proposed to add to the very considerable sacrifice they were then called upon to make. When we are told of the grievances of the Artillery, our informants invariably forget that officers in the Artillery and Engineers receive for their services a fair professional income, which, although their promotion is rather slow, is a great make-weight in their favour, as compared with the position of the officers in the Cavalry and Infantry; for the latter, in reaching the higher regimental rank, have positively hitherto given their services to the country for nothing. Last year the Secretary of State for War declared that the officers of corps, which had been Purchase Corps, but in which purchase was about to be abolished, would in no wise suffer in their future relative position to the rest of the Army. If the measure now proposed be carried into execution, it cannot be said that that pledge will have been redeemed. I say this, because I cannot accept the assertion of the noble Marquess that the amount of supersession involved in the new scheme will be very slight. I have examined the tabular statements referred to by the noble and gallant Lord who brought forward the Motion now under consideration; and, according to those statements, I am able to say that it is shown that a large amount of supersession will be inflicted on the Cavalry and Infantry, not only with regard to the last step of rank, but actually with reference to the number of years which officers have served in the Army. I am not, of course, in a position at present to verify the accuracy of those statements; but I believe them to be correct. At all events, the very difference of opinion which exists between the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Abinger) and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), in reference to the nature and amount of supersession, forms in itself a very fair and a very sufficient ground for inquiry. The whole question raised by the Motion before the House naturally divides itself into three branches—firstly, there is the consideration of the supersession of officers; secondly, the real interests of the Royal Artillery officers; and, thirdly, the interests of Her Majesty's service, and, therefore, of the State at large. With regard to the first point, I need add nothing more; but there is one consideration to which I am bound to invite the attention of your Lordships. Thus, a comparison has been frequently drawn out-of-doors—and it has been repeated in this House to-night—which is eminently in favour of Artillery officers, and in depreciation of officers of Cavalry and Infantry. Now, as I entirely disagree to the propositions thus confidently stated, I propose to join issue upon them, and to subject them to a slight test of argument. It is said that the responsibilities of Artillery officers are greater than those of officers of Cavalry and Infantry of similar rank; that the Artillery officers have charge of horses, and so on, and these are among the reasons adduced for the proposed measure. Now, it often happens in time of war that either but one field officer is left with the regiment or battalion, or none at all. In either case, superior duties of an important character devolve on the senior captains, who thus find themselves in command of either the regiment or of wings of Cavalry or Infantry—that is, of considerable bodies of Her Majesty's troops in the face of an enemy. In the case of a siege, it is a matter of daily occurrence that a captain is in command of trenches with four or five companies under him, with all the heavy responsibilities attendant on such a position. Now, I would ask, are not the duties and responsibilities of a captain, who is thus employed in the trenches—the men who are under him being in close grips with the enemy—of a more important character than the responsibility of a captain of Artillery, who is 1,200 yards in the rear, covering the attack with his fire? Surely, we know something of the qualities requisite in the officer who leads his men in attack “through the imminent deadly breach.” He must be a man of great character and power in every sense of the word. We know something of the value of personal influence in such circumstances, and of what is due to the character, bearing, and conduct of the man to whom the general in command looks on such an occasion. But, again, if we leave the scene of war, and refer to what is called the state of peace, the duties of the two classes of officers again show differences of a similar kind. Does it ever happen that the Artillery or the Engineers are called out in aid of the civil Power? This duty, which is of the most difficult and delicate kind, devolves on the officers of the Infantry and Cavalry. When the civil Power and the populace are in conflict, everything depends on the prudence and conduct of the officer in command of the troops whose services have been required. That duty is very generally performed by officers of the rank of captain; and, as I have said, it is difficult to exaggerate its importance, the delicacy of its character, and the personal risk and responsibility which it involves—this being frequently and more especially seen in Ireland. Surely, it is a fair question to ask if duties of this character are to be subordinated to the charge of stores? The noble Marquess referred to the personal responsibility of battery commanders, and to certain orders lately issued for the purpose of giving greater utility to the Artillery arm. But, whilst it is understood that a larger margin is to be allowed to commanders of Artillery, we must not be led to believe that in actions of importance, where Artillery is massed, the duty of placing guns in position will be left to captains of Artillery. The duty of choosing such a position is far too serious to be relegated to an inferior officer. It must be carefully looked to by the lieutenant-colonels of Artillery themselves; and, what is more, no general officer who cares for the safety of the troops under his command and his own reputation would be content to rest the placing of his artillery, without correction, under his own eye. I am not stating any novelties; I am merely describing conduct which must be suggested by the commonest prudence and all experience. In such matters the commander of the corps d'armées looks to himself only, and, if possible, will not trust to the eyes or reports of others.

Lord Sandhurst

Great stress was laid by the noble Marquess upon certain actuarial calculations. But it is surely difficult to attribute much value to them if they be subjected to even a slight examination. They all refer to facts connected with the Army when it was under the purchase system; but they do not touch upon what the condition of the Army will be when the purchase system having been abolished for some years, promotion comes to rest entirely on the new regulations. I am aware of the pledge given last year by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with reference to the promotion of Line officers, and I was happy to hear that pledge repeated again to-night by the noble Marquess. But it must be understood we are dealing with promises only, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not in any manner shown how he intends to redeem that pledge. With regard to the question immediately before the House, and the value of the actuarial calculations to the parties concerned, let us take the case of the garrison of Malta, where there are some seven or eight garrison batteries which are commanded at Malta pretty much as a single battalion of Infantry is commanded in the same garrison. Each of these batteries will then come to have a major, who in the ordinary course and friction of garrison duty will supersede all the captains of the Line who were but yesterday the seniors of the new majors. This is surely not likely to conduce very much to harmony and content, and it does seem that the brigade of Artillery at Malta will have a superfluity of field officers. When we say that each brigade, in its existing form, has six field officers, we really very much understate the case; for, as your Lordships are aware, there are a great many situations both in England and in India of an administrative and executive and a manufacturing character. Now, I believe I am right in stating that whenever an officer of whatever rank is removed to one of these situations from the military branch proper he is seconded, and promotion throughout the regiment follows in consequence. Therefore, the Artillery regiment has already many more field officers than are represented by the proportion allotted to the batteries. But let us see how the proportion stands. In the horse brigades of England there are 6 field officers and 8 batteries to a brigade; in the field battery brigades the establishment stands at 6 field officers and 10 batteries. But in India the field officers are more numerous in proportion to the batteries. An Indian horse brigade has 5 batteries and 5 field officers; or, practically, 1 field officer to each battery.

I have alluded to what was done after the Peninsular War with regard to the promotion to lieutenant-colonel. I have had the curiosity to look into The Army List of this month, and there I find that the junior lieutenant-colonel of Artillery is an officer of 24 years' standing. By his late promotion he has not only superseded 60 or 70 captains, but 300 or 400 majors, or whatever their number may be, who lately stood above him, and a vast number of whom must have been far longer in the service than he has been. Now, my Lords, this is an example of a point alluded to by the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge). This supersession is one to which the Army has been accustomed for a long time, and takes it as a matter of course: it is not resented because it has become a habit; whereas a novelty, involving similar consequences, cannot but cause great discontent, and is resisted accordingly. With reference to the real interests of the Artillery regiment itself, I cannot bring myself to believe that the proposed measure will produce the results aimed at by the Committees of 1867 and 1869. It seems to me that to confer a boon upon a small class of officers does in truth produce the very reverse of what was the object of those Committees—namely, to ensure a certain flow of promotion throughout the regiment. It is a principle of human nature that if you make the position of individuals more important and more comfortable you render them more desirous to stop where they are, which, then, of course, must act as a bar to the promotion of their juniors. I venture to say, then, with all respect to the noble Marquess, that the granting of this boon of promotion to a certain number of officers, or, to use the phrase of the Duke, creating majors out of the present materials, will not answer the object of the Committees. That point has not been made out. If I could bring myself to believe that, under all the circumstances, the object of those Committees would be in any, even in the slightest, degree attained, I should almost be inclined to waive my opinions on the subject, strong as they are. We have, however, no security that such a result would follow. On the contrary, I believe the result will be that the second captains, and the many hundreds of subaltern officers in the Artillery regiment, will be worse off than they were before. I think a strong case may be made out on the part of those Artillery officers, that they are about to be prejudiced in favour of a small class in their own regiment.

We have now to consider whether the matter as proposed to be arranged is for the general public advantage. We have been told that the country desires the proposed measure. I entirely disagree from the view that this particular Artillery question has been considered by the country at all—indeed, it appears to me to be just one of those subjects of which what is called the country is absolutely ignorant; but I do believe that the public are alive to the necessity of insuring a proper flow of promotion in those regiments, and that the interests of the Army, and therefore of the State, are involved in the same. But I must again ask the question, if this is insured by conferring a particular boon on a small class, as now proposed? But, in truth, after the organic change of last year, what is wanted is a full experience of the facts of the Army after sufficient time shall have elapsed. I think it is a matter to be deplored, when looking at the whole from this point of view, that we should commence tinkering one part of the service before a complete scheme is proposed. As yet, it is impossible for the Secretary of State to judge of the results of his measures, or for your Lordships to be able to give an opinion upon them. For my own part, I should much prefer to see all these matters remain in statu quo for three or four years to come. We have had many inquiries into military matters of late years—perhaps it may be thought too many; but, with regard to the particular question before the House, I am certain it is impossible to do justice to it without a most searching investigation of the facts, stated so ably by my noble and gallant Friend opposite, and as to whether the scheme was likely to further the object which the Committees of 1867 and 1869 had in view. For these reasons, I would express my earnest hope that the Government will see fit to accede to the Motion of the noble and gallant Lord opposite.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I am afraid it is not possible for me to give my noble and gallant Friend the satisfaction he desires by promising that the Government will advise Her Majesty to issue the Commission. My noble and gallant Friend in some of the last remarks he addressed to your Lordships seemed to be inconsistent with himself and somewhat harsh towards my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. My noble and gallant Friend said he would leave all these questions alone, and would not touch the question of retirement at all for three or four years to come, at all events. He complained, also, of my right hon. Friend because he said he had given a pledge which he had taken no measures to enforce. My Lords, the Government has not taken measures to maintain the standard rate of promotion because the time has not arrived to take them. Neither according to the pledge given, nor according to the views of the noble and gallant Lord himself, has the time for taking those measures arrived. The noble and gallant Lord is rather fond of speaking of the pledges which he says have been given. I am well aware of one pledge to which allusion has been made by the noble Marquess behind me (the Marquess of Lansdowne), and which has been renewed to-night on behalf of the Government—namely, that, when the time comes, it would, in the opinion of the Government, be right to take measures for maintaining the standard of promotion. My noble and gallant Friend also alluded vaguely to another pledge given by Mr. Cardwell as to officers in the late Purchase Corps retaining their relative positions in the Army;—now it would have been well if my noble and gallant Friend had given us a quotation from a speech in which such a pledge was embodied—that would only have been right and fair when he charged Mr. Cardwell with having given a pledge which he had not kept. I am a little inclined to think that the noble and gallant Lord has unintentionally confused the supposed pledge to which he has now alluded with that renewed by the Under Secretary to-night—namely, that when it is necessary measures shall be taken to maintain the standard rate of promotion. I do not propose to go into the question raised as to the comparative importance of the position of a captain in the Artillery and one in the Line. It is very undesirable that comparisons of that description, which must necessarily be in their nature somewhat invidious, should be made in this House. I am bound to say I failed to catch the bearing of the main argument by which the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Sandhurst) endeavoured to prove the greater importance, as he appeared to think it, of the position of a captain in the Infantry or Cavalry over that of a captain in the Artillery or Engineers. Doubtless it is true a man may go into action a captain and come out in command of a battalion; it is possible he may be a lieutenant-colonel when he comes out, or entitled to be promoted to that rank—and so may a captain of Artillery. The noble and gallant Lord said that a captain of Infantry in face of the enemy was in a position of greater importance than a captain of Artillery 1,200 miles in the rear—of course the noble and gallant Lord did not mean that distance, but he said it. I admit that a captain of Infantry before the enemy is in a position of much greater importance and responsibility than a captain of Artillery in the rear; and it may be as truly said that a captain in face of the enemy is in a position of much greater importance and responsibility than a general officer commanding troops at home. There is one thing to be borne in mind, about which there will be no contest whatever, and it is that the present position of the Ordnance Corps in regard to promotion is admitted on all hands to be an unsatisfactory position, and one which ought not to be continued. But this is not a new question. The acknowledged existence of the evil led to the appointment of a Committee in 1867, and its Report was considered by two successive Governments, each of whom, notwithstanding the authority of the Committee, said it was impossible for any Government to adopt the plan it proposed. It was therefore laid aside, and the Government had to consider how they could otherwise provide for promotion in the Ordnance Corps. Whether it is done by the method proposed now by the Secretary of State, or by a measure expediting retirement in the higher ranks, in either case, there must inevitably be a certain amount of supersession. The proposal to stimulate retirement in the lower ranks has been completely disposed of by the noble Lord, who has shown the mischief it would produce to the best interests of the service. The illustrious Duke touched the main point in the question when he told us there was no question upon which officers in the Army were so susceptible as the question of supersession; and, although he said most truly that civilians could not fully appreciate their feelings, I can do so to some extent, from the connection I have had with the War Office and with the India Office; and I desire to speak of that susceptibility with every consideration and respect. As the illustrious Duke told us, the supersession now complained of results from the new arrangements for the Artillery and the Engineers. The jump from captain to lieutenant-colonel must produce supersession not only of the senior captains of the Line, but also of the majors; and you cannot expedite promotion by retirement without encountering a supersession of that kind. That being so, it is for your Lordships seriously to consider whether you think it desirable to prescribe a mode in which arrangements of this description shall be carried out. That is the practical effect of the vote which your Lordships are about to give on a Motion which distinctly aims at condemning the conclusion at which military authorities have arrived after the fullest consideration. The pledge of the Government is to maintain the standard of promotion laid down by Sir John Pakington; and I cannot admit that in matters of this kind you are to look to individual cases and not to general averages—for such a principle, carried out to any extent, would prevent your making any change whatever in your Army, however much it might be required. This is a question which must be settled one way or another, and I contend that it cannot be settled without some supersession. I cannot conclude these remarks without congratulating the noble and gallant Lord opposite (Lord Abinger) upon the fair manner in which he brought this question forward, and the able and temperate manner in which he discussed it.

Lord Sandhurst

EARL DE LA WARR said, that in the correct estimate which had been formed of the amount of direct and immediate supersession which would result from the contemplated measure of the Government, in reference to promotion in the Artillery and Engineers, it had been forgotten that purchase officers—colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors—were retiring from the Army at the rate of 64 a-month, that this occasioned a flow of promotion which would last for many years, and that there was no such outlet for promotion in the case of the Artillery and Engineers. There was no occasion to rely on rough conjectural calculations, because quotations had been made that night from unimpeachable actuarial tables, and these showed that supersessions could endure only for a short time. If those superseded officers were dissatisfied with their lot, let them come to the Purchase Commission Office and they would get their money in a very few days. It was because he believed no injustice would be done that he should support Her Majesty's Government in resisting this Motion; because he saw in their scheme an earnest, for the future, of a just consideration for the privileges, professional interests, and position of the scientific branches of the Army. He hoped their Lordships would not agree to the Motion of the noble Lord, for it had been distinctly proved by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) that there was no need for inquiry, because in future there would be no just cause of complaint.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he must confess that if he had not been aware of the distinguished military position of the noble and gallant Earl who had last spoken (Earl De La Warr)—a position to which his gallantry quite entitled him—he should not have gathered that he belonged to the military profession from the speech he had just heard. The noble and gallant Earl had failed to answer a single point advanced by his noble Friend who brought forward this subject. The remarks of the noble and gallant Earl appeared to him to resolve themselves into this—these superseded officers might have injustice to complain of at present, but, inasmuch as they had a pledge from the Government, they had no right to complain, because everything would be set right in a very short time. In the very few remarks he had to make on this important subject, he should endeavour to follow the example set by the illustrious Duke, who had upon this occasion spoken in a manner so well-befitting the position he held at the head of the Army, and the line of conduct he had laid down for himself, and which he always expected the illustrious Duke would pursue. The illustrious Duke appeared carefully to avoid giving an opinion on either side of the question; he rather took on himself the office of a judge who laid before the jury both sides of the case; and if, on the one hand, he admitted that there was some force in the remarks of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), he also, he thought, admitted that there was equal force in the statement of his noble Friend (Lord Abinger) behind him. He did not think the illustrious Duke committed himself of an opinion of any sort or kind; and, considering the position the illustrious Duke occupied, he was very glad he had not pronounced an opinion on the matter. For himself, what he (the Duke of Richmond) objected to was that the plan of the Government was, according to the statement of the noble Marquess himself, neither one thing nor the other. The noble Marquess treated it as a system of retirement. If it was so, it was a sham system of retirement, because it dealt piecemeal with what ought to be dealt with as a whole. No doubt, in the Scientific Corps promotion had been slow, but the constitution of the Royal Artillery and the rest of the Army was totally different. He did not mean to draw any distinction as to their respective merits, and he was extremely sorry to think that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had given the idea of drawing invidious distinctions between the merits of the two branches of the service. In point of fact, the officers of the Army who voluntarily underwent the severe examinations for the Staff College showed that they possessed very high qualifications, while those of the Royal Artillery did not pass any examination after the first. He (the Duke of Richmond) had said that as a scheme of retirement there was nothing in the plan of the Government—and as a means of advancing promotion that was the very thing it would not do; for if the first captains in the Royal Artillery were made majors, the promotion in the junior ranks would not be so rapid. Within six months of the revolution which had occurred in the Army they were beginning at the wrong end—beginning with a small scheme when it ought to be a large and comprehensive one, a scheme which would cause a great deal of heart-burning and unpleasant feeling in other branches of the service; and he did not think it for the benefit of the service that such a scheme should be adopted. He thought the proposal of his noble and gallant Friend behind him (Lord Abinger) was a very fair one. He only asked for inquiry—he did not condemn the system except so far as to make out a case for inquiry. He (the Duke of Richmond) thought inquiry was necessary; and it should be conducted by a Royal Commission, because the appointment of its Members would rest with the Advisers of Her Majesty, and they might then hope those appointed would come to a conclusion that would give general satisfaction.

Earl De La Warr

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE wished to say one word in explanation. He hoped he had said nothing that could be interpreted into an attempt to draw any such invidious distinction between the two branches of the service as had been suggested by the noble Duke who had just sat down. He had expressed no opinion with regard to the military bearings of this question. As to the Staff College, officers went to that college for purposes of their own, and that had nothing to do with the question under discussion.

On Question? Their Lordships divided: Contents, 42; Not-Contents, 39; Majority, 3.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with white staves.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 18th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 17] reported—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Review of Justices' Decisions * [190].

Third Reading—Court of Chancery (Funds) * [140]; Customs and Inland Revenue * [106]; Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension * [188], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

IRELAND—MURDER OF MRS. NEILL AT RATHGAR—ALTAR DENUNCIATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the statement in the public journals that Mrs. Neill addressed a letter to the Lord Lieutenant, specifying the priest by whom, and other circumstances connected with the altar denunciation on the Sunday preceding her murder, is true; and, if so, whether any measures were taken in consequence of such communication?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, no communication was addressed by Mrs. Neill to the Lord Lieutenant. On the 25th May, however, she wrote to a constable to inquire whether a priest had commented on her proceedings, on Sunday the 19th. That letter was forwarded by the constable to the Irish Government; but it was not received at the Castle till after the murder, which took place on the 27th. As to the alleged denunciation, the facts, as reported by the constabulary, were these—The priest on Sunday the 19th, after celebrating mass, alluded to the eviction of Welsh, and recommended the parishioners to defray the expenses of his case, promising to head the subscription himself with £5, and making arrangements for a collection in the evening. But no subscriptions were received. There was no denunciation either in the priest's chapel, or any other.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 31.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 65 (Conscience clause.)

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved in page 25, line 18, before "secular," insert "elementary." The hon. Member said it was necessary to insert this Amendment, in order to prevent any difficulty which might arise in some of the schools which were open continuously from eight o'clock in the morning till four o'clock in the afternoon.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ANDERSON moved in line 18, after "day" insert—

"And no religious catechism or religious formula which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in the school."

The hon. Member said, the question raised was one upon which there was great divergence of opinion in Scotland, but it was one of great importance. He night from unimpeachable actuarial tables, and these showed that supersessions could endure only for a short time. If those superseded officers were dissatisfied with their lot, let them come to the Purchase Commission Office and they would get their money in a very few days. It was because he believed no injustice would be done that he should support Her Majesty's Government in resisting this Motion; because he saw in their scheme an earnest, for the future, of a just consideration for the privileges, professional interests, and position of the scientific branches of the Army. He hoped their Lordships would not agree to the Motion of the noble Lord, for it had been distinctly proved by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) that there was no need for inquiry, because in future there would be no just cause of complaint.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he must confess that if he had not been aware of the distinguished military position of the noble and gallant Earl who had last spoken (Earl De La Warr)—a position to which his gallantry quite entitled him—he should not have gathered that he belonged to the military profession from the speech he had just heard. The noble and gallant Earl had failed to answer a single point advanced by his noble Friend who brought forward this subject. The remarks of the noble and gallant Earl appeared to him to resolve themselves into this—these superseded officers might have injustice to complain of at present, but, inasmuch as they had a pledge from the Government, they had no right to complain, because everything would be set right in a very short time. In the very few remarks he had to make on this important subject, he should endeavour to follow the example set by the illustrious Duke, who had upon this occasion spoken in a manner so well-befitting the position he held at the head of the Army, and the line of conduct he had laid down for himself, and which he always expected the illustrious Duke would pursue. The illustrious Duke appeared carefully to avoid giving an opinion on either side of the question; he rather took on himself the office of a judge who laid before the jury both sides of the case; and if, on the one hand, he admitted that there was some force in the remarks of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), he also, he thought, admitted that there was equal force in the statement of his noble Friend (Lord Abinger) behind him. He did not think the illustrious Duke committed himself of an opinion of any sort or kind; and, considering the position the illustrious Duke occupied, he was very glad he had not pronounced an opinion on the matter. For himself, what he (the Duke of Richmond) objected to was that the plan of the Government was, according to the statement of the noble Marquess himself, neither one thing nor the other. The noble Marquess treated it as a system of retirement. If it was so, it was a sham system of retirement, because it dealt piecemeal with what ought to be dealt with as a whole. No doubt, in the Scientific Corps promotion had been slow, but the constitution of the Royal Artillery and the rest of the Army was totally different. He did not mean to draw any distinction as to their respective merits, and he was extremely sorry to think that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had given the idea of drawing invidious distinctions between the merits of the two branches of the service. In point of fact, the officers of the Army who voluntarily underwent the severe examinations for the Staff College showed that they possessed very high qualifications, while those of the Royal Artillery did not pass any examination after the first. He (the Duke of Richmond) had said that as a scheme of retirement there was nothing in the plan of the Government—and as a means of advancing promotion that was the very thing it would not do; for if the first captains in the Royal Artillery were made majors, the promotion in the junior ranks would not be so rapid. Within six months of the revolution which had occurred in the Army they were beginning at the wrong end—beginning with a small scheme when it ought to be a large and comprehensive one, a scheme which would cause a great deal of heart-burning and unpleasant feeling in other branches of the service; and he did not think it for the benefit of the service that such a scheme should be adopted. He thought the proposal of his noble and gallant Friend behind him (Lord Abinger) was a very fair one. He only asked for inquiry—he did not condemn the system except so far as to make out a case for inquiry. He (the Duke of Richmond) thought inquiry was necessary; and it should be conducted by a Royal Commission, because the appointment of its Members would rest with the Advisers of Her Majesty, and they might then hope those appointed would come to a conclusion that would give general satisfaction.

Earl De La Warr

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE wished to say one word in explanation. He hoped he had said nothing that could be interpreted into an attempt to draw any such invidious distinction between the two branches of the service as had been suggested by the noble Duke who had just sat down. He had expressed no opinion with regard to the military bearings of this question. As to the Staff College, officers went to that college for purposes of their own, and that had nothing to do with the question under discussion.

On Question? Their Lordships divided: Contents, 42; Not-Contents, 39; Majority, 3.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with white staves.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 18th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 17] reported—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Education (Scotland) [31]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Review of Justices' Decisions * [190].

Third Reading—Court of Chancery (Funds) * [140]; Customs and Inland Revenue * [106]; Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension * [183], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

IRELAND—MURDER OF MRS. NEILL AT RATHGAR—ALTAR DENUNCIATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the statement in the public journals that Mrs. Neill addressed a letter to the Lord Lieutenant, specifying the priest by whom, and other circumstances connected with the altar denunciation on the Sunday preceding her murder, is true; and, if so, whether any measures were taken in consequence of such communication?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, no communication was addressed by Mrs. Neill to the Lord Lieutenant. On the 25th May, however, she wrote to a constable to inquire whether a priest had commented on her proceedings, on Sunday the 19th. That letter was forwarded by the constable to the Irish Government; but it was not received at the Castle till after the murder, which took place on the 27th. As to the alleged denunciation, the facts, as reported by the constabulary, were these—The priest on Sunday the 19th, after celebrating mass, alluded to the eviction of Welsh, and recommended the parishioners to defray the expenses of his case, promising to head the subscription himself with £5, and making arrangements for a collection in the evening. But no subscriptions were received. There was no denunciation either in the priest's chapel, or any other.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 81.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 65 (Conscience clause.)

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved in page 25, line 18, before "secular," insert "elementary." The hon. Member said it was necessary to insert this Amendment, in order to prevent any difficulty which might arise in some of the schools which were open continuously from eight o'clock in the morning till four o'clock in the afternoon.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ANDERSON moved in line 18, after "day" insert—

"And no religious catechism or religious formula which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in the school."

The hon. Member said, the question raised was one upon which there was great divergence of opinion in Scotland, but it was one of great importance. He desired to render the Conscience Clause in the Scotch Act like that in the English Act, from which he had copied the words of his Amendment. One reason why that proposal was even more necessary in the Scotch than in the English Act was, that in Scotland the Act would be more generally compulsory, and therefore the rights of minorities ought to be more strictly protected. It was true the three great Presbyterian bodies desired that the Shorter Catechism should be taught in the schools; but the Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, Jews, Unitarians, and others formed, in the aggregate, a large minority, whose conscientious scruples ought to be regarded and protected from assault. It might be said that the children of parents who did not desire the religious teaching might withdraw during its progress; but though they did, a portion of their school fees would be appropriated to the payment of the teacher, and so another question of conscience would be raised. It was not enough that a clause in the Act affirmed that the Privy Council Grant was not given on religious instruction. That grant formed part of the general emoluments of the teacher, and if a school board could require the teacher to teach religion nominally for nothing, it became part of the work for which he received his emoluments, and was, practically, State-paid religious instruction. He would like to ask hon. Members what they would do next year in the case of Ireland, if they now allowed the Shorter Catechism to be taught in the school-board schools of Scotland? Some hon. Friends of his, no doubt, had pleasant recollections of the Shorter Catechism in their youth, and he would ask them, and other hon. Members who earnestly desired to see the Scotch grow up a religious people, whether to place the Shorter Catechism in the hands of people too young to understand it, was not likely to create a feeling of disgust and aversion against all religious education? He had no wish to proscribe religious teaching at proper times and places, whether by means of the Shorter Catechism or any other book; but he objected to its being so taught in the public schools by State-paid and rate-paid teachers.

Amendment proposed,

In page 25, line 18, after the word "day," to insert the words "and no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in any public school."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Mr. Anderson

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought, after the discussions which had taken place upon this question, there remained nothing new to be said with regard to it. The principle of the measure, to which he meant to adhere, was that, subject to the provisions of a Conscience Clause, the terms of which had been substantially adjusted, the matter of religious teaching was one which should be left to the people themselves, and that the statute should neither prescribe nor proscribe anything upon the subject. This provision to exclude all catechisms, creeds, and formularies was inconsistent with the principle which he had endeavoured to state. He should only like to observe further, that there was a manifest distinction in this matter between the cases of England and of Scotland. About 86 per cent of the people of Scotland were Presbyterians, and however much they might differ upon subjects of more or less importance, they generally agreed as to the religious education they desired for their children; and, therefore, by a statutory proscription of the Catechism, in which they were generally agreed, from the schools, a large number of the parents would be prevented sending their children to the schools. If he knew the people of Scotland aright, he knew that nothing could give a greater impulse to the life and vitality of the Catechism than its proscription by a clause in the Scotch Education Bill.

MR. GRAHAM said, he thought the hon. Gentleman had not really stated the bearing of his Amendment. The effect of the Amendment would be to exclude the Catechism not only from the rate-paid schools, but in the denominational schools also. He believed the Shorter Catechism to be valuable not only as an instrument of religious instruction, but as an instrument of mental cultivation; but he could not on that ground think of introducing it by Act of Parliament in the rate-aided schools. Parliament had no right to meddle with the question of religious teaching; and he thought it was with great wisdom that the Government proposed to relegate the question to the people of Scotland, who would have sufficient toleration and good sense not to abuse the power if it was conferred upon them.

MR. GRIEVE said, he thought proscription would be exceedingly wrong, and he entirely opposed the Amendment.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER suggested to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), who he believed wished to apply his Amendment only to public schools, the desirableness of inserting the word "public" before "schools" in his Amendment, on which he hoped a division would be taken. He should like to hear the Vice President of the Council upon this Amendment, which was copied from his own Act. He, for one, objected to the extraordinary way in which the English Act was quoted or left untouched in these discussions, just as might be most convenient to the supporters of the Bill. Now, for the first time, the ratepayers were called upon to support the schools, which had hitherto been done by the heritors, and therefore it was the more important that protection should be afforded to the consciences of the minority among the ratepayers. To teach the Shorter Catechism at the public expense would be to violate the rights of conscience. It might be said that the schoolmasters would be able from the Bible to give the same teaching that was given by means of the Catechism; but whether that was or was not the case, they desired Parliament to pronounce an opinion in favour of rendering religious teaching as comprehensive as possible, and against purely dogmatic teaching.

MR. ANDERSON said, he was willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. Baronet.

MR. W. E. FORSTER denied that it was proposed by the Bill to make the teaching of the Shorter Catechism compulsory. It would be no more compulsory than the reading of the Bible. People who objected to have their children taught the Shorter Catechism would make use of the Conscience Clause. He entirely denied the hon. Baronet's insinuation that the Government had played fast and loose with the English Act in these discussions. They had always stated that the circumstances of Scotland and England were different, and that the educational position and the feelings of the two countries must be taken into consideration. When, in the English

Bill, they proposed to exclude the Catechism, they did it on this ground—that it was a question of new schools which at first would be in a minority. The religious differences in England were great; there were large numbers on each side; and therefore it was thought advisable to exclude from the schools the teaching of the catechism of any particular sect. But in Scotland they were not introducing a comparatively small number of schools, but were about to change the position of the old and existing schools of a people who had few differences of religious opinions. In every parish school the Shorter Catechism was taught, and the effect of his hon. Friend's (Mr. Anderson's) Amendment would be to alter the mode of teaching, and oblige them to exclude the Shorter Catechism. That appeared to be a violent and unnecessary change.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the Government, to his utter astonishment, had reduced the religious teaching in the Scotch schools to a minimum, and religious instruction was now to be given for a very short time at the beginning of the day. Hitherto, the Shorter Catechism had been taught, and it would be a point of honour to teach it rather than the Bible the whole of the time that would be devoted to religious instruction. Now, believing that it would be wholesome and better that the time which had been curtailed by the action of the Government should be given to the teaching of the Bible, he thought the Committee would best promote the religious teaching of the Scotch children if they accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, from what he had heard of the action of the Scotch schools—and it had been confirmed by what he had seen in the two largest schools of Edinburgh—ample time would be given to religious instruction.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Then Amendment proposed—

"And no religious catechism or religious formula which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught in public schools."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought the effect of the proposal as amended would simply be to give a great impetus to denominational education, because it would outrage the feelings of the people of Scotland who were much attached to the Shorter Catechism.

MR. DIXON wished to call attention to the probable effect of the rejection of this Amendment. When discussing the English Act of 1870, it was urged that the result of passing a clause similar in spirit to the Amendment under discussion would be to render the teaching of an undenominational character. The effect of what was actually done, however, was to cause the school board to adopt a system of religious education suitable to the comprehension of the children to be taught. If the Amendment was rejected, the English school boards would be disposed to ask why they should act in a different manner from the Scotch boards, who would have the power to order the teaching of the Shorter Catechism in the board schools. If they gave the Scotch greater power over religious education than the English, they must give to the Irish still more power, because the Irish wanted more; and no doubt the Government would come to Parliament next year to say that in 1872 they had consulted the feelings of the Scotch people on the religious question, and in the same way they must consult the people of Ireland. The Government would base their Bill for Ireland on the same principle that they had adopted for Scotland. It was for this reason that he protested against any such principle, and it was a most dangerous one for the House to adopt.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not see how the proposed principle in the Scotch Bill was to be reconciled with the English Bill of 1870, because at the time of the passing of that Act there was a strong feeling in favour of liberty in respect of English formularies which had been denied them, but which the Government were going to grant to Scotland. He confessed to be a little jealous if Scotland was to be better off than England in this respect; but he thought they should be acting wrongly if they allowed that feeling to lead them to deny that liberty which they had claimed for themselves originally, but which they had not got. It might be said that they ought not to interfere with the conscientious scruples of those people who objected to formularies, and that it was better that they should be taught the Bible. That might be a good argument for its adoption in England; but it would be a mistake to lay down the same principle for Scotland. He took up the proposition of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), who did not see why formularies should not be considered applicable to England. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) did not see either why it should not be applicable, only it was too late. With regard to Ireland the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dixon) need not fear, because they had been repeatedly told by the Prime Minister that it was not intended to deal with primary education in Ireland. It was because he considered the principle of the Bill of 1870 the safest that he opposed the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson).

MR. C. S. PARKER opposed the Amendment as being contrary to the principle of the Bill. It would alienate much of the support which was given to the Bill in Scotland, and lead to practical difficulties in the working of the Bill. He thought the House was agreed that in legislating for Scotland they were to have some regard for the religious feeling of Scotland; but they had had the unblushing avowal of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) that no regard should be paid to their feelings. No one who knew Scotland would doubt that the effect of the Amendment would be to uproot the old traditional system that had been adopted in almost all the schools of Scotland. For this reason, he gave his most strenuous opposition to the Amendment.

MR. CRAUFURD maintained that the Amendment was not inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, which said that the State had nothing to do with religious teaching, leaving that to the parents and the Churches. The Amendment proposed to carry out that principle by saying that the school buildings supported by the public money should not be used for religious dogmatic teaching, but that it should be left in the hands of the parents and the ministers to provide it. How were they to be consistent if the money contributed from the rates and the public funds was to go for the teaching of dogmas in the schools? He saw no reason for applying the ratepayers' money in this way, and he denied that there was any difference of feeling in Scotland such as had been represented, and in proof of that he referred to a division which took place lately to ascertain the feelings of the Scotch Members on this subject.

MR. GORDON agreed that the Government had shown great inconsistency in this matter, because they followed the English Bill when it suited them, and rejected it when it did not suit them. In England, the Government had established a new system. In Scotland they had to deal with an ancient system which had given universal satisfaction, and it was by departing from this old system, instead of supplementing it, that the Government had involved themselves in these inconsistencies. He should certainly oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson).

MR. C. REED said, he hoped that as he did not often intrude upon the time of the House he might be allowed to say a few words upon the present subject, and more especially so as there was a more serious consideration in connection with it than had yet been raised. It should be remembered that, if the Amendment were rejected, it would seriously endanger the English Act which was now in operation. He perfectly agreed with what had been stated by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon); and the London School Board had adopted the course of proceeding to which the noble Lord had referred—namely, to give simple Bible instruction without any dogmatic teaching. They would do wisely, in his opinion, to adopt the Amendment, as its rejection might in the course of a few years cause to be broken up what otherwise might prove to be a national system of education throughout the Empire.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 250: Majority 120.

MR. M'LAREN moved, in line 21, at end of clause, add—

"Provided, That when religious instruction shall be given, the reading and teaching of the Bible shall form part of such instruction."

It might be objected to his Amendment that most of the school boards would teach the Bible whether they were required to do it or not. He at once admitted that, but it did not make it the less necessary that he should move this Amendment. It was undeniable that the teaching of the Bible was understood, and was in fact required in Scotland—the old Acts were full of expressions about religious teaching. He thought, therefore, that that was the most fitting opportunity for providing for the religious teaching of the Bible, and it ought not to be neglected. Hon. Members would observe that four hours of secular instruction were imperatively required, and that, either before or after that, religious instruction might be given. It was permitted only, but was not required; but his Amendment said, if the permissive power should be exercised, it should be so exercised that part of the instruction should be from the Bible. An argument in favour of the teaching of the Bible had not been mentioned, and it was this—that the evidence of a child who did not know the nature of an oath was not taken in criminal proceedings. Was it not the interest of the State to acquaint the child with the judgments of the Almighty and of the consequences attached to telling the true or the untrue? As they had rejected the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow, he thought the Government, in order to be consistent, must support his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided, That when religious instruction shall be given in any public school, the reading and teaching of the Bible shall form part of such instruction."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE LORD ADVOCATE trusted the Committee would not enter into the consideration of the Amendment, on the assumption that there was nothing whatever requiring or forbidding instruction in religion and religious observances by giving in schools the protection of the Conscience Clause to those who chose to send their children there. The Amendment now proposed was to enact that if there should be any teaching of religion in the public schools, the reading and teaching of the Bible should form part of it. That was to be a positive enactment, without any reference to the nature of the school, or to the age of the children, or the particular purpose for which the public school was endowed, or the instruction more suitable for the minds of the youth attending such schools; nevertheless they must, under pain of violating the Act of Parliament, teach them to read the Bible. Why should not this matter be left to the managers of the schools? Why should this be ordered by the statute on penalty of violating its provisions? He was quite aware that in all ordinary schools in Scotland the Bible would be read as a rule, nay, without an exception. It was at present so read without any statutory provision, and a statutory provision could hardly make its reading more universal than it was at present. Without such enactment, as a general rule, the Shorter Catechism was taught too; but that they had declined to make imperative. This Amendment seemed to him to be very different to that which was proposed by the hon. Gentleman only last week; because the Amendment last week was that instruction in the Bible should be the only religious teaching, but now it was to be only a part of the religious teaching, and there was to be some other instruction in religion to be given. The teaching of the Bible was not to be the whole. That was the plain meaning of it. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press this Amendment, because, as the clause now stood, there was no restriction on the liberty of reading or teaching the Bible.

MR. GRAHAM said, he hoped that the hon. Member would not press his Amendment, because in his view nothing could be more inexpedient. He trusted the time would never come when the Bible would be taught in Scotland simply because there was a provision to that effect in the Act of Parliament. He would far rather leave it to the Christian feeling of the people of Scotland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 189: Majority 59.

MR. CRUM-EWING moved, at end of clause, to add—"All payments for instruction in religious subjects shall be defrayed out of funds voluntarily provided." The hon. Gentleman said, that had the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) been agreed to, he might not have considered it necessary to move the one of which he had given Notice; but that Amendment having been negatived, he must now do so. The Scotch Bill, as regarded the religious difficulty, stood in a different position from the English Act.

In that Act the use of any religious catechism or religious formulary which was distinctive of any particular denomination was distinctly prohibited. But by the Bill now under consideration the school boards in Scotland would have the power to introduce any dogmatic teaching of which the majority of the board might approve. On that he would make no remark, as that part of the clause had passed; but he wished the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Privy Council had exerted his influence with the Lord Advocate to get him to assimilate the two Bills in this respect. He had prepared the Amendment which he was about to move with the view of rendering that part of the Bill less obnoxious to a very large portion of the community of Scotland as well as of England, who conscientiously held that the State went beyond its legitimate province when it did more than provide means of giving secular instruction. His Amendment was, that all instruction in religious subjects should be paid for out of the funds voluntarily provided; and he could not see how his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, as the representative of a Government which so lately refused to endow all sects in Ireland, could, with any regard to consistency, refuse to accept it. It would be out of place to go into any length of argument on the duty of the State in matters of religion; but he would take the liberty to make a few practical remarks on the subject now before the Committee. They might with certainty infer that the kind of religion which would be taught in the respective schools under the Bill would be according to the distinctive forms of the particular denomination to which the majority of the school board might belong—that where the majority were Presbyterians the Shorter Catechism would be taught, and if in any parish the Roman Catholics should predominate, there the formularies of that religion would be used. Well, if the Bill was allowed to remain so as to provide for teaching all religions out of State funds, he would ask what was that but the very scheme of concurrent endowment which the present Government, when in Opposition, so distinctly repudiated when proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Bill, it was true, provided that parents might withdraw their children from attendance when religious teaching or observances were going on; but if such religious instruction was to be paid for at the public expense—if not only money from the Imperial Treasury to which all contributed, but the money which was more directly paid as a special educational rate was to be used for what they did not approve—the most flagrant injustice would be inflicted, and if persisted in, they might expect a renewal of that dissatisfaction and resistance which was manifested in regard to church rates in England, and the annuity tax in Edinburgh, both of which they were compelled to abolish. If it be right to exempt children from such attendance, it surely could not be right to cause parents to pay for that from which they derived no benefit. The Roman Catholic minority in Scotland would, by the Bill as it now stood, be called on to contribute towards the teaching of the Presbyterian religion. Now, he for one, whatever he might have done in the way of contribution to other denominations as an individual, would vote against any measure that might have the effect of providing by legislative enactment for teaching Roman Catholicism or any other religion in Ireland or elsewhere, and he was not prepared to ask Roman Catholics to do for his religion what he would not do for them. But while desirous of keeping our hands clear of anything like State interference with religion, he was most anxious—indeed, considered it a matter of the highest importance—that where the inhabitants of a district wished their children to receive religious instruction, there should be no obstacle in the way of their making such teaching continuous with the assembling of the children for their secular instruction, provided always that they paid for it themselves. Feeling as he did that religion should permeate all teaching, he should have preferred that no distinction were made between secular and religious instruction; but under a Government Bill that was impossible with a due regard to varying religious convictions, and he must offer his decided opposition to such a system. As regarded the payment for religious instruction by voluntary means contemplated by his Amendment, there was nothing to be apprehended. He had no fear but the great bulk of the parents would be willing to pay for the religious instruction of their children, and where any were unable to do so, that the small amount required in the case would be easily made up in a country like Scotland where two-thirds of the people, of their own free will, and with their own means, had erected churches and manse, and provided for the maintenance of their clergy. He believed that what he proposed was in accordance with the conscientious opinions of a large portion of the people of Scotland, and of England too. It was held by many in the Free Church, and by not a few in the Established Church; while the following brief extract from a Petition which he had the honour to present from the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church showed that they were unanimous. They said—

“Your petitioners are strongly of opinion that it should be enacted that the local rates as well as the public grants should be applied only to the teaching of the secular branches of education in the national schools; that grants to denominational schools should be withdrawn.”

One word more as to Ireland. They must soon come to deal with the question of Irish education, and how were they prepared to do with that? Were they prepared to repeal the present national system of education and substitute a denominational one? He (Mr. Crum-Ewing) rather thought they were not; but if they enacted laws by which the State was to pay for religion in Scotland, how could they refuse the same thing to Ireland? He considered that, unless they were prepared to make such a thorough change in the whole system in Ireland, they were shut up to the adoption of such an Amendment as the one he proposed; and, if they did so, they could then mete out equal justice to both countries and to all religions.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words “all payments for instruction in religious subjects shall be defrayed out of funds voluntarily provided.”—(Mr. Crum-Ewing.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN observed that not only were there the Roman Catholics resident in Scotland, but many Protestant Dissenters—such as the Evangelical Union and others—who objected to the teaching of religious dogmas in the public schools, and he could not see with what justice they ought to be taxed for the promotion of the views of the minority. The minority, indeed, ought to withdraw their children from the schools. If they adopted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. Crum-Ewing), it would be the nearest approach they could make to a system of united religious and secular instruction, and to the solving of the religious difficulty.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he had only one or two words to say on the subject. In regard to the principle enunciated by his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, that the public money ought not to be paid for teaching religion, he agreed generally; but with reference to the public schools, he thought his hon. Friend would concur with him that it was impossible to carry out that principle with perfect integrity, without absolutely excluding the teaching of religion altogether from those schools—that was to say, from all buildings provided at the public expense. No doubt, it would be very advisable to allow all children to receive religious instruction at the expense of the parents alone; but it would be attended with the difficulty he had formerly pointed out arising from the habits and feelings of the people of Scotland. As a matter of practical utility, they were, he thought, quite prepared to make small sacrifices of infinitesimal points to secure a great good. With respect to the fees, they would be paid by those who attended, so that the voluntary principle contended for by his hon. Friend would be operative to that extent. He did not think that it would be wise to tell the people of Scotland that their children could only be permitted to receive religious instruction in the public schools by their paying something more than what they would otherwise have to pay or the schoolmasters to receive.

MR. MACFIE wished to know whether his hon. Friend would accept the following Amendment of his proposal—

“That no payment for instruction in religious subjects should be defrayed out of the funds provided or sanctioned by this Act?”

If he would not accept this suggestion, he should be obliged to go into the Lobby against him.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he could not accept what the hon. Member for Leith proposed, and if the hon. Gentleman walked into the Lobby against him,

Sir David Wedderburn

he would be as consistent as he had hitherto been.

MR. RICHARD supported the Amendment, which was of a character similar to that which he had endeavoured to introduce into the English Education Act. The phrase “religious instruction” was used with great vagueness. Hon. Gentlemen opposite used the phrase as if it represented a meaning in which they were all agreed; but that he very much doubted. What they were now asked to do was to sanction religious instruction in accordance with the Presbyterian faith; and the right hon. Gentleman wished members of all religions to join in that. Was he prepared to vote for the carrying out of that principle in the case of Roman Catholics? If not, he was inconsistent. He supported the Amendment as affording the only escape from all difficulties—the separation of secular from religious instruction. The Amendment was in harmony with the principle advocated by the late Lord Derby when introducing the Irish National School system, and with the views of Dr. Chalmers.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 85; Noes 230: Majority 145.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

And it being now Seven of the clock the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—(LORDS' BILLS).—RESOLUTION.

MR. MONK rose to move—

“That when any Bill shall be brought from the House of Lords the Questions ‘That this Bill be now read a first time,’ and ‘That this Bill be printed,’ shall be put by Mr. Speaker as soon as conveniently may be, and shall be decided without Amendment or Debate, and when any such Bill shall have remained upon the Table for twelve sitting days without any honourable Member proposing a day for the Second Reading thereof, such Bill shall not be proceeded with in the same Session.”

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 19th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Bastardy Laws Amendment * [109]; Imprisonment for Debt Abolition * [156], put off.

Committee—Report—Public Prosecutors [28-203].

Considered as amended—Sites for Places of Worship and Schools * [2].

Third Reading—Review of Justices' Decisions * [190], and passed.

Withdrawn—County Courts (Small Debts) (No. 2) * [121].

PARLIAMENT—ORDER AND PRACTICE —COUNTS OUT.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I am about to adopt a course which is only resorted to when something unusual has occurred in the Business of this House. Yesterday, when the House resumed at 9 o'clock, and the Business had recommenced, the hon. Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams) at two minutes and a-half past 9 o'clock, called your attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members in the House. At exactly 5 minutes past 9 you counted, and there were only 32 Members present. On yesterday week, and on the preceding Tuesday the same thing occurred. This is a matter that has attracted the attention of the Committee of this House on Public Business, and who unanimously passed a Resolution to the effect that if any hon. Member should call your attention to the fact that if there were not 40 Members present at 9 o'clock, or soon after, you should not count the House until a quarter past 9 o'clock. Now, I observe, that, on the Journal of the House, which is the record of our proceedings, it is entered that you, Sir, counted the House at a quarter past 9 o'clock yesterday; but it happened that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Hardcastle) was sitting next to me at that time and I called his attention to the exact time when the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bowring) was counted out. The Committee on Public Business unanimously came to the conclusion that the counting of the House so soon after it resumed, was taking an unfair advantage of the general body of the Members of this House; because it is impossible, considering the difference of time according to different clocks and watches, that hon. Members should be in their places here precisely at the moment that this clock points to 9 o'clock. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice, as Chairman of the Committee on Public Business, of a Resolution of that Committee. I shall, therefore, to-morrow, ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will not propose to the House to give effect to the Resolution of the Committee, and that I shall also move that, when an hon. Member calls your attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members in their places, the name of the hon. Member shall be taken down by the Clerk at the Table before you, Sir, proceed to count the House.

MR. SPEAKER: There being no Question before the House, and no Motion having been made by the hon. Member, the observations he has made are quite out of Order.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had inadvertently omitted to do so, but would then move the adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, it could not then be done, as he had directed the Clerk at the Table to proceed with the Orders of the Day.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS BILL—[BILL 28.]
(Mr. Spencer Walpole, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Eykyn, Mr. Rathbone.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that under the very peculiar circumstances of this Bill, it was impossible to say who was the promoter. He was not then about to discuss the question whether public prosecutors should or should not be appointed, but to call attention to the state of things before the House. The measure was introduced by a private Member (the right hon. and learned Recorder for London) early in the Session, and it was read a second time under protest for the accommodation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who was at the time in America, and with the understanding that the discussion should be taken on going into Committee. The Home Secretary in the meantime, however, had given Notice of a number of Amendments entirely altering the whole construction of the Bill; and in some respects they removed objections that existed to the establishment of public prosecutors. With regard to the expense that would be brought upon the Imperial Exchequer, he estimated that it would amount in salaries alone to a sum of £50,000 or £60,000 per annum, while the costs of prosecutions would very probably be likewise increased. It would be impossible then to enter into a discussion of the Bill, and the best course to be pursued would be to go into Committee pro forma, and introduce the Amendments, and then that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should resign the further conduct of the Bill to the Government. Two matters had been rather unfairly introduced into the Government Amendments, that would require explanation—namely, placing the cost of all prosecutions on the Imperial Exchequer, contingently on adoption of the Act by local authorities, while the adoption of the Act was left optional. He wished also to know if on the passing of the Bill, the establishment in Spring Gardens would be abolished. The Government had also introduced into the Bill, a clause for the payment of clerks of the peace by salary instead of fees, while there was another Bill before the House dealing with those officers in the same manner. He wanted to know on which of the two Bills the Government intended to rely? It was a very unusual and extraordinary proceeding to have a clause in two separate Bills to effect the same object in the same Session of Parliament, and both Bills promoted by private Members.

MR. WEST, who had given Notice of his intention to move that the House should go into Committee on the Bill on that day three months, said that the objectors to the Bill were placed in a position of great difficulty with regard to the Bill, in consequence of the course which Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to take in respect to it. One of the principal objections which had been taken to the measure, was the great expense which it was urged the Bill would entail upon the public; but down to the present time no information as to the probable cost to the public of the appointment of public prosecutors had been laid before the House, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Home Office having declined to produce the result of an investigation that had been instituted into the subject, on the ground that it was a confidential communication. On Saturday last a list of the Amendments proposed by the Government was placed in the hands of hon. Members, and he regretted that neither of the Law Officers of the Crown was present to give the House some explanation of those Amendments, which were of so extraordinary a character as to give rise to the suspicion that they had been extracted from the pages of a comic journal. In fact, those who had come down to oppose the Public Prosecutors Bill as it was read a second time now found that it had ceased to exist, for the Amendments proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had swept away the whole of the first and second pages of the Bill; while only one line of the original Bill was left in the third page, and so on to the end of the chapter; and in short, it would be found that so far from its being a Public Prosecutors Bill, it would deal with entirely different subjects. Perhaps the House would be surprised to hear that by these Amendments the right hon. Gentleman would be empowered, without consultation with the Lord Chancellor or any one of Her Majesty's Judges, to alter the whole criminal law of the land, and to have the supreme direction of such trifles as trial by jury, writs of error, questions of law to be reserved, proceedings before Justices, or other criminal proceedings which public prosecutors were or were not to institute. [Mr. BRUCE explained that the law upon those points was not to be altered.] Under those circumstances, he must confess that his understanding was not sufficiently lofty to enable him to comprehend the meaning of these Amendments. He objected to give such power to the Home Secretary as would enable him at his own will and pleasure to alter our whole criminal law, and without at that moment making the Motion of which he had given Notice, that the House should go into Committee on the Bill that day three months, he left the matter in the hands of the House, and would take whatever course they might think would be the best under the circumstances.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, that the former opposition to the Bill appeared to be confined to two questions, one of which was whether the appointment of a public prosecutor should be limited to the metropolitan district; and the other, whether the Secretary of State should be empowered to divide the country into districts for similar appointments, wherever the justices or town councils concurred in the arrangement. These objections had been considered by the Government, as well as by his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder, and the other hon. Members whose names appeared on the back of the Bill; and, to speak the plain truth, he regarded the compulsory appointment of such an officer for the Central Criminal Court district as a wise alteration in the measure. With respect to the other question, affecting the rest of the country, he had as little doubt as on the first one, and he could only repeat what he said on the second reading, that it was really a disgrace—and he used the word advisedly—that England was the only country in the world where prosecutions for crime should mostly be left at the mercy of private individuals, who might or might not proceed with them as they thought fit. In his opinion, therefore, it was a matter of great importance that they should ascertain how far they were agreed in carrying out the principle of appointing public prosecutors. As to the two main objections which were urged against the Bill, he thought the Amendments intended to be moved by the Government would deal wisely with those parts of the Bill to which those objections applied. He hoped the result of this discussion would show that the House wished, in the first place, that public prosecutors should be confined to the Central Criminal Court; and, in the second place, that an opportunity should be given for the appointment of a public prosecutor in any provincial district where such an appointment might be desired by the local authorities. The Bill might be regarded as divisible into two parts—one relating to the appointment of public prosecutors, and the other relating to the mode in which the expenses of prosecutions should hereafter be paid. Excepting as to the mode in which it was now proposed to defray those expenses, he denied that the Bill was entirely new as compared with its original form. However, the question before the House might be said to be, whether they were in a position to go into Committee to consider that part of the Bill which remained practically the same, for he never would press upon the attention of the House anything which they had not had a fair opportunity of examining. His anxiety that the Bill should be proceeded with arose from the fear that, as it was the measure of private Members, and not of the Government, they would have no other day on which to consider even that part of the Bill which was quite familiar to everybody in the House. The Bill was an important one, and as it was desirable that it should not be postponed, through unnecessary delay, to another Session, he therefore hoped the House would see the propriety of going into Committee for considering the first portion of the Bill.

MR. BOUVERIE said, his right hon. Friend who had just spoken had had a long experience in that House, and had also had experience in the Home Department, and he would ask him whether it was in his recollection that with regard to so important a measure as that such a course had ever been taken as had been taken with respect to that Bill? His right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder had brought in a Bill on this important subject, which was surrounded with difficulties, and with which various Parliaments had attempted to deal. That Bill was read a second time, with next to no discussion, on the understanding, he believed, that the principle of it should be discussed at the following stage—namely, at the stage at which the Bill had now arrived. On the day before the Bill came to be considered in Committee a series of Amendments to be proposed by the Government were put into the hands of hon. Members of the House. If those Amendments were adopted the Bill would become a totally different Bill from that which was introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend, for they filled 13 pages, and if they were accepted only 300 words of the Bill as introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend would be left. That was not the way in which the House had a right to expect that sort of business to be conducted. The criminal law was supposed to be under the superintendence of the Home Secretary, who was responsible to the House for its proper administration, and for the introduction of such measures as he might think requisite for its amendment. As a Member of the Government, the Home Secretary had the command of a great deal of the time of the House, and if he thought a measure ought to be introduced on this subject, he had abundant opportunity of submitting such a measure to the consideration of the House; but to allow a private Member to introduce a Bill on the subject, and, after it had been read a second time, to turn it inside out—to put a new Bill into an old framework—was a course which hitherto had not been adopted by a Home Secretary. Suppose the Bill went into Committee, and these Amendments, which would make it a totally different Bill, were adopted, the House would have lost the opportunity it might have had on the second reading of expressing its opinion on the principle of the Bill. In fact, the course proposed to be taken by the Home Secretary was practically an evasion of those Rules of the House which were made for the purpose of securing an adequate discussion of the principle of a Bill; for the only opportunity the House would have of discussing the principle of this Bill would be on the third reading—the last stage. There was no necessity for having embarked the House in this difficulty, which was entirely owing to the way in which the Home Office now appeared to abandon functions which it used to perform in that House. That was not the first time that Session he had felt it his duty to complain of the way in which the Government did business, and he hoped some change for the better would be made, and that the Home Secretary would pluck up courage and introduce on his own responsibility such measures as he thought were desirable with regard to the administration of the criminal law.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, his right hon. Friend who had just spoken was a great authority on the conduct of the Business of the House; but he ought to remember the great block of Public Business which had occurred and was continually increasing. His right hon. Friend said the Government ought to undertake the conduct of this Bill, but they had not time to do so. He could not help thinking, therefore, that the time had arrived when the House might with advantage recognize the existence of a new class of Bills—what he would call hybrid Bills, half Private and half Government—which, having been long under the consideration of the House, might, though introduced by private Members, and discussed in the time set apart for private Members, receive the special support and sanction of the Government. It was said the principle of this Bill was a new principle—namely, that there should be a public prosecutor; but that principle could in no sense be said to be new, for it had been admitted on both sides of the House in discussions on the second reading; all, therefore, that remained was a matter of detail, for if these Amendments had been before the House on the second reading the House would have been told that they involved questions of detail which should be dealt with in Committee. In answer to the question, whether or not there should be a public prosecutor, the House on the second reading apparently said, Yes. The question how far the appointment of a public prosecutor should be compulsory or permissive was also a question of detail—that was to say, a question for the Committee. He did not concur in all the Amendments, but they could be modified in Committee. He, therefore, hoped they would lose no further time, but proceed with the measure while they had the chance.

Mr. Bouverie

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he must contend that with the exception of the point that a public prosecutor should be appointed, this Bill had been abandoned by its promoters. ["No, no!"] Why, it was absurd to say that the Amendments intended to be moved by the Government would not make it a totally different Bill. The Bill, instead of enacting that public prosecutors should be appointed, held out facilities for the appointment of a public prosecutor in any district that might choose to appoint one. Things would be left as they now were until a public prosecutor was appointed. What course ought to have been adopted? Without going so far as his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who spoke as if the Order for going into Committee ought to be discharged with the view of bringing in a new Bill, he thought the Bill ought to have been committed pro forma, in order to insert in it the Amendments of the Government. The Bill could then have been reprinted, and ample time might have been afforded to hon. Members to consider the Amendments of the Government; whereas, if the House went now into Committee on the Bill, the difficulty of the subject would be enormously increased through not having adopted that course. With respect to the latter part of the Bill, for instance, however desirable it might be to settle the question of costs, he did not think that on going into Committee on a Bill which did not deal with that subject was the proper time for considering it. He was quite aware how overpressed the Government were with the number of measures they had brought in; but it was more important to have measures fully considered than to relieve by any means the Government from a burden which properly belonged to them. The Home Secretary had shown that he felt the importance of this question of public prosecutor, and that it was impossible for the Government not to intervene when a Bill dealing with such a subject was before the House. They should therefore take the full responsibility of any Amendments they might introduce.

MR. BRUCE said, it was not now possible for the Government either to recommit the Bill, and reprint it in time for hon. Members to consider the Amendments, or to introduce a measure on their own responsibility. That was the advice of the authorities of the House on the question. He would admit that the proper course to take when the Government proposed numerous Amendments in a Bill introduced by themselves was to move that the Bill be reprinted, and that that was a subject which properly belonged to the Government, and that it would have been the duty of the Government to introduce a Bill on the subject, if they had had time. But the Government had charge of a great number of questions, which were certain to occupy every moment of available time at their disposal. In dealing with this subject in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee which sat upon it, it was absolutely necessary to deal with the question of fees; and they had also tried to fulfil the pledge given to the House to take some steps to relieve the counties from the treatment they now complained of as to the taxation of costs. That had necessarily involved great labour; but, nevertheless, it had been, he hoped, effected by the Amendments made in the Bill. It was impossible for the Government to undertake the conduct of this Bill without abandoning other measures to which they were pledged, and the Government were entirely in the hands of the House with reference to this question. If the House expressed a desire to proceed with the Bill, the Government would be most happy to facilitate its passage by every means in their power; if, on the other hand, for the reasons stated by the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. G. Hardy), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), the House thought the Bill ought not to be proceeded with, the Government would be content to yield to that opinion.

MR. HENLEY said, he never remembered a case in which that House and the country had been less fairly treated than on that occasion, neither did he recollect a Bill with respect to which so many Amendments were proposed as in the case of this Bill, which was not committed pro forma with the view of reprinting it with the Amendments, and thus enabling the House and the country to know what was to be debated. The alterations, moreover, which were proposed to be made in this Bill by the Government were not of a formal, but of a most material kind, and they affected the principle of the Bill. Another point was the large bribe that was offered to parties who would accept the Bill. The Bill was said to be permissive, except as regarded the Central Criminal Court; but while it was made permissive a very large offer of public money was made to all parties who would accept it, and of course there would be a corresponding disadvantage to those who did not accept it. For what was the proposal? That, in the event of a county or borough accepting this Bill, the public prosecutor would pay all the expenses, without the necessity of resorting to the funds of the county or borough, the necessary inference being that all who did not accept the Bill would be dealt with according to some capricious rule of thumb on the question of the repayment of their expenses. Such a principle, introduced by the Government in the form of an Amendment, ought of itself to have secured the re-committal of the Bill, in order that the country might be able to discuss and express its opinion upon it. There was another point in the Amendments which certainly ought to be considered. It was said that if anybody thought the public prosecutor was not doing his duty properly, he might apply to a Superior Court to set him aside. That was a very queer proposal. In the first place, it did not show much confidence in the people that were to be made public prosecutors. In the next, no provision at all was made about dealing with the prosecution of a criminal, while the public prosecutor and the person who complained of his conduct were contending with each other in one of the Superior Courts. Was the criminal to be handed from one side to the other, or what was to become of him? The Bill, in point of fact, had become a Government Bill, because it provided for the payment of public money, and the Government ought to appoint a day for the discussion of it. [Mr. BRUCE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head. Perhaps the Government had too many omnibuses of their own blocking up the way. He did not think the Government had taken a proper course with reference to this Bill, for they ought to have given the House a fair opportunity of dealing with what had in fact become a new Government Bill.

MR. MAGNIAC said, he must agree with the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire that the House was hardly put in a fair position in regard to the Bill. For instance, there had been a distinct understanding arrived at by the Government that the counties should be relieved from the cost of prosecutions; but they were now to be asked to consent to another arrangement in the matter, and one to which he believed the counties would entertain a very strong objection. He also felt convinced that the House would never consent to the extensive powers given to the Secretary of State by the Bill. Another point was, that under the Bill the clerks of justices might be appointed public prosecutors, and they might carry on prosecutions in defiance of the magistrates. That was certainly most objectionable.

MR. BRUCE explained that under the Bill, clerks of the justices, if appointed public prosecutors, would only have the power to prosecute where offenders had already been committed for trial.

Mr. Henley

MR. MAGNIAC said, however it might be, he was not sure the right hon. Gentleman was correct in that interpretation of the language of the measure. Again, why should they be asked to consent to fees being given for prosecutions—a thing that many hon. Gentlemen entertained a great dislike to? The right hon. Member for Oxford University had said that the only principle in the Bill was that of public prosecution; but he differed from that statement, and he thought that it was very unfortunate that the House should now be placed in a position of much embarrassment on account of the course taken by the Government.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had listened with attention to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State in order to find some guidance as to the course they should pursue; but the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have found the difficulties of arriving at a settlement of this case to be so very great, that it was not till Saturday that he had been able to place the result of his deliberations before the House. Now, if it took the Home Office so long to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on the various points involved, how could it be expected that in four days hon. Members who had to communicate with their constituents could make up their minds as to the course they should take on this important Bill? Confessedly, this was a new Bill, and if the Home Secretary had introduced it, could he have expected the House to read it a second time and go into Committee upon it within four days? The changes they would introduce were extremely important, and surely the opportunity ought to be allowed of consulting those interested in the subject throughout the country at large before the House committed itself to legislation on the subject. He thought the proper course for the House now to adopt was to recommit the Bill pro forma, for the purpose of inserting the Amendments, and that then it should be considered at as early a day as possible.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to explain, what he had not perhaps sufficiently explained before, that he felt had he moved to-day that the Bill be recommitted without giving an assurance that the Government would carry it through, he might seriously interfere with the chance which those having charge of the Bill had of carrying the Bill this Session; and he did not wish to take any course which might prove disastrous to his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder by taking such a step.

MR. HUNT said, he would not go back on what had been done, but would address himself to the question what was best to be done now. He was in favour of the principle of appointing a public prosecutor, though many of the details of the Bill seemed to him to be faulty, and therefore he was anxious that the Bill should be discussed. Supposing the Bill committed pro formâ, and the Government Amendments incorporated in it, would the right hon. Gentleman promise them time for its discussion—say a Morning Sitting? In that case they might still entertain the hope of carrying a Bill for the appointment of public prosecutors that Session. He objected the other morning at 2 o'clock to the Resolution by which it was proposed to sanction the expenses to be incurred by the Amendments of the Government, for he wanted an opportunity of discussing the financial arrangements under these Amendments, and he observed that the last Order of the Day was to go into Committee on that subject. He could not, therefore, hope to have the opportunity he desired; but he must say he entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that very powerful inducements were held out to local authorities to appoint public prosecutors. Supposing they did so, what was to follow? These public prosecutors were to order any expenditure, sanction and check it, and actually to pay the money. Could that be considered sound in principle or satisfactory in practice? Local authorities might jump at the appointment of public prosecutors, in order to save the rates and to escape the grievance now felt in the deductions from fees and expenses made by the Treasury; but the House was bound to take care that while saving rates they were not increasing taxation unduly. He, however, saw no machinery proposed by the Government to control the lavish expenditure which would be incurred if these Amendments were agreed to, and protested most strongly against that principle. It would be far better to appoint some one wholly independent of the public prosecutor to check the expenditure. There were cases in every county which occasionally required a public prosecutor; he said occasionally, for as chairman of Quarter Sessions he could not say that more than two cases had occurred in several years where a public prosecutor was really wanted. What he should prefer would be that there should be certain large districts—say half a circuit—to which a public prosecutor should be appointed, who, on application of the authorities having charge of the administration of the law, should institute prosecutions where private individuals did not come forward. He agreed that in the district of the Central Criminal Court, and in large manufacturing centres, public prosecutors might be highly necessary and valuable; but he denied that throughout the length and breadth of the land they were wanted in every county and borough, and it was most undesirable to saddle the public with the expense of this officer unless he was really wanted. At all events, he insisted that there should be a taxing officer wholly distinct from those who incurred the expenditure. He hoped the arrangement he had suggested with regard to a Morning Sitting would be accepted by the right hon. Gentleman. If not, he must vote against going into Committee on this Bill to-day.

MR. LEEMAN said, that they were within a fortnight of the time when the Quarter Sessions were held in different parts of the country, and it was of great importance that the Justices should have the opportunity of considering the details of this Bill. He, therefore, hoped that the suggestion to commit the Bill pro formâ would be accepted by the Home Secretary, and that a Morning Sitting should be appointed for discussing the Bill the week after the Quarter Sessions had been held. He must say, from his knowledge and experience, he did not believe that the appointment of public prosecutors was necessary in the agricultural districts. On the other hand, he did not see why a county was to be put under the pains and penalties of this Bill if it did not appoint a public prosecutor. He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) as to the bribe which was held out to counties under this Bill, for the public prosecutor was to come with the money of the Consolidated Fund, and deal with it in paying the expenses of prosecutions. Besides, as to the machinery proposed in the Amendments of the Government, it was of a most despotic character, and such as would require the most careful and deliberate consideration of the House. There was a clause proposing to enact that the Rules and Regulations of the Home Office on this particular subject should have all the force of an Act of Parliament. He did not agree with that. He did not say that that was a new Bill. It was a modification of several former Bills which had been introduced to the House. That was evidenced by the fact that, with regard to the Central Criminal Court, it had been deemed desirable that a public prosecutor should be appointed; while the Government, in their Amendments, had left the counties and the boroughs to adopt a public prosecutor if they thought proper.

MR. STRAIGHT said, that when the question as to how public prosecutions were to be conducted was being discussed he thought they could not be too careful what sort of machinery they introduced in this Bill. Therefore, it was most desirable that they should adjourn the consideration of the Amendments which the Government proposed. He was thankful to the Government for one thing they had done, in adopting a suggestion he had made to enable clerks to the Justices to prosecute where they were paid by salary. The clerks to the Justices were generally selected from the most respectable solicitors in either town or county, and when paid by salary they were a cheap and effective machinery for conducting prosecutions ready at hand. Certain most unfair insinuations had been made against them; but he was glad the right hon. Gentleman had shut his ears to the idle nonsense people who knew nothing about the subject had talked, and proposed to avail himself of the assistance of gentlemen well qualified to fill the posts of public prosecutors. He was not quite so sure as to the policy of the proposal only to introduce the public prosecutor when the case had been committed for trial. It was in the preliminary proceedings before Justices that so many of the matters of which complaint had been made in the Press, and elsewhere, had occurred, and it was at that stage, he was of opinion, that the public prosecution would be of the greatest use. If the Bill was not proceeded with this Session he hoped the Government would introduce it with these Amendments as a measure of their own next year, when he would do his best to assist in making it a practical scheme.

MR. WHARTON said, that taking for granted the Bill was permissive, supposing a county should not see fit to elect a public prosecutor, by whom, in such case, would the duties of the public prosecutor be discharged? If the Bill was to be a permissive Bill, and the magistrates were to have power to appoint a public prosecutor at Quarter Sessions, in many places that power would not be exercised; and, in that case, what would become of the taxing officers? Would counties be left to the tender mercies of their friends in New Street? In the county of Durham—of the Sessions of which he was Chairman—prosecutions had been well carried out, and the magistrates had never felt the want of a public prosecutor.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he wished to say a few words as to the course which had been taken with regard to the Bill, and, in doing so, must say that the discussion which had taken place would afford material assistance in the further consideration of the measure. It had been stated that the Amendments had only been placed on the Table on Friday night; and it was assumed from that, that the Government had required all the time since the second reading to elaborate their Amendments. But that was not quite correct. He had paid a great deal of attention to the Bill; but it was not a Government Bill. It had been introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend the Recorder, who had only recently returned to England, having been engaged in public duties abroad. It was necessary to consult with him how far the important changes suggested by the Government would be accepted by his right hon. and learned Friend; and when that was done, no time was lost in placing the Amendments on the Paper. Those changes, however, were not by any means of so extensive a character as had been represented. In the first place, they rather reduced and limited the scope of the Bill by restricting it, in the first instance, to the district of the Central Criminal Court; in the next place, they limited the action of public prosecutors to cases actually committed for trial by magistrates; and, in the third place, existing machinery was employed, for Justices' clerks, when paid by salary, would, in many cases, conduct prosecutions very effectually. With regard to the control of expenditure, it was of great importance that adequate provision should be made in the Bill; and it was a mistake to suppose that the expenditure would be at the free will of the prosecutor, and that the only check on him would be dismissal. At the present moment the Secretary of State had power to issue a scale of allowances, while, under the Bill, the tables of fees taken by clerks of the peace and clerks to the Justices would be revised. The whole system of costs would thus be under Government control, and the costs incurred would be taxed. Moreover, every clerk of assize and clerk of the peace was to give such assistance in taxing accounts as the Secretary of State from time to time might require. But if some contended, as they did, that there was no need of a public prosecutor, or of any review of local control of costs as at present practised, let them consider how these costs had been reduced since the Treasury undertook their payment, and began to revise and check the local officers' taxation. In 1848 the total cost of prosecutions formerly paid out of the local rates was £457,213. Next year it was £316,000; the following year £226,000; two years after it was £217,000; and in five years after it was taxed down to £145,000. Such was the effect of the control of the Treasury, and that central control would still be continued, for it was essential that there should be efficient control. The whole object of the Government Amendments had been to limit the operation of the Act to cases in which it was necessary, and at the same time to carry out the pledge they had given to consider the best mode in which they could relieve the counties and boroughs of the grievance of which they justly complained in having to bear the burden of the costs of prosecutions. He protested against the use of the word "bribe" in reference to what the Government now proposed. Wishing, as they did, to relieve those who now complained of their burdens, it was natural that they should propose what they had done, and what they did was a bond fide attempt on the part of the Government to meet the wishes of the House and the justice of the case. The Government could not, however, give any pledge that they would find time for proceeding with this Bill out of the time at their disposal, for the state of Public Business rendered it impossible that they could give any such pledge.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, the House was evidently not prepared to go at once into Committee on the Bill and discuss the Government Amendments; but he thought they were prepared to allow the Bill to be committed pro forma, in order that the Amendments of the Government might be introduced. An opportunity would then be afforded to the Justices at the ensuing Quarter Sessions to consider the scope of the Government Amendments; and the Government would afterwards, he hoped, be prepared to name a day for proceeding with the Bill, so that they might at last have some useful legislation instead of going on to the end of the Session as they had begun, with mere sentimental legislation. On the whole, in the rural districts justice, he believed, was well administered, and no public prosecutor was necessary. The Bill should, therefore, be so framed that where public prosecutors were required they should be appointed; but whether appointed or not, relieving the ratepayers from the criminal prosecution expenses from which deductions were now so unfairly made.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he did not dispute the fact mentioned by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department that great reductions had been made in the expenses of prosecutions; but he would contend that those reductions ought not to be made; and the Judges themselves in a recent case were unanimously of opinion that many of those reductions had been unfair. Having regard to the wealth of this country, the expenses of criminal prosecutions were not excessive, and, remembering the enormous cost of the Tichborne trial, they did not contrast unfavourably with civil cases. Fifteen years ago the late Mr. J. G. Phillimore obtained the appointment of a Committee on the subject of a Public Prosecutor; and he (Mr. Scourfield) served upon the Committee. Lord Brougham gave evidence in favour of that system; but Lord Campbell said that though when he was first Attorney General he was most anxious for the appointment of public prosecutors, he had since found such great difficulties in the way, that he had been unable to carry out his wishes, and did not then see that these difficulties were removed.

MR. EYKYN said, he must point out that the opposition to this Bill proceeded mainly from hon. Members who were in favour of revising our system of local taxation. He hoped that if the Bill were now committed pro forma, the Government would pledge themselves to take charge of it next Session, for their Amendments really made the Bill a Government measure. He should have been glad if the Law Officers had been present to assist the House with their opinions on the Bill.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he saw no reason for hurrying on the Bill that Session, and his experience of the administration of the law led him to doubt whether the change now suggested would, on the whole, be any improvement. In the Central Criminal Court, and possibly in other places, a public prosecutor might be necessary; but it did not follow that such a system, with the patronage to which it would give rise, should be applied to the whole country. At all events, the Justices should have an opportunity of discussing the Government Amendments at their next Quarter Sessions before any legislation was attempted, for it would be better to postpone its consideration for a year, than to discuss its merits at a time when they had only a very imperfect knowledge of it.

MR. PELL said, that hon. Members who had taken up the subject of local taxation had no desire to prevent the appointment of public prosecutors, and he hoped the Government would give a Morning Sitting for the consideration of the Bill. If the progress of the measure was impeded at all, it was through the Amendments of the Government, for those Amendments had smothered the Bill. The excisions proposed by the Home Secretary, to be replaced by his Amendments, entirely transformed the Bill, and could only be likened to the repairs to a pair of trousers of which nothing was left but the buttons, and to which the Government had proposed to attach a pair of new legs and a seat. He could not understand why there should have been such delay in placing these Amendments on the Paper, for the Recorder had returned to this country six weeks ago; and the House, therefore, ought not to be now in the position of having for the first time to consider those Amendments.

MAJOR PAGET said, he objected to the permissive principle which had crept into the Bill, and he also thought the Bill had been so thoroughly transmogrified by the Government that it ought now to be regarded as a Government Bill. The hands of the Government, however, were so full, and the progress of their legislation was so slow, that he feared there was little hope of the Bill becoming law this Session; but he still hoped the Government would themselves grapple with the evil, instead of being content to introduce Amendments, and say—"This is no child of ours, and we cannot promise to push it forward."

MR. M'MAHON said, he should like to know how the system had worked in the other countries which had been quoted as examples. Scotland was being perpetually held up as a model in this respect; but a Select Committee might find evidence to prove that public prosecutors worked very unsatisfactorily. Only a short time ago one Scotch Member contended that they amounted to a practical denial of justice. In the case of Ireland the system of public prosecutors had led in a great measure to the failure of justice, owing to the want of local knowledge and to the carelessness with which prosecutions were got up and conducted. In that opinion Sir Joseph Napier and Chief Justice Whiteside concurred, and the former, in his evidence before the Committee, spoke of "the slovenly and slobbering manner" in which cases were presented, and the result was an unusual number of acquittals. So much so was that the case, that prisoners on leaving the dock free were heard to say—"God bless Her Majesty; she employs counsel nobody else would think of having." Chief Justice Whiteside also stated that although a public prosecutor in Ireland might be never so old or inefficient, he was still continued in office. In France, too, in which the system of public prosecutors existed, no one had the slightest confidence in the administration of justice—and the want of such confidence in the administration of criminal justice was also one of the great evils in Ireland. He would suggest, therefore, that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the system as it existed in France, Ireland, and Scotland, and other countries before the system in England was given up—a system which, he believed, was the cheapest and most efficient which could possibly be devised.

Mr. Scourfield

MR. MAGUIRE said, the statements which had just been made by his hon. and learned Friend had taken him quite by surprise. Some Baron Munchausen must, he was afraid, have been whispering in his ear. He, as one who had the means of knowing how the system in Ireland practically worked, could state that prosecutions were most vigorously conducted there under that system. Very able men were selected to represent the Crown in Ireland, and no prisoner there, he believed, ever returned thanks to God or to Her Majesty for having escaped conviction owing to the stupidity of those by whom he had been prosecuted. The informant of his hon. and learned Friend had, therefore, been guilty of presenting to him a gross and unwarrantable caricature of the actual state of things.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, that as one who was familiar with the conduct of public prosecutions in Ireland, he also protested against the statements which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for New Ross. The idea of a prisoner returning thanks for his escape because of the inefficiency of the prosecution might have some foundation in the past, but none whatever in the present history of Ireland, for public prosecutions in that country were now, at all events, economically and well conducted. The Crown Solicitors were most zealous and efficient public servants, and he had never known in his experience anything to lead him to the conclusion that the prosecutions were conducted in a haphazard manner. The counsel employed, moreover, were learned lawyers, who had the advantage of making the criminal law a study, and it was quite unwarrantable, therefore, to speak of the conduct of the prosecutions in Ireland as being "slobbering and slovenly." [Mr. M'MAHON: Those are not my words; they are the words of Sir Joseph Napier.] Oh, he knew all about the words "slobbering and slovenly." He had the advantage of hearing his hon. and learned Friend deliver the same speech the other evening; but if these words were used by Sir Joseph Napier—for whom he had the highest respect—they could have reference only to some incidental prosecutions, and were not meant to apply to the system as worked at present. His hon. and learned Friend had also fished up some old story about a prisoner leaving the dock saying, "God bless Her Majesty" for employing stupid counsel, or something to that effect; but he should like to know where his hon. and learned Friend got the story. [Mr. M'MAHON: From the O'Connor Don.] Well, it was not a bit better because it came from another man. He would have to get the authority of the O'Connor Don; but he objected to his hon. and learned Friend drawing on the stories of 50 years ago. All he could say was that the system of public prosecutions in Ireland worked economically as well as efficiently, and he hoped that England would soon follow the example of Ireland in establishing the system.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, that seeing that the principle of the Bill was all but universally approved, he would not trouble the House with many words with respect to it. In reply to the objection of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), that the question was being hurried on, he would only say that it had been before the House and the country for nearly 20 years, and that on the Select Committee which had sat to inquire into the subject were the Lord Advocate, the Attorney General for Ireland, and the English Attorney General of the day, all of whom were warmly in favour of the appointment of a public prosecutor. At the same time, there had been a series of Amendments proposed which naturally complicated the question, although he was of opinion they were much more simple than seemed to be supposed; and he did not, under the circumstances, think it right to ask the House to proceed with the Bill in Committee in the ordinary way. What he should suggest, therefore, was that the House should go into Committee pro forma, that Progress should immediately be reported. He should like, then, to see the Bill recommitted in the ordinary way with the Amendments; and he was sure the House would be glad to be afforded an opportunity during the present Session of passing a measure which would be satisfactory to the country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department might find it convenient to fix a Morning Sitting with that object.

MR. DENMAN said, he hoped that, as the Bill would in its altered shape be a new one to most hon. Members, there would be an opportunity of discussing its provisions on going into Committee when it next came on.

SIR HERBERT CROFT said, he trusted the Bill would not be proceeded with until after Quarter Sessions were over, and contended that in the county which he had the honour to represent a public prosecutor was not at all required. His constituents were opposed to centralization, and wished to be allowed to do their own work.

SIR DAVID SALOMONS said, he wished to know in what position the Clerks of Justices Bill would stand in the event of the arrangement proposed with respect to the measure under discussion being carried into effect?

MR. BRUCE said, there would be no objection on the part of the Government to the passing of that Bill if they had themselves no prospect of dealing with the question as part of a larger measure. As to the Bill before the House, there were one or two Amendments to the Bill on the Paper which the Government would feel bound to oppose; but he believed that the measure generally was a good one, and so far from the day having been wasted by the discussion which had occurred upon it, he remembered very few Wednesdays this Session which had been more profitably employed. When the Amendments proposed had been inserted, and the Bill was reprinted, the Government would take into consideration the possibility of giving a day for its discussion. There were measures of great importance, however, still to be dealt with, such as the Scotch Education Bill and the Mines (Coal) Regulation Bill, to which the hon. and gallant Member for Sussex would not, he was sure, say the word "sentimental" was applicable; and it would, therefore, be rash in him to make any definite arrangement with regard to the progress of the present measure. The Government, however, in the event of their not being able to deal with the Bill this Session, would do so next.

House resumed.

Mr. Russell Gurney

Bill reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 203]; re-committed for Wednesday 3rd July.

BASTARDY LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.
(Mr. Charley, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Eykyn, Mr. Whitwell.)

[BILL 109.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHARLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Committee which sat upon the subject of Infanticide last year examined many important witnesses, including the Recorders of Manchester and Middlesex and Mr. Serjeant Relf, who had had great experience in cases of infanticide, and who brought Margaret Waters to justice. That Committee recommended that the bastardy laws should be amended for the better protection of infant life; and it was from that point of view that he now desired to approach the subject. The chief object of the Bill was to enlarge the discretion of the magistrates with regard to the granting of bastardy orders. Under the existing law, if a seducer absconded to the colonies or to a foreign country the mother of the illegitimate child was perfectly helpless; and from the evidence of Mrs. Main, the excellent lady superintendent of the Refuge for Deserted Mothers and their Infants in Great Coram Street, it was found that in only 3 per cent in 1,000 of these cases did the father contribute anything towards the support of his bastard children. It was proposed by the Bill that at any time within 12 months after the return of the seducer proceedings might be taken against him before the Justices, provided he had absconded within 12 months after the birth of the child. By the existing law a hard-and-fast line was fixed with reference to the amount to be awarded to the mother of the bastard child, and in ordinary cases that amount was rigidly limited to 2s. 6d. per week; but the evidence before the Committee showed that it was quite impossible to maintain an infant for a week upon so small a sum, and that that rigid limitation led to infanticide. The mother had this alternative placed before her—either to maintain her child or to destroy it, for otherwise she could not possibly go to service. She could not maintain her child, and so she destroyed it. Again, under the existing law the mother could only recover for 13 weeks of arrears, and if she married her husband was obliged to support her bastard children. The last-mentioned provision was a direct restraint on marriage, and was therefore contrary to public policy. It was proposed by the present Bill to alter these two points in accordance with the sentiments of humanity and of justice. Then under the law of 1834 the mother was liable for the maintenance of her bastard child until it attained the age of 16 years; but her bastardy order, if she obtained one, expired when the child attained the age of 13, and it was now proposed to do away with that anomaly. Again, if such a child became chargeable to the rates, under the law of 1844 the guardians were unable to relieve the ratepayers of the cost of its maintenance; but an alteration was made in that respect by an Act passed in 1868, and now the guardians could attach the money obtained under the bastardy order in the hands of the mother for the relief of the ratepayers. It was proposed by the present Bill to extend that principle. If the mother did not take action under the existing law, there was no way of relieving the ratepayers. It was now proposed to give to the guardians, as was the case in Ireland, the power of initiating proceedings for the relief of the ratepayers; but the amount to be obtained by them would be rigidly limited to the amount necessary for the actual cost of the maintenance and education of the child. There was one other provision in the Bill which happened to correspond with a proposal which the Government had made, which was that the age of girls to which criminal liability for their seduction should attach should be raised from 12 to 14 years. Under the existing law consent might be shown where the girl was more than 12 years of age; but it was now proposed to raise the limit of age, during which consent would be immaterial, to 14 years. Unfortunately, in many cases, seduction occurred between the ages of 12 and 14. He maintained that the result of this amendment of the law would be two-fold—it would cause a decrease in infanticide, because the mother would be able to put out her child to nurse, under the Infant Life Protection Bill, with a respectable woman and go out to service herself; and it would also decrease immorality by exposing the seducer to the liability of paying for his illegitimate offspring; and penalties upon the seducer were more likely to discourage immorality than severe and oppressive laws upon the seduced.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. LOPES said, he was not aware that any measure of this kind was required; and he certainly thought that some limit ought to be fixed, in Committee on the Bill, to the amount for which the putative father of the child should be held liable. It would be extremely unwise to invest the magistrates with an unlimited discretion in these cases.

MR. HURST thought that some amount of discretion, at all events larger than they possessed at present, ought to be given to the magistrates. Indeed, he thought that unlimited power might be given to them with great safety, for they would not be likely to abuse it. With regard to the age to which criminal liability should attach for seduction, he approved of the provision in the Bill, and he thought it might well be applied in cases of indecent assault. It was absurd to talk of the "consent" of a child of eight or ten in such cases.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he trusted the promoter of the Bill would consent to limit the discretion of the magistrates as to the allowance to be made to the mother of a bastard child, for care should be taken not to hold out inducements to a woman to allow herself to be seduced because the whole maintenance of the child would be thrown on the father.

MR. GREGORY said, that as one connected with a public institution which had to deal with questions of this nature, he did not think the Bill went far enough, because the difficulty of a woman recovering anything for the injuries done her were now almost insuperable. Gross cases of seduction came under his notice for which there was little or no remedy—a state of things which he hoped would soon be removed.

MR. CANDLISH said, that the great sufferers in such cases were the women, and he thought that an unlimited discretion might be left to the magistrates as to the amount of allowance to be given by the father of an illegitimate child, for he thought they could very well judge whether or not the mother was an abandoned woman, and give their award accordingly.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would at once admit that on that subject it was natural that the feelings of hon. Members should go with the suffering party; but he trusted the House would regard the matter in reference to the general interests of society. If hon. Members looked back to the investigations which were made before the introduction of the New Poor Law and to the evils which existed then, they would be cautious how they moved on the path which might lead to similar results, and how they took too wide steps in the interest of one party, which might have the effect of encouraging the very vice they wished to put an end to. In 1834 there were many persons who arrived at the conclusion that the old law on the subject required to be abolished, on the ground that the payments made to the mothers of illegitimate children were conducive to immorality, and instances were adduced where women, who had transgressed two or three times, were actually sought in marriage on account of the endowment resulting from the orders granted by the magistrates. He stated that circumstance in order to prevent the House rushing rashly to a conclusion on this subject. With regard to the Bill, he thought the two first clauses very complicated and difficult to be understood; but there were points in the Bill well worthy of consideration in Committee, and he therefore deemed it desirable that the Bill should be read a second time. He, however, warned the House not to yield to the rash conclusions to which the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) appeared inclined to yield.

MR. WHITWELL said, he was of opinion that the Bill deserved the favourable consideration of the House, for there could be no doubt that women in these cases were entitled to more than they now received.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought the thanks of the country and of that House were due to the hon. and learned Member for Salford for introducing the measure. At the same time, though he considered the sum which a magistrate could order to be paid to the mother of a bastard child was at present too small, he trusted the House would not be induced to go too far in a contrary direction. He thought that provision might be made in the present Bill to enable women to follow up the fathers of their bastard children, for at present they were put to great expense in that attempt, and trusted that the question of criminal assault would not be mixed up as proposed by the Bill with the question of seduction, which belonged to a totally different branch of the law.

MR. STANSFELD said, he had great pleasure in congratulating the hon. and learned Member for Salford on the reception which his Bill had met with, and although he thought the warning of his right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Hardy) well worth listening to, yet, speaking his own individual opinion, he was prepared to go so far as to say that the time had come when they ought to review the former Poor Law Acts on the subject of affiliation orders. The points raised by the Bill were all worthy of discussion, and there was hardly any one of them on which some amendments in the existing law might not be made. There was much to be said against any arbitrary limit on the amount of allowance to be awarded by the magistrates; but in dealing with cases of summary jurisdiction, it would be well to consider whether some limit might not be imposed in that respect, or some right of appeal given in the event of any extravagant allowance being ordered. He saw no objection to the proposal that when the mother of a bastard child had not obtained an order from a magistrate, the Poor Law Guardians might get an order and apply the proceeds to the maintenance of the child. He was glad to give his support to the principle of the Bill; but he reserved for himself liberty of action when the Bill came to be discussed clause by clause in Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the present bastardy laws had very much to do with the fearful increase of infanticide; and was glad that though the House had elected in one way to check that evil, that they were now about to do that, which in another direction would have a much greater effect in stopping that fearful crime. It was impossible to look at the bastardy laws without seeing that they bore very hardly on women, and he was glad to see any attempt in the direction in which it was now proposed to go, for he felt certain that since the enactment of the existing law 35 years ago, though the births of illegitimate children had decreased, the crime of infanticide had increased in a far greater proportion. It was impossible to consider the position in which these poor unfortunate women were placed without feeling that the law held out a temptation too strong for human nature to stand against. He was, therefore, glad that an attempt was made to amend the law, for they must all regard with shame and horror the amount of infanticide which had occurred during the last two years. He trusted that the present and other measures would tend to check that crime and to relieve the country from the disgrace which rested on it.

Mr. Candlish

DR. BREWER said, the maintenance of bastard children fell too heavily on local rates; but he thought that unlimited power as to the allowance to be paid by the fathers of bastard children should not be given to the magistrates.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday 12th July.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT ABOLITION BILL—[BILL 156.]

(Mr. Bass, Mr. Robert Fowler.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M. T. BASS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, alluded to the present condition of the subject with which the Bill proposed to deal. During the year 1870, he said, there were between 900,000 and 1,000,000 actions for small debts under £50, nearly 600,000 being for debts not exceeding 40s. These actions resulted in 160,000 executions and the imprisonment of 6,700 people. During the year ending last September there were 602 prisoners for debt in Stafford Gaol, whose maintenance cost the country £370, and for whose conveyance to gaol the Consolidated Fund was charged £361 4s. The total amount of the debt in 100 cases was £47 18s. 4d., so that the county might have saved 5s. for each prisoner by paying the debts before the summonses were issued, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer £35 at least, and perhaps £82 10s. The Judge of the Derby County Court was the only one of 60 County Court Judges who concurred in the necessity of abolishing imprisonment for debt. But that gentleman had assured him that it cost him much misery to send these poor people to gaol, when they had no idea of the obligations they had incurred. Not only that, but the maintenance in prison of persons on account of small debts was, in a majority of cases, greater than the total amount of their debts, while their families were thrown on the Union for support. In cases which had been brought under his notice, one man had been imprisoned 14 days for 1s. 10d., another 10 days for 2s. 11d., another 30 days for 16s., and another 40 days for 11s. 1d. But a man who had been imprisoned for 40 days might be sent back to prison again two days after his liberation for another period of 40 days, so that this power of imprisonment was virtually without limitation. Moreover, the present system was not alone costly, but it was highly injurious, because not one in 50 of those persons who were imprisoned ever recovered the position they had lost. There was a number of cases of imprisonment for debts of 1s., and in April last a man between 70 and 80 years of age, who was a cripple, was imprisoned for a debt of 8s., next for 12s., and a third time for 9s.; while an unfortunate sweep of Tunbridge Wells, 70 years old, a pauper, who owed 2s. 6d., had been actually taken out of the Union workhouse and sent to Maidstone Gaol under one of these orders of imprisonment. The expense to the county in such a case could not have been less than 30s.; what it cost the Chancellor of the Exchequer he would not say; but, at all events, it could not be regarded as anything else than a serious waste of public money. The House was aware that there was no imprisonment for debt from the Superior Courts; and therefore they could come to no other conclusion than that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor. ["Oh!"] That very morning he had an interview with the Lord Chancellor, who had been good enough to inform him that there was no imprisonment from the Superior Courts, except where the matter bore the character of a crime. Did his hon. Friend who said "Oh!" just now mean that poor people who were sent to gaol were criminals?

Why, he could prove before a Select Committee that many of the men who were sent to gaol did not even know why they were sent there. Well, then, if it were right and good to abolish imprisonment for debt for sums over £50, why not for sums under £50? He was convinced that there was no system of a more vicious character than that of imprisonment for small debts. A publican could not recover for debt, and the existing arrangement tended to encourage drunkenness, because as a man could not get credit at the public-house he spent all his ready money there, while the baker who gave trust had to send the man to gaol, sell up his goods, and ruin his family. He was intimately acquainted with Mr. Daniel, County Court Judge of Burnley, in Lancashire. Mr. Daniel, being dissatisfied with the punishment he had hitherto imposed, had announced that in future when a case for imprisonment was made out he should commit for 40 days. As a reason for adopting that course the County Court Judge stated that he had ascertained from the Under Sheriffs in Yorkshire and Lancashire that many debtors went to prison at Lancaster or York at the expense of the Consolidated Fund, merely for the purpose of amusing themselves. Their practice was, after they had cost the county perhaps 30s., to pay the small debt for which they had been arrested, and on being liberated they spent the rest of the day in visiting the Minster and other places in the city. But if foolish people acted in this manner it could not be tolerated that their conduct should be made an excuse for trifling with the liberty of the subject. He had conversed with half the Judges of the Superior Courts on this subject, and he had not met with one who was not decidedly opposed to the present system of leaving the exercise of this power of imprisonment for an unlimited time to the discretion—or, as he said, the indiscretion—of County Court Judges. It was said that the people who were sent to gaol for debt were “good for nothing,” and not what they ought to be; but he found that a vast number of actions for small debts were for amounts owing on account of Bibles; and he thought people who bought Bibles were not likely to be of such a character as to deserve imprisonment. He thought, on the contrary, that the County Courts were kept up at a cost of £500,000 a-year for the purpose of collecting the debts of Scotch tallymen, and he had received a letter from a friend of his stating that the system was a curse, and that an Act was required to mitigate the evil of imprisonment for debt. He had been waited on by a deputation from the Linendrapers Mutual Protection Society in opposition to the Bill; but they acknowledged in the course of the conversation that in Scotland, where some of them came from, they could not imprison for debt under £100 Scots, and that not the county, nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the creditors themselves paid the expense of maintaining in prison the person whom they imprisoned. For that reason it was very obvious why there were so many Scotch tallymen in England running all over the country. He had received a communication with the farewell address of the gentleman who had, until within the last few days, been at the head of the Exeter County Court, and he said that in the exercise of his somewhat arbitrary power of imprisonment for debt his predecessor had imprisoned 120 men in the course of a year; but he himself had reduced the number to 7. It was said that if the Bill became law, the poor man would have no chance of obtaining credit. That was the very thing he wanted to insure. The labourer at present would have no difficulty in saving a certain moderate sum to enable him to go to market, and if a man went with cash in his hand he might buy at 30 per cent less than if he asked for credit. Between 6,000 and 7,000 men were annually sent to prison and ruined by the existence of this law, and the question was one of such tremendous import that sooner or later the House would have to deal with it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Bass.)

MR. LOPES, in rising to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that every County Court Judge except one affirmed that if the Bill became law the vitality and efficiency of County Courts would be destroyed, and that from the day of the passing of the Bill County Courts might be as well abrogated altogether. In almost every case the person who was imprisoned could pay the debt. If the hon. Member for Derby had understood the practical working of the matter, and had received correct information about it, he would never have advocated this principle. Was it not a principle of common honesty that a man who had incurred a debt, and had received the benefit of the debt, and had money in his pocket to pay it, should be compelled to do so? Yet what the hon. Gentleman proposed was to take away that power which the County Courts possessed of sending to prison a man who was proved almost to demonstration to be able to pay. He denied altogether the dictum which had been ascribed to the Lord Chancellor by the hon. Member, and would refer him to the 5th section of the Debtors Act of 1869, to show that there was no difference between Superior and Inferior Courts in the matter of the law of imprisonment for debt. He would also draw attention to the very careful way in which the Legislature had guarded that power of imprisonment. It could only be exercised after judgment, provided the Judge was satisfied that the debtor had the means of paying the debt and did not do so; and before the Judge could make an order for the judgment summons the debtor was called upon to show cause why the order should not be made upon him. If he did not appear the Court would not proceed to make an order in his absence, but the employer would be summoned, and called upon to give satisfactory evidence whether the debtor had the means, and persistently refused and neglected to pay. So careful were the County Court Judges that very frequently they made an order for imprisonment, which, however, was "to be suspended for the space of a week;" and in most cases the money was paid before the term of imprisonment arrived. The Bill, moreover, was not supported by working men, because they knew that in the event of sickness their baker and grocer would not give them credit if the security of imprisoning was withdrawn. He held in his hand the concurrent testimony of 59 County Court Judges, who were all opposed to the Bill, and he would instance the opinions of five of them, which were to the effect that there would be no adequate means of enforcing the judgment if the power of imprisoning was abolished.

Mr. M. T. Bass

MR. NORWOOD, in seconding the Amendment, said, the whole subject was discussed thoroughly a few Sessions ago, when our bankruptcy laws were revised. It was an error to speak of the power of arbitrary arrest, which did not exist in respect of 5s. any more than it did for a debt of £50; the procedure was the same in both cases, and in both there must be a judgment, and in default a judgment summons. It ought to have been stated that the 6,700 persons who were imprisoned were but the residue of 137,000 ordered to be imprisoned, the remainder having paid under the pressure put upon them by the order. There were about 20 Acts under which justices could commit in default of the payment of penalties, and why should we exempt from imprisonment those who refused to pay for the necessaries of life? If this Bill passed men would go with impunity past the door of the tradesman who had trusted them, and spend their money at the public-house. The Bill ought to be called one for the promotion of dishonesty and fraud.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Lopes.)

MR. RODEN, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, said there was not a single man in prison for a very large debt, but there were men in prison whose original debts did not exceed 5s. The ratepayers, moreover, ought not to be called upon as they were to pay large sums of money to assist certain persons to carry on their business, for he did not admit that the abolition of imprisonment would stop legitimate credit, but only illegitimate credit—credit incurred by a man's wife really without his authority. In short, the present system was a relic of barbarism, and no man ought to be imprisoned for non-payment of a debt, and for that reason he warmly supported the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he could not forget that, when it was proposed to abolish hanging for theft the objections of the Judges and their predictions of evil were stronger than the objections and predictions of County Court Judges on this subject; and, indeed, as a rule, Judges were very reluctant to part with any authority. In this matter the rich and the poor did not practically stand upon the same footing, for you seldom or never heard of a man being sent to prison because he owed £100; and it was a great mistake and a misfortune, when the law was changed, that all classes were not put on the same footing. It was, further, a great injustice to the poor that they were more easily committed for non-payment of a debt than those who owed large sums; and the injustice was aggravated by the fact that the imprisonment might be perpetual.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, they could not but be obliged to the hon. Member for Derby for the statistics he had brought before them. It was a lamentable thing that so large a proportion of the male population should be committed to prison in a year, and their dependents pauperized; and, indeed, the very fact that men had been in prison was an injury to their future prospects, and it was undoubtedly a hardship that ratepayers should have to support in gaol men who were imprisoned for debt. He did not think that the objections to the Bill, although very serious, were by any means conclusive. As to it tending to stop credit, it would be most beneficial if it stopped credit being given by certain persons who went about the country selling things to the wives of working men; but he did not believe that the Bill would stop legitimate credit. He thought, however, that the subject required further inquiry before they could legislate upon it; besides there were different laws in England, Ireland, and Scotland upon the same subject, and upon a question of this kind legislation ought to be uniform for all parts of the United Kingdom.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 136: Majority 102.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

GAME LAWS.

Instruction to the Select Committee on the Game Laws, to inquire into the Laws for the protection of deer in Scotland, with reference to their general bearing upon the interest of the community.—(Mr. Hunt.)

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

Mr. Henley

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 20th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Review of Justices' Decisions * (164).
Second Reading—Bank of England (Election of Directors) * (144).
Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Infant Life Protection * (118).
Referred to Select Committee—Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) and Act (No. 2, 1864) Amendment * (130).
Committee—Report—Charitable Trustees Incorporation * (127); Board of Trade Inquiries * (155).
Report—Baptismal Fees * (160).
Third Reading—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation * (116), and passed.

Their Lordships met;—

INFANT LIFE PROTECTION BILL.

Read 2^a (according to order), and referred to a Select Committee.

And, on Friday, June 21, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

E. Derby.	L. Wharncliffe.
E. Shaftesbury.	L. Skelmersdale.
E. Morley.	L. Portman.
L. Bp. London.	L. Egerton.
L. Boyle.	L. Kesteven.
L. Saltersford.	L. Fitzwalter.

And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 20th June, 1872.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Report—Education (Scotland) [31]; Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation * [137].
Third Reading—Sites for Places of Worship and Schools * [2], and passed.

IRELAND—MURDER OF MRS. NEIL AT RATHGAR.—QUESTION.

COLONEL TAYLOR said, he wished to preface his Question with a remark which he should not have thought it necessary to make had the murder been one of an ordinary nature. It was perpetrated in one of the quietest districts of Ireland, immediately adjoining the capital; indeed, he might say as orderly and civilized a locality as any in this country; and it was not believed by those who had inquired into the matter that the inhabitants of the district had anything to do with the crime. He thought it must be part of that desperate system of crime in which, for some real or imaginary offence, a self-constituted tribunal, sitting at a distance, pronounced sentence, and a wretched assassin was discovered and ordered to commit the murder, he not having, probably, up to that moment ever seen or heard of his victim. Having said thus much to exonerate his county from any imputation, he would now ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether any clue has been obtained in the matter of the late atrocious murder of Mrs. Neil at Rathgar, in the county of Dublin; and, if not, what steps Government is taking to discover the perpetrators of that crime?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse) said, that before proceeding to answer the Question he begged to state that he entirely agreed with the right hon. and gallant Member who had put the Question in his prefatory remarks. He did not believe that the county of Dublin had any connection with the horrible crime that had been committed other than its being the place where the unfortunate lady met her death. The Government had taken, and were still taking, all the steps in their power to discover the perpetrator of the crime; but the right hon. Gentleman and the House would see that it was obviously undesirable at the present time to say anything more relative to the matter. He might, however, mention that a man named Terence Walsh was in prison under, the Westmeath Act, on suspicion of being accessory to the murder.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.
QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE: Observing, Sir, a Notice placed on the Paper prior to the Whitsun holidays by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), proposing—

“To bring before the consideration of the House the state of our relations with the Government of the United States of America,”

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

I wish to ask him, Whether he intends bringing it forward any time during this Session?

MR. DISRAELI: It appears to me, Sir, that the inquiry which the hon. Gentleman has addressed to me has arisen from a misconception of the Notice that I gave some time ago. At the time when I gave that Notice, the two countries, having entered into a Treaty to which they ascribed different interpretations, had commenced negotiations in order to arrive at some similarity of opinion. Those negotiations completely failed; affairs were at a deadlock, and I thought I was but doing my duty in asking the House to consider what were the causes of that failure, and to take such a course as might be of a remedial nature. Before, however, I could bring forward that Motion, to my surprise, and confessedly to the surprise of Her Majesty's Ministers, they found themselves engaged in fresh negotiations with the object of concluding a Treaty which would remove these difficulties. Those negotiations, so far as I am aware, have not concluded—at any rate, we have had no official announcement of their conclusion; and, under these circumstances, I certainly do not deem it consistent with my sense of public duty that I should embarrass a Government conducting negotiations by debates in this House. When we hear—which, probably, we very shortly may—from an official and authentic quarter that those negotiations have terminated, it will be in my power to consider, with the information then before the House, the whole circumstances of the case, and I shall then be able to decide what course it will be my duty to pursue. In that event, however, the only consideration which would influence me would be the public welfare.

ORDNANCE SURVEY—THE 25-INCH SCALE.—QUESTION.

MR. WELBY asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he would state to the House on which of the grounds recently alleged by him, viz. military considerations, importance, enterprise, and the use made of the soil, Flintshire has been selected for survey in preference to Lincolnshire, and Maps of it made on the 25-inch scale which have been recently published by the Ordnance Department?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, the main consideration which had influenced the Ordnance Survey Department in selecting Flintshire was that it was a mineral county. It was thought the public interest was best served by selecting counties on which the welfare of the country largely depended and which were the scene of great activity and enterprise. Moreover, a Bill was before the House—the Mines Regulation Bill—which would require the preparation of maps on a large scale. He said this without disparaging the excellence of Lincolnshire, which was eminently an agricultural county.

IRELAND—GALWAY ELECTION PETITION—THE JUDGMENT AND EVIDENCE.
QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If arrangements cannot be made to expedite the printing of the evidence in the Galway Election case, so that the same may be in the hands of Members early next week?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that the Government had no control over the printing of the House, but, having made inquiry, he was indebted to the authorities of the House for the information of what arrangement could be made. He was afraid it would not entirely meet the desire of his hon. Friend; but he must understand that the evidence would occupy more than 1,000 closely printed folio pages in double columns. Moreover, the shorthand notes from which the manuscript had to be transcribed had, unfortunately, been written on both sides of the paper and without any numbering of the questions. Some patience would, therefore, be requisite; but every effort would be used, and the best course would be to produce the volume in separate sections. A considerable section would be in Members' hands within a week from this time, and would probably be followed at similar intervals by at least two sections more.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.
DOMINION OF CANADA.—QUESTIONS.

MR. GREGORY, understanding from the reports this morning, that the question of the postponement was still before the Arbitrators at Geneva, said he would postpone for a week the Questions he had placed on the Paper.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had not been communicated with by the hon. Gentleman, and he was not aware of any reason why the Questions should not be answered at once.

MR. GREGORY said, he would, in that case, put his Questions, Whether, notwithstanding the postponement of the reference to Arbitration under Article 1 of the Treaty of Washington, he proposes during such postponement to take the necessary steps for carrying out such other Articles of the Treaty as are not directly connected with such reference; whether he contemplates that during such period the acts which may be necessary to carry out such of the Articles as relate to the Dominion of Canada, and on the passing of which the guarantee of this country for £2,500,000 is to be claimed, should be proposed to the Parliament of that Dominion, or whether the execution of such Articles is to remain in abeyance, and whether he regards the stipulations contained in those Articles as dependent upon or connected with the reference to Arbitration provided by Article 1 of the said Treaty, or whether the same are independent provisions and binding upon the parties to such Treaty whether such reference is proceeded with or not?

MR. GLADSTONE: My answer, Sir, is very simple. The Articles of the Treaty not directly connected with the reference to Arbitration at Geneva, and the execution of the Articles relating to the Dominion of Canada, have no direct connection with any question raised at Geneva. As far as the recommendation of the British Government to the Dominion of Canada is concerned, that is complete. As far as the action of the Canadian Parliament is concerned, that is complete, the Canadian Parliament having, by its own deliberate judgment, accepted for itself the Articles of the Treaty. Nothing further now can be done until on its part the Congress of the United States shall have proceeded to legislate, and, as Congress is now under adjournment and will not meet again until the winter, the hon. Gentleman will see that practically there is no connection—at any rate at the present time—between any question that has been raised at Geneva and the practical postponement of the Articles of the Treaty relating to Canada. It is only after Congress shall have performed its part of the covenant, which it will have to consider upon its meeting again, that any question can arise with regard to the execution of these Articles. It will be at the same period that the Government of this country will have to discharge its engagement to Canada. Upon the completion of the legislation, and upon the taking effect of the entire Treaty in a formal manner, we shall propose to Parliament the guarantee of £2,500,000 which has been conditionally promised. That guarantee is contingent, as it stands in the arrangement, upon the taking effect of the entire Treaty.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman's answer applied solely to the Fisheries question, or whether it applied also to the San Juan Boundary question?

MR. GLADSTONE: My answer did not apply to the San Juan Boundary question, for that has not been treated as part of the matters affecting the Dominion of Canada.

In reply to Mr. R. TORRENS,

MR. GLADSTONE said: My hon. Friend travels rather fast. He asks me whether we shall revive the question of damages suffered by the Fenian raids, if the guarantee be abandoned by the Government. But there is no intention whatever on the part of the Government to abandon the guarantee, and I should be very sorry to give any answer which would appear to contemplate that contingency. We are bound in honour to make a proposal in reference to that guarantee at the proper time; and I may also state to my hon. Friend that the claim for damages occasioned by the Fenian raiders, is a question entirely between the Imperial Government at home and the Government of the United States; while the claim of Canada is a claim not exclusively against the United States, inasmuch as it may be held to lie also against the Imperial Government; and the claim as against the Imperial Government is disposed of by the guarantee which we propose to lay before Parliament in due time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—THE PERSIAN MISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Tylour Thomson has been appointed to succeed Mr. Alison as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Persia?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the post of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Persia has been offered to Mr. Tylour Thomson; but the Secretary of State has not as yet heard whether that gentleman accepts the post or not.

BRITISH GUIANA—EMIGRATION.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any steps have been taken upon the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the treatment of Immigrants in British Guiana?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, an Ordinance, embodying the greater part of the recommendations of the Commissioners and consolidating the law relating to emigration, has been drafted, and, having been carefully examined by the Secretary of State, has been sent out to the Colony, with a strong invitation to the Court of Policy to pass it into law without delay. A further Parliamentary Paper, including this draft Ordinance and Correspondence respecting it, and the report of the Commission, is in preparation, and will be presented in a very few days.

NAVY—CHANNEL SQUADRON.

QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that certain ships belonging to the Channel Squadron have been detained in Milford Haven for want of coal; and, when it is expected that the necessary supplies will arrive and so enable the ships so detained to proceed?

MR. GOSCHEN, said, in reply, that there had been a certain detention of ships of the Channel Squadron at Milford Haven; but the statement which had appeared in The Army and Navy Gazette to the effect that their detention was due to a fault on the part of the Contract and Purchase Department of the Admiralty was totally without foundation. The decision to send these ships to Milford Haven to coal, and that they should proceed thence to Holyhead and Liverpool, was arrived at by himself on the 7th instant, and the information that coal was to be supplied there was given to the Contract and Purchase Department only on the following day. There was no particular hurry as regarded the ships; but there were reasons why the decision as to the destination of the Channel Squadron had not been come to until the last moment. After his decision had been arrived at, the order for the purchase of coal was given on the succeeding Monday; a portion of the coal was delivered on the Tuesday, and the whole of it on Thursday, making about 1,000 tons. Whatever blame there might be in the matter, it would attach to himself and not to the Contract Department. The ships were no longer at Milford Haven, but had arrived at Holyhead.

METROPOLIS—STORAGE OF PETROLEUM.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the hon. Member for Colchester, Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works have any power to prevent the storing of, or to compel the removal of petroleum, in and from any place within the limits of the City of London; whether, in the event of an explosion taking place at any premises where many thousand barrels of petroleum are now said to be stored, there are any precautionary measures which the Board of Works can enforce to save life and property; whether the atmosphere in the locality of petroleum is not more or less largely impregnated with vapour given off from it; what danger from explosion of the vapour of petroleum in mixture with air is to be apprehended; what destruction of life and property must be expected to result from the dense volume of black smoke which would issue from flaming petroleum in store; whether, if it escaped to the Thames, the shipping in the Thames would not be destroyed; and, whether it has been suggested by the Officers of the Board, or of the Fire Brigade Department, that immediate steps should be taken to avert such a calamity?

DR. BREWER said, in reply, that the Metropolitan Board of Works had no power to prevent the storing of petroleum to any amount in any wharf or warehouse in the City of London. The Petroleum Act, 31 & 32 Vict., only applied to the storing of petroleum in places where it might be exposed to a temperature of 100 degrees. The Board could not enforce any measures for the protection of life and property in the event of an explosion or conflagration taking place in premises where barrels of petroleum were stored. The amount stored last week was 45,554 barrels, containing 35 gallons each, but these did not include privately stored petroleum. The head of the Fire Brigade Department wished that steps should be taken to isolate the stores of petroleum, and that a building should be constructed applicable to the storing of all petroleum.

Mr. Goschen

EDUCATION(SCOTLAND)BILL—SCHOOL-MASTERS.—QUESTION.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Lord Advocate, in the event of the Education (Scotland) Bill becoming law, Whether the Treasury will be entitled, as heretofore, to pay the interest of the capital sum invested under the Act 1 and 2 Vic. c. 87, to the schoolmasters of Parliamentary schools until such time as the charge of their salaries comes upon the rates?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, he had no hesitation in answering the Question in the affirmative, and if necessary further words should be added to one of the clauses of the Bill in order to make the matter perfectly plain.

PARLIAMENT—COUNTS OUT. QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to propose for the adoption of the House the following Resolution, which was recommended by the Committee on Public Business, which sat during Session 1871 :—

“That when the House, after a morning Sitting, resumes its Sitting at Nine o'clock, and it appears, on Notice being taken, that forty Members are not present, the House shall suspend Debate and Proceedings until a quarter past Nine o'clock; and Mr. Speaker shall then count the House, and, if forty Members are not then present, the House shall stand adjourned!”

This Resolution was in accordance with one unanimously passed last Session by the Committee on Public Business, and was brought forward by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Chairman of that Committee, on the 26th of February last. Since then the right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn the Order for the Adjourned Debate on the Resolution, and since the withdrawal the House, on Tuesday, the 28th of May, was counted out; on the 11th instant, also a Tuesday, only one having intervened, the House was again counted out at 10 minutes past 9; and on the 18th instant, just a week after, when the House resumed at 9 o'clock, another count out took place at three minutes past 9; so that during the past month the House had been counted out on three Tuesdays out of four. Under those circumstances, he begged to submit his Question to the right hon. Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, Sir, I have no such intention.

ARMY—CONTROL DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government are willing to assent to such a Motion as that which stood on the Paper on Tuesday 18th instant, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Control Department; and, if not, whether any opportunity will be afforded for a discussion on the subject?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Question of the hon. and gallant Member has been on the Paper, in one form or another, the whole Session, but has been postponed by the hon. and gallant Member from time to time. On Tuesday last my right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Henry Storks) and I came down to discuss it, and should have shown what we trusted the House would have considered very good reasons for declining to accede to the proposal. Under these circumstances, I am not prepared, in the present state of Public Business, to apply to my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government to set aside other Business for the purpose of giving another opportunity for bringing on this discussion.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT said, that Tuesday was the first occasion on which his Notice of Motion for a Royal Commission had been on the Notice Paper. As the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety for a discussion had not even brought him down in time to help to make a House on Tuesday, and as he now declined to assist him ["Order!"]—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member is entitled to put a Question to the Secretary of State for War with respect to the answer now given by the right hon. Gentleman; but he is not at liberty to debate the matter.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT said, he was merely going to add that he would endeavour to find an opportunity for himself, and would therefore put the same Notice on the Notice Paper for to-morrow night on going into Committee of Supply.

ARMY—THE VOLUNTEERS.

QUESTION.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to the desirability of permitting Volunteers, who on account of business engagements are absent from their own head quarters, to be attached (with the consent of commanding officers) to corps in the neighbourhood in which they may be staying, and under proper vouchers from the adjutant of the corps to which they may be so attached, to be returned, as efficient, in the annual return of the corps to which they belong?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, his attention had been directed to this subject, and in the draft of an Order in Council, to be circulated to-morrow, provision was made to meet the case referred to.

ARMY—FIRST-CAPTAINS IN THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Address to Her Majesty, carried in the other House of Parliament by a majority of three, will prevent or delay the promised advancement of the First Captains of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers to the rank of Field Officers?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Address is directed against an arrangement for which provision has been made by this House. I have not had the opportunity of considering with my Colleagues the Answer which Her Majesty ought to be advised to return to the Address of the other House. I must therefore request my right hon. and learned Friend to defer his Question until Monday.

IRELAND—GALWAY ELECTION PETITION—JUDGMENT OF MR. JUSTICE KEOGH.—QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the Report of the Judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Keogh in the case of the Galway Petition, and which is to be placed upon the Table of the House, is to be the Report as it was originally taken by the shorthand writer, or that Report revised by Mr. Justice Keogh?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. DOWSE) said, he had no official information on this subject beyond that possessed by any other Member of the House, and any knowledge he might have, had been derived not in his official capacity. A communication had been made to him by the printer of the House—who, no doubt, thought he would like to be informed on the subject—to the effect that Mr. Justice Keogh had returned the proofs with the least possible delay, and had substantially done nothing beyond making—to use the printer's own words—"typical amendments."

FRANCE—EMBARKATION OF COMMUNIST PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has been informed that French political prisoners have been placed by the French police on board British steamers and landed in this Country since the publication of the Correspondence between the two Governments relating to this matter, and that so lately as Friday last four prisoners from Dieppe were landed at Newhaven; and, under these circumstances, whether he will state what steps Her Majesty's Government purpose taking to insure the fulfilment of the assurances which have been repeatedly given to Parliament on this subject?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, my hon. Friend showed me a letter about three hours ago from Mr. Knight, the General Manager of the South-Eastern Railway, stating that on the 9th instant four Frenchmen, and on the 15th instant six Frenchmen, had been put on board the

Mr. Cardwell

English steamer at Dieppe and landed at Newhaven, presumably by the French police. The Secretary of State's attention was at once called to this matter, and a despatch has been this evening sent to Lord Lyons, requesting him to bring this report immediately under the notice of the French Government. As it is stated that some of these men paid their own fares up to London, it is possible that there may have been some mistake in the statement that they had been forcibly deported by the French authorities.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[Bill 51.]
The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

VI. — MISCELLANEOUS — INSPECTION—CONSCIENCE CLAUSE—COMPULSION, &c.

Clause 66 (School boards to provide elementary education for poor children).

MR. CRAUFURD rose to move, in page 25, line 22, to leave out "school," and insert "parochial," his object being much the same as that of his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith)—namely, to charge the parochial board, and not the school board, with the duty of providing for the education of the children of poor parents. The difficulty that struck him was this—By the clause as it now stood they were either making two classes of paupers, or they were handing over to school boards the decision of a matter which they had no means of determining—namely, the ability of parents to pay for their children's education.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the school board as a body was not so constituted as to be able to decide whether parents could pay or not. Boards of Guardians and the parochial boards in Scotland were much better adapted for doing so. He was aware that the Amendment would stigmatize as paupers such persons as could not afford to pay for the education of their children; but there was no help for that, and the number of such persons would be exceedingly small. In London the School Board hoped that, even when the compulsory system was in force, they would not be led into the payment or remission of school fees to any considerable extent; but this remission should be allowed by Boards of Guardians rather than by school boards. He had placed on the Notice Paper an Amendment to the same effect, and he should support, not the words, but the principle of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. MILLER said, he hoped the Lord Advocate would agree to the Amendment. The school board had not the means of inquiring into the circumstances of parents. The parochial board was the proper authority for satisfying the ratepayers that school fees should be remitted.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE supported the Amendment, though he thought that of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) preferable.

MR. DIXON doubted whether there would be any satisfactory solution of the difficulty except by means of free schools. He did not intend, however, to vote for the Amendment, and hoped the Government would adhere to the clause in its present form. Parliament would not solve the religious difficulty by adopting the course now proposed, for there was no difference in principle whether the school fees were paid by the parochial boards or by the school boards, the ratepayers having to provide the funds in both cases. When the Education Act of 1870 was under discussion many hon. Members dwelt with great force on the pauperizing effect of forcing poor parents to claim a remission of school fees, and it was distinctly stated in that Act that the payment of school fees was not to be considered poor relief. His hon. Friend who proposed the Amendment no doubt thought the effect would be the same in both cases; but he did not concur in that view. The class of persons who went before the Poor Law Guardians were known as paupers; but they were now dealing with a class which was quite distinct from the pauper class—with hundreds and thousands of widows, for example, who were struggling energetically against pauperism, and whose great aim it was to avoid any connection whatever with the Poor Law, with persons who had seen better days, and who shrank from the idea of applying to a relieving officer. The question of compulsion was an extremely difficult one, and the greatest tenderness should be shown in carrying it out, and the Amendment would increase the difficulties attending its application. Nothing could be more oppressive than to compel such a deserving class of widows as he had referred to to place themselves in the position of paupers.

VISCOUNT SANDON supported the Amendment. Under the new system of school boards a very extensive double machinery was created for the purpose of inquiring into the pecuniary position of parents, and to test their capability of paying school fees for the education of their children. That was a state of things which he believed could not last. There were a set of officers watched by the school boards who delegated their duties to district committees, and was it not, he would ask, highly probable that those committees would take a very lenient view of the pecuniary position of those with whom they would have to deal? His own experience of the London School Board led him to believe that the greatest evils were likely to ensue from having two concurrent bodies administering funds in the same locality.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR expressed himself as being greatly alarmed at the probable operation of the 66th and 67th clauses of the Bill. The 67th clause, in reality, though that might not be the intention of the Lord Advocate, gave an invitation to everyone who considered he would be benefited by the fees to go to the school funds. The result would be the pauperizing of education in Scotland, than which he could conceive no greater evil. He thought the Amendment open to the objections which had been urged by the hon. Member for Westminster, but then its spirit ought, in his opinion, to receive the sanction of the House.

MR. MELLY, in supporting the Amendment, observed that, in the case of such great towns as Manchester and Liverpool, it had been found a great evil to have two large staffs acting separately in relation to cases of poverty.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, by the existing Poor Law of Scotland, it was the duty of the Poor Law authorities—and it was a duty which was very well performed—to provide education for the children of paupers in country parishes, and the same thing had been done to a considerable extent in towns. Undoubtedly, there were cases—they were comparatively few—in which parents who were not paupers could not bear the burden of being compelled to pay school fees, and at the same time losing the benefit of their children's services, and he thought it would be rather hard to compel all such persons to have recourse to the Poor Law; while, on the other hand, if the school board authorized them to send their children to school without paying the fees, the children would have the benefit of education without there being any sense of degradation in the matter, and he apprehended it was most in accordance with the sense of the House that in certain cases compulsion should be carried out without the parents and children being branded as paupers. He had endeavoured to provide that there should be no unnecessary pressure on the rates. The duty was in the first instance put upon the parents to send their children to school; but if they did not perform that first duty they must then go to the school board and explain that they were unable to discharge it on account of poverty. That was the meaning of the 67th clause, and not the least invitation was held out to parents to induce them to receive money when it was not required from the school board. Under all the circumstances he had stated, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. ORR EWING regretted that the Government did not intend to adopt the Amendment. He thought that what his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) said was perfectly true—namely, that the parochial board would have the best means of knowing all the circumstances connected with the child. But then the Lord Advocate said this would only reduce the children to the condition of paupers, and he wished to maintain their independence. The Lord Advocate had pursued rather an inconsistent course, considering that when he (Mr. Orr Ewing) brought forward a Motion to relieve the parents who lived in houses of a low rent from paying for education in Scotland, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said the people of Scotland would willingly pay these rates.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he thought it a great pity the Government did not accept the spirit of his hon. Friend's Amendment. The opinion of the House, as far as he was able to gather, was in favour of accepting the spirit of the Amendment. How was the school board to ascertain who the children were unless they applied to the parochial board? Therefore the Lord Advocate proposed to do by two steps what his hon. Friend proposed to do in one. The fact could not be concealed that there were pauper children whose parents could not supply them with the necessaries of reading, writing, and arithmetic. They all knew that the religious difficulty as regarded the question of payment of fees to denominational schools had been mixed up with the schools boards. The present proposal, however, would place the whole matter on a new platform, and relegate all these difficulties to the parochial boards, and the effect of making the change would be to relieve them from the whole of the odium this subject had brought upon them. He would point out to the Government that a large portion of the Scotch Bill was an experiment. They believed it would work well; but surely the Government were not beyond taking advice from practical men like the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith.) He ventured to suggest that the Government should accept the spirit of the Amendment, and undertake to bring up a clause to give it effect upon the Report.

MR. M'LAREN believed that the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) had exhausted the whole argument on the question. If the duty of making inquiries as to who were entitled to be relieved from the payment of fees were placed in the hands of persons unaccustomed to make such inquiries, the effect would necessarily be that persons having no right to be exempted would be excused from payment.

MR. COLLINS conceived that the adoption of the Amendment would go far to put an end to the religious difficulty, and he hoped that the Government would agree to it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would not resist what appeared to be the opinion of the House, and he was, therefore, disposed to assent to the substance of the Amendment; but he thought that the object of the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) would be more satisfactorily attained by omitting the 66th clause, and adopting in Clause 67 the first part of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), requiring, in case of necessity, application to be made to the parochial board for the payment of the school fees, and directing that board, upon such application being made, to pay out of the poor fund the ordinary and reasonable fees.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause struck out.

Clause 67 (Parents to provide elementary education for their children).

MR. M'LAREN moved to make the limits of age of children to be sent to school from 6 to 12, instead of from 5 to 13, as proposed by the Lord Advocate. Five years was too young an age, he contended, for a child to be sent to school.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it would be necessary to make several alterations in the clause, and he promised, therefore, to take up this question on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. H. SMITH then moved in line 33, after "therefore," insert—

"to apply to the parochial board of the parish or burgh in which he resides, and it shall be the duty of the said board to pay out of the poor fund the ordinary and reasonable fees for the elementary education of every such child, or such part of such fees, as the parent shall be unable to pay, in the event of such board being satisfied of the inability of the parent to pay such fees."

MR. DIXON asked the hon. Member for Westminster whether he meant that the school boards should pay the school fees for the parochial board, or whether the parish authorities of one parish were to pay to those of another?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he meant that the parochial boards should pay the ordinary fees of the schools to which the children shall be sent.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. COLLINS then moved the addition of the following words:—

"No such payment shall be made or refused on condition of the child attending any school other than such school as may be selected by the parent."

The hon. Member said, that the question involved in this Amendment was a wide and important one, and it had already more than once attracted the attention of the House. What he wanted the Committee to do was to say that where a poor person was in that position that he could not pay for the education of his children it should be left to him to determine to what school his boy or girl should be sent. He wished to enforce parental responsibility, and he did not see why the same facilities should not be given to the minority in the large towns of Scotland as had been conferred upon the minority in England. In gaols prisoners, and in the Army soldiers, had the privilege of selecting their chaplains; and where there were two schools side by side receiving the support of the Government the children of parents belonging to the minority should have their religious feelings respected.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "but no such payment shall be made or refused on condition of the child attending any school other than such school in receipt of the Parliamentary grant as may be selected by the parent."
—(Mr. Collins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE LORD ADVOCATE looked upon the Amendment as proposing that the Poor Law authorities shall pay for the education of paupers at any school the paupers might select. According to the Amendment, the pauper parents should be at liberty to select any inspected school they chose, and the Poor Law authorities should have no voice in the matter at all. He must dissent altogether from that proposition; and he must also dissent from the Amendment on the Paper by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, to the effect that the parents should have no voice in the matter. Both these extremes were vicious. Hitherto the reasonable wishes of the parents had been respected, and there was every ground for believing that there would be no difference in the future. If there were two schools equally eligible for the education desiderated, the one desired by the parent on religious or other grounds would commonly be selected. But that the parent should be allowed to dictate to the rating authority to what school the child should be sent, without any reference to convenience, was altogether out of the question. The Government desired to maintain the perfect liberty to reserve to the Poor Law Board to do that which was just and right, and which was in accordance with good feeling, in individual cases as they might arise. He felt he must vote against the Amendment.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the statement of the Lord Advocate might probably settle the question without going to a division, because it was evidently the desire of the Government that in all these matters the reasonable wishes of the parents should be consulted. They were now opening a new chapter in Poor Law administration by introducing this new provision; but it would not be possible to carry it out unless the wishes of the parents were consulted. He was far from saying that every captious wish could be consulted; but in any case it was clear that the Board of Supervision had laid down a principle which rendered this Amendment unnecessary.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) merely extended the 25th clause of the English Act to Scotland, to which the House could have no objection.

MR. TREVELYAN said, this was not so; but that, whereas the English Act obliged the school boards to pay the fees when they sent children to a school not their own, this Amendment would oblige the boards to pay for children being educated in a school of the parents' choice, although the board schools might be empty.

MR. ORR EWING asked how would it be if a school board sent a child to a school in a parish where there were only secular schools, and where a minority wanted a religious education for their children?

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, it was quite true that evidence had been before the Committee by Roman Catholic clergymen on the subject referred to by the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr Ewing), but those gentlemen were unable to give one single instance in which the consciences of the Roman Catholic children or their parents had been offended by the action of the parochial board, and therefore the argument of the hon. Member completely broke down.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 166; Noes 178: Majority 12.

MR. M'LAREN moved, at the end of the clause, to add—

“Provided, the school board shall pay fees only for the elementary education of such poor children as attend the public schools.”

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he had already spoken on this Amendment, and that he did not intend further to refer to it.

MR. CRAUFURD hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Amendment.

MR. CANDLISH suggested that as the view of the House on the subject had been indirectly expressed in the division which had just taken place, the wiser course to adopt would be to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. COLLINS was in favour of the Amendment being negatived rather than withdrawn.

Amendment negatived.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN moved to add—“And the provisions of this clause shall apply to the education of blind children.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 68 (Defaulting parents may be proceeded against).

MR. SCOURFIELD moved, in page 25, line 39, leave out “it shall be the duty of,” and after “board” leave out “to,” and insert “may at its discretion.” He strongly objected to any increased severity in the penal and compulsory enactments. By the clause as it now stood the Board was authorized to summon any parent, and require from him information and explanation respecting the failure of his duty with regard to the education of his children, and prosecute him before the Sheriff; and on conviction such person was rendered liable to a penalty of £5 or 30 days' imprisonment. He thought it would be a sufficient and more severe punishment to compel the offender to listen to a lecture of one, two, or three hours from a member of the board on the blessings of education.

MR. J. LOWTHER pointed out the arbitrary character of this preposterous enactment, which provided that it should be the duty of every school board to appoint an officer to ascertain and report to the board what parents, resident within the parish or burgh, had failed and omitted to provide elementary education for their children, and they would be rendered liable to prosecution if they did not satisfy the board that they had not failed in such duty without reasonable excuse. Thus a parent might be summoned before a kind of Inquisition, or Star Chamber, and cross-examined with a view to the institution of legal proceedings against him. This was neither more nor less than the old French system, which had been denounced from time immemorial in this country. The corresponding clause in the English Act was couched in far milder language, and, moreover, he did not believe any proceedings had been taken under it. At all events, he was certain no person had been sent to prison for infringing the English Act, because this was a free country, where every man ought to be at liberty to know as much or as little as he pleased. He protested against cramming information down people's throats with a policeman's staff, and trusted the Committee would eventually assist him in removing this element of compulsion from the Bill.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER remarked that in the present instance his hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) had exercised the freedom of which he spoke, and had elected to remain ignorant of the educational requirements of the people of Scotland. If there was one thing they wanted more than another it was this compulsory clause, and he hoped the Government would not be seduced into giving it up by the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. F. S. POWELL desired to see a universal system of compulsion established both in England and Scotland, as the time had passed when parents should be allowed to bring up their children in ignorance; but, nevertheless, he objected to the present clause because it was unnecessarily inquisitorial and vexatious in its character. However, if the Scotch Members did not object to it, it was not for him as an English Member to interfere.

MR. COLLINS protested against the doctrine that if the Scotch people chose to have the clause Englishmen ought not to say anything against it. Every English Member of the House was interested in seeing that no precedent was adopted for Scotland which might afterwards injuriously be applied to this country.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE thought it strange that a Liberal Government should bring forward so many tyrannical measures. This was about the most tyrannical clause he had ever seen in a Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE urged that they could not compel a person to do anything without coercion; and, having determined that it was necessary, the next question was, what amount was sufficient for the purpose? As to the Amendment now before the Committee, he did not think it should be left at the discretion of the board to act in the matter as they thought fit, and it was not too strong language to use for the purpose to say that it should be their duty to give attention to the point, and to see that children were not left uneducated through the culpable neglect of their parents. The hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) quite misapprehended the effect of the clause, which would inflict no hardship on parents, but was conceived in kindness and tenderness towards them. An opportunity was afforded to the parent by the clause of explaining why he had not sent his child to be educated, and the fiat for his prosecution could only issue upon his failure to attend the request or summons of the board to appear, or, upon his appearing, his failing to give a satisfactory explanation.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the clause, as a penal one, was of interest to England as well as Scotland. Its object was to create a moral feeling, and that could not be done by pains and penalties. He was much surprised to hear the learned Lord Advocate say that the latter part of the clause was drawn in tenderness and kindness. He (Mr. B. Hope) knew that Scotch legal phraseology was very strange to the southern mind; for what was termed to "justify" a man in Scotland, meant in England hanging him. Even taking such differences of terms into consideration, he was not prepared to hear the words tenderness and kindness applied to the clause. If the Committee passed this clause they would make the idea of education odious, and place reading and writing in the category of things which were looked upon as simple tyranny.

MR. ORR EWING quoted the Report of Dr. Frazer (Bishop of Manchester) on education in America, to show that, in spite of pains and penalties, a large amount of truancy and absenteeism existed there; and he asked whether this clause could not be amended so as to make it less stringent. If it were passed in its present form no school board could work it. It had better be made less stringent in order that it might be universally carried out.

MR. J. LOWTHER suggested the withdrawal of the Amendment, in order that he might raise the whole question of compulsory education at a subsequent stage in an Amendment expunging all the objectionable words of the clause.

MR. SCOURFIELD, who said his object was to facilitate the operations of the boards, said he had no objection to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ANDERSON moved, in page 26, line 9, leave out "the board is hereby authorized," and insert "it shall be the duty of the board." He contended that if it was not made compulsory upon the board to summon the parent whose child was not attending school, it would not be done.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the construction he put upon the clause in its present form was, that it would be the duty of the board to inquire into every case of non-attendance, and no doubt this would be done, and it would be too stringent to enact that in every case the parent should be summoned. The Committee should have confidence that the boards would carry out the intention of the Act without directing them at every stage that they must do certain things compulsory.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY thought considerable difficulty would be experienced in some parishes in getting a suitable person to prepare a list of all children not attending school.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE did not think any such difficulty would be felt, and he agreed with the Lord Advocate that it would be unwise to compel the board to summon the parent in every case.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment to a division, but would rather leave the matter to the discretion of the school boards. In many of the large towns in England legal proceedings had been instituted with the greatest possible benefit, but they were not compulsory. Under the English Act the school boards picked out the worst cases, in which they took proceedings against the parents, and the moral effect of their action in those cases rendered it unnecessary to proceed in the other cases. He thought to compel the boards in Scotland to summon in every case would have an injurious effect upon the working of the Bill.

Mr. Orr Ewing

MR. KINNAIRD said, when he first saw the Amendment he was prepared to support it; but after what had been just said, he did not think it would be wise to draw the string too tight at first.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the clause without the Amendment would only provide for permissive education; whereas the understanding had been that the Bill should give absolute compulsion uniformly. It had been stated that there were 90,000 children in Scotland who received no education. The greater part of that number were probably in Glasgow, and none of them would be sent to school unless stringent compulsory powers were given to the boards.

MR. GRAHAM remarked that, if the statement just made was correct, it showed that it would render the whole clause inoperative to compel the boards to summon the parents of 90,000 children.

MR. ANDERSON said, if there was one thing more than another upon which the Scotch people had determined, it was that—right or wrong—they would make a fair trial of absolute compulsion, and they altogether objected to the permissive compulsion of the clause as it at present stood.

Amendment negatived.

MR. F. S. POWELL moved to insert "alleged" before the word "failure" in line 12, in order to modify the language of the clause and make it accord with general usage.

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to directing the board to take proceedings upon a mere allegation.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ORR EWING moved, in page 26, line 26, leave out "five," and insert "one." Line 27, leave out "thirty," and insert "three."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought, perhaps, the penalties in the clause were a little too high, and therefore he would consent to reduce the £5 to £2, and the 30 days to 14 days.

Mr. ORR EWING still thought the penalties too high.

Mr. CRAUFURD objected to any reduction. Amongst the mining population many men were receiving between £3 and £4 per week, much of which was squandered in drink, and they would willingly pay a couple of pounds rather than send their children to school.

Mr. M'LAREN reminded the Committee that penalties of 40s. were considered to be sufficient for many serious offences, and asked why a poor man should be made liable to pay a much larger amount for neglecting to comply with this provision.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, he should leave it to the Scotch Members to settle amongst themselves what the money penalty should be; but he should certainly take the sense of the Committee on the proposal to imprison. There was no such enactment in the English Bill, and he objected to its introduction into the Scotch Bill.

Mr. FORDYCE wished to ask the Lord Advocate what was to become of these penalties, and also whether the expenses of the Procurator Fiscal were to be defrayed by the board, or considered included in their salaries, as, if the former, he strongly objected to such expenditure being thrown on local rates?

Mr. F. S. POWELL said, the penalty in the English Act was 5s. and costs, and the parent might be summoned again next day; while in this Bill an interval of six months must elapse before a second prosecution could take place; therefore it was necessary the penalty should be higher.

The words "five pounds" were then struck out, and "forty shillings" inserted.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT then moved to omit that part of the clause which enacted imprisonment.

Amendment proposed, in page 26, line 26, to leave out the words "or to imprisonment not exceeding thirty days."
—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or to imprisonment' stand part of the Clause."

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, if a man did not pay his fine, he might be sent to prison under the English Act.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, he was aware that such was the case; but the proposal in this Bill was that there should be a discretion to fine or imprisonment, and it was that to which he objected. He should not be opposed if the imprisonment was only to follow upon the non-payment of the fine.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 27; Majority 36.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to strike out 30 days, and insert 14 days.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, they were imposing a duty by Act of Parliament, and if those on whom it was imposed failed to perform it, they would commit a misdemeanour which was punishable by the ordinary law of the land by fine and imprisonment. The present clause was really a limitation of the penalty. He did not know why the learned Lord wished to limit the maximum to 14 days; for his part he would rather leave it as it was.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE, on the other hand, would rather fix it at 7 than 14 days.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. C. S. PARKER wished to ask the learned Lord a question with respect to the Bill of last year—which formed a sort of appendix to the Education Act—the Industrial and Reformatory Schools Bill. He wanted to know whether the learned Lord had considered the question, and whether, under this Bill, the school board had sufficient power to spend money in sending criminal children to reformatory schools? In a densely populated city like Glasgow they would be sure to find many children in the streets who were not fit to be sent to the ordinary schools under the school board.

Mr. R. W. DUFF also inquired what was to be done with the fines levied under this Act?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he had fully considered this Bill with reference to the measure of last year. The Industrial Schools Act already gave power to magistrates to deal with children brought before them, and he thought that this Bill had at present quite as much as it could carry. Therefore, he he did not propose to insert a clause giving the school boards power to send children to a reformatory or industrial schools. With respect to the penalties, there was an express provision that they should go to the Exchequer. The question of the expense of the prosecution was dealt with in the next clause, and it was provided that such expenses as were not recovered from the defaulting persons should be paid by the school board.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that after the division which had been taken, he would not trouble the Committee to divide against the clause; but he reserved to himself the right of doing so on the Report should he think fit.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

MR. M'LAREN thought that there was some injustice in making the school boards pay the expenses of prosecutions and not allowing them to receive the fines.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to add at the end of the clause the words—"All fines recovered under this clause shall be paid into the school fund."

MR. M'LAREN said, that although the machinery for recovering the penalties under the Bill was described as summary, it would be somewhat expensive. Taking into consideration the charges for the summons, the witnesses, and the officers, each case would hardly cost less than 30s. He thought that this being in the nature of a penal Act, the Procurators Fiscal should conduct the prosecutions as part of the duty of their office.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 69 (Method of Procedure) agreed to.

Clause 70 (Employers of children to act as parents. Parents not exempted from liability).

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that, according to the terms of the clause, if an infant entered an infant school at the age of three and remained until six, the employer would be relieved from all responsibility. But it could not be thought that an infant would have received sufficient education in that time. He would therefore propose to insert in page 27, line 7, after "years" "consecutively between the ages of five and thirteen."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH moved, in line 7, after "years" to leave out "and," and insert "or who having so attended school," his object being to prevent the employer from being relieved from all responsibility if the child could merely read and write. He should be sorry to see the standard of education limited to the arts of reading and writing. Certainly, if a child could not read and write after being at the school for three years, he ought to go back again.

The Lord Advocate

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he sympathized very much with the proposal, and was far from saying that the standard of education should be the mere ability to read and write; nor would he exonerate an employer who took a child into his employment merely because he could read and write. At the same time, he pointed out that, in a Bill which created offences and inflicted penalties, it would not do to make the clauses too stringent, and he would point out that, as the clause now stood, it did not absolutely prohibit a person from employing a child who had not been three years at school, and who could not read or write, but it made the master subject to all the liabilities to which a parent was subject, and that was what they were aiming at. The only reason he had for rejecting the Amendment was that it was proposed to render still more stringent a penal clause passed for the establishment of a compulsory system.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR thought that precisely the same arguments might be used against the Factory Bill.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ORR EWING moved the omission of the clause, on the ground that if it were retained and acted on it would be impossible to carry out the provisions of the Factory Act. Employers of labour required, in order to avoid the penalties of that Act, to keep two sets of children, whereby the one set, who were at work during the forenoon, were educated during the afternoon; and those who were at school in the forenoon were at work in the afternoon. But employers of labour might be imprisoned under this clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that only those manufacturers who were censurably contumacious would be subject to penalties, because the clause provided that such penalties should only attach to masters who continued ignorant children in their employment after notice from the school board.

MR. ORR EWING said, that a child might come to an employer at eight or nine years of age, and his education might have been neglected up to that time. Was the employer of the child to be punished because the child's education had been neglected for the three preceding years?

MR. SCOURFIELD said, the tendency of recent measures, especially during the present Session, was to subject all mankind to penal legislation. If anybody were called on to portray the advancing civilization of England, it might be fitly conveyed by the representation of a large prison.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 71 (Exemptions).

MR. GRIEVE moved the omission, in page 27, of words which provided that a certificate of regular attendance at a public school, or a school subject to inspection, during a period of not less than six months in each of three successive years, shall exempt the parent, and all employers of the child, from any prosecution or other proceeding under this Act. The only proof of education which would exempt an employer would, therefore, be a certificate of ability to read and write, and of a fair knowledge of elementary arithmetic under the hand of one of Her Majesty's Inspectors, or a teacher of a school authorized by one of Her Majesty's Inspectors.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that his object in inserting the words objected to was to meet the case of a very rare occurrence—that of employers employing children who had been at certain schools for three years, but who would not learn to read or write. He was assured that such cases were so very rare that it was not worth while to provide for them, and he would not therefore resist the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK moved, in line 21, to leave out the words "of ability to read and write and of a fair knowledge of elementary arithmetic," and to insert instead, "instruction according to a standard which may be fixed from time to time by the Education Department." He contended that the provision as it now stood would not secure an education at all, for it would be a mockery to call mere reading, writing, and arithmetic by that name. These three things were merely the foundation upon which an education could be built. He might, no doubt, be told that this was merely a provision exempting the parents of the children from punishment in the event of these things provided for having been learned; but he was afraid that the enactment would give a tone, or rather a want of tone, to the standard of teaching in all schools throughout Scotland. He thought that it would be much better to leave the standard according to which a certificate of ability should be granted to the discretion of the Education Department, so that they could from time to time raise the standard. He feared that the standard of teaching in the English schools was very much influenced for the worse by the necessary standard having been fixed too low, and he hoped that such a system would not be introduced into Scotland, which had been so long and so justly celebrated for the high standard of teaching in her national schools.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR remarked that they had already passed a compulsory law for Scotland, and there could be no greater tyranny than to insist upon the attendance of children at school for a certain number of years, and yet only to provide for their being taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. The moment they had compulsion they were bound to have higher education. What his hon. Friend proposed was nothing more than what was in the English Bill, which provided for a definite standard of education, and surely no one could say that reading, writing, and arithmetic was any definition of education. He repeated that it was nothing short of tyranny to connect compulsory attendance with the miserable standard fixed by the clause.

MR. SCOURFIELD thought that the tyranny would rather be in punishing parents for not having their children educated up to a standard which would be in itself fluctuating and uncertain.

MR. M'LAREN also opposed the Amendment. He remarked that the Bill was one of pains and penalties, and if those were to be inflicted, it was necessary that the standard should be well known and defined.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH was surprised at the opposition to the Amendment, when the principle of it was precisely the same as was embodied in the English Act. He must protest against putting into an Act of Parliament a provision that education was to consist of merely reading, writing, and arithmetic. He hoped the Lord Advocate would accept the words proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock).

THE LORD ADVOCATE observed that it was not intended by the present clause to define education, the clause only referring to children under 13 years of age, and providing an exemption for parents and employers from liability to prosecution in cases where a certificate was granted that the children could read and write and had a fair knowledge of arithmetic. It would, however, be a serious matter to sanction an impression that by means of penalties children should be compelled to receive the higher class of education. He was as strong an advocate for the higher education as the hon. Member; but he hoped he would not press his Amendment to a division.

MR. DALGLISH supposed that it could not enter into the imagination of any one that all children in all districts should be educated up to a point to be fitted to go to the University. All the Committee had to consider was that the child should be so educated that he should become a good member of society afterwards. A certificate that he was educated up to that point was all that could possibly be required, and that was to be able to read and write and to understand a certain amount of arithmetic.

MR. DIXON said, that what was required was that security should be given not for what they should be taught at school, but what they should retain in after life. They found from statistics that children who left school at the ages of 10, 11, and 12, and who only possessed a knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic, in the space of a few years after they had left school entirely forgot what they had learnt, and it was against that that Parliament had to provide, but it could not be obtained by the clause. In Germany the children were all well educated. The Germans retained their education, and the country was progressing at a pace little known in this country. They were our competitors in commerce, as they were the competitors of France in war. They conquered France in war, and they would conquer England in commerce if we did not care more about the education of our people. In Germany children remained at school from 6 to 14 years of age, and it was expected that the child should benefit by the seven years of education, which was the fact, and he attained a point of knowledge that was never gained in our elementary schools. The exemption asked for was a most reasonable one, and if it did not exist in England it ought not to exist in Scotland.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE objected to the Amendment, for he had long held that in Scotland the means of education were sure to produce their proper effect. He thought the clause somewhat vague, and it certainly acquired amendment. By whom was the certificate of proficiency to be given? Why should it be left to the master of the school? Why not restrict it to an Inspector of schools? He wished the Government would confine the operation of this clause in the same way as it was in the English Act.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK thought the Lord Advocate did not quite appreciate the object of the Amendment. He objected to lay down so low a standard for time to come as that no child should be forced to attend school who was merely acquainted with the rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic. He would rather leave the standard to the discretion of the Education Department. The Lord Advocate truly said that reading, writing, and arithmetic did not constitute education. In this he quite agreed; but it followed that if the Lord Advocate was right, this was not a Bill for compulsory education at all. He did not ask to have a higher standard carried out at once; but he wished the power to be taken to raise it whenever it appeared possible to do so. He asked the Committee to carry out the principle advocated by a Royal Commission and a Committee of that House, both of which had carefully inquired into the circumstances of the case.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR did not see why this clause should be so much inferior in value to that in the English Bill. By this clause a definite standard of education was fixed. What did that mean? The Committee of Council had several times changed the standard of education, but here the standard was fixed for all time; whilst the English Bill had the advantage of having occasionally a change of standard as circumstances might demand.

Mr. GLADSTONE admitted that the authority recommending this Amendment entitled it to the most respectful attention; at the same time, it was not a Scotch authority. The Government, in the matter of compulsion, had been encouraged in this Bill to go very much beyond what had been attempted in the English Act. The English Act provided only for permissive compulsion, thereby leaving it to the judgment of the local authorities to determine if there need be compulsion or not, with the conviction in the minds of the Government that if the law remained as it was a considerable time would probably elapse before compulsion would be universal over England. In Scotland, however, the Government felt they were justified, in a great degree, in laying down immediate compulsory education, because they were encouraged to come up to that point by the sentiments and convictions of the people of Scotland, as expressed by the Representatives of that country. If they were to go by the opinions of those Representatives, they must have a compulsory enactment. His hon. Friend who had just sat down, and who adorned the seat for the University he occupied, was not immediately and directly the expositor of the popular voice of Scotland on this matter, because he spoke in behalf of a learned constituency. The objection taken by his hon. Friend was to the words which gave exemption from compulsion, not only in respect of children who obtained an Inspector's certificate, but also of those who received a certificate granted by any of the teachers of the schools. Upon consideration, the Government were disposed to give up these words, and to limit the power of giving a certificate which would exempt the parent to cases in which the certificate was given by one of the Inspectors. He fully admitted that it was most desirable that the certificate should be a perfectly substantial one. The point, however, on which he joined issue with the one of his hon. Friend was the doctrine that it was better to leave this matter to the discretion of the Department of Education. If they were to stand to the letter of the English law, it would be open to the objection that the Department might fix a lower standard of education, and insist upon it. So far from thinking that leaving this matter to the discretion of an Executive Department was an advantage, he thought it would be exactly the reverse. They were then dealing with the penal portions of the Act. It was not that they wanted to punish parents because their children did not learn a certain quantity at school. They were laying down a certain amount of penal liability for the parents, and it was demanded by justice and policy that the sphere within which parents may be liable should be strictly defined, and not dependent upon the discretion of any Executive Department. It was necessary that they should speak in plain language, and it would not be satisfactory to the people themselves if the reasons why they were exempted were not stated in clear language.

Mr. GORDON concurred generally in the views just expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, but maintained that the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair) was, directly as well as indirectly, an expositor of the educational views of the people of Scotland. The opinion stated by that hon. Member as to the deteriorating effect which the Bill would have upon the higher branches of education correctly represented the feeling existing in Scotland, even among the humbler classes. It might be impossible to give the higher education to the great mass of the people who attended the schools; but still the good which the schools in Scotland had done towards those of the humbler classes who had shown a capacity to benefit by the higher education had been very great, and it was to be hoped that, whatever measures Parliament adopted, those classes would still continue to receive similar advantages.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE the word "fair" was omitted from line 22, as were also the words "or by any teacher of such school authorized by one of Her Majesty's Inspectors," in line 24.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

MR. DIXON opposed the clause after the speech of the Prime Minister, because it was clear, from what the right hon. Gentleman had said, that if that clause was passed for Scotland a similar one must be proposed, probably next year, for England. That clause was a limitation on the compulsory principle of the Bill, and there existed no such limitation in the English Act.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER was afraid the effect of this clause would be to destroy the effect of Clause 68. As he read the clause, if a child could read, write, and scramble through a little arithmetic, he could not be compelled to go to school.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, the absence of any provision in this Bill giving power to an Inspector, on a parent bringing his child before him, to grant a certificate that the child could read and write, would render parents in the middle and upper classes liable to prosecution, which, he thought, could not be contemplated by the Government in this measure.

MR. M'LAREN supported the clause as a valuable one, under whose operation a child might learn more in five years than, without it, he could learn in seven.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, in supporting the proposition of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), said, the difficulty would surely be met by the Lord Advocate bringing up on Report a clause carrying out the principle of the English measure in this matter. The clause was totally different from anything that appeared in the English Bill.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 110; Noes 7: Majority 103.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 72 (Clerks of criminal courts to be furnished with list of defaulting parents).

MR. GORDON protested against the clause which provided that a copy of the list of defaulting parents should be furnished to the clerk of every Court of criminal jurisdiction in the district, and that the Court might take the facts set forth in such lists into consideration in pronouncing sentence. This really was carrying compulsion too far, and he thought it would be better to omit the clause altogether.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 50: Majority 25.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 73 (Children bound to attend school).

MR. GORDON moved, in page 28, line 6, leave out "secular." If the clause was allowed to remain in its present state there would be a large amount of secular scholars. If a parent objected to having his child instructed in religion, it would not be right to submit the child to such teaching; but he certainly thought the child should not be allowed to withdraw at the time of such teaching unless the parent objected to his remaining.

THE LORD ADVOCATE could not agree to the Amendment, because, if carried, it would introduce that which was entirely against the principle of the Bill—namely, the enforcement of religious instruction.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY urged that if the State was to stand in loco parentis it should enforce the parents' desire as to attending religious as well as secular teaching. The learned Lord surely did not, in his zeal for religious liberty, wish the child to judge what instruction it should receive, or to support it in rebellion against parental authority.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the clause did not interfere with the parents' authority. It would apply to children ordered to attend by the board as well as by their parents, and nothing was more likely to injure religious instruction than to make it compulsory.

MR. CAWLEY asked how, if compulsion injured religious teaching, it could promote secular teaching? No invidious distinction should be drawn between one part of a parent's desire and another. The whole clause was one of an extraordinary character.

MR. CARNEGIE said, that without this clause it would be possible for a parent to say—"I have ordered my child to go to school, and if he chooses to stop in the street I cannot help it; you cannot expect me to look after him." The object of the clause really was to compel the parent to send the child.

MR. CAWLEY said, that was not so; the clause put compulsion on the child and not on the parent. He did not object to compelling a parent to send his child to school; but he objected to pretending to carry out the wishes of the parent when something contrary was intended.

MR. C. S. PARKER suggested the omission of the words "during the whole time that the school was open for secular instruction."

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, this was one of the clauses which showed the zeal of the promoters of the Bill for secular education as compared with religious education. His fear was, that from the treatment religious instruction received, an impression would be produced that it was a matter about which no trouble need be taken. If the word "secular" were omitted, an invidious distinction between secular and religious instruction would be removed.

MR. ANDERSON said, it would be contrary to the spirit of the Bill to enforce attendance on religious instruction; but he doubted whether the clause was not too severe, and if the object could be accomplished by the general rules of the school, perhaps the clause could be dispensed with.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that on the passing of the English Act infinite trouble was taken to secure the attendance of children during the whole time a school was open, and if they did not attend the religious instruction other instruction was provided. The importance of this seemed to have been lost sight of in the case of Scotland. Why was the term "secular" used so much in this Bill when it did not occur in the English Act? Was Scotland more anxious for secular teaching than England was two years ago? So far from that, the tone of the public mind was more in favour of religious teaching, a fair balance being held between the different parties. Why on earth should the Bill bear on the face of it a sort of secular mark?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the English Bill provided against a child being master of the situation and absenting himself, under the Conscience Clause, from instruction; but the wording of the Conscience Clause was different from the wording of this, which put compulsion on the parent to send the child to school. It was out of the question that they could by law enforce attendance at the time of religious instruction; and probably, as suggested, the object now sought could be obtained by school regulations, so that the clause might be withdrawn.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, after that statement, he would advise the withdrawal of the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause negatived.

Clause 74 negatived.

Clause 75 agreed to.

Clause 76 (Teachers appointed under the Act not subject to provisions of 9 & 10 Vict., c. ccxxvi.)

MR. ORR EWING moved the omission of the clause, on the ground that it was the almost unanimous wish of the schoolmasters that the question should be dealt with by private legislation next year.

THE LORD ADVOCATE declined to withdraw the clause, because he thought it desirable that it should be distinctly stated that the Act in question did not affect the teachers to be appointed under the Bill; but, at the same time, he had no objection whatever to the subject being dealt with by private legislation next year, nor would the clause throw any obstacle in the way of that being done.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE remarked that private efforts to legislate were not always successful.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 77 (Repeal of Acts at variance with this Act).

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed that the first part of the clause only should be agreed to, and promised to bring up a schedule of the Acts repealed on the Report.

MR. CAMERON observed, that under one of the Acts proposed to be repealed, the interest of a sum of £24,000 was distributed amongst schoolmasters in certain Highland districts. What, he desired to know, did the Government propose to substitute for that grant, and what was to become of it?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the £24,000 would be absorbed in the general funds of the country; but under the Bill a larger amount of public money would be distributed for educational purposes in the districts referred to, in respect of which the provisions of the Bill were very liberal. Provision would be distinctly made to secure the interest of the £24,000 under the new system, and the incomes of the existing schoolmasters would not be interfered with.

MR. CRAUFURD was glad to hear that the Treasury would preserve the fund; but it was already secured by statutory trust, and was the property of the schools. They could not consent to part with it.

MR. M'LAREN moved in line 35, leave out after "repealed," to "and," in page 29, line 8, and insert—

"The assessments authorised and required to be imposed and levied by the said recited Acts, or any of them, shall continue to be imposed and levied upon the heritors in all time coming, according to the provisions of the said Acts, and the law as existing prior to the passing of this Act, to the extent and effect of imposing and levying in each parish an assessment which shall produce a sum equal in amount to that which was imposed and levied in such parish during the average of the three years immediately preceding the passing of this Act, and with the same right of relief against their tenants as is provided by the said recited Acts, and that the produce thereof shall be paid over to the said School Boards respectively in all time coming: Provided, that when the general assessment hereby authorised to be imposed in any parish would amount to a larger sum on any heritor and his tenants than the average amount leviable during the three years preceding the passing of this Act, the original assessment hereby continued shall cease and determine, and the new assessment only shall be leviable according to the provisions of this Act."

By the Act of 1696 the heritors were required to establish a school in every parish, and the maximum stipend was now £70. It could be proved, however, that the rental of many counties had increased more than forty-fold, while the salary of the schoolmaster was only augmented by £6. One third of the whole parishes had to supply, not only the school-houses, but the salaries for the schoolmasters. The rate would be levied on the small holders as well as upon the wealthier classes, but the proportion was not adequately adjusted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it was proposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh to adopt a system which was a most objectionable one on its merits. As it appeared to him, a double mode of assessment was proposed by the Amendment, and he confessed that it was a most difficult one to understand. He submitted that the plan proposed in the Bill was the right one, and it was a rule that had been followed in all analogous cases—namely, to found the assessment upon the equitable value of the land, and to divide it among the owners and occupiers who were to pay the rate.

MR. CARNEGIE thought the Lord Advocate had misapprehended the intention of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, who did not wish that there should be a double payment, but that the sum now paid on the assessment, whichever was highest, should be paid. With the principle of this he agreed, although he objected to the wording of the Amendment.

MR. CRAUFURD hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing on his Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON remarked that under the Bill as it at present stood there would be, in some parishes, a considerable transfer of burdens from the rich to the poor, and the object of the Amendment was to prevent that transfer. If, therefore, his hon. Friend should divide he would vote with him.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CAMERON moved, in line 35, to insert the following amendment:—

"Provided that in addition to the Parliamentary grant a sum of money equal in amount to the sum now appropriated to any school established under the said recited Act of the First and Second Victoria, chapter eighty-seven, shall be paid by the Scotch Education Department to the School Board of each parish in which such school may be situated."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had consulted on the subject with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he had great pleasure in saying that there was no objection to the proposition contained in the Amendment. If the hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Amendment, he (the Lord Advocate) would bring up a clause on the Report which would embody the same proposition.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN wished to know whether under the Bill the position of a sub-tenant would be respected, and whether such a sub-tenant would be held liable for rates. If so, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman bring up a clause on the Report to protect such tenants during the currency of their existing leases.

The Lord Advocate

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was nothing in the Bill which interfered with existing contracts, which would remain when this Bill came into operation just as they were at present.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 78 agreed to.

Postponed Clauses.

Clause 2 (Expenses of Scotch Education Department) negatived; whereupon—

THE LORD ADVOCATE rose to explain that it had been negatived by mistake; when—

LORD GARLIES rose to Order. He wished to know what clause the Committee were now upon?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the clause had been negatived, and he did not think it was competent for him to put it again.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was some misapprehension about the matter. The clause was a matter-of-course clause, which must be passed.

MR. BOUVERIE said, it was better that things should be done in a regular way, and as the clause had been negatived by mistake it would be easy enough to re-commit the Bill in order to re-insert it, and that course would have to be adopted.

Clause 3 (Department may employ officers in Scotland).

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 89: Majority 41.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to insert a new clause providing that the expenses of the Scotch Education Department should be defrayed by the Lords of the Treasury out of moneys to be voted by Parliament.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH considered this to be a most extraordinary proceeding. The Committee had negatived Clause 2 of the Bill, providing that—

"The salaries of the officers and servants of the Scotch Education Department shall be fixed with the consent of the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury, and shall, together with the whole expenses of the said Department, be defrayed out of moneys voted by Parliament;"

and now another clause was proposed, to all intents and purposes in the same terms. He appealed to the Chairman to know whether such a course was in accordance with the Rules of the House.

THE CHAIRMAN: It appears to me that this is substantially the same clause as Clause 2; but there are certain modifications in it which, if the Committee had been so disposed, would have enabled it to be taken. However, if I am bound to give a strict ruling, I must say that, in consideration of the circumstances under which Clause 2 was negatived, this clause should be proposed on re-committal.

COLONEL WILSON - PATTEN concurred that the clause could only be considered on the third reading, or on re-committal, and suggested that it should be withdrawn.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause (Appointment of organising Commissioners in Scotland to act for three years,)—(The Lord Advocate,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. GORDON said, the Committee were entitled to be informed as to the character and position of the persons who were to exercise the powers of Commissioners. Not the slightest information had been given as to the persons whom it was proposed to appoint Commissioners. That was an unusual proceeding. He hoped that the Committee would adopt the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper. A code applicable to England would not be suitable to the parochial schools in Scotland, and therefore he was anxious that the preparation of the Scotch code should be intrusted to persons who were acquainted with the Scotch system. In 1869 the Vice-President of the Committee of Council repudiated the idea of Scotch education being placed under the Privy Council, because, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it would be impossible to work two different systems under the same roof. He wanted to know upon what grounds had the Government changed the views to which they gave expression in 1869?

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 79: Majority 53.

MR. ELLIOE moved an Amendment to insert after the word "years," in line 3, the words "and if they see fit at the expiry of that period to extend it for five years."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the Government did not make any objection to the Amendment; but he should be exceedingly disappointed if the labours of the Commission, so far as carrying the Act into operation was concerned, were not completed within three years.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD GARLIES moved that the Chairman report Progress, as the proceedings of the Committee appeared to be in a state of confusion, and no one seemed to know what was the clause under consideration.

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Motion, in the hope that the Bill would pass through Committee that night.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought the proposal of the noble Lord (Lord Garlies) was perfectly feasible, as Members should have time to consider the new clause.

MR. BOUVERIE thought it was a most unreasonable demand to make on the part of the noble Lord (Lord Garlies), as it would necessitate another day's sitting.

LORD GARLIES said, if the House wished it he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion withdrawn.

MR. GORDON said, that before the Committee came to the next Amendment he wished to know from the Vice-President of the Privy Council, whether they were to receive any information as to the character and position of the parties likely to occupy the position of Commissioners?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Commission would be a most important one, and the Government felt the responsibility of acting in accordance with the opinion of Parliament as to the persons to be appointed.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE also wished to obtain some information as to the composition of the Commission, and, looking to the manner in which the Paper had been loaded with Amendments by hon. Members on the opposite side which had been departed from, he could not conceive but that some information had been given to them as to the composition of the Board of which the Committee was not aware.

MR. BOUVERIE thought it only reasonable that before the Bill was passed the names of some of those who were to be appointed Commissioners should be made known.

MR. ANDERSON hoped that nothing like a clerical Commission would be appointed, as the people of Scotland would object to any gentlemen being appointed who held a prominent place in any religious sect.

MR. M'LAREN wished to know the amount of salary which it was proposed to give the Commissioners?

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR remarked that there was a difference between the Commission which would be appointed under the Bill and that which was proposed in 1869. He had no doubt the members of the Commission would be selected with great care; but what the people of Scotland wanted to know was, what was to be the real nature of the Scotch Education Department? He would add that he did not think it would be right to disqualify a man who had devoted himself to education from being a Commissioner simply because he happened to be a clergyman.

MR. NEWDEGATE suggested that there would be nothing unprecedented in naming the Commissioners, inasmuch as they had been named in the case of the Irish Church Act.

MR. COLLINS expressed a hope that the Commissioners would be named before the Bill passed into a law.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that on certain occasions—such as the passing of the Irish Church Act which had just been mentioned—when great legislative powers were intrusted to certain gentlemen, it might be a very proper thing to invite the assistance of Parliament in their selection, inasmuch as they would have to exercise powers more or less analogous to those possessed by Parliament itself. In the present instance, however, the principle on which the House had hitherto proceeded was that the executive portion of the Bill should be intrusted to the Executive Government. Was it, therefore, he would ask, desirable, or in conformity with usage, to call on the Government under those circumstances to indicate the individuals who were to be employed in the execution of the Act? The result of naming the Commissioners would be to lighten the responsibility of the Government, and to transfer a portion of the responsibility to the shoulders of Parliament. He hoped the Scotch Education Department would be a reality; but if it was to be a reality, it must be intrusted with the choice of the Commissioners who were to exercise authority under it. The Government desired to stand on their own responsibility, and, in choosing the Commissioners, they would make their choice so as to give the fullest effect to the spirit of the Act.

MR. BIRLEY thought that the names of the gentlemen to constitute the Board of Education might be inserted in the Bill.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, it was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to promise that Commissioners would be chosen to carry out the spirit of the Act; but the fact was that the whole Bill was subversive of the traditions of Scotch education. Unless the Government were to-morrow prepared to give the name of the Commissioners, he would move that the debate be now adjourned. His confident belief was that the Bill had been drawn by men who had no religious impressions. He protested against the whole Bill, because he considered that the trail of the serpent was on every clause.

MR. GORDON said, the course pursued by the Government now was different to that of 1869. They were then told that the Royal Commissioners would be named in the Act; but the views of the Government had since changed upon the subject.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE asked when the House would have the opportunity of challenging the appointment of the Commissioners?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that obviously new charges must be inserted in the Estimates for the Council Office, which would almost force on the House of Commons the power of challenging the appointments.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked if the names of the Commissioners would appear on the Estimates.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the names of such persons, as a rule, were not printed in the Estimates; but it would be competent for any hon. Member to challenge the propriety of the appointments.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules A and B agreed to.

On Schedule C,

SIR JOHN OGILVY moved, in page 31, line 26, leave out "Dundee High School."

THE LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment. The Dundee High School was inserted to insure that it be carried on as a high school.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported; re-committed in respect of a New Clause (Expenses of Scotch Education Department), for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS COMMISSION BILL.

RIGHTS OF PRIVATE MEMBERS.

MR. NEWDEGATE moved that the Bill be placed on the Paper for Tuesday at 2 o'clock, in order to raise the question whether Members, not being Members of the Government, should not have precedence at 2 o'clock on Tuesdays as at 4, and to-morrow he intended asking Mr. Speaker his opinion on the point.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for reading the Bill a second time To-morrow be postponed till Tuesday next, at Two of the clock."

MR. AYRTON thought that, as the question was a novel one, the better way would be to postpone the Bill till Monday next, because it involved the principle whether private Members could fix a Bill equally with the Government for a Morning Sitting.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 3; Noes 13: Majority 10.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CCXI.

THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1872.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings :"—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

A BINGER, Lord
Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps,
1327; Address for a Commission, 1906,
1911, 1913

ACLAND, Sir T. D., Devonshire, N.
Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Finsbury Estate, 100, 101

Act of Uniformity Amendment Bill [H.L.]
(Mr. W. E. Gladstone)

c. Read 2^o * May 6 [Bill 136]
Committee; Report May 30, 888
Considered * May 31
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o"
June 3, 1035
Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned"
(Mr. Rylands); after short debate, Motion withdrawn
Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read 3^o"

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

Act of Uniformity Amendment Bill—cont.

Amendt. to leave out from "Bill be," and add
"re-committed, in respect of the Preamble"
(Mr. Bouverie) v.; after further short debate,
Question put, "That the words, &c.;" A. 160, N. 89; M. 71; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 3^o

ADDERLEY, Right Hon. Sir C. B., Stafford- shire, N.

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial
Schools, Res. 608
Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1257
Parliament—Public Business, 838, 1028
Supply—Privy Council, 980, 982, 1518
Salaries and Allowances of Governors, &c.
1899
Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 66

Admiralty and War Office Rebuilding Bill
(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Baxter)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 17 [Bill 200]

ADVOCATE, The Lord (Right Hon. G. YOUNG), Wigton, &c.

Criminal Law—Case of John Richard Dymond, 1856

Education (Scotland), Comm. 295, 302; cl. 1, 1055, 1056, 1061, 1063, 1064, 1072, 1079, 1083, 1084, 1194; cl. 2, 1195, 1196; cl. 4, 1208; cl. 5, 1284, 1285, 1287, 1289; cl. 8, 1293, 1297, 1298, 1299; cl. 20, 1352; cl. 24, 1354, 1355; cl. 35, 1357, 1358; cl. 39, 1359; cl. 40, 1360; cl. 41, Amendt. ib.; cl. 42, 1361; cl. 43, 1362, 1363, 1366; cl. 50, 1367, 1368, 1374, 1615; cl. 51, 1617, 1618, 1619, 1620; cl. 52, 1626, 1703, 1710, 1711; cl. 54, 1712; cl. 56, ib.; cl. 58, 1713, 1714; cl. 59, 1714, 1716, 1717; cl. 64, 1720; Motion for reporting Progress, 1721, 1745, 1747, 1749, 1754; Amendt. 1755; cl. 65, 1756, 1757, 1759, 1936, 1942, 1947, 1992; cl. 66, 1998, 2000; cl. 67, 2001, 2002, 2004; cl. 68, 2006, 2007, 2008; Amendt. 2010, 2011; cl. 70, 2012; cl. 71, 2013, 2015; cl. 73, 2020; cl. 76, 2022; cl. 77, 2022, 2023, 2024, 2025; cl. 2, 2025; add. cl. 2025, 2027; Schedule C, 2030

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 136; Consid. cl. 16, Amendt. 533, 534

Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns, 975

Scotland—Offences against Women and Children, 499

Poor Law Inspectors, 650, 1029

Supply—Criminal Proceedings in Scotland, 1896

Africa

Acquisition of Dutch Guinea, Question, Sir Charles Wingfield; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen May 6, 287

East African Slave Trade, Question, Mr. Gilpin; Answer, Viscount Enfield May 13, 653

West Africa, Bank of, Question, Mr. Laird; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen May 9, 500

West Coast—The Lagos Traders, Question, Mr. Laird; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen May 9, 501

Africa, South

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that facilities should be afforded, by all methods which may be practicable, for the confederation of the Colonies and States of South Africa" (Mr. Robert Fowler) May 28, 806; after short debate, Motion agreed to AGAR-ELLIS, Hon. L. G. F., Kilkenny Co.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 870

Agricultural Children Bill

(Mr. Clare Read, Mr. Pell, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth, Mr. Kennaway)

c. Bill read 2^o, after debate June 12, 1657
[Bill 104]

AIRLIE, Earl of

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 2, 1818

AKROYD, Mr. E., Halifax

Agricultural Children, 2R. 1659

All Saints Church, Cardiff, Bill (Lords) (by Order)—

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 30, 818

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day three months" (Mr. Dillwyn); after short debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 153, N. 172; M. 19; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Bill put off for three months

Alteration of Boundaries of Dioceses Bill [H.L.] (Archbishop of York)

l. Committee*; Report May 2 (No. 84)
Read 3^a* May 3

c. Read 1^o* (Mr. Monk) May 27 [Bill 170]
Read 2^o* May 30

Committee*: Report June 3
Read 3^o* June 6

l. Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 14]

ANDERSON, Mr. G., Glasgow

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 2, 1195; cl. 5, 1287; cl. 8, Amendt. 1295, 1296, 1305; cl. 43, 1363; cl. 50, 1373; cl. 52, 1708; cl. 65, Amendt. 1756, 1758; Amendt. 1934, 1937; cl. 68, Amendt. 2007, 2008; cl. 73, 2021; cl. 77, 2024; add. cl. 2028

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1231
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 134

Supply—Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office (Scotland), 1550

ANSTRUTHER, Sir R., Fifeshire

Education (Scotland), Comm. 348; cl. 1, 1074; cl. 8, 1291; cl. 50, 1374; cl. 51, 1619; cl. 64, 1746; cl. 65, 1759, 1937; cl. 66, 1999; cl. 67, 2003; cl. 68, 2005; cl. 71, 2019
Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns, 975

Appellate Jurisdiction

Committee nominated, after short debate; List of the Committee May 6, 275; May 7, The Viscount Ossington added

Appointment of Commissioners for taking Affidavits Bill [H.L.]

(Marquess of Clanricarde)

l. Presented; read 1^a* June 10 (No. 133)
Read 2^a* June 18

ARBUTHNOT, Major G., Hereford City

Army—Control Department, 1993, 1994

India—Horse Artillery, 1419

Canada, Dominion of—Arms and Stores, Sale of, 501, 503

ARGYLL, Duke of (Secretary of State for India)

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 23, 586

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 16, 1843

Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, 1179, 1189

ARMY

Army Re-organisation

Appointments and Promotions — The Royal Warrant, Questions, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answer, Mr. Cardwell June 6, 1275

County Military Depot Centres, Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 28, 782

Militia Permanent Staff, Question, Major Tollemache; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 6, 279

Commissions—Examinations, Question, Colonel Brise; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 7, 375 — University Candidates, Questions, Mr. Assheton Cross, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answers, Mr. Cardwell June 6, 1278

Control Department, Question, Observations, Major Arbuthnot; Reply, Mr. Cardwell June 20, 1993

Equipment of the Army, Question, Sir John Gray; Answer, Sir Henry Storks May 2, 103

Exchanges by Sub-Lieutenants, Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Mr. Cardwell June 3, 1027

Grenadier Guards' Band, Question, Observations, The Marquess of Hertford; Reply, The Marquess of Lansdowne; short debate thereon June 3, 984; Question, The Earl of Yarmouth; Answer, Mr. Cardwell, 1031; Questions, Mr. Waterhouse, Colonel Stuart Knox, The Earl of Yarmouth; Answers, Mr. Cardwell June 10, 1510

Guards, The, Notice of Motion withdrawn (The Duke of Richmond) June 7, 1326

India

Retirement of Indian Field Officers, Question, Colonel Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 10, 604

Royal Horse Artillery, Observations, Colonel North, Sir Charles Wingfield; Reply, Mr. Grant Duff; short debate thereon June 7, 1416

Ireland

Cashel Barracks, Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 2, 104—Sickness at, Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 30, 835

Fermoy Barracks Question, Colonel C. Lindsay; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 9, 503

Martini-Henry Rifle—Mr. Andrews, Question, Mr. Stacpoole; Answer, Sir Henry Storks June 13, 1691

Militia

Irish Militia, Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 9, 505

Militia Camp, Appleby, Questions, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Whitwell; Answers, Sir Henry Storks June 17, 1849

Militia Surgeons, Question, Colonel Corbett; Answer, Mr. Campbell June 4, 1193

Officers—Presentations at Court, Question, Mr. H. A. Herbert; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 2, 103

Torpedoes—Captain Harvey, Question, Captain Dawson-Damer; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 28, 788

ARMY—cont.

Volunteers, Question, Mr. Norwood; Answer Mr. Cardwell June 20, 1994 — Capitation Grant, Question, Colonel C. Lindsay; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 30, 829

Windsor Cavalry Barracks—Surgeon Major Logie, Question, Lord Garlies; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 30, 833

Army—Autumn Manœuvres

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the selection of the period of harvest for the contemplated Autumn Manœuvres will interfere with the processes of agriculture, affect injuriously the interests of the cultivators of the soil, and inflict grave pecuniary hardship on the labourers in the rural districts" (Mr. Dimsdale) May 28, 795; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Army—Purchase and the Scientific Corps

Question, Observations, Lord Abinger; Reply, The Marquess of Lansdowne; short debate thereon June 7, 1327

First Captains in the Scientific Corps, Question, Sir Colman O'Loughlen; Answer, Mr. Cardwell June 20, 1994

Scientific Corps—Promotion in the Artillery and Engineers, Question, Major General Sir Percy Herbert; Answer, Mr. Cardwell June 13, 1692

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Commission may be issued to inquire into the alleged injustice towards the captains of the late Purchase Corps occasioned by their proposed supersession by the first captains of the Scientific Corps; and further to inquire whether the intended advancement of the first captains of the Royal Artillery and Engineers to the rank of field officers would have the effect of removing the slowness of promotion in those corps, and as to the best means of remedying the same; and that in the meantime and until the report of the Commission the publication of the Royal Warrant on this subject be delayed (Lord Abinger) June 18, 1906; after debate, on Question? Cont. 42, Not-Cont. 39; M. 3; Motion agreed to

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with white staves

ASSHETON, Mr. R., Clitheroe

Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 444

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Considered, cl. 4, Amendt. 531; Schedule 1, Amendt. 672; Amendt. 675

Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1252

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir J. D. Coleridge), Exeter

Criminal Law—Brutal Assaults on Women, 285
Farrell, David, Case of, 1855

Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 445

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1861

Juries, 2R. 701

*Law Officers of the Crown, 253, 284

Law Reform—Judicature Commission, 835

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The—cont.

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1261
 Religious Disqualification for Offices, 280
 Supply—Law Charges, 1865, 1867, 1868
 Miscellaneous Legal Charges, 1895
Tichborne v. Lushington — Prosecution, &c.
 1272
 Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 62

AYRTON, Right Hon. A. S. (Chief Commissioner of Works), Tower Hamlets
 Metropolis—Chelsea Toll Bridge, 1686
 Water Supply—Victoria Park, 1852
 Metropolis—Queen's Square, Westminster, and Birdcage Walk, Res. 238, 1278
 Monastic and Conventual Institutions Commission, 2030
 Ordnance Survey (Lincolnshire), 1689
 The 25-inch Scale, 1987
 Ordnance Survey (England), Res. 394, 395
 South Kensington Museum—Natural History
 Collections, 1690
 Supply—Works and Public Buildings, 1541,
 1542

AYTOUN, Mr. R. Sinclair, Kirkcaldy, &c.
 All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 827
 Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 684, 839
 Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven
 Rioters, Res. 953
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1074 ; cl. 8,
 1300 ; cl. 51, 1619
 Supply—Privy Council, 983
 Terminable Annuities, 1274
 Treaty of Washington, 1045

BAGGALLAY, Sir R., Surrey, Mid.
 Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. Amendt.
 681 ; cl. 18, 693, 695

BAGWELL, Mr. J., Clonmel
 Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1640
 Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 443
 Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 358
 Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
 157

BAILEY, Sir J. R., Herefordshire
 Criminal Lunatics—Crickhowell Union, 1273

Bakehouses Bill (Mr. Locke, Mr. Holms, Mr. William Henry Smith)

c. 2R. adjourned June 4 [Bill 54]

BAKER, Mr. R. B. Wingfield, Essex, S.
 Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 802

BALL, Right Hon. J. T., Dublin University
 Act of Uniformity Amendment, 3R. 1092
 Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 691 ;
cl. 18, 693
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 19, 1315
 Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 356
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
cl. 16, 538 ; cl. 17, 541 ; cl. 23, 543 ;
 Schedule 1, 670, 677

Bank Notes Bill

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Backhouse, Mr. Munts, Mr. Robert Fowler, Mr. Kinnaird)
c. Bill withdrawn * June 13 [Bill 117]

Bank Notes (No. 2) Bill

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Backhouse, Mr. Munts, Mr. Robert Fowler, Mr. Kinnaird)
c. Ordered ; read 1st * June 14 [Bill 196]

Bank of England (Election of Directors)
 Bill [H.L.] (Lord Redesdale)

l. Presented ; read 1st * June 13 (No. 144)
 Read 2nd * June 20

Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill
 [H.L.] (Lord O'Hagan)

l. Select Committee, The Lord Camoys added
 May 31

Baptismal Fees Bill [H.L.]

(Bishop of Winchester)

l. Presented ; read 1st * June 6 (No. 128)
 Bill read 2nd, after short debate June 13, 1863
 Committee * June 18 (No. 160)
 Report * June 20

BARNETT, Mr. H., Woodstock

Customs and Inland Revenue, Consid. add. cl.
 1904

European Assurance Society, 3R. 1586
 Royal Mint—Silver Coinage, 604

BARTTELOT, Colonel W. B., Sussex, W.

Agricultural Children, 2R. 1661
 Army—Commissions, Examinations, 375
 India—Army—Horse Artillery, 1419
 Indian Field Officers, Retirement of, 604
 India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 214
 Local Taxation, 1279
 Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 106, 376
 Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1960
 Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1893 Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions,
 1534
 Treaty of Washington, 911, 1742

BASS, Mr. M. A., Staffordshire, E.

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 2R. 1977

Bastardy Laws Amendment Bill

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Eykyn, Mr. Whitwell)

c. Bill read 2nd, after short debate June 19, 1972

BATES, Mr. E., Plymouth

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1416

BATH, Marquess of

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
add. cl. 1839

BAXTER, Mr. W. E. (Secretary to the Treasury), Montrose, &c.
 Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 686; cl. 18, 695; cl. 22, 697
 Customs and Inland Revenue, Consid. cl. 4, 1904
 Customs Department—Competitive Examinations, 1853
 Ireland—Customs Clerks at Dublin, 1270
 National Schools, Masters and Assistants at, 1744
 Post Office—Telegraph Clerks, 1857
 Supply—Bounties on Slaves, 1902
 Charity Commission, 1530
 Civil Service Commission, 1533
 Civil Services, 1045, 1054
 County Courts, 1879
 Court of Chancery, 1870, 1871, 1872
 Criminal Prosecutions, 1868, 1869
 General Register House, Edinburgh, 1898
 Lord Privy Seal, Office of, 1527
 Patent Law Amendment Act, 1536
 Paymaster General, London and Dublin, 1537
 Police Courts, London and Sheerness, 1881
 Privy Council, 977, 978, 979, 982, 1521
 Public Record Office, 1538
 Public Works Loan Commissioners, &c. 1538
 Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office (Scotland), 1549, 1551
 Registrar General of Births, &c. 1535
 Terminable Annuities, 1274

BEACH, Sir M. E. HICKS-, Gloucestershire, E.
 Education (Scotland), Comm. add. cl. 2025
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 23, Amendt. 541; cl. 26, Amendt. 544
 Poor Law—Goding, Mr., Case of, 1742
 Public Health—Public Revenue, Charges on, 909, 910

BEAUCHAMP, Earl
 Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 6, 574; cl. 23, 586; cl. 25, 590
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 33, Amendt. 1843
 Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, Res. 1267

BENTINCK, Mr. G. A. F. Cavendish, Whitehaven
 Metropolis—Queen's Square, Westminster, Birdcage Walk, &c., Res. 815, 1238, 1240, 1277
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. Motion for Adjournment, 1226
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 123; Consid. Schedule 1, 670
 Wellington Monument, Motion for Papers, 203

BENTINCK Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.
 Education (Scotland), Comm. 334
 Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 442
 Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1415
 Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 388

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P.—cont.
 Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 736
 Military Pensions and Allowances, 774
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 867
 Post Office—Postmaster at this House, 708
 Treaty of Washington, Statement, 1604

BERESFORD, Colonel F. M., Southwark
 Army—Exchanges by Sub-Lieutenants, 1027
 Metropolis—Petroleum, Storage of, 1991
 Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1261
 Parliament—Derby Day, 793
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 117

Betting Bill (Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Bowring)
c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 4 [Bill 186]

BIRLEY, Mr. H., Manchester
 Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 942
 Education (Scotland), Comm. 319; add. cl. 2029
 France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1778
 Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 492

Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation Bill [H.L.] (Mr. Gladstone)
c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" June 4, 1219
 Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day three months" (Mr. Dickinson); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" debate adjourned Debate resumed June 10, 1553; after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn; original Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o [Bill 137]
 Committee*; Report June 20

Board of Trade Inquiries Bill
 (Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel)
c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 10 [Bill 193]
 Read 2^o * June 13
 Committee*; Report; read 3^o June 14
l. Read 1^o * (Earl Cowper) June 17 (No. 155)
 Read 2^o * June 18
 Committee*; Report June 20

BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. J. (Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means), Winchester
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 2, 2025, 2026
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 2, 137

BOUVERIE, Right Hon. E. P., Kilmar-nock, &c.
 Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, Amendt. 889, 894; 3R. Amendt. 1085
 Court of Chancery (Funds), Consid. 1722
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 5, 1287; cl. 39, 1359; cl. 42, 1361; cl. 52, Amendt. 1702, 1708; cl. 59, 1718; cl. 64, 1751; cl. 2, 2025; add. cl. 2027, 2028

BOUVIER, Right Hon. E. P.—cont.

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 239, 240, 247

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1678

Parliament—Ascension Day—Committees, 447, 508

Business of the House, 1030

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. 527; Schedule 1, 547

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1954

Supply—Office of Lord Privy Seal, 1524

Treaty of Washington, 608, 708, 710, 786, 787, 842, 1041, 1045;—Statement, 1601, 1602, 1862, 1864

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. Amendt. 22, 31

BOWRING, Mr. E. A., Exeter

Eyre, Mr.—Legal Expenses, Payment of, 706

Parliament—Counts of the House, Res. 1629

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 2, 137; Amendt. ib.

Supply—Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions, 1534

Land Registry, 1881

Metropolitan Police, 1881

Privy Council, 976, 1516, 1522

Works and Public Buildings, 1543

Vienna—International Exhibition (1873), 1269

BRASSEY, Mr. T., Hastings

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1395

BREWER, Dr. W., Colchester

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1977

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 970

Metropolis—Petroleum, Storage of, 1991

Navy Estimates—Medical Establishments, 772

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 134

Post Office—Telegraphs—Sunday Labour, 707

Rating—Exemptions of Government Property, 836

Supply—Privy Council, 993

BRIGHT, Mr. Jacob, Manchester

Education—Manchester School Board, 1350

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 1, 26, 31, 69

BRISTOWE, Mr. S. B., Newark

Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1249

British Guiana—Emigration

Question, Sir Charles Wingfield; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen June 20, 1990

BROGDEN, Mr. A., Wednesbury

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 6, Amendt. 1555

BROWN, Mr. A. H., Wenlock

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1260

Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1653

BROWNE, Mr. G. E., Mayo Co.

Post Office (Ireland)—Irish Postmasters, 193

BRUCE, Right Hon. H. A. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Renfrewshire

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 822, 824

Criminal Law—Questions, &c.

Broadmoor Asylum—Criminal Lunatics, Maintenance of, 652

Collumpton Magistrates—Webber, John, Case of, 1507, 1686

Criminal Lunatics—Crickhowell Union, 1274

Criminal Prosecutions—Treasury Revision of Costs, 504, 1685

Murphy, Mr., Assault on the late, 286

Oxfordshire Magistrates—Norris, Mr., Case of, 1349

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 626

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 956, 971

Education (Scotland), Comm. 292

Master and Servant (Wages), 1588

Metropolitan Police—Questions, &c.

Carter, George, Constable, Case of, 840

Cruelty to Animals, 1271

Southampton, Strike of Seamen at, 653

Superannuation, 1853

Mine Dues, 2R. 1661

Municipal Corporations (Election of Aldermen), Res. 404

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 488

Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns, 974

Public Prosecutors, 1507; Comm. 1957, 1959, 1960, 1971

Registrars of Deeds, &c. (Middlesex), 1849

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1885, 1894

Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions, 1534

County and Borough Police (Great Britain), 1883

Criminal Prosecutions, 1869

Metropolitan Police, 1882, 1883

Treaty of Washington—Notice, Motion for Adjournment, 1661

Turnpike Act Continuance, 834

Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1654

Women, Employment of—Smith, Mary Ann, Case of, 1506

Workshop Regulation Act (1871), 1851

BRUCE, Sir H. H., Coleraine

Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 359

Navy—Channel Squadron, 102

BRUEN, Mr. H., Carlow Co.

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1644

Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 358

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 17, 540

BUCKHURST, Lord

Dangerous Exhibitions—Women and Children, 1733

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 20, Amendt. 582

Railways—Telegraph Block System, Motion for Returns, 274

Treaty of Washington, 1582

Building Societies Bill (Mr. Gourley, Sir Roundell Palmer, Mr. Torrens, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Dodds)

c. Committee*; Report May 7 [Bills 66-153]

Burial Grounds Bill [H.L.]

c. Bill read 2^o, after debate June 7, 1420 [Bill 111]

BURY, Right Hon. Viscount, Berwick-on-Tweed

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. 525; Schedule 1, 548

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 497

Treaty of Washington, 1041; Res. 1280; Motion for Adjournment, 1281, 1697, 1740

BUTT, Mr. I., Limerick City

Ireland—Criminal Law—Roche, Mr., Imprisonment of, 284

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 440

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 2R. 1655

Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 146, 147, 151, 152, 161

CADOGAN, Hon. F. W., Cricklade

Supply—Charity Commission, 1530

CAIRNS, Lord

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 275, 276, 277

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 4, 569, 570, 571; cl. 16, 581; cl. 29, 591; cl. 39, 597

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1013

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1501; Comm. 1800; cl. 1, Amendt. 1801; cl. 2, 1804, 1819, 1822; cl. 4, 1826; cl. 5, 1828; add. cl. 1834; Motion for reporting Progress, 1835, 1840; cl. 33, 1844; Schedule 1, 1846

Party Processions (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 366

Treaty of Washington, 73, 271, 908, 991, 993, 996; Motion for an Address, 1167, 1176, 1179, 1189, 1266;—Statement, 1564, 1799

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of (Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief)

Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps, Address for a Commission, 1916

CAMERON, Mr. D., Inverness-shire

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1297; cl. 77, 2022; Amendt. 2024

CAMPBELL, Mr. H., Stirling, &c.

Army—Militia Surgeons, 1193

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of (Lord of the Admiralty)

Naval College, Portsmouth, Removal of, 176, 180

Navy—Steam and Coal, Motion for a Paper, 907, 999

Canada, Dominion of—Sale of Arms and Stores

Questions, Major Arbuthnot; Answers, Sir Henry Storks May 9, 501

[See title—Treaty of Washington—Dominion of Canada]

CANDLISH, Mr. J., Sunderland

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1974

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 620

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1290; cl. 67, 2004

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 227

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 2, 138; Consid. 513; cl. 23, 543; Schedule 1, 547

Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns, 973, 975

Supply—Charity Commission, 1532

Civil Services, 1052

Privy Council, 978, 1520

Public Works Loan Commissioners, &c. 1588

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 6, Amendt. 1829

CARDWELL, Right Hon. E. (Secretary of State for War), Oxford City

Army—Questions, &c.

Appointments and Promotions, 1275

Cashel Barracks, 104;—Sickness at, 836

Commissions—Examinations, 375;—University Candidates, 1279

Control Department, 1993

Depôt Centres, County Military, 782

Exchanges by Sub-Lieutenants, 1027

Fermoy Barracks, 504

Grenadier Guards, Band of, 1031, 1510, 1511

Irish Militia, 505

Militia Permanent Staff, 280

Officers—Presentations at Court, 103

Scientific Corps, 1692;—First Captains in, 1994

Volunteers, 1994

Volunteers—Capitation Grant, 829

Windsor, Cavalry Barracks—Logie, Surgeon Major, 833, 834

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 798, 801, 805

CARLISLE, Bishop of

Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, 171

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 20, 585

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 6, 1830

Trusts of Benefices and Churches, 2R. 1906

CARNARVON, Earl of

Pacific Islanders Protection, Comm. 368

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1476

CARNEGIE, Hon. C., Forfarshire

Education (Scotland), Comm. 324; cl. 1, 1067;

cl. 50, 1373; cl. 52, 1705; cl. 73, 2020;

cl. 77, 2024

CARTER, Mr. R. M., Leeds

Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Finsbury Estate, 100
Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 458

CARTWRIGHT, Mr. W. C., Oxfordshire

Diplomatic Service, Report, 1507
France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1780

Cattle Disease (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill (Mr. William Henry Gladstone, Mr. Baxter, The Marquess of Hartington)

c. Considered in Committee ; Bill ordered ;
read 1^o * May 9 [Bill 159]
Read 2^o * May 13
Committee * ; Report May 31
Read 3^o * June 3
l. Read 1^o * (Marquess of Lansdowne) June 4
Read 2^o * June 10 (No. 125)
Committee * ; Report June 11
Read 3^o * June 18
Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 16]

Cattle—Importation of Sheep and Cattle—Order in Council, 1871

Question, Mr. J. B. Smith ; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 13, 650

CAVE, Right Hon. S., New Shoreham

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 622
European Assurance Society, 3R. 1587
France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1786
Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 383
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 2, 138, 139
Supply—Privy Council, 1520

CAVENDISH, Lord F. C., Yorkshire, W.R., N. Div.

Mine Dues, 2R. 1661

CAWLEY, Mr. C. E., Salford

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 73, 2020
Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 778 ; Amendt. 780
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 130, 131 ; Schedule 2, Amendt. 138, 139 ; Consid. cl. 16, 535

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, W.

Army—Appointments and Promotions, 1275
Commissions—University Candidates, 1279
Treaty of Washington, 1862

Chain Cables and Anchors Act (1871) Suspension Bill

(Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel)

c. Considered in Committee ; Bill ordered ;
read 1^o * June 3 [Bill 183]
Read 2^o * June 6
Committee * ; Report June 17
Read 3^o * June 18
l. Read 1^o * (Earl Cowper) June 18 (No. 163)

CHAMBERS, Mr. M., Devonport

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 232
Municipal Corporations (Election of Aldermen), Res. 406
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1224
Parliamentary and Municipal Election, Consid. cl. 4, 530, 531
Supply—Public Record Office, 1538
Woods, Forests, &c. 1540

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (Lord HATHERLEY)

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 275, 276
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1017
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1498 ; cl. 2, 1807 ; cl. 4, 1826 ; add. cl. 1838
Statute Law Revision, 2R. 1022, 1023
Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, Motion for Adjournment, 1187, 1189, 1264 ; —Statement, 1570

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Right Hon. R. LOWE), London University

Army—Torpedoes—Harvey, Captain, 788
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 690 ; cl. 18, 693 ; cl. 21, 696, 697 ; Consid. 1723
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 6, 1556 ; cl. 12, ib. ; cl. 13, 1560 ; add. cl. ib., 1561 ; Consid. add. cl. 1903
Inland Revenue—Income Tax—Tenant Farmers, 1514
Shootings, Income Tax on, 652
Ireland—Taxation, Exemption from, 286
Parliament—Counts Out, 1993
Public Business, Report of Select Committee on, 1278
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1234
Pensions Commutation Act—March, Lieutenant, Case of, 283
Royal Mint—Silver Coinage, 604
Sugar—Drawback Convention, 1026
Supply—Charity Commission, 1531
County Courts, 1879
Court of Chancery, 1872, 1875, 1876
Law Charges—Treasury, Motion for reporting Progress, 1553
Offices of the Registrars of Friendly Societies, 1539
Privy Council, 977
Woods, Forests, &c. 1541
Works and Public Buildings, 1543
Tichborne, v. Lushington—Prosecution, &c. 102, 372, 375, 1272, 1273
Vienna—International Exhibition (1873), 1270
Wellington Monument, Motion for Papers, 200
Working Men's Clubs—Excise, The, 1513

Chancery Funds—29 Vict. c. 5

Question, Mr. Sinclair Aytoun ; Answer, The Solicitor General May 30, 830

Charitable Loan Societies (Ireland) Bill
(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 167]
Read 2^o * May 27
Committee *; Report May 30
Read 3^o * June 3
l. Read 1^o * (Marquess of Lansdowne) June 4
Read 2^o * June 10 (No. 124)
Committee * Report June 11
Read 3^o * June 13
Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 17]

Charitable Trustees Incorporation Bill
(Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Osborne Morgan)

- c. Committee * (on re-comm.)—R.F. May 3
Committee *; Report May 13 [Bill 120]
Considered * May 31
Read 3^o * June 3
l. Read 1^o * (Lord Romilly) June 4 (No. 127)
Read 2^o * June 13
Committee *; Report June 20

CHARLEY, Mr. W. T., Salford

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1972
Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 356
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 1, Amendt. 107, 123; Consid.
add. cl. 513; cl. 3, Amendt. 528; cl. 4,
Amendt. 529, 530; Schedule 1, 677

CHELMSFORD, Lord

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 277
Intoxicating Liquors (Licensing), Comm. cl. 6,
Amendt. 573
Naval College, Portsmouth, Removal of, 174

CHILDERS, Right Hon. Hugh C. E., Pontefract

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, 696
Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 389
Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 747, 749, 763, 768
Victualling Yards, 770
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 124; Consid. 525

Christchurch Annual Fairs Abolition

Question, The Earl of Malmesbury; Answer,
The Earl of Morley June 14, 1730

Church of England Fire Insurance Bill
[H.L.] (Lord Egerton)

- l. Presented; read 1^o * May 10 (No. 102)

Church Seats Bill [H.L.]

(Earl Nelson)

- l. Committee May 3, 170 (No. 59)
Report * May 6 (No. 97)
Read 3^o * June 7
c. Read 1^o * (Mr. Beresford Hope) June 10
Read 2^o * June 14 [Bill 194]

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1020
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. add. cl. 1841, 1842

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-on-Hull

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1228

Clerks of the Peace and Justices Clerks' Salaries and Fees Bill

(Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 164]

CLEVELAND, Duke of Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 16, 581; cl. 31, 594

Prison Ministers, Report, cl. 3, 361; cl. 4, 362; Schedule, 363

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. W. R. Baillie, Isle of Wight

Canada, Dominion of—Treaty of Washington, 603, 652
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 4, 1201; cl. 8, 1290; cl. 19, 1322; cl. 50, 1371; cl. 68, 2005
France—Quarantine in French Ports, 1193, 1277
Supply—Civil Services, 1053
Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1596, 1736, 1858
Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 54

COLCHESTER, Lord

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Motion for Papers, 1729
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 1801; cl. 2, Amendt. 1823; add. cl. 1830

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire, S.

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1069; cl. 2, 1196; cl. 4, 1205; cl. 5, 1288; cl. 8, Amendt. 1289, 1294; Amendt. 1299; cl. 35, Amendt. 1357, 1358; cl. 51, 1618; cl. 52, Amendt. 1700, 1704; cl. 59, 1715; cl. 64, 1745, 1762; cl. 65, 1938; cl. 66, 1997; cl. 67, 2003; cl. 68, 2007; cl. 71, 2016
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 116
Supply—General Register House, Edinburgh, 1897

COLERIDGE, Sir J. D., see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The

COLLINS, Mr. T., Boston

Education (Scotland), Comm. 339; cl. 20, 1352, 1353; cl. 35, 1358; cl. 42, 1361; cl. 43, 1363; cl. 50, 1615; cl. 64, 1719; Amendt. 1721, 1744, 1748, 1750, 1756; cl. 66, 2000; cl. 67, Amendt. 2001, 2004; cl. 68, 2005; add. cl. 2023

COLLINS, Mr. T.—cont.

European Assurance Society, 3R. 1586
 Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, 287
 Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1261
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
 Schedule 1, 123, 548; Consid. Schedule 1,
 557; Motion for Adjournment, 563, 668

Colonial Governors (Pensions) Bill

(Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. Baxter)

c. Resolution [May 9] reported, and agreed to;
 Bill ordered * May 13
 Read 1° * May 27 [Bill 176]

Colonies

Crown Lands, Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer,
 Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen June 13, 1882
 Liquor Laws in the, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen
 June 13, 1890

Colonies, The

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 31, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should consider whether it is expedient and opportune that they should advise Her Majesty to appoint a Commission to inquire as to the propriety and best means of admitting the Colonies, which, by their loyalty and patriotism, their intelligence and vigour, their numbers, geographical position, and resources, have become a highly important part of the nation, to participation in the conduct of affairs that concern the general interest of the Empire" (Mr. Macfie) v. 912; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;"
 after debate, Motion withdrawn

COLONSAY, Lord

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
 cl. 16, Amendt. 1843

Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000) Bill

(Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter)

c. Considered in Committee; Bill ordered * May 6
 Read 1° * May 7
 Read 2° * May 8
 Committee *; Report May 9
 Read 3° * May 10
 l. Read 1° * (Lord President) May 10
 Read 2° *; Committee negatived; read 3°
 May 11
 Royal Assent May 13 [35 Vict. c. 11]

CORBETT; Colonel E., Shropshire, S.

Army—Militia Surgeons, 1193
 Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 805
 Supply—Privy Council, 982

CORRANCE, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, E.

Treaty of Washington, 1693, 1694; Motion for Adjournment, 1738

CORRIGAN, Sir D. J., Dublin City

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 434
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R.
 884
 Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
 167, 169

Corrupt Practices Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General)

c. Committee *—R.P. May 2 [Bill 22]

Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections

Bill (Mr. James, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Cross, Mr. Leatham, Mr. Rathbone)

c. Read 2° * May 7 [Bill 86]
 Committee *—R.P. June 3

CORRY, Right Hon. H. T. L., Tyrone Co.

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1404
 Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 740, 749, 768
 Half-Pay—Navy and Marines, 773
 Victualling Yards, 770, 772

County Courts (Small Debts) (No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Bass, Mr. Robert Fowler, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. West)

c. Bill withdrawn * June 19 [Bill 121]

County Officers (Ireland) Bill

(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1° * May 27 [Bill 174]

Court of Chancery (Funds) Bill

(Mr. Baxter, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. William Henry Glaistone)

c. Committee *; Report May 2 [Bill 43]
 Order for Committee (on re-comm.) read; Moved,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"
 (Mr. Baxter) May 13, 681
 Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
 "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee" (Sir Richard Baggallay) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; main Question, "That Mr. Speaker, &c.," put, and agreed to; Committee—R.P.
 [Bill 140]

Committee * (on re-comm.); Report June 4
 Moved, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration" June 13, 1721

Amendt. to leave out from "be," and add "recommitted, in respect of Clause 21" (Colonel French) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Question put; A. 54, N. 140; M. 86; words added;
 main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to;
 Bill re-committed; Committee

Clause 21 (Pension to present Accountant General) amended

Report
 Read 3° * June 18

l. Read 1° * (Lord Chancellor) June 18 (No. 161)

Courts of Law (Scotland) Agents Bill
(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam)

c. Read 2^o • June 17 [Bill 135]

COWPER, Earl

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1460; Comm. cl. 2, 1817, 1824

COWPER-TEMPLE, Right Hon. W. F.,
Hampshire, S.

Supply—Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions, 1534

CRAUFURD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1088; cl. 2,
1196; cl. 5, 1288; cl. 8, 1304; cl. 39, 1359;
cl. 51, 1617, 1619; cl. 52, 1629, 1705, 1710;
cl. 59, 1715; cl. 64, 1748; cl. 65, 1759,
1940; cl. 66, Amendt. 1996; cl. 67, 2004;
cl. 68, 2008, 2009, 2010; cl. 77, 2023,
2024

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 1, 126; Consid. Schedule 1, Motion for Adjournment, 562

Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns,
974

Supply—Law Charges, Treasury, 1552

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., London

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 687;
cl. 18, 695; cl. 21, ib.; Consid. 1722

Customs and Inland Revenue, Consid, add. cl.
1903

India—Drafts on London, 1856

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 244

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 1, Amendt. 123

CRICHTON, Viscount, Enniskillen

Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 358

Criminal Law

Assault on the late Mr. Murphy, Questions, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Percy Wyndham; Answers, Mr. Bruce May 6, 285

Broadmoor Asylum—Maintenance of Criminal
Lunatics, Question, Mr. White; Answer Mr.
Bruce May 13, 651

Brutal Assaults on Women, Questions, Mr.
Montague Guest; Answers, The Attorney
General, Mr. Straight May 6, 285

Case of John Richard Dymond, Question, Sir
Stafford Northcote; Answer, The Lord Advocate June 17, 1855

Collumpton Magistrates—Case of John Webber, Question, Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth; Answer,
Mr. Bruce June 10, 1507; June 13, 1686

Crickhowell Union—Lunatics, Question, Sir
Joseph Bailey; Answer, Mr. Bruce June 6, 1273

Extradition of Criminals—See that title

Freemasonry—Case of David Farrell, Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, The Attorney
General for Ireland June 17, 1854

Ireland—Imprisonment of Mr. Roche, Question, Mr. Butt; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland May 6, 284

CRIMINAL LAW—cont.

Oxfordshire Magistrates—Case of Mr. Norris,
Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Mr. Bruce
June 7, 1349

Prosecutions—Treasury Revision of Costs,
Question, Mr. Waterhouse; Answer, Mr.
Bruce May 9, 504; Question, Mr. Wharton;
Answer, Mr. Bruce June 13, 1685

Tichborne v. Lushington—Prosecution of the "Claimant" for Perjury, Question, Mr.
Mellor; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 2, 102; Question, Mr.
Onslow; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 7, 372; Questions, Mr. J.
D. Lewis, Mr. Whalley, Mr. Onslow; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer,
The Attorney General June 6, 1271

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial Schools

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 10, To leave out from "That," and add "all Schools for poor children, aided by public money, should be under one general Education Department; and that Industrial Schools should not be treated as penal institutions, but that children of tender age, whether merely vagrants or convicted of minor offences, should, after any due correction, be sent to such Schools for the rest of their childhood, as to educational establishments where they may be trained to industry" (Sir Charles Adderley) v. 608; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Question put, and agreed to

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven
Rioters—The Late Mr. Murphy

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 31, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the release of the Whitehaven rioters before the expiration of their sentence was not warranted by the circumstances of the case, and has a tendency to weaken the deterrent power of the Law against offences of a like character" (Mr.
Percy Wyndham) v. 949; Question proposed,
"That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt.
withdrawn

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to lay before this House all correspondence relative to the release of prisoners convicted of assault on the late Mr. Murphy, whether between the Roman Catholic chaplain of the jail in which such prisoners were confined, or with the visiting or other magistrates of the county or borough in which the conviction of the said prisoners took place, or with the Judge before whom the said prisoners were tried, and Her Majesty's Government (Lord Oran- more and Browne) June 14, 1725; after short debate, on Question? resolved in the negative

Criminal Law Amendment Act (1871) Amendment Bill (Mr. Vernon Harcourt,
Mr. James, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Dixon, Mr.
Melly)

c. Ordered; read 1^o • May 26

[Bill 157]

[cont.]

Criminal Trials (Ireland) Bill

(Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Sir John Gray, Mr. Pim, Mr. Synan)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
June 12, 1630

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day three months" (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland); after short debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c;" A. 28, N. 165; M. 187; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Bill put off for three months

CROFT, Sir H. G. D., Herefordshire

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
cl. 6, Amendt. 532
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1971

CROSS, Mr. R. Assheton, Lancashire, S.W.

Army—Commissions—University Candidates, 1278
Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1974
Juries, 2R. 703
Mines Regulation, 911
Parliament—Private Legislation, Res. 1668
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
cl. 4, 530; cl. 23, 543; Schedule 1, 547;
Amendt. 550, 555; Amendt. 665, 670
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1960
Supply—Civil Services, 1050
Privy Council, 977, 982

CUBITT, Mr. G., Surrey, W.

Registrars of Deeds, &c. (Middlesex), 1848
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 1533

Custody of Infants Bill

(Mr. William Fowler, Mr. Andrew Johnston, Mr. Mundella)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
June 13, 1724 [Bill 93]
Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned"
(Mr. James Lowther) [House counted out]

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter)

c. Read 2^o * May 2 [Bill 106]
Committee; Report June 10, 1554
Considered June 17, 1903
Read 3^o * June 18
l. Read 1st * (Marquess of Lansdowne) June 18
(No. 162)

Customs' Department—Out-Door Officers —Competitive Examinations

Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer,
Mr. Baxter June 17, 1853

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 43, Amendt.
1362; cl. 59, 1716; cl. 71, 2015
Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
1234

DALRYMPLE, Mr. C., Buteshire

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 829
Education—New Code—Evening Schools, 1850
Education (Scotland), Comm. 314; cl. 4, 1204;
cl. 5, 1285; cl. 50, 1373; cl. 52, 1704, 1710;
cl. 58, 1714; cl. 64, 1746; cl. 65, 1759;
cl. 73, 2021; add. cl. 2027, 2029
Workshop Regulation Act (1871), 1851

DALRYMPLE, Mr. D., Bath

Act of Uniformity Amendment, 3R. 1087
Colonies, The, Res. 917
Juries, 2R. 703
Parliament—Ascension Day, 507
Supply—Privy Council, 979, 981, 983
Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1647

DAMER, Hon. Captain L. S. W. Dawson-, Portarlington

Army—Torpedoes—Harvey, Captain, 788

Deans and Canons Resignation Bill

(Archbishop of Canterbury)

l. Royal Assent May 13 [35 Vict. c. 8]

Debtors (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]

(Lord O'Hagan)

l. Select Committee, The Lord Camoys added
May 31

Defamation of Private Character Bill

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Cross, Mr. Denman)

c. Bill read 2^o, after short debate June 5, 1254
[Bill 99]

DELAHUNTY, Mr. J., Waterford City

Borough Representation (Ireland), Res. 631
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, 697
Post Office—Mails to South of Ireland, 831

DE LA WARR, Earl

Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps, Address
for a Commission, 1930
Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Report, add. cl.
1347, 1348

DENISON, Mr. C. BECKETT-, Yorkshire, W.R., E. Div.

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 225
Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
1232
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
Schedule 1, 561, 671, 673

DENMAN, Lord

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1503; Comm. Amendt. 1800; cl. 5, 1828;
add. cl. 1833, 1842
Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, 1128

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton

Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1257
Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. Amendt. 1260
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1224
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1971

DENT, Mr. J. D., Scarborough

Parliament—Private Legislation, Res. 1669

DERBY, Earl of

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 276
Treaty of Washington, 271, 647, 898; Motion for an Address, 1129, 1262, 1264;—Statement, 1577

DE ROS, Lord

Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 988
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1011

DICKINSON, Mr. S. S., Stroud

Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation, 2R. Amendt. 1219, 1554
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, Amendt. 695; Consid. 1721
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 64, 1720; Amendt. 1755
India—Public Documents and Papers, 192
India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 224
Navy Estimates—Military Pensions and Allowances, 775
Supply—Court of Chancery, 1873

DILKE, Sir C. W., Chelsea, &c.

Metropolis—Sheepshanks Gallery, 99

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. Amendt. 818
Supply—Civil Services, Amendt. 1053
Court of Chancery, 1874
Office of Lord Privy Seal, Amendt. 1523
Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1653

DIMSDALE, Mr. R., Hertford

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 785, 806

Diplomatic Service

British Consulate Establishments, Questions, Mr. Rylands; Answers, Viscount Enfield May 10, 602
Report of the Diplomatic Committee, Question, Mr. Cartwright; Answer, Viscount Enfield June 10, 1507

DISRAELI, Right Hon. B., Buckinghamshire

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 806
Education (Scotland) Amendment, 910
Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1680
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 120; Consid. Schedule 1, 562
Treaty of Washington, 105, 663, 710, 783, 787, 841, 1038;—Statement, 1594, 1612, 1613, 1986

DIXON, Mr. G., Birmingham

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1300; cl. 65, 1939; cl. 66, 1997; cl. 67, 2001; cl. 71, 2015, 2019
Elementary Education Act—Ludlow School, 1682
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 555

DODDS, Mr. J., Stockton

Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 779

DODSON, Mr. J. G., Sussex, E.

Parliament—Private Legislation, 1853
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 117; Consid. 523

DOWNING, Mr. M'Carthy, Cork Co.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 125; Consid. cl. 17, Amendt. 537, 540; Schedule 1, 556, 666

DOWSE, Right Hon R. (Attorney General for Ireland), Londonderry, Bo.

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 1635
Ireland—Questions, &c.
Criminal Law—Roche, Mr., Imprisonment of, 285
Galway Election Petition, 1680, 1681, 1995
Neill, Mrs., Murder of, at Rathgar, 1985
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 439
Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 358
Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 1656
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. add. cl. 510; cl. 17, 538, 541; cl. 26, 545
Parochial Registers (Ireland), 1271
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1969
Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 151
Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 66

Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill

(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, The Marquess of Hartington)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 17 [Bill 202]

Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental Bill

(Mr. William Henry Gladstone, Mr. Baxter)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 4 [Bill 185]

Read 2^o * June 6

Committee *; Report June 7

Read 3^o * June 10

l. Read 1^o * (Marquess of Lansdowne) June 11 (No. 142)

DUFF, Mr. M. E. Grant (Under Secretary of State for India), Elgin, &c.

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 68, 2010
India—Questions, &c.
Andaman Islands, Convicts at, 99
Army—Horse Artillery, 1417

[cont.]

DUFF, Mr. M. E. Grant—cont.

Bombay—Income Tax, 601
Coolies, Recruiting of, 600
Council of India — Indian Presidencies,
Drafts on, 505
Drafts on London, 1856
Educational Service — Retiring Pensions,
603
Indian Field Officers, Retirement of, 601
Kooka Insurrection, 372
Madras, Hurricane at, 1194
Peshawur, Water Supply of, 1350
Public Documents and Papers, 192
Staff Appointments, 1514
Talifoo, Mission from, 1859
India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 217, 239

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 4, 1207; cl. 8, 1302

DUFFERIN, Earl of (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster)

Party Processions (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
363

DUNSANY, Lord

Naval College, Portsmouth, Removal of, 175

DYNEVOR, Lord

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Report, cl. 4, 1337
Prison Ministers, Report, cl. 4, 362

East India (Bengal, &c. Annuity Funds)

Bill (Mr. Grant Duff, Mr. Ayrton)

c. Resolution [May 31] reported, and agreed to ;
Bill ordered; read 1^o June 3 [Bill 182]

EASTWICK, Mr. E. B., Penryn, &c.

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 828
Education (Scotland), Comm. 324
India—Persian Mission, Appointment to the,
375, 1989
India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 223
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
Schedule 1, 670
Persia—Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1279
Polynesian Islanders, 788
South Africa, Res. 815
Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 15

Ecclesiastical Commissioners — The Finsbury Estate

Questions, Mr. Carter, Mr. Floyer; Answers,
Sir Thomas Acland May 2, 100

Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries

Bill [H.L.]

c. Read 1^o May 7 [Bill 152]

EDUCATION

Endowed Schools Commission, Question, Sir
Lawrence Palk; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster
May 3, 193

Endowed Schools Commissioners—Education of Girls, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr.
W. E. Forster May 9, 509

[See title Endowed Schools Commissioners]

[cont.]

EDUCATION—cont.

Inspectors of Elementary Schools, Question, Mr.
H. Samuelson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster
June 11, 1588

Elementary Education Act

Compulsory Attendance, Question, Mr. Hermon;
Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 30, 837

Election of School Boards, Question, Mr.
Heygate; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster
June 13, 1689

Ludlow School, Question, Mr. Dixon; Answer,
Mr. W. E. Forster June 13, 1682

Manchester School Board, Question, Mr. Jacob
Bright; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster June 7, 1350

The New Code, 1871—Evening Schools, Question, Mr. C. Dalrymple; Answer, Mr. W.
E. Forster June 17, 1850

Education — Retirement Allowances for Certificated Teachers

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 31, To leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon Thursday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to consider of an humble Address to Her Majesty, praying that, by a deduction from the Parliamentary Grant in aid of Public Elementary Schools, a provision may be made for granting Annuities to the Certificated Teachers of such Schools upon their retirement by reason of age and infirmity; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the same" (Mr. Whitwell) v. 939;
Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;"
after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Education (Scotland) Bill

(*The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr.
William Edward Forster*)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr.
Speaker do now leave the Chair" May 6, 288

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
"having regard to the principles and history of the past educational legislation and practice of Scotland, which provided for instruction in the Holy Scriptures in the public schools as an essential part of education, this House, while desirous of passing a measure during the present Session for the improvement of education in Scotland, is of opinion that the Law and practice of Scotland in this respect should be continued by provisions in the Bill now before the House" (Mr. Gordon) v.;
Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;"
after long debate, Question put; A. 209,
N. 216; M. 7; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to [Bill 31]

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 352

Questions, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Scourfield; Answers, Mr. Gladstone May 31, 910

Committee—R.P. June 3, 1054

Committee June 4, 1194

I.—GENERAL MANAGEMENT.

Clause 1 (Interpretation of Act)

Clause 2 (Expenses of Scotch Education Department) postponed Clause 3 (Department may employ officers in Scotland) postponed

[cont.]

Education (Scotland) Bill—cont.

II.—LOCAL MANAGEMENT.

Clause 4 (Election of school boards), 1198
Committee—R.P.

Committee June 6, 1284

Clause 5 (Area of a parish and a burgh)

Clause 6 (United parishes) agreed to

Clause 7 (Burghs may be united with parishes in certain cases), 1289

Clause 8 (First election of school boards), 1289

Clauses 9 to 18, inclusive, agreed to Clause 19 (School board declared to be a body corporate. Managers), 1306; Committee—R.P.

Committee June 7, 1352

III.—SCHOOLS.

Clause 20 (Parish schools)

Clauses 21 to 23, inclusive, agreed to

Clause 24 (School boards to ascertain amount of accommodation), 1353

Clauses 25 to 34, inclusive, agreed to

Clause 35 (Transference of existing schools to school boards), 1356

Clauses 36 to 38, inclusive, agreed to

Clause 39 (Combination of school boards), 1359

IV.—FINANCE.

Clause 40 (School fund), 1359

Clause 41 (Power to impose rates), 1360

Clause 42 (Borrowing by school boards), 1360

Clause 43 (Burgh school funds to be transferred to school boards), 1362

Clauses 44 to 49, inclusive, agreed to

Clause 50 (School fees), 1367; Committee—R.P.

Committee June 11, 1615

Clause 50 (School fees)

Clause 51 (Teachers houses), 1616

V.—TEACHERS.

Clause 52 (Teachers in office before the passing of the Act. Teachers appointed after passing of Act), 1621; Committee—R.P.

Committee June 13, 1700

Clause 52 (Teachers in office before the passing of the Act. Teachers appointed after passing of Act)

Clause 53 (Qualified teachers) agreed to

Clause 54 (Examinations of Teachers), 1711

Clause 55 (Certificates) agreed to

Clause 56 (University degrees, &c.), 1712

Clause 57 (Removal of teachers appointed before passing of Act), 1713

Clause 58 (Retiring allowances), 1713

Clause 59 (Higher class public schools.—Burgh) 1714

Clause 60 (Higher class public schools.—Parish) agreed to

Clause 61 (Funds) agreed to

VI.—MISCELLANEOUS—INSPECTION—CONSCIENCE CLAUSE—COMPULSION, &c.

Clause 62 (Evidence of orders, &c. of Education Department) agreed to Clause 63 (Inspection) agreed to Clause 64 (Parliamentary grant), 1718; Committee—R.P.

Committee June 14, 1744

Clause 65 (Conscience clause), 1756; Committee—R.P.

[cont.]

Education (Scotland) Bill—cont.

Committee June 18, 1984

Clause 65 (Conscience clause); Committee—R.P.

Schoolmasters, Question, Dr. Lyon Playfair; Answer, The Lord Advocate June 20, 1992

Committee June 20, 1996

Clause 66 (School boards to provide elementary education for poor children), 1996

Clause 67 (Parents to provide elementary education for their children), 2001

Clause 68 (Defaulting parents may be proceeded against), 2004

Clause 69 (Method of procedure) agreed to

Clause 70 (Employers of children to act as parents. Parents not exempted from liability), 2011

Clause 71 (Exemptions), 2013

Clause 72 (Clerks of criminal courts to be furnished with list of defaulting parents), 2019

Clause 73 (Children bound to attend school), 2020

Clause 74 negatived

Clause 75 agreed to

Clause 76 (Teachers appointed under the Act not subject to provisions of 9 & 10 Vict., c. ccxxvi), 2022

Clause 77 (Repeal of Acts at variance with this Act), 2022

Clause 78 agreed to

Postponed Clauses

Clause 2 (Expenses of Scotch Education Department) negatived, 2025

Clause 3 (Department may employ officers in Scotland), 2025

New Clause (Appointment of organizing Commissioners in Scotland to act for three years), 2026

Schedules A, B, and C agreed to Report; re-committed in respect of a New Clause (Expenses of Scotch Education Department)

EGERTON, Lord

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 31, 594

EGERTON, Hon. A. F., Lancashire, S.E.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 884

EGERTON, Hon. Captain F., Derbyshire, E.

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1408

Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 381

EGERTON, Hon. Wilbraham, Cheshire, Mid.

Education (Scotland), Comm. 328

Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Charles Reed, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Morley, Viscount Mahon)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 168]

Read 2^o * May 27

Committee *; Report May 30

Read 3^o * June 3

l. Read 1^o * (Lord Lyttelton) June 4 (No. 128)

Elementary Education (Provisional Order Confirmation) Bill (Mr. WilliamEdward Forster, Mr. Winterbotham)

- c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 27 [Bill 175]
 Read 2^o * June 3
 Committee *; Report; read 3^o June 12
 l. Read 1^o * (Lord President) June 13 (No. 148)

Elementary Schools (Certificated Teachers)

Select Committee appointed June 3, 1892;
 List of the Committee, 1561

ELLICE, Mr. E., St. Andrews, &c.

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1075;
 cl. 2, Amendt. 1195; cl. 5, 1284, 1288; cl. 8,
 1291; cl. 24, 1355; cl. 35, 1358; cl. 52,
 1700, 1704, 1709; add. cl. 2027

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
 Schedule 1, 110, 119; Consid. Schedule 1,
 562

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D. H., Portsmouth

Education (Scotland), Comm. 320; cl. 1, 1084;
 cl. 2, 1197; cl. 4, 1217; cl. 8, 1292, 1294;
 cl. 19, 1323; cl. 20, 1353; cl. 35, 1358;
 cl. 76, 2022; add. cl. 2029

France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1781

India—Madras, Hurricane at, 1193

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1408

Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 383

Navy Estimates—Coastguard, &c. 720

Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 755

Half-Pay—Navy and Marines, Motion for reporting Progress, 773

Military Pensions and Allowances, 773

Victualling Yards, 771

Treaty of Washington, Statement, 1606

Endowed Schools and Hospitals (Scotland)

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the nature and amount of all endowments in Scotland, the funds of which are wholly or in part devoted, or have been applied, or which can rightly be made applicable to educational purposes, and which have not been reported on by the Commissioners under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858; also to inquire into the administration and management of any Hospitals or Schools supported by such Endowments, and into the system and course of study respectively pursued therein, and to Report whether any and what changes in the administration and use of such Endowments are expedient, by which their usefulness and efficiency may be increased (Sir Edward Colebrooke) May 1

Endowed Schools Commissioners—Ripon Grammar School

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that, in so much as the Scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners with reference to the

[cont.]

Endowed Schools Commissioners—Ripon Grammar School—cont.

Free Grammar School at Ripon, Yorkshire would deprive the poor of that city and its neighbourhood of the facilities of obtaining an education, almost free, now possessed by all classes in that city and its neighbourhood, She will therefore be pleased to withhold Her consent from the said Scheme" (Mr. Wheelhouse) May 7, 444; after short debate, Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Fawcett); A. 26, N. 84;
 M. 58

Original Question put; A. 19, N. 84; M. 65

ENFIELD, Viscount (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Middlesex

British Consular Establishments, 602

Crimea—British Graves in the, 98

Diplomatic Committee, Report, 1508

East African Slave Trade, 654

France—Political Prisoners, Deportation of, 783, 1995

Quarantine in French Ports, 1193, 1277

India—Persian Mission, Appointment to the,
 375, 1990

Japan—Japanese Embassy, 1030

Persia—Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1279

Rome—Papal Court, Diplomatic Representation at the, 1028

Supply—Secret Services, 1547

ENNISKILLEN, Earl of

Party Processions (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 367

Epping Forest Bill [H.L.]

(Duke of St. Albans)

- l. Bill read 2^a, after short debate May 3, 189
 Committee *; Report, and referred to a Select Committee May 13 (No. 112)
 Report of Select Committee * June 10 (No. 132)
 Committee * (on re-comm) June 13 (No. 150)
 Report * June 14
 Read 3^a * June 17

ERSKINE, Admiral J. E., Stirlingshire

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1402

European Assurance Society Bill (by Order)

- c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o"
June 11, 1584
 Amendt. to leave out from "be," and add "recommitted to the former Committee" (Mr.
Eykyn) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 3^o

EWING, Mr. A. Orr, Dumbarton

Education (Scotland), Comm. 312; cl. 1, 1077;
 cl. 2, 1195, 1197; cl. 4, 1206; cl. 5, 1286;
 cl. 8, Amendt. 1295, 1298; cl. 24, 1355;
 cl. 50, 1615; cl. 51, 1618, 1621; cl. 52,
 1701, 1710, 1711; cl. 65, 1759; cl. 66,
 1999; cl. 67, 2003; cl. 68, 2006; Amendt.
 2008, 2009; cl. 70, Amendt. 2012, 2013;
 cl. 76, Amendt. 2022

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
 Schedule 1, 138

EWING, Mr. H. E. CRUM- Paisley
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1071 ;
cl. 65, Amendt. 1943, 1947

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the, see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

Exhibitions, Dangerous — Women and Children
Observations, Lord Buckhurst ; Reply, The Earl of Morley June 14, 1733

Extradition (Germany)—Communist Prisoners (France)—Papers presented by Command

Observations, Earl Granville June 13, 1822
Correspondence respecting the embarkation of Communist Prisoners from French Ports to England : And Treaty between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Germany for the mutual surrender of Fugitive Criminals ; signed at London 14th May 1872 :
Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table

Extradition of Criminals

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Returns stating the number and nature of all treaties or conventions at present in force with foreign states for the extradition of criminals (The Earl of Rosebery) May 3, 181 ; after short debate, Motion agreed to

EYKYN, Mr. R., Windsor
European Assurance Society, 3R. Amendt. 1584, 1587
Police Superannuation, 1852
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1967
Supply—Privy Council, 1518

Eyre, Mr., Late Governor of Jamaica—Payment of Legal Expenses
Questions, Mr. Bowring, Colonel North ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone May 27, 706

FAWCETT, Mr. H., Brighton
Agricultural Children, 2R. 1660
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 12, 1559
Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 445
Endowed Schools Commissioners—Education of Girls, 509
Law Officers of the Crown, 247
Parliament—Public Business, 1027

Fenian Convicts—Reported Amnesty
Question, Sir George Jenkinson ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 27, 708

FEVERSHAM, Earl of
Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 277

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Fires Bill (Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Charles Turner, Mr. Agar-Ellis)
c. Committee * ; Report June 17 [Bills 7-199]

FITZMAURICE, Lord E. G., Calne
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1302 ;
cl. 64, 1753

FLOYER, Mr., J. Dorsetshire
Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Finsbury Estate, 101
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. 517

FORDYCE, Mr. W. D., Aberdeenshire, E.
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1290 ;
cl. 52, 1708 ; cl. 68, 2009

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Bradford
Agricultural Children, 2R. 1659
Cattle — Importation of—Order in Council, 1871, 650

Education—Questions, &c.
Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 944
Endowed Schools Commission, 193
Inspectors of Elementary Schools, 1588
Manchester School Board, 1350
New Code—Evening Schools, 1851
Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 444
Education (Scotland), Comm. 341 ; cl. 1, 1081 ;
cl. 2, 1195 ; cl. 8, 1303, 1305 ; cl. 50, 1373 ;
cl. 52, 1706 ; cl. 59, 1715, 1718 ; cl. 64, 1747, 1753 ; cl. 65, 1937, 1938 ; cl. 68, 2007, 2009 ; cl. 73, 2020, 2021 ; add. cl. 2027

Elementary Education Act—Compulsory Attendance, 838
Ludlow School, 1682
School Boards, Election of, 1689
Endowed Schools Commissioners—Education of Girls, 509
Metropolis—Sheepshanks Gallery, 99
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 113, 118, 120, 122, 123, 124, 126, 129, 131, 132, 133, 134 ; Amendt. 135 ;
Schedule 2, 138, 139 ; Consid. 512, 514 ;
cl. 3, 528 ; cl. 4, 529, 530 ; Amendt. 531 ;
cl. 6, 532 ; cl. 8, Amendt. 533 ; cl. 16, 534 ;
cl. 17, 539 ; cl. 23, 543 ; cl. 26, 544 ; Schedule 1, 546, 547, 548 ; Amendt. 549, 555 ;
Amendt. 557, 560, 562, 563, 569, 671, 672, 674 ; Amendt. 675, 677 ; Amendt. 680 ; 3R. 845, 846, 855, 880
Supply—Privy Council, 978, 979, 980, 982

FORTESCUE, Right Hon. Chichester S. (President of the Board of Trade), Louth Co.

France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1791
Ireland—Arran Islands—Straw Island, Lighthouse on, 837
Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 385, 836

FORTESCUE, Right Hon. C. S.—cont.

Parliament—Private Legislation, 1854

Railways—Box Tunnel, Accident in the, 278

Communication with Guards, 1687

St. George's Channel—Lighthouse on the Tuscar Rocks, 838

Suez Canal—Dues, Increase of, 1688

Supply—Privy Council, 1518, 1522

Water Supply (Metropolis), 279

Weights and Measures (Metric System) Act (1864), 1859

FOWLER, Mr. R. N., Penryn, &c.

Colonies, The, Res. 919

Customs and Inland Revenue, Consid. add. cl. 1903

Juries, 2R. 703

Navy Estimates—Military Pensions and Allowances, 774

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1232

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 2, 138, 139; Consid. Schedule 1, 553

South Africa, Res. 806

Supply—Salaries and Allowances of Governors, &c. 1902

FOWLER, Mr. W., Cambridge Bo.

Ordnance Survey (England), Res. 397

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 497

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 69

France

Deportation of Political Prisoners—Correspondence, Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Viscount Enfield May 28, 783; Observations, Question, Mr. Otway; Reply, Mr. Gladstone May 30, 829; Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Viscount Enfield June 20, 1995

Quarantine in French Ports, Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Viscount Enfield June 4, 1193; June 6, 1277

France—Denunciation of the Treaty of Commerce

Amendt. on Committee of Supply June 4, To leave out from "That," and add "the recent action of the French Government in imposing 'Differential Duties' on merchandise carried in British Ships in the 'Indirect Trade,' is inconsistent with the policy mutually agreed upon between the two Countries in 1866; and that such policy, whilst likely to entail serious injury upon French Trade and Manufactures, is calculated, in the present circumstances of the 'Carrying Trade,' to inflict injury upon British Shipping, and to impair the relations and intercourse between the two Countries, which have grown up under recent commercial arrangements, more especially when it is considered that other European flags are (under Treaties recently made with them) free from the restrictions now imposed upon British Shipping" (Mr. Graves) v. 1760; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Amendt. withdrawn

FRENCH, Right Hon. Colonel F., Rescommon Co.

Court of Chancery (Funds), Consid. Amendt. 1721

Parliament—Derby Day, 795

Game Laws

Instruction to the Select Committee on the Game Laws, to inquire into the Laws for the protection of deer in Scotland, with reference to their general bearing upon the interest of the community (Mr. Hunt) June 19

GARLIES, Lord, Wigtonshire

Army—Windsor Cavalry Barracks—Logie, Surgeon Major, 833, 834

Education (Scotland), Comm. 332; cl. 4, 1212; cl. 2, 2025; Motion for reporting Progress, add. cl. 2027

Gas and Water Orders Confirmation Bill(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Committee*; Report May 2 [Bill 125]

Considered* May 3

Read 3^o* May 6l. Read 1st* (Earl Cowper) May 7 (No. 101)

Read 2^a* and referred to a Select Committee May 31

Committee nominated June 3; List of the Committee, 1023

Committee* June 7

Report* June 10

Read 3^a* June 14

Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. lxix.]

Gas and Water Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Bill(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)c. Ordered; read 1^o* May 2 [Bill 141]Read 2^o* May 6

Committee*; Report May 27

Considered* May 30

Read 3^o* May 31l. Read 1st* (Earl Cowper) June 3 (No. 122)Read 2^a* June 11

Committee* June 13

Report* June 17

Read 3^a* June 18

Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. lxx.]

GILPIN, Mr. C., Northampton Bo.

East African Slave Trade, 653

Mauritius—Indian Labourers in the, 1683

Post Office—Irish Mails—Milford, 1684

South Africa, Res. 814

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E. (First Lord of the Treasury), Greenwich

Act of Uniformity Amendment, Comm. cl. 6, 889; Preamble, 891, 894, 896; 3R. 1085, 1089

Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation, 2R. 1221, 1554

Canada—Dominion of—Guaranteed Loan, 284

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 18, 694

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. 1555; cl. 12, 1558; Consid. add. cl. 1904

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.—cont.

Education (Scotland) Amendment, 910, 911;
Comm. cl. 1, 1084; cl. 19, 1316, 1322;
cl. 65, 1759; cl. 71, 2017; add. cl. 2028, 2029
Eyre, Mr.—Legal Expenses, Payment of, 706, 707
Fenian Convicts—Reported Amnesty, 708
France—Political Prisoners, Deportation of,
830, 831
France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of
the, Res. 1792
India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 243
Ireland—Galway Election—Keogh, Mr. Justice, 1025, 1676, 1677, 1679, 1681, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1987
Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 357
Local Taxation, 1273, 1279
Mines Regulation, 911
Parliament—Questions, &c.
Ascension Day, 507
Derby Day, 793
Galway Election—Keogh, Mr. Justice,
Judgment of, 841
Public Business, 839, 1027, 1028, 1031,
1048, 1509
Whitsuntide Recess, 106, 376
Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
1223, 1237
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 1, 127; Consid. Schedule 1, 556
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1893
Charity Commission, 1532
Civil Services, 1052, 1053
Office of Lord Privy Seal, 1524
Treaty of Washington, 105, 371, 607, 608, 654,
665, 713, 718, 784, 786, 787, 841, 842, 843,
911, 1032, 1038, 1039, 1045, 1046, 1048,
1276; Res. 1282;—Statement, 1589, 1592,
1597, 1601, 1604, 1609, 1612, 1613, 1614,
1693, 1695, 1698, 1699, 1736, 1737, 1739,
1741, 1742, 1863, 1864, 1987, 1988, 1989
Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
160, 161

GLOUCESTER and BRISTOL, Bishop of Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, 172GOLDNEY, Mr. G., Chippenham

Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, 896
All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 821
Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 777
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 1, 132, 134; Schedule 2, 139;
Consid. cl. 16, 535; Schedule 1, Amendt.
546, 548, 681
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1249
Supply—Woods, Forests, &c. 1541
Works and Public Buildings, 1543
Treaty of Washington, 1048;—Statement, 1606

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H., Reading

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 693

GOLDSMID, Mr. J., Rochester

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 463
Supply—Civil Services, 1054
Wellington Monument, Motion for Papers, 193,
200, 204

GORDON, Right Hon. E. S., Glasgow, &c. Universities

Education (Scotland), Comm. Amendt. 288,
292, 295; cl. 1, 1054; Amendt. 1056, 1063,
1082, 1083; Amendt. 1194; cl. 4, Amendt.
1198, 1217; cl. 5, Amendt. 1284; cl. 7,
Amendt. 1289; cl. 8, 1292, 1298; cl. 19,
Amendt. 1306; cl. 24, 1353, 1354; cl. 39,
Amendt. 1359; cl. 40, ib.; cl. 42, Amendt.
1360; cl. 43, 1365; cl. 50, Amendt. 1367,
1371; cl. 51, Amendt. 1616, 1618; Amendt.
1619, 1620; cl. 52, 1629, 1707; cl. 54,
Amendt. 1711; cl. 56, Amendt. 1712; cl. 58,
Amendt. 1713; Amendt. 1716; cl. 65, 1758,
1941; cl. 71, 2018; cl. 72, 2019; cl. 73,
Amendt. 2020; add. cl. 2026, 2027, 2029
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
cl. 16, 536; Schedule 1, 678
Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns,
975
Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1604

GORE, Mr. W. R. ORMSBY- Leitrim Co.
Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 359GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J. (First Lord of the Admiralty), London

Navy—Questions, &c.
Channel Squadron, 102, 1990
Chatham Dockyard—Railway Connection, 781
Greenwich Pensions, 707
Marines, Captains of, 1691
"Thalia," The, Storeship, 1857
Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1411
Navy Estimates—Coastguard, &c. 719, 720
Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 721, 726,
731, 738, 764, 766, 768, 769
Half Pay—Navy and Marines, 773
Medical Establishments, 772
Military Pensions, 774, 775
Victualling Yards, 771, 772

GOURLY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland

Army—County Military Depot Centres, 782

GRAHAM, Mr. W., Glasgow

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1070; cl. 8,
1290, 1304; cl. 19, 1323; cl. 59, Amendt.
1716; cl. 65, 1936, 1943; cl. 68, 2003

GRANVILLE, Earl (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 275, 276
Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 988
Extradition of Criminals, Address for Returns,
182, 1662
Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 191, 648
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
1800; cl. 2, 1809, 1822; add. cl. 1836, 1840
Treaty of Washington, 73, 267, 270, 271, 272,
273, 564, 632, 642, 899, 902, 904, 905, 908,
989, 991, 993, 995, 996, 1093, 1094, 1095;
Motion for an Address, 1107, 1110, 1125,
1156, 1176, 1188, 1262, 1266, 1267;—Statement, 1562, 1579, 1582, 1583, 1725, 1732, 1799, 1800

GRAVES, Mr. S. R., Liverpool

France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1780, 1798

Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 390

GRAY, Sir J., Kilkenny Bo.

Army—Equipment of the, 103

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1681

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 448
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 852

Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 166

GREENE, Mr. E., Bury St. Edmunds

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 829

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 804

Colonies, The, Res. 938

Education (Scotland), Comm. 336

GREGORY, Mr. G. B., Sussex, E.

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1974

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 687 ; cl. 18, Amendt. 692 ; Amendt. 694 ; cl. 21, 696 ; cl. 22, 697

Education — Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 948

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 204

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1259

Ordnance Survey (England), Res. 397

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 670

Treaty of Washington, 1045 ;—Statement, 1614, 1735, 1987, 1988

GREY, Earl

Church Seats, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 172

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 4, 568 ; Report, add. cl. 1342

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. Amendt. 1427 ; Comm. cl. 2, 1808, 1817

Treaty of Washington, 270, 989 ; Motion for an Address, 1120, 1125, 1188, 1265 ;—Statement, 1580

GREY, Right Hon. Sir G., Morpeth

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. 520

Supply—Public Works Loan Commissioners, &c. 1538

Treaty of Washington, 899, 904

GRIEVE, Mr. J. J., Greenock

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1055 ; cl. 65, 1937 ; cl. 71, Amendt. 2013

GROSVENOR, Hon. Captain R. W., Westminster

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 117 ; Consid. Schedule 1, 552

GUEST, Mr. A. E., Poole

Navy—"Thalia," The, Storeship, 1857

Navy Estimates—Military Pensions and Allowances, 774

Supply—Office of Lord Privy Seal, 1528

GUEST, Mr. M. J., Youghal

Criminal Law—Brutal Assaults on Women, 285

GURNEY, Right Hon. Russell, Southampton

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1970

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord C., Tyrone Co.

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 436

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., Lynn Regis

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 825

Navy—Greenwich Pensions, 707

HAMILTON, Lord G. F., Middlesex

Customs Department—Competitive Examinations, 1853

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 4, 531

Turnpike Acts Continuance, 834

HAMILTON, Marquess of, Donegal Co.

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 441

HARCOURT, Mr. W. Vernon, Oxford City

Law Officers of the Crown, 264

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 2, 137 ; Consid. Schedule 1, 553, 558, 665, 671, 674 ; Amendt. 675 ; 3R. 854, 855

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1955

Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1246, 1253

HARDY, Right Hon. Gathorne, Oxford University

Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, 895

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1975

Colonies, The, Res. 929, 935

Court of Chancery (Funds), Consid. 1723

Criminal Law — Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 618

Education (Scotland), Comm. 344 ; cl. 1, 1078, 1080 ; cl. 19, 1320 ; cl. 64, 1747, 1751 ; cl. 73, 2020, 2022

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 26, 545

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1956

HARDY, Mr. J. Stewart, Rye

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 673

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 68

HARROWBY, Earl of

Criminal Law — Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Motion for Papers, 1728

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Report, cl. 4 1336

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of (Chief Secretary for Ireland), New Radnor

Ireland—Questions, &c.
Church Temporalities Commissioners, 1515
Galway Election Petition, 1860
Intoxication by Ether, 1024
Landed Proprietors, 1269
Neill, Mrs., Murder of, at Rathgar, 1743, 1934
Poor Law—Union Rating, 837
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 1512
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 422, 427
Irish Church Act Amendment, 287; Comm. 355, 359; 3R. 700
Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. Amendt. 143

HATHERLEY, Lord (see CHANCELLOR, The Lord)

HAY, Rear-Admiral Sir J. C. D., Stamford

Education (Scotland), Comm. 318; cl. 1, 1070; cl. 2, 1197; cl. 8, 1301
Navy—Marines, Captains of, 1691
Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1400, 1401
Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 377, 390, 836
Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 767, 768
Medical Establishments, 772
Military Pensions and Allowances, 774
Victualling Yards, 771
Supply—Privy Council, 1518

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton Bo.
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 668

HENLEY, Right Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire
Agricultural Children, 2R. 1660
Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1976
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 688; cl. 18, 694
Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 625
Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 971
Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 2R. 1982
India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 230
Juries, 2R. 702
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1237
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 16, 536; Schedule 1, 554, 672
Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 470
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1958
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1890
Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1654

HENRY, Mr. Mitchell, Galway Co.
Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1644, 1646
Ireland—Arran Islands—Straw Island, Lighthouse on, 839
Galway Election—Keogh, Mr. Justice, 1025

HENRY, Mr. M.—cont.

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Amendt. 1883, 1892
County Courts, 1880
Privy Council, 978
Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Offices (Scotland), 1551

HERBERT, Right Hon. Major-General Sir Percy E., Shropshire, S.
Army—Scientific Corps, 1692

HERBERT, Hon. Auberon E. W. M., Nottingham Bo.

Army Officers—Presentations at Court, 103
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 431
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 134
Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. Amendt. 1648, 1654

HERMON, Mr. E., Preston

Colonies, The, Res. 925
Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 943
Education (Scotland), Comm. 336
Elementary Education Act—Compulsory Attendance, 837
Supply—Civil Services, 1054
Court of Chancery, 1872
Criminal Proceedings, Scotland, 1896
Tichborne v. Lushington—Prosecution, &c. 374
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 547, 678

HERON, Mr. D. C., Tipperary Co.
Church Temporalities (Ireland) Commissioners, 1515
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 429
Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 56

HERTFORD, Marquess of
Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 984
Purchase and Scientific Corps, 1332

HEYGATE, Mr. W. U., Leicestershire, S.
Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1642
Elementary Education Act—School Boards, Election of, 1689
Ireland—Landed Proprietors, 1268
Municipal Corporations (Election of Aldermen), Res. 400, 406
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 17, 540; 3R. 860
Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 498

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T. (Secretary to the Poor Law Commissioners), Oldham
Poor Law—Goding, Mr., Case of, 1742

HOARE, Sir H. A., Chelsea, &c.
Police—Animals, Cruelty to, 1271

HODGKINSON, Mr. G., Newark Bo.
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. add. cl. 511

HOGG, Colonel J. M., Truro
Supply—Privy Council, 1521

HOLMS, Mr. J., Hackney
Navy—Chatham Dockyard—Railway Connection, 781
Water Supply (Metropolis)—Victoria Park, 1852

HOLT, Mr. J. M., Lancashire, N.E.
Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 968
Juries, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 703

HOPE, Mr. A. J. Beresford, Cambridge University
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 64, 1746, 1752; cl. 65, Amendt. 1757; cl. 68, 2006
Ordnance Survey (England), Res. 399
Parliament—Ascension Day, 505, 507
Derby Day, 795
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1225, 1229
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 132; Consid. cl. 6, 533; cl. 26, 545; Schedule 1, 681
Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1648
Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 59

HORSMAN, Right Hon. E., Liskeard
Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, 894, 895; 3R. 1089
All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 824
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 437, 441
Treaty of Washington, 717, 1038;—Statement, 1597, 1736, 1737

Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Bill
(Mr. Pell, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Joshua Fielden, Lord John Manners, Mr. Charles Forster)
c. 2R. adjourned May 27 [Bill 16]

HOSKYNs, Mr. C. WREN-, Hereford City
Land Returns—The "New Domesday Book," 1684
Ordnance Survey (England), Res. 390, 395, 400

HOUGHTON, Lord
Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 82

HUGHES, Mr. T., Frome
Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, 896
Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation, 2R. 1554
Parliament—Derby Day, 789

HUNT, Right Hon. G. W., Northamptonshire, N.
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 685; cl. 21, 695; Consid. 1722
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. 1555; cl. 12, 1557, 1558; cl. 13, 1560; add. cl. ib.

[cont.]

HUNT, Right Hon. G. W.—cont.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. 514; cl. 4, 531; cl. 8, 533; cl. 16, 534; cl. 17, 541; Schedule 1, Amendt. 545; Amendt. 546; Amendt. 548, 561, 669, 672, 673; Amendt. 680
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1961
Supply—Charity Commission, 1530
Court of Chancery, 1871, 1876
Criminal Prosecutions, 1869

HUNTLY, Marquess of
Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 20, 583

HURST, Mr. R. H., Horsham
Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1974

HYLTON, Lord
Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 20, 583

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition Bill
(Mr. Bass, Mr. Robert Fowler)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 8 [Bill 156]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
June 19, 1977
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day three months" (Mr. Lopes); after short debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 34, N. 136; M. 102; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Bill put off for three months

INDIA

Appointment to the Persian Mission, Question, Mr. Eastwick; Answer, Viscount Enfield
May 7, 375; June 20, 1989

Army

Retirement of Field Officers, Question, Colonel Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 10, 604

Royal Horse Artillery, Observations, Colonel North, Sir Charles Wingfield; Reply, Mr. Grant Duff; short debate thereon June 7, 1416

Staff Appointments, Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff June 10, 1514

Bank of Bengal—Drafts on London, Question, Mr. Crawford; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff June 17, 1856

Convicts at the Andaman Islands, Question, Mr. Salt; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 2, 99

Council of India—Drafts on Indian Presidencies, Question, Mr. M^r Arthur; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 9, 505

Educational Service—Retiring Pensions, Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 10, 602

Hurricane at Madras, Question, Sir James Elphinstone; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff June 4, 1193

Income Tax, Presidency of Bombay, Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 10, 600

[cont.]

INDIA—cont.

Indian Labourers in the Mauritius, Question, Mr. Gilpin ; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen June 13, 1883

Kooka Insurrection, Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 7, 372

Mission from Talifoo, Question, Sir Stafford Northcote ; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff June 17, 1859

Public Documents and Papers, Question, Mr. Dickinson ; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 3, 192

Recruiting of Coolies, Question, Sir Charles Wingfield ; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff May 10, 600

Water Supply of Peshawur, Question, Mr. Stapleton ; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff June 7, 1850

India—Old Bank of Bombay—Government Liability

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 3, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the case of the Shareholders of the Bank of Bombay is one for the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government" (Mr. Gregory) v. 204 ; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Question put, A. 116, N. 78 ; Majority 38

Infant Life Protection Bill

(Mr. Charley, Dr. Brewer, Dr. Lyon Playfair)

c. Committee * (on re-comm) ; Report May 3
[Bills 108-146]

Considered * May 13 [Bill 161]

Read 3^o * May 30

l. Read 1^o * (Earl of Shaftesbury) May 31

Read 2^o *, and referred to a Select Committee
June 20 (No. 118)

Committee nominated June 21 ; List of the Committee, 1984

International Exhibition, Vienna, 1873

Question, Mr. Bowring ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 6, 1269

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing) Bill

(Earl of Kimberley)

l. Read 2^a, after debate May 2, 74 (No. 78)
Committee May 10, 565

Re-comm. ; Committee June 7, 1332 (No. 106)

Report * June 10 (No. 131)

Read 3^a June 13, 1665 ; after short debate, Bill passed

c. Read 1^o * (Mr. Secretary Bruce) June 17
[Bill 198]

IRELAND

Arran Islands, The—Lighthouse on Straw Island, Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry ; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue May 30, 837

Cashel Barracks, Question, Mr. Stacpoole ; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 2, 404—Sickness at, Question, Mr. Stacpoole ; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 30, 835

IRELAND—cont.

Church Temporalities (Ireland) Commissioners—Sales of Land, Question, Mr. Heron ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 10, 1515

Criminal Law—Imprisonment of Mr. Roche, Question, Mr. Butt ; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland May 6, 284

Customs Clerks at Dublin, Question, Mr. Pim ; Answer, Mr. Baxter June 6, 1270

Exemption from Taxation, Question, Colonel Taylor ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 6, 286

Fermoy Barracks, Question, Colonel C. Lindsay ; Answer, Mr. Cardwell May 9, 503

Freemasonry—Case of David Farrell, Question, Mr. O'Reilly ; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 17, 1854

Intoxication by Ether, Question, Colonel Stuart Knox ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 3, 1024

Landed Proprietors, Question, Sir Frederick W. Heygate ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 6, 1268

Masters and Assistants of National Schools, Question, Mr. Smyth ; Answer, Mr. Baxter June 14, 1743

Murder of Mrs. Neill at Rathgar—Altar Denunciations, Question, Mr. Whalley ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 14, 1743 ; June 18, 1933 ; Question, Observations, Colonel Taylor ; Reply, The Attorney General for Ireland June 20, 1984

Parochial Registers, Question, Mr. Pim ; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 6, 1270

Poor Law (Ireland)—Union Rating, Question, Mr. M'Mahon ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington May 30, 837

Post Office

Irish Mails, Milford, Question, Mr. Gilpin ; Answer, Mr. Monsell June 13, 1684

Irish Postmasters, Question, Mr. G. Browne ; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 3, 193

Mails to the South of Ireland, Question, Mr. Delahunty ; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 30, 831

Reformatories and Industrial Schools, Question, Mr. O'Reilly ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 10, 1512

Ireland—Borough Representation

Moved, "That, inasmuch as the manufacturing, commercial, and trading interests of Ireland are not sufficiently represented in Parliament, and it is not expedient that its borough representation should continue lessened by the disfranchisement of Cashel and Sligo, it is the opinion of this House that Her Majesty's Government should forthwith introduce and promote a Bill to authorize and empower the several towns of the county of Tipperary to elect and return one Member, and the several towns of the county of Sligo, in conjunction with the seaport towns of Ballina and Westport, to elect and return one other Member to the Imperial Parliament" (Mr. Delahunty)
May 10, 831 [House counted out]

Ireland—Galway Election Inquiry—Judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh

Question, Colonel Stuart Knox ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 30, 841 ; Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 3, 1025

Certificate and Report from Mr. Justice Keogh, and Special Case—together with Minutes of Evidence, and Shorthand Writer's Notes of Mr. Justice Keogh's Judgment June 13, 1669

Moved, "That the said Certificate and Report from Mr. Justice Keogh, together with the Special Case and Order of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, be entered in the Journals of this House," 1677 ; Motion agreed to

Moved, That the Clerk of the Crown do attend this House To-morrow, at Two of the clock, with the last Return for the County of Galway, and amend the same, by rasing out the name of John Philip Nolan, esquire, and inserting the name of Captain the Honourable William le Poer Trench, instead thereof (Mr. Gladstone) ; after short debate, Motion agreed to

After further debate, Ordered, That the Copy of the Shorthand Writer's Notes of the Judgment of Mr. Justice Keogh on the Trial of the Galway County Election Petition [No. 241] : Also the Minutes of the Evidence taken at the Trial of the said Election Petition, and the Appendix thereto [No. 241], be printed (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

The Clerk of the Crown attending according to order, amended the Return for the County of Galway June 14

Notice of Motion, 'The O'Donoghue June 14, 1735 ; Questions, Mr. P. Smyth, Mr. O'Connor ; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Gladstone, The Attorney General June 17, 1860 ; Question, 'The O'Donoghue ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 20, 1987 ; Question, The O'Donoghue ; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland, 1995

Outrages on Mr. Justice Keogh, Questions, Sir Robert Peel, Colonel Stuart Knox ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 17, 1861

Ireland—Lord Lieutenant of the County of Clare

Question, Mr. Collins ; Answer, Sir Colman O'Loughlen May 6, 287

Moved, "That this House has heard with great regret that a gentleman has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Clare who has never resided in that county, who is a stranger to its Magistrates, and who does not possess that local knowledge of the county and its residents essential to the proper discharge of the important duties of a Lieutenant of a County, and that this House is of opinion that such an appointment is of evil example, and ought not to have been made" (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) May 7, 406 ; after long debate, Question put ; A. 41, N. 257 ; M. 216

Irish Church Act Amendment Bill [H.L.]
(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Question, Colonel Taylor ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington May 6, 287

[cont.]

Irish Church Act Amendment Bill—cont.

Committee ; Report May 6, 355

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o"
May 7, 446 [House counted out]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o"
May 13, 627

Amendt. to leave out from "Bill be," and add "re-committed" (Mr. Newdegate) v. ; Question proposed, "That the words, &c. ;" after short debate, Question put ; A. 86, N. 35 ; M. 51 ; main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 3^o

l. Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 13]

Isle of Man Harbours Bill

(Earl Cowper)

l. Read 2^a * June 3 (No. 83)

Committee * ; Report June 4

Read 3^a * June 6

Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 23]

JAMES, Mr. H., Taunton

European Assurance Society, 3R. 1586

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 120, 128 ; Schedule 2, 139 ;

Consid. Schedule 1, 554, 673

Supply—County Courts, 1877

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 43

Japan—The Japanese Embassy

Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Viscount Enfield June 3, 1030

JENKINSON, Sir G. S., Wiltshire, N.

Canada, Dominion of—Guaranteed Loan, 284

Fenian Convicts—Reported Amnesty, 708

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 118

Treaty of Washington, Statement, 1607, 1609

JESSEL, Sir G., see SOLICITOR GENERAL, The

JOHNSTON, Mr. A., Essex, S.

Parliament—Charity Commission, 1529, 1533

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1225

Supply—Office of Lord Privy Seal, 1528

Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office, Scotland, 1549 ; Amendt. 1551

Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1646

JOHNSTONE, Sir H., Scarborough

Working Men's Clubs—The Excise, 1513

Juries Act Amendment (Ireland) Bill

[H.L.] (Lord O'Hagan)

l. Presented ; read 1^a * May 13 (No. 109)

Read 2^a * May 31

Committee * ; Report June 4

Read 3^a * June 10

c. Read 1^o * (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)
June 12 [Bill 195]

Read 2^o * June 14

Juries Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
May 13, 701

After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Holt), put, and negatived; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee

Select Committee nominated; List of the
Committee June 4, 1241

KAVANAGH, Mr. A. M., Carlow Co.

Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 359

Navy — "Megara" Commission, Report of,
1514

KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Mr. U. J., Hastings

Criminal Law — Collumpton Magistrates —
Webber, John, Case of, 1507, 1686

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 19, 1315,
1320; cl. 70, Amendt. 2011; cl. 71, 2015,
2019

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
Schedule 1, 554

Water Supply (Metropolis), 278, 279

KESTEVEN, Lord

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 97; Comm.
cl. 6, 578; cl. 31, 594

KIMBERLEY, Earl of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Epping Forest, 2R. 191

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 74, 90, 95;
Comm. cl. 4, 566, 570, 571, 572; cl. 6, 573,
574; cl. 8, 575; cl. 9, 576; cl. 10, ib., 577;
cl. 11, ib.; cl. 14, 578; cl. 15, ib., 579; cl. 16, 580, 582; cl. 19, ib.; cl. 20, 583, 584, 585;
cl. 23, 586; cl. 25, 587; Amendt. 589, 590,
591; cl. 29, Amendt. 591, 592; cl. 31, 592,
594; cl. 39, 596, 598; cl. 66, 599; cl. 68,
Amendt. ib.; Report, 1332; cl. 4, Amendt.
ib., 1334, 1337, 1338; cl. 5, ib.; cl. 23,
Amendt. ib., 1339; cl. 25, ib.; cl. 29,
1341, 1345; add. cl. 1346, 1347; add. cl.
1348, 1665

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1005, 1008

Pacific Islanders Protection, 2R. 184, 267;
Comm. 369

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1486; Comm. cl. 2, 1820, 1821; cl. 6, 1830;
add. cl. 1838, 1842; Schedule 1, 1847

Party Processions (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
367

Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address,
1137, 1188; — Statement, 1575

KING, Hon. P. J. Locke, Surrey, E.

Act of Uniformity Amendment, 3R. 1091

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, 896
Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation,
2R. 1222

Colonies, The, Res. 938

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial
Schools, Res. 621

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F.—cont.

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 12,
1559

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 48, 1363;
cl. 68, 2008

India—Kooka Insurrection, 372

Japan—Japanese Embassy, 1030

Navy—Navigation, System of, 1415

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 2, 1847

Supply—Court of Chancery, 1873

Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address,
Motion for Adjournment, 1191

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. E. H. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), *Sandwich

Africa, South, Res. 811, 812

Africa, Western—Bank of West Africa, 500

Dutch Guinea, Acquisition of, 287

Lagos Traders, The, 501

British Guiana—Emigration, 1990

Canada, Dominion of—Treaty of Washington, 603, 653

Colonies—Crown Lands, 1683

Colonies, The, Res. 926, 929

Liquor Laws in the Colonies, 1690

Mauritius—Indian Labourers in the, 1684

Polynesian Islanders, 788

Spain—"Lark," Seizure and Detention of the, 606

Supply—Salaries and Allowances of Governors,
&c. 1899, 1902

Treaty of Washington, 1858

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 46

KNIGHTLEY, Sir R., Northamptonshire, S.
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
Schedule 1, Amendt. 557

KNOX, Hon. Colonel W. Stuart, *Dungannon

Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 1510

Ireland—Intoxication by Ether, 1024

Galway Election Petition, 1861, 1862

Parliament — Galway Election — Mr. Justice
Keogh, Judgment of, 841

LAIRD, Mr. J., Birkenhead

Africa, Western—Bank of West Africa, 500

Lagos Traders, The, 501

Navy Estimates — Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 763

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870" (Viscount Lifford) June 3, 1000; after debate, on Question? Cont. 53, Not-Cont. 29; M. 24

Division List, Cont. and Not-Cont., 1021

Committee nominated; List of the Committee
June 6, 1268

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Amendment (No. 2) Bill

(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Committee*; Report May 2 (No. 1)

[cont.

Land Returns — The "New Domesday Book"

Question, Mr. Wren-Hoskyns; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld June 13, 1884

LANSDOWNE, Marquess of (Lord of the Treasury)

Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 986, 988
Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps, 1327;
Address for a Commission, 1909, 1933

LAUDERDALE, Earl of

Naval College, Portsmouth, Removal of, 173, 174, 180

Navy—Steam and Coal, Motion for a Paper, 997, 999

Law Officers of the Crown

Observations, Mr. Fawcett; Reply, The Attorney General; debate thereon May 3, 247

Law Reform—The Judicature Commission

Question, Mr. Watkin Williams; Answer, The Attorney General May 30, 835

LAWRENCE, Alderman Sir J. C., Lambeth

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 13, 1560; Consid. add. cl. 1904

Supply—Works and Public Buildings, 1543

LAWRENCE, Mr. Alderman W., London

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 12, Amendt. 1556, 1559; cl. 13, 1560; Consid. add. cl. 1903

Supply—Woods, Forests, &c. 1539, 1541

LAWSON, Sir W., Carlisle

Criminal Law — Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 959

Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1256

Liquor Laws in the Colonies, 1690

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1225

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 871

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 448, 463, 495

LEATHAM, Mr. E. A., Huddersfield

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.

Schedule 2, 138; Consid. Schedule 1, 561, 673, 678; 3R. 852

LEEMAN, Mr. G., York

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1260

Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 777

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1962

Supply—Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions, 1534, 1535

LEFEVRE, Mr. J. G. Shaw (Secretary to the Board of Admiralty), Reading

Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 758, 767

Medical Establishments, 772

Military Pensions and Allowances, 773, 775

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G., Chichester
Navy—"Megara" Commission, Report of, 1514

Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 751

Half Pay—Navy and Marines, 773

Victualling Yards, 770

LEWIS, Mr. Harvey, Marylebone

Metropolitan Police—Southampton, Strike of Seamen at, 653

LEWIS, Mr. J. D., Devonport

Tichborne v. Lushington—Prosecution, &c. 1271

LICHFIELD, Bishop of

Pacific Islanders Protection, 2R. 188

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.

Army—India—Horse Artillery, 1419

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1975

France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1771

Mines Regulation, 911

Navy—Channel Squadron, 1990

Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 766

Military Pensions and Allowances, 774

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1233

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 113

Supply—Privy Council, 977, 982

LIFFORD, Viscount

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1000, 1008

Limited Owners Improvements Bill [H.L.]
(Marquess of Salisbury)

l. Presented; read 1st * June 14 (No. 154)

Limited Owners Residence Law Amendment Bill

(Sir Hervey Bruce, Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Sir Frederick Heygate, Mr. MacEvoy)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 165]
Read 2^o * June 3

LINDSAY, Hon. Colonel C. H., Abingdon

Army—Volunteers—Capitation Grant, 829

LINDSAY, Colonel R. J. Loyd, Berkshire

Army—Fermoy Barracks, 503

Liquor Laws in the Colonies

Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen June 13, 1690

Local Government—Digest of Sanitary Laws

Question, Sir Massey Lopes; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld June 13, 1888

Local Government Supplemental Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Stansfeld)

- c. Read 2^o * May 2 [Bill 133]
Committee * ; Report May 6
Read 3^o * May 9
l. Read 1^a * (Earl of Morley) May 10 (No. 103)
Read 2^a * June 7
Committee * ; Report June 10
Read 3^a * June 11
Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. xlv.]

Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) and Act (No. 2, 1864) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Stansfeld)

- c. Ordered ; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 163]
Read 2^o * May 27
Committee * ; Report June 3
Read 3^o * June 6
l. Read 1^a * (Earl of Morley) June 7 (No. 130)
Read 2^a * June 18
Referred to Select Comm. * June 20

Local Legislation (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Heron, Mr. Pim, Mr. Bagwell)

- c. 2R. adjourned June 4 [Bill 27]

Local Taxation

Question, Colonel Barttelot ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 6, 1279
The Resolution, Question, Sir Massey Lopes ;
Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 6, 1273

LOCKE, Mr. J., Southwark

Law Officers of the Crown, 265
Oxfordshire Magistrates—Norris, Mr., Case of, 1349
Parliament—Derby Day, 792

Locomotives on Roads Bill

(Mr. Cawley, Mr. Hick, Mr. Pender)

- c. Ordered ; read 1^o * May 31 [Bill 180]

LONDON, Bishop of

Baptismal Fees, 2R. 1664

LOPES, Mr. H. C., Launceston

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1974
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. add. cl. 1560
Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 2R. Amendt. 1980
Juries, 2R. 703
Local Government—Digest of Sanitary Laws, 1688, 1689
Local Taxation, 1273
Mine Dues, 2R. 1661

LOWE, Right Hon. R., see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

LOWTHER, Mr. J., York City

Army—Militia Camp, Appleby, 1849
Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1256
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 68, 2004, 2007
Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. Amendt. 775

LOWTHER, Mr. J.—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1232
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 667 ; Amendt. 671
Treaty of Washington, 1739

LUBBOCK, Sir J., Maidstone

Court of Chancery (Funds), Consid. 1723
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 71, Amendt. 2013, 2016

LURGAN, Lord

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, Motion for a Committee, 1011

LUSH, Dr. J. A., Salisbury

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 134
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1889

LUSK, Mr. Alderman A., Finsbury Bo.

Navy Estimates—Coastguard, &c. 719, 720
Supply—Charity Commission, 1531
Civil Service Commission, 1533
Comptroller and Auditor General of the Exchequer, 1535
Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions, 1535
County Courts, 1880
Court of Chancery, 1872
Criminal Proceedings (Scotland), 1896
Metropolitan Police, 1881
Patent Law Amendment Act, 1536
Privy Council, 978, 982, 1521
Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office (Scotland), Amendt. 1548

LYTTELTON, Lord

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 20, 583
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 2, 1817 ; cl. 6, 1830

LYVEDEN, Lord

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1474

MCARTHUR, Mr. W., Lambeth

Council of India—Indian Presidencies, Drafts on, 505
Pensions Commutation Act—March, Lieutenant, Case of, 283
South Africa, Res. 815

MC COMBIE, Mr. W., Aberdeenshire, W.

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1290, 1292

MACFIE, Mr. R. A., Leith, &c.

Colonies—Crown Lands, 1682
Colonies, The, Res. 912
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 6, 1556 ; Consid. cl. 4, Amendt. 1904
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1071 ; cl. 5, 1287 ; cl. 8, 1292 ; cl. 51, 1621 ; cl. 52, 1711 ; cl. 65, 1947
France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1798

[cont.

[cont.

MACFIE, Mr. R. A.—cont.

Supply—Emigration Board, 1902
 Patent Law Amendment Act, 1536
 Privy Council, 1517
 Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office (Scotland), 1550
 Stationery, &c. 1539

McLAGAN, Mr. P., Linlithgowshire

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. add. cl. 1560
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1068; cl. 2, 1196; cl. 5, 1287; cl. 40, 1360; cl. 50, 1375; cl. 52, 1710; Amendt. 1711; cl. 57, Amendt. 1713; cl. 58, Amendt. 1714
 France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1792

McLAREN, Mr. D., Edinburgh

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 6, 1556
 Education (Scotland), Comm. 308; cl. 1, 1058, 1064, 1065; cl. 2, 1196; cl. 4, 1202; cl. 5, 1288; cl. 8, 1291, 1296; Amendt. 1298, 1299, 1301; cl. 20, Amendt. 1352, 1353; cl. 41, 1360; cl. 43, 1363, 1364, 1365; cl. 50, 1375; cl. 51, 1617; cl. 52, 1628, 1701; Amendt. 1709, 1710, 1711; cl. 59, Amendt. 1717, 1721; cl. 64, 1744, 1748, 1754; cl. 65, 1759; Amendt. 1941; cl. 66, 2000; cl. 67, Amendt. 2001; Amendt. 2003; cl. 68, 2009, 2011; cl. 71, 2014, 2019; cl. 77, Amendt. 2023; add. cl. 2028
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 135; Consid. Schedule 1, 678.
 Polling Places (Scotland), Motion for Returns, 972
 Poor Law (Scotland) Inspectors, 649, 1028
 Supply—Privy Council, 979
 Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office (Scotland), 1549

McMAHON, Mr. P., New Ross

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1644
 Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. 1250
 Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 2R. 1656
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 124; Consid. Schedule 1, 679
 Poor Law (Ireland)—Union Rating, 837
 Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1968
 Supply—Criminal Proceedings, Scotland, 1895

MAGNIAC, Mr. C., St. Ives

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, 696
 Mine Dues, 2R. 1798
 Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1959, 1960

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Cork City

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1645
 Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 944
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 679; 3R. Amendt. 843, 846, 856, 857, 870
 Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1969
 Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 168
 *Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 38

MAHON, Viscount, Suffolk, E.

Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1605

MALMESBURY, Earl of

Christchurch Annual Fairs Abolition; 1730
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. add. cl. 1837
 Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, 1109, 1155, 1156, 1189, 1725

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R., Leicestershire, N.

Education (Scotland), Comm. 351; cl. 1, 1083; cl. 2, 1197; cl. 24, 1354, 1355
 Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 358
 Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 779
 Parliament—Sittings of the House, 1048
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1224, 1228
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 115; Consid. cl. 16, 536; cl. 17, 539; Schedule 1, 668
 Supply—Civil Services, 1052
 Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1608
 Wellington Monument, Motion for Papers, 203

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of

Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 170
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. cl. 6, 1829, 1830; add. cl. 1839
 Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1581

MARTIN, Mr. P. Wykeham, Rochester

Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 731
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. 516; Schedule 1, 674

Master and Servant (Wages) Bill

(Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce)

c. Report * May 6 [Bills 65-149]
 Question, Mr. Pell; Answer, Mr. Bruce
 June 11, 1588

Masters and Workmen (Arbitration) Bill

(Mr. Mundella, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Morley, Mr. Thomas Brassey, Mr. Thomas Hughes)

c. Read 2^o * June 12 [Bill 123]

MATTHEWS, Mr. H., Dungarvan

Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. Amendt. 1241, 1253

MAXWELL, Mr. W. H., Kirkcudbrightshire

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1290

MELLOR, Mr. T. W., Ashton-under-Lyne

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 134
 Tiebborne v. Lushington—Prosecution, &c. 102

MELLY, Mr. G., Stoke-upon-Trent

Criminal Law — Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 816
 Education — Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 941
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 66, 1998
 Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 466

Metalliferous Mines Regulation Bill

(Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Winterbotham)

c. Committee *; Report May 6 [Bills 30-151]

METROPOLIS

Chelsea Toll Bridge, Question, Mr. Peek; Answer, Mr. Ayrton June 13, 1886

Royal Mint—Silver Coinage, Question, Mr. Barnett; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 10, 604

South Kensington Museum—Natural History Collections, Question, Mr. Spencer Walpole; Answer, Mr. Ayrton June 13, 1890

Storage of Petroleum, Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Dr. Brewer June 20, 1991

Sunday Observance — The Sheepshanks Gallery, Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 99

Water Supply, Question, Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue May 6, 278—Victoria Park, Question, Mr. Holms; Answer, Mr. Ayrton June 17, 1852

Metropolis—Queen Square, Westminster, and Birdcage Walk

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it would conduce to the convenience of the public if a carriage communication were opened between Queen Square, Westminster, and the Birdcage Walk" (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) June 4, 1238; after short debate, Question put; A. 43, N. 55; M. 12

Questions, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Neville-Grenville; Answers, Mr. Ayrton June 6, 1277

Metropolis—Queen Square, Westminster, and St. James's Street

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it would conduce to the convenience of the public if a carriage communication were opened between Queen Square, Westminster, Birdcage Walk, and St. James's Street" (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) May 28, 815; [House counted out]

Metropolis (Kilburn and Harrow) Roads Bill

(Lord Hylton)

l. Read 2^a * May 10 (No. 94)
 Report * May 13
 Committee *; Report May 31
 Read 3^a * June 3
 Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. xlix.]

Metropolitan Commons Supplemental Bill

(Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 2 [Bill 143]
 Read 2^o * May 6
 Committee *; Report May 9
 Considered *; read 3^o May 13

Metropolitan Commons Supplemental Bill—cont.

l. Read 1^a * (Earl of Morley) May 31 (No. 115)
 Read 2^a * June 10
 Committee *; Report June 11
 Read 3^a * June 13
 Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. xliii.]

MIALL, Mr. E., Bradford

Act of Uniformity Amendment, Preamble, 897

Middlesex Registration Amendment Bill

[H.L.] (Lord Truro)

l. Bill withdrawn * June 10 (No. 86)

Middlesex Registration of Deeds Bill

(Mr. Gregory, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Goldney)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" June 5, 1259

After short debate, Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Denman); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after further short debate, Amendt. and Motion withdrawn; Bill withdrawn [Bill 52]

MILLER, Mr. J., Edinburgh City

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1290; Amendt. 1297; cl. 20, 1353; cl. 39, 1359; cl. 43, 1365; cl. 66, 1997

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 16, 635

Mine Dues Bill (Mr. Lopes, Mr. Gregory)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 30 [Bill 177]
 Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" June 12, 1661; debate adjourned Debate resumed June 14, 1798; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

Mines Regulation Bill

(Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Winterbotham)

c. Committee *; Report May 6 [Bills 29-150]
 Questions, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Assheton Cross; Answers, Mr. Gladstone May 31, 911

Monastic and Conventual Institutions Commission Bill

(Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Holt, Sir Thomas Chambers)

c. Rights of Private Members—Moved, "That the Order for reading the Bill a second time To-morrow be postponed till Tuesday next, at Two of the clock" (Mr. Newdegate) June 20, 2030; Question put; A. 3, N. 13; M. 10 [Bill 129]

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester City

Act of Uniformity Amendment, Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 888; cl. 6, Amendt. 889, 896
 Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation, 2R. 1554

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, 696
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1298

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1231, 1948

[cont.]

[cont.]

MONK, Mr. C. J.—cont.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 16, 534; Consid. Schedule, 1, 676; 3R. 849

Rome—Papal Court, Diplomatic Representation at the, 1028

Supply—Privy Council, 982, 1522

MONSELL, Right Hon. W. (Postmaster General), Limerick Co.

Bank Holidays Act—Savings' Banks Clerks, 601

Post Office—Questions, &c.

Irish Mails—Milford, 1685

Irish Postmasters, 193

Mails to South of Ireland, 882

Postmaster at this House, 708

Telegraphs—Sunday Labour, 707

MONTAGU, Right Hon. Lord R., Huntingdonshire

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1681

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1224, 1225, 1236, 1237

MONTGOMERY, Sir G. G., Peeblesshire

Education (Scotland), Comm. 316; cl. 1, 1066; cl. 5, 1287; cl. 8, 1291; cl. 50, 1375; cl. 51, 1619; cl. 65, 1759; cl. 68, 2007

MORGAN, Mr. C. O. S., Monmouthshire

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 827

MORGAN, Mr. G. Osborne, Denbighshire

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 819, 823

Burial Grounds, 2R. 1420

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 691; cl. 18, 692; cl. 21, 696

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1233

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 556, 561

Sites for Places of Worship and Schools, Consid. Amendt. 1420

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 55

MORLEY, Earl of

Christ Church Annual Fairs Abolition, 1730

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Motion for Papers, 1727

Dangerous Exhibitions—Women and Children, 1734

MORRISON, Mr. W., Plymouth

Wellington Monument, Motion for Papers, 198

MUNDELLA, Mr. A. J., Sheffield

Customs and Inland Revenue, Consid. cl. 4, 1904

France—Political Prisoners, Deportation of, 783

Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1652

Municipal Corporation Acts Amendment Bill (Mr. Dixon, Mr. Alderman

Carter, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Stevenson)

c. Bill withdrawn * June 17 [Bill 24]

Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds)

Bill (Mr. Leeman, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Goldney, Mr. Candlish, Mr. Dodds)

c. Report of Select Comm. * May 1 (No. 177)
Report * May 1 [Bills 55-138]

Municipal Corporations (Election of Aldermen)

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the present mode of electing Aldermen in Municipal Boroughs by the vote of the Town Council is unsatisfactory, and fails to secure a fair representation in each Borough on the Aldermanic Bench" (Mr. Heygate) May 7, 400; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment Bill (Mr. Sherlock, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. McClure)

c. Bill withdrawn, after short debate June 12, 1655 [Bill 79]

Municipal Corporations (Wards) Bill

(Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Secretary Bruce)

c. Adjourned Debate [22nd April] resumed May 27, 775

Amendt. to leave out "now" and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. James Lowther) v.; after short debate; Question put, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 78, N. 38; M. 40; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill considered [Bill 102]

Municipal Officers Superannuation Bill

(Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Birley, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Morley, Mr. Graves)

c. Committee *; Report May 8 [Bills 64-154]

MUNTZ, Mr. P. H., Birmingham

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 970, 971

Inland Revenue—Shootings, Income Tax on, 652

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 132, 134; Consid. 513; Schedule 1, 551

Supply—Court of Chancery, 1876

Criminal Proceedings (Scotland), Amendt. 1896

Privy Council, 978

Naturalization Bill [H.L.]

(Mr. Winterbotham)

c. Read 1^o * May 2 [Bill 145]
Read 2^o * May 6

NAVY

Captains of Marines, Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Goschen June 13, 1691

Channel Squadron, Question, Sir Hervey Bruce; Answer, Mr. Goschen May 2, 102; Question, Mr. Liddell; Answer, Mr. Goschen June 20, 1890

[cont.]

NAVY—cont.

Chatham Dockyard—Railway Connection, Question, Mr. Holms; Answer, Mr. Goschen May 28, 781

Greenwich Pensions—Merchant Seamen, Question, Lord Claud John Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Goschen May 23, 707

Removal of Naval College, Portsmouth, Question, Observations, The Earl of Lauderdale; Reply, The Earl of Camperdown; debate thereon May 3, 173

The "Megæra" Commissioners Report, Question, Mr. Kavanagh; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox June 10, 1514

The "Thalia" Storeship, Question, Mr. A. Guest; Answer, Mr. Goschen June 17, 1857

Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether the present Steering and Sailing Rules cannot be modified so as to reduce the present risk to life and property at sea" (Sir John Hay) May 7, 377; after short debate, Question put, and negatived; Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue May 30, 836

Navy—Steam and Coal—Admiralty Orders

Return respecting (laid before the House on the 7th of May last): To be printed (No. 120)

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, Copy of the revised Orders from the Admiralty to admirals and captains of Her Majesty's ships relative to the use of steam and the consumption of coal" (The Earl of Lauderdale) June 3, 997; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Navy—System of Navigation

Amendt. on Committee of Supply June 7, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the maintenance of a separate and distinct branch of officers for navigating duties is no longer desirable in the interests of the Naval Service" (Mr. Hanbury-Tracy) v. 1375; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn

NELSON, Earl

Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, 171, 172

NEVILLE-GRENVILLE, Mr. R., Somersetshire, Mid.

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. add. cl. 1560

Metropolis—Queen's Square, Westminster, and Birdcage Walk, 1278

Supply—County and Borough Police (Great Britain), 1883

County Courts, 1878

Miscellaneous Legal Charges, Amendt. 1894

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Act of Uniformity Amendment, 3R. 1091

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 820

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 803

Criminal Law—Murphy, Mr., Assault on the late, 285

Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven Rioters, Res. 962

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N.—cont.

Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 445

Education (Scotland), Comm. 849; cl. 1, 1083; cl. 4, 1216; cl. 19, 1324; add. cl. 2027, 2028, 2029

Irish Church Act Amendment, 3R. Amendt. 608

Juries, 2R. 703

Law Officers of the Crown, 265

Monastic and Conventual Institutions Commission, 2050

Parliament—Counts out, 1949, 1950, 1992

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1237

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 118; Consid. 526; * 3R. 849, 852

Religious Disabilities Abolition, 288

Sites for Places of Worship and Schools, Consid. Amendt. 1421

Treaty of Washington—Statement, Motion for Adjournment, 1596

New Peers—Sat First—See title Parliament

New Writs Issued—See title Parliament

New Members Sworn—See title Parliament

NORTH, Lieut-Colonel J. S., Oxfordshire Army—India—Horse Artillery, 1416

Eyre, Mr.—Legal Expenses, Payment of, 707

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H., Devonshire, N.

Criminal Law—Case of John Richard Dymond, 1855

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 65, 1939

India—Educational Services—Retiring Pensions, 602

Talifoo, Mission from, 1859

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 234

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 873

Treaty of Washington, 709, 710

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingston-upon-Hull

Army—Volunteers, 1994

France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, Res. 1774

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 2R. 1982

Suez Canal—Dues, Increase of, 1687, 1688

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

India—Staff Appointments, 1514

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1233

O'CONOR DON, The, Roscommon Co.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 125

O'CONOR, Mr. D. M., Sligo Co.

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1860, 1861

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 17, Amendt. 537

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tralee

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1987, 1995
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
Schedule 1, 128

OGILVY, Sir J., Dundee

Education (Scotland), Comm. Schedule C,
Amendt. 2030

O'LOGHLEN, Right Hon. Sir C. M.,
*Clare Co.

Army—Scientific Corps, First Captains in, 1994
Criminal Law—Release of the Whitehaven
Rioters, Motion for Papers, 1725
Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1630, 1646
Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1677, 1681
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of the County of, 287; Res. 406, 427, 442
Juries, 2R. 703
Parliament—Public Business, 1509
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
Amendt. 680
Religious Disabilities Abolition, 288
Religious Disqualification for Offices, 280
Supply—Works and Public Buildings, 1541,
1542

ONSLOW, Mr. Guildford, J. H. M. E., *Guildford

Tichborne v. Lushington—Prosecution, &c. 372,
1272

ORANMORE AND BROWNE, Lord

Party Processions (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
367, 368
Prison Ministers, Report, cl. 3, 361; cl. 4,
Amendt. 361, 362; Schedule, 363
Treaty of Washington, 1093;—Statement, 1582;
Motion for an Address, 1584

Ordnance Survey (England)

Moved, "That Her Majesty's Government be urged, in view of the promised Bill for the Transfer of Land, to give their earliest attention to the completion of the Cadastral
Map of England" (Mr. Wren-Hoskyns)
May 7, 390; after short debate, Motion withdrawn
Lincolnshire, Question, Mr. Welby; Answer,
Mr. Ayrton June 13, 1689
The 25-inch Scale, Question, Mr. Welby; Answer, Mr. Ayrton June 20, 1986

O'REILLY, Mr. M. W., Longford Co.

Army—Irish Militia, 505
Criminal Law—Case of David Farrell, 1854
Ireland—Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 1512
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
cl. 17, 538
Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R.
155

O'REILLY-DEASE, Mr. M., Louth

Criminal Law, Release of the Whitehaven
Rioters, Res. 955
Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions,
Notice, 944

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Waterford City

Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation,
2R. 1553, 1554
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. 1554,
1555
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 432
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
518
Treaty of Washington, 842, 843; Motion for Adjournment, 1040;—Statement, 1590, 1592, 1599, 1985

OTWAY, Mr. A. J., Chatham

France—Political Prisoners, Deportation of,
829, 831, 1995
Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 734
Supply—Office of Lord Privy Seal, 1526
Works and Public Buildings, 1542, 1543
Treaty of Washington, 607, 1044; Res. 1281,
1696, 1699

Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Supplemental (No. 2) Bill (Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

a. Ordered; read 1^o * May 27 [Bill 172]
Read 2^o * May 30
Order for Committee discharged; Bill committed to a Select Committee June 4
Report *; Re-comm. June 13
Committee * (on re-comm.); Report; read 3^o
June 14
l. Read 1^o * (Earl Cowper) June 17 (No. 156)

Pacific Islanders Protection Bill

(Earl of Kimberley)

l. Bill read 2^a, after short debate May 3, 184
Murder of Bishop Patteson, Explanation, The Earl of Kimberley May 6, 267
Committee, after short debate May 7, 368
Report * May 10 (No. 100)
Read 3^a * May 13
Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 19]

PAGET, Major R. H., Somersetshire, Mid.

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1968

PAKINGTON, Right Hon. Sir J. S., *Droitwich

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 801
Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial
Schools, Res. 621
Education (Scotland), Comm. 311
Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 761, 765
Spain—"Lark," Seizure and Detention of the, 606

PALK, Sir L., Devonshire, E.

Education—Endowed Schools Commission,
193
Supply—Civil Services, 1052

PALMER, Mr. J. Hinde, Lincoln City

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 688; cl. 18, 692
Railways—Communication with Guards, 1687
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1251
Supply—Court of Chancery, 1872
Miscellaneous Legal Charges, 1895
Patent Law Amendment Act, 1836

Parish Constables Abolition Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Stansfeld)

c. Read 2^o • May 13

[Bill 97]

PARKER, Lieut. Colonel W., Suffolk, W.

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 801

Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 445

PARKER, Mr. C. S., Perthshire

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 4, 1215; cl. 59, 1716; cl. 65, 1940; cl. 68, 2010; cl. 73, 2021

Parliament

LORDS—

Privilege—Treaty of Washington—Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)—The Indirect Claims, Question, Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Reply, Earl Granville; short debate thereon June 4, 1093

Whitsuntide Recess, Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville May 3, 191—Adjournment of the House, Observations, Earl Granville; Reply, Earl Russell May 13, 648

COMMONS—

Controverted Elections, Mr. Speaker informed the House, that he had received from Chief Justice Monahan, one of the Judges selected, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the trial of Elections Petitions, Reports relating to the Election for the County of Kerry May 7

Business of the House

Act of Uniformity Amendment Bill, Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Mr. Bouverie June 3, 1030

Public Business

Question, Sir Colman O'Loughlen; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 10, 1509

Corrupt Practices Bill, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 3, 1027

Order and Practice—Counts Out, Observations, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Speaker June 19, 1949; Question, Observations, Mr. Newdegate; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 20, 1992

Post Office—Postmaster at this House, Question, Mr. G. Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 27, 708

Public Health Bill, Question, Sir Charles Adderley; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 30, 838; June 3, 1027

Report of Select Committee, Question, Mr. Raikes; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 6, 1278

Whitsuntide Recess, Question, Colonel Bartelot; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 2, 106; May 7, 376

Parliament—Ascension Day—Committees

Moved, "That no Committees have leave to sit To-morrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock" (Mr. Glyn) May 8, 447; after short debate, Question put, A. 47, N. 52; M. 5

VOL. CCXI. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

Parliament—Ascension Day—Committees—cont.

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Boresford Hope) May 9, 505; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Parliament—Business of the House

Moved, "That during those Sittings of the House which are limited as to time, no Motion for the Adjournment of any Debate be put from the Chair within half an hour of the time fixed for the conclusion of Opposed Business" (Mr. Raikes) June 4, 1222; after short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck); after further debate, Question put; A. 90, N. 63; M. 27; Debate adjourned till Tuesday 18th June

Parliament—Business of the House—Consolidation Statutes

Moved, "That whenever a Bill for the consolidation of existing Statutes, and containing only Clauses of Acts in force, be on its passage through the House, no Amendment shall be moved at any of its stages except in Committee; and the only Amendments which may then be moved shall be to insert other Clauses of any Acts in force on the same subject, and verbal Amendments rendered necessary by the amalgamation of the Clauses of different Acts" (Lord Robert Montagu) June 4, 1236; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Parliament—Business of the House—(Lords' Bills)

Moved, "That when any Bill shall be brought from the House of Lords the Questions 'That this Bill be now read a first time,' and 'That this Bill be printed,' shall be put by Mr. Speaker as soon as conveniently may be, and shall be decided without Amendment or Debate, and when any such Bill shall have remained upon the Table for twelve sitting days without any honourable Member proposing a day for the Second Reading thereof, such Bill shall not be proceeded with in the same Session" (Mr. Monk) June 18, 1948
[House counted out]

Parliament—Counts of the House

Moved, "That every Member taking notice that 40 Members are not present shall do so from his place" (Mr. Bowring) June 11, 1629
[House counted out]

Parliament—Private Legislation

Moved, "That the existing system of passing Local Bills on the same subjects as Public General Acts is inconvenient, works injustice between different towns, and leads to unnecessary complication in the Laws affecting Local Government" (Mr. Francis Sharp Powell) June 13, 1666; Moved, "That the Debate be adjourned" (Mr. Dent); Motion agreed to; Debate adjourned
The Resolutions, Question, Mr. Dodson; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue June 17, 1853

Parliament—Sittings of the House

Moved, "That, whenever the House shall meet at Two o'clock, the sitting of the House shall be held subject to the Resolutions of the House of the 30th day of April 1869" (Mr. Gladstone) June 3, 1868; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Parliament—The Derby Day

Moved, "That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Thursday next" (Mr. Gladstone) May 28, 1869; after short debate, Question put; A. 212, N. 58; M. 154

HOUSE OF LORDS

Sat First

June 4—The Marquess of Ailsa, after the death of his Father

June 13—The Duke of Bedford, after the death of his Uncle
The Earl of Aberdeen, after the death of his Brother

HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Writs Issued

May 27—For Mallow, v. George Waters, esquire, Chairman of the Quarter Sessions of the County of Waterford

May 28—For Oldham, v. John Platt, esquire, deceased

June 12—For Bedford County, v. Francis Charles Hastings Russell, esquire, now Duke of Bedford

The Galway Election

Moved, That the Clerk of the Crown do attend this House To-morrow, at Two of the clock, with the last Return for the County of Galway, and amend the same, by rasing out the name of John Philip Nolan, esquire, and inserting the name of Captain the Honourable William le Poer Trench, instead thereof (Mr. Gladstone) June 13, 1867; after short debate, Motion agreed to

The Clerk of the Crown attending according to order, amended the Return for the County of Galway June 14

New Members Sworn

June 6—John Morgan Cobbett, esquire, Oldham

June 14—William Felix Munster, esquire, Mallow

June 17—Hon. William le Poer Trench, Galway County

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections)
Bill [Bill 21] and*Corrupt Practices Bill* [Bill 22]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Marquess of Hartington)

c. Committee May 2, 1867

First Schedule

Amendments made

Remaining Schedules and Preamble agreed to Report

Considered May 9, 1867

Considered May 13, 1865

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections Bill and Corrupt Practices Bill—cont.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o" May 30, 1863

Amendt. to leave out from "Bill be," and add "re-committed, in respect of Schedule I., Rule 26" (Mr. Maguire) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 279, N. 61; M. 218; Bill read 3^o

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 885

l. Read 1^a (Lord President) May 31 (No. 117)

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a" June 10, 1861

Amendt. to leave out ("now,") and insert ("this day six months") (Earl Grey); after long debate, on Question, That ("now,") &c.? Cont. 86, Not-Cont. 56; M. 30; resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 2^a

Division List, Cont. and Not-Cont. 1504

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee" (Lord President) June 17, 1860

Amendt. to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months") (Lord Denman); after short debate, on Question, That ("now,") &c.; resolved in the affirmative; Committee

Clause 1 (Nomination of candidates for Parliamentary Elections), 1861

Clause 2 (Poll at Election), 1862

Division Lists, Cont. and Not-Cont. 1810, 1822

Offences at Elections

Clause 3 (Offences in respect of nomination papers, ballot papers, and ballot boxes), 1824

Clause 4 (Infringement of secrecy), 1825

Amendment of Law

Clause 5 (Division of boroughs and counties into polling districts), 1827

Clause 6 (Use of school and public room for poll), 1829

Clauses 7 to 11, inclusive, agreed to

Miscellaneous

Clauses 12 to 15, inclusive, agreed to

Application of Part of Act to Scotland

Clause 16 (Alterations for application of Part I. to Scotland), 1843

Clauses 17 to 32, inclusive, agreed to

Clause 33 (Short title), 1843

FIRST SCHEDULE (Rules for Parliamentary Elections), 1845

SECOND, THIRD, FOURTH, FIFTH, SIXTH SCHEDULES agreed to, 1847

Party Processions (Ireland) Act Repeal Bill (Earl of Dufferin)

l. Bill read 2^a, after short debate May 7, 1863

Committee*; Report May 10

Read 3^a* May 13

Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 22]

PATTEN, Right Hon. Colonel J. W., Lancashire, N.

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 806

Education (Scotland), Comm. add. cl. 2026

Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 777

[cont.]

[cont.]

PATTEN, Right Hon. Colonel J. W.—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1230, 1233, 1237

Supply—Court of Chancery, 1875

Criminal Prosecutions, 1868

Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 158, 167

Pawnbrokers Bill

(Mr. Whitwell, Mr. Charles Mills, Mr. Morley, Mr. Plimsoll)

c. Considered in Committee; Bill ordered; read 1^o * May 27 [Bill 173]

Read 2^o *, and referred to a Select Committee June 6

Committee nominated; List of the Committee June 17, 1905

PEEK, Mr. H. W., Surrey, Mid.
Metropolis—Chelsea Toll Bridge, 1886

PEEL, Right Hon. Sir R., Tamworth
Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1861

PELL, Mr. A., Leicestershire, S.
Agricultural Children, 2R. 1661
Master and Servant (Wages), 1588
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1967
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1250

PEMBERTON, Mr. E. L., Kent, E.
Poor Law—Lunatics, Borough Pauper, 500

Pensions Bill

(Marquess of Lansdowne)

l. Read 2^a * May 6 (No. 93)
Committee *; Report May 7
Read 3^a * May 10
Royal Assent May 13 [35 Vict. c. 12]

Pensions Commutation Act—Case of Lieutenant March

Question, Mr. M'Arthur; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 6, 283

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill

(Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Lord Claud Hamilton, Sir Thomas Bazley, Mr. Downing, Sir John Hanmer, Mr. Miller, Mr. Dalway)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" May 8, 448 [Bill 3] Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Wheelhouse); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after long debate, Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned" (Sir Frederick Heygate); Question put; A. 15, N. 369; M. 354; debate adjourned

Persia—Foreign Jurisdiction Act

Question, Mr. Eastwick; Answer, Viscount Enfield June 6, 1279

PETERBOROUGH, Bishop of Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 84, 97;
Comm. cl. 6, 574; cl. 10, Amendt. 576; Report, cl. 4, 1336, 1337

Petroleum Bill [H.L.]

(Earl of Morley)

l. Presented; read 1^a * May 10 (No. 104)
Read 2^a *, and referred to a Select Committee May 31
Committee nominated; List of the Committee June 7, 1348

PHILIPS, Mr. R. N., Bury (Lancashire)
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 884

Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Considered in Committee; Bill ordered; read 1^o * May 2 [Bill 142]

Read 2^o * May 6

Committee *; Report May 27

Committee * (on re-comm.); Report; Considered; read 3^o May 30

l. Read 1^a * (Earl Cowper) May 31 (No. 116)

Read 2^a * June 10

Committee * June 17

Report * June 18

Read 3^a * June 20

Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. lxxviii]

Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Considered in Committee; Bill ordered; read 1^o * May 9 [Bill 158]

Read 2^o * May 13

Order for Committee discharged; Bill committed to a Select Committee * May 27

Report *; Re-comm. June 5 [Bill 187]

Committee * (on re-comm.); Report June 6

Considered *; read 3^o June 7

l. Read 1^a * (Earl Cowper) June 10 (No. 134)

Read 2^a * June 18

Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Considered in Committee; Bill ordered; read 1^o * May 27 [Bill 171]

Read 2^o *, and referred to a Select Committee June 17

PIM, Mr. J., Dublin City

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1643

Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 943

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1306

Ireland—Customs Clerks at Dublin, 1270

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 2R. 1656

Parochial Registers (Ireland), 1270

PIM, Mr. J.—cont.

Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1892

Public Record Office, 1538

Stationery, &c. 1539

Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 158

PLAYFAIR, Dr. Lyon, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 1, 1077; cl. 19, 1309; cl. 43, 1363; Amendt. 1365, 1366; Amendt. 1367; cl. 50, Amendt. 1371; cl. 52, Amendt. 1621, 1629, 1710; cl. 56, 1713; cl. 59, Amendt. 1714, 1715; cl. 64, 1754; cl. 65, 1758; Amendt. 1934, 1992; cl. 66, 1998; cl. 70, Amendt. 2011, 2012; cl. 71, 2014, 2016; add. cl. 2028

PLIMSOLL, Mr. S., Derby Bo.

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 474

Police, Metropolitan

Case of Constable George Carter, Question, Mr. Straight; Answer, Mr. Bruce May 30, 840

Cruelty to Animals—The 12th and 13th Vict., Question, Sir Henry Hoare; Answer, Mr. Bruce June 6, 1271

Strike of Seamen at Southampton, Question, Mr. Harvey Lewis; Answer, Mr. Bruce May 13, 653

Superannuation, Question, Mr. Eykyn; Answer, Mr. Bruce June 17, 1852

Polling Places (Scotland)—See title Scotland—Polling Places

Polynesian Islanders

Question, Mr. Eastwick; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen May 28, 788

POOR LAW

Borough Pauper Lunatics, Question, Mr. Pemberton; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld May 9, 500

Case of Mr. Goding, Question, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Answer, Mr. Hibbert June 14, 1742

Union Rating (Ireland), Question, Mr. M'Mahon; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington May 30, 887

Scotland—Female Inspectors, Question, Mr. M'Laren; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 13, 649; June 3, 1028

Poor Law (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. Craufurd, Sir Robert Anstruther, Mr. Miller)

c. Committee *; Report May 31 [Bills 85-179]

PORTMAN, Lord

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 4, 570; cl. 6, Amendt. 572; cl. 25, 589

POST OFFICE

Irish Mails, Milford, Question, Mr. Gilpin; Answer, Mr. Monsell June 13, 1684

Irish Postmasters, Question, Mr. G. Browne; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 3, 193

Mails to the South of Ireland, Question, Mr. Delahunty; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 30, 881

Savings Banks' Clerks—Bank Holidays Act, Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 10, 601

Sunday Labour, Question, Dr. Brewer; Answer, Mr. Monsell May 27, 707

The Telegraph Clerks, Question, Mr. Synan; Answer, Mr. Baxter June 17, 1857

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Yorkshire, W. R., N. Division

Burials, 2R. [209] 372

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. add. cl. [211] 1560

Education (Scotland), 2R. [209] 1556; Comm. [211] 329; cl. 8, 1302; cl. 24, 1355; cl. 35, 1356; cl. 39, 1359; cl. 42, 1361; cl. 46, 1748; cl. 68, 2005; Amendt. 2008, 2009; cl. 71, 2019

Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, Leave, [210] 1722

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 2R. [211] 1260

Parliament—Private Legislation, Res. [211] 1666, 1669

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. [209] 1186; cl. 1, 1963; cl. 2, [210] 900, 1107, 1108, 1121; cl. 3, 1223; cl. 5, 1527, 1528; Schedule 1, 1955; Schedule 2, [211] 138, 139

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. [211] 484

Public Health, Leave, [209] 603

Public Health in Rural Places, 2R. [210] 1759

Supply—Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commissions, [211] 1534

Local Government Board, [211] 1537

Patent Law Amendment Act, [211] 1536

Privy Council, [211] 979, 1517

Registrar General of Births, &c. [211] 1535

Turnpike Trusts, Res. [210] 82

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. [210] 633

POWIS, Earl of

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 31, 594

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 1847

Prison Ministers Bill [H.L.]

(Duke of Cleveland)

l. Report May 7, 360 (Nos. 72-91)

Read 3^a * May 10 (No. 99)

c. Read 1^o * (Sir John Trelawny) June 10

[Bill 191]

Prisons (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]

(Marquess of Lansdowne)

l. Presented; read 1^a * May 13 (No. 108)

Read 2^a * June 3

Public Health Bill

Question, Sir Charles Adderley ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 30, 838 ; June 3, 1027
Charges on Public Revenue, Question, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld May 31, 909

Public Health (Scotland) Supplemental Bill (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Adam)

c. Ordered ; read 1^o * May 13 [Bill 162]
 Read 2^o * May 27
 Committee * ; Report May 30
 Read 3^o * May 31
l. Read 1st * (Earl of Morley) June 3 (No. 121)
 Read 2nd * June 10
 Committee * ; Report June 11
 Read 3rd * June 13
 Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. xlv]

Public Parks (Ireland) Bill

l. Royal Assent May 13 [35 Vict. c. 6]

Public Prosecutors Bill

Mr. Spencer Walpole, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Eykyn, Mr. Rathbone
c. Cost of Public Prosecutors, Question, Mr. West ; Answer, Mr. Bruce June 10, 1507
 Committee ; Report June 19, 1950
 [Bills 28-203]

Queen's Bench (Ireland) Procedure Bill
 (Mr. Heron, Mr. Pim)

c. Read 2^o * June 5 [Bill 126]
 Committee * ; Report June 14
 Read 3^o * June 17
l. Read 1st * (Lord O'Hagan) June 18 (No. 159)

RAIKES, Mr. H. C., Chester

Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1254
 Parliament—Report of Select Committee on Public Business, 1278
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1222, 1223
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 116
 Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1252

Railway Rolling Stock (Distraint) Bill
 (Mr. Muntz, Mr. Pim, Mr. Anderson)

c. Read 2^o * June 13 [Bill 116]

Railways

Accident in the Box Tunnel—Supply of Lights, Question, Major Walker ; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue May 6, 278
Communication with Guards—The Cord System, Question, Mr. Hinde Palmer ; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue June 13, 1687

Railways Provisional Certificate Confirmation Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)
c. Ordered ; read 1^o * June 10 [Bill 192]
 Read 2^o * June 13

Railways—Telegraph Block System

Moved, "For Return of Railways in the United Kingdom, showing those which are worked by telegraph block systems" (Lord Buckhurst) May 6, 274 ; Motion agreed to

RATHBONE, Mr. W., Liverpool

France—Treaty of Commerce, Denunciation of the, 1790
 Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1250

Rating—Exemptions of Government Property

Question, Dr. Brewer ; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld May 30, 836

RAVENSWORTH, Lord

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1461

READ, Mr. Clare S., Norfolk, S.

Agricultural Children, 2R. 1657
 Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 798
 Inland Revenue — Income Tax — Tenant Farmers, 1513
 Supply—Privy Council, 1522

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Epping Forest, 2R. 191
 Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. add. cl. 1842
 Treaty of Washington, 270, 909.; Motion for an Address, 1189, 1730, 1733

REDMOND, Mr. W. A., Wexford

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 127
 St. George's Channel—Lighthouse on Tuskar Rocks, 838

REED, Mr. C., Hackney

Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 943
 Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 65, 1941

Reformatory and Industrial Schools (No. 2) Bill (Mr. John Talbot, Viscount Mahon, Mr. Cowper)

c. Read 2^o * May 1 [Bill 134]
 Committee * ; Report May 2
 Considered * ; read 3^o * May 3
l. Read 1st * (Duke of Richmond) May 6
 Read 2nd * May 7 (No. 98)
 Committee * ; Report May 10
 Read 3rd * May 13
 Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 21]

Registrar of Deeds, &c. (Middlesex)

Question, Mr. Cubitt ; Answer, Mr. Bruce June 17, 1848

Registration of Borough Voters Bill

(Mr. Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Whitbread, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Collins, Mr. Henry Robert Brand, Mr. Rathbone)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) June 5, 1241

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. Matthews) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put, and negatived; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Committee put off for three months [Bill 15]

Religious Disabilities Abolition Bill

Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Sir Colman O'Loughlen May 6, 288

Religious Disqualifications for Offices

Question, Sir Colman O'Loughlen; Answer, The Attorney General May 6, 280

Review of Justices' Decisions Bill

(Mr. Hunt, Mr. Staveley Hill)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 10 [Bill 190]

Read 2^o * June 17

Committee *; Report June 18

Read 3^o * June 19

l. Read 1st * (Duke of Richmond) June 20 (No. 164)

RICHARD, Mr. H., Merthyr Tydvil

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 827

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 65, 1948

RICHMOND, Duke of

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 276

Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 987
Guards, The, 1326

Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps, 1329;
Address for a Commission, 1931

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 74, 95;
Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 565, 571; cl. 6,
Amendt. 574; cl. 9, Amendt. 576; cl. 10,
Amendt. 577; cl. 11, Amendt. ib.; cl. 14,
Amendt. 578; cl. 15, Amendt. ib. 579;
cl. 19, 582; cl. 20, 583, 584; cl. 23, Amendt.
585; cl. 25, 589; cl. 31, Amendt. 592; cl. 39,
Amendt. 595; cl. 66, 599; Report, cl. 4, Amendt. 1333, 1337; cl. 23, 1338, 1339;
add. cl. 1348, 1665

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1437, 1474; Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1802,
1809; Amendt. 1812; cl. 4, Amendt. 1825;
cl. 5, Amendt. 1827; cl. 6, 1829; add. cl.
1836, 1840; Schedule 1, Amendt. 1845

Prison Ministers, Report, cl. 3, Amendt. 360, 361; cl. 4, 362; Schedule, Amendt. ib.

Treaty of Washington, 564, 642; Motion for an Address, 1192, 1267

RIPON, Marquess of (Lord President of the Council)

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 277

Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps, Address
for a Commission, 1927

RIPON, Marquess of—cont.

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1421; Comm. 1801; cl. 1, ib., 1802; cl. 2,
1803, 1812; cl. 3, 1825; cl. 4, ib.; cl. 5,
1828; cl. 6, 1830; add. cl. 1831, 1833, 1837;
cl. 33, 1844; Schedule 1, 1846

Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, 1149

RODEN, Mr. W. S., Stoke-on-Trent

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 2R. 1982

Rome—Diplomatic Representaion at the Papal Court

Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Viscount Enfield June 3, 1028

ROMILLY, Lord

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act 1870,
Motion for a Committee, 1010

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
cl. 2, 1809, 1821; cl. 5, 1829

ROSEBURY, Earl of

Extradition of Criminals, Address for Returns,
181

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1465, 1493; Comm. add. cl. 1833

Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, 1165

Royal Parks and Gardens Bill

(Duke of St. Albans)

l. Committee * May 2 (No. 79)

Report * May 6

Read 3rd * May 7

Royal Assent June 27 [35 & 36 Vict. c. 15]

ROYSTON, Right Hon. Viscount, Cambridgeshire

Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1614

Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether the present Steering and Sailing Rules cannot be modified so as to reduce the present risk to life and property at Sea" (Sir John Hay) May 7, 377; after short debate, Question put, and negatived; Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue May 30, 836

RUSSELL, Earl

Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 648

Treaty of Washington, 269, 272, 273, 642, 992,
993; Motion for an Address, 1095, 1111, 1206

Russian War, The—British Graves in the Crimea

Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, Viscount Enfield May 2, 98

RUTLAND, Duke of

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R.
1471

[cont.]

RYLANDS, Mr. P., Warrington

Act of Uniformity Amendment, 3R. Motion for Adjournment, 1085
British Consular Establishments, 602
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, 696
Navy Estimates — Dockyards at Home and Abroad, Amendt. 721, 726, 731, 733, 769
Parliament—Public Business, 1030
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1233
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 121; Consid. cl. 8, 533; Schedule 1, Amendt. 546; Amendt. 557, 667, 677
Supply—Civil Service Commission, 1533
Civil Services, 1051
Court of Chancery, 1873
Metropolitan Police, 1883
Privy Council, Amendt. 977, 983, 1518
Salaries and Allowances of Governors, &c. 1901
Secret Services, Amendt. 1543
Slaves, Bounties on, 1902
Treaty of Washington, 1694

ST. ALBANS, Duke of
Epping Forest, 2R. 189

ST. AUBYN, Mr. J., Cornwall, W.
Mine Dues, 2R. 1661

St. George's Channel—Lighthouse on the Tuskar Rocks

Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue May 30, 838

SALISBURY, Marquess of

Appellate Jurisdiction, Nomination of Committee, 276
Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, 171
Epping Forest, 2R. 190, 191
Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 89; Comm. cl. 4, 568; cl. 8, 575; cl. 10, 577; cl. 16, 579, 581; cl. 20, 585; cl. 25, 586, 589, 590; cl. 29, 592; cl. 31, 593; Report, 1332; cl. 4, 1335; cl. 5, 1338; cl. 25, Amendt. 1339, 1340; cl. 29, 1340, 1342; add. cl. Amendt. 1347
Parliament—Whitsuntide Recess, 191
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1491, 1493; Comm. cl. 2, 1814, 1818, 1821, 1824; cl. 3, 1825; cl. 4, 1826; cl. 6, 1830; add. cl. 1831, 1838
Statute Law Revision, 2R. 1022
Treaty of Washington, 271, 564, 905; Motion for an Address, 1141, 1188, 1266, 1267;—Statement, 1573

Salmon Fisheries (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. William Lowther, Mr. Assheton, Mr. Brown)

c. Report * May 31 [Bills 10-178]

SALOMONS, Alderman Sir D., Greenwich
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1971

SALT, Mr. T., Stafford

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 22, 697
India—Andaman Islands, Convicts at, 99

SAMUDA, Mr. J. D'A., Tower Hamlets

Navy Estimates — Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 733
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 555

SAMUELSON, Mr. B., Banbury

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 52, 1628

SAMUELSON, Mr. H. B., Cheltenham

Education—Inspectors of Elementary Schools, 1588
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 123, 126; Schedule 2, Amendt. 137

SANDHURST, Lord

Army—Purchase and Scientific Corps, 1329;
Address for a Commission, 1919

SANDON, Viscount, Liverpool

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 65, 1938;
cl. 66, 1998; cl. 73, 2021

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G., Hampshire, N.

Court of Chancery (Funds), Consid. 1723
Customs and Inland Revenue, Consid. add. cl. 1904
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Amendt. 514
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1950
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1893
Charity Commission, 1529
County Courts, 1879
Court of Chancery, 1872
Law Charges, 1867
Miscellaneous Legal Charges, 1895
Privy Council, 977, 978
Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Office (Scotland), 1550
Works and Public Buildings, 1542

SCOTLAND

Endowed Schools and Hospitals—See that title
Offences against Women and Children Bill, Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 8, 499
Poor Law—Female Inspectors, Question, Mr. M'Laren; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 13, 649; June 3, 1028

Scotland—Polling Places

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 31, To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Return respecting the counties, divisions of counties, and combined counties in Scotland which severally return a Member to Parliament, showing, as far as can be given, the population of each, the area in square miles, the number of electors, the number of polling places at last election, the average number of electors to each polling place, the average number of square miles to each polling place, and the number of electors who at last election polled at each polling place, the two divisions of a county recently made for the purpose of returning a Member each for each division to be bracketed together and treated as an original county for the calculation of this Return, and the number of square miles in each county to be taken from the 'Edinburgh Almanac,' or any other authentic source" (Mr. McLaren) v. 972; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

[cont.]

Scotland—Polling Places—cont.

SCOTT, Lord H. J. M. D., Hampshire, S.

Education (Scotland), Comm. 306; cl. 1, 1056, 1073; Motion for reporting Progress, 1084; cl. 4, 1213; cl. 5, 1288; cl. 8, 1290; cl. 19, 1322; cl. 52, 1709; cl. 64, 1748, 1753

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 441

Navy Estimates—Coastguard, &c. 720

Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 769

Treaty of Washington, 1741, 1742

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 69

SCOURFIELD, Mr. J. H., Pembrokeshire

Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 944

Education (Scotland), Comm. 327, 911; cl. 68, Amendt. 2004, 2007, 2011; cl. 70, 2013; cl. 71, 2014

Navy Estimates—Dockyards at Home and Abroad, 766

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1233

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 134

Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1966

Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1253

Women's Disabilities Removal, 2R. 34

SELWIN-IBBETSON, Sir H. J., Essex, W.

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1225, 1231

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 479

Treaty of Washington, 1694

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 2R. 1447; Comm. add. cl. 1831, 1835

SHAW, Mr. R., Burnley

Supply—County Courts, 1880

SHERLOCK, Mr. Serjeant D., King's Co.

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1645

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 2R. 1655, 1657

Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 159

SIMON, Mr. Serjeant J., Dewsbury

Spain—"Lark," Seizure and Detention of the, 605, 607

Sites for Places of Worship and Schools

Bill (Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Morley, Mr. Charles Reed, Mr. Hinde Palmer)

a. Committee *; Report June 4 [Bill 2] der for Consideration read June 7, 1420

[cont.]

Sites for Places of Worship and Schools Bill—
cont.

Amendt. in page 3, line 41, after "school," add "and such trust deed, together with the names of the trustees for the time being, shall be enrolled in the High Court of Chancery" (Mr. Newdegate); Question proposed, "That those words be there added"

Amendt. proposed to the said proposed Amendt. to leave out "together with the names of the trustees for the time being" (Mr. Osborne Morgan); Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" Question put; A. 3, N. 22; M. 19 [House adjourned]

Considered * June 19

Read 3° * June 20

SMITH, Mr. A., Hertfordshire

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 802

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport

Cattle, Importation of—Order in Council, 1871, 650

Weights and Measures—Metric System Act (1864), 1859

Sugar—Drawback Convention, 1026

SMITH, Mr. T. E., Tynemouth, &c.

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 246

Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 383

Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 482

Supply—Miscellaneous Legal Charges, 1895

SMITH, Mr. W. H., Westminster

Crimea—British Graves in the, 98

Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 13, 1560

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 66, 1996; cl. 67, Amendt. 2001

Metropolis—Queen's Square, Westminster, and Birdcage Walk, Res. 1240

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 562; 3R. 856, 858

SMYTH, Mr. P. J., Westmeath Co.

Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1860

National Schools, Masters and Assistants at, 1743

* Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal, 2R. 140

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir G. JESSEL),
Dover

Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 683; cl. 18, 693, 839

Imprisonment for Debt Abolition, 2R. 1983

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 227

Law Officers of the Crown, 263

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. cl. 26, 545

Supply—Court of Chancery, 1874

Land Registry, 1881

SOMERSET, Duke of

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), 2R. 88 ;
Comm. cl. 16, 580; cl. 25, 588, 589; Amendt.
590; cl. 31, 593; cl. 39, 598; cl. 66,
Amendt. 599; Report, cl. 4, 1886
Naval College, Portsmouth, Removal of, 175
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
cl. 2, 1809; cl. 4, 1827

Spain—Cuba—Seizure and Detention of the "Lark"

Questions, Mr. Serjeant Simon, Sir John
Pakington; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Mr.
Knatchbull-Hugessen May 10, 605

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. H. B. W.
BRAND), Cambridgeshire

Army—Control Department, 1994
Bishops Resignation Act (1869) Perpetuation,
2R. 1553
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm, 1555
Ireland—Galway Election Petition, 1669
Parliament—Ascension Day, 507
Counts-out, 1950
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid.
513; cl. 16, 535; Schedule 1, 679; 3R. 852, 870
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1253
Spain—"Lark," Seizure and Detention of the, 606
Treaty of Washington, Res. 1281;—Statement, 1591, 1741

STACPOOLE, Mr. W., Ennis

Army—Cashel Barracks, 104;—Sickness at, 835
Martini-Henry Rifle, 1691
Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 431
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1893

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm.
cl. 3, Amendt. 1824

STANSFELD, Right Hon. J. (President of the Poor Law Board), Halifax

Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1976
Land Returns—The "New Domesday Book," 1684
Local Government—Digest of Sanitary Laws, 1688
Mine Dues, 2R. 1798
Parliament—Private Legislation, Res. 1669
Poor Law—Lunatics, Borough Pauper, 500
Public Health—Public Revenue, Charges on, 909, 910
Rating—Exemptions of Government Property, 836
Supply—Local Government Board, 1538

Statute Law Revision Bill [H.L.]

(Lord Chancellor)

l. Presented; read 1st May 13 (No. 107)
Read 2^d, after short debate June 3, 1022
Committee June 10
Report June 11
Read 3^d June 13

STAPLETON, Mr. J., Berwick-on-Tweed

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 8, 1301;
cl. 64, 1748; cl. 65, Amendt. 1756

STEVENSON, Mr. J. C., South Shields

Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 776

STORRS, Right Hon. Major General Sir
H. (Surveyor General of Ordnance), Ripon

Army—Questions, &c.
Equipment of the, 104
India—Horse Artillery, 1419
Martini-Henry Rifle, 1691
Militia Camp, Appleby, 1850
Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 803
Canada, Dominion of—Arms and Stores, Sale of, 502, 503

STRAIGHT, Mr. D., Shrewsbury

Criminal Law—Brutal Assaults on Women, 285
Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1256
Metropolitan Police—Carter, George, Constable, Case of, 840
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1963

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Viscount

Treaty of Washington, Motion for an Address, 1126

STUART, Lieutenant Colonel J. F. D. C., Cardiff

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 821

Suez Canal—Increase of Dues—Net and Gross Tonnage

Questions, Mr. Norwood; Answers, Mr. Chichester Fortescue June 13, 1687

SUPPLY

Considered in Committee May 3—Committee
—R.P.

Considered in Committee May 27, 719—NAVY
ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported May 30

Considered in Committee May 31, 976—MIS-CELLANEOUS ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported
June 3

Considered in Committee June 3, 1049—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported
June 4

Considered in Committee June 10, 1516—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—R.P.—Resolutions reported June 11

Postponed Resolutions 19-32 [reported 11th
June] considered, and agreed to June 13

Considered in Committee—Committee—R.P.
June 14

Considered in Committee June 17, 1865—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Resolutions reported
June 18

SYNAN, Mr. E. J., Limerick Co.

Criminal Trials (Ireland), 2R. 1641
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 20, 1353;
cl. 64, 1744
Irish Church Act Amendment, Comm. 359

[cont.]

SYMAN, Mr. E. J.—cont.

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 2R. 1656

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Comm. Schedule 1, 111; Amendt. 124; Consid. cl. 17, 539; Schedule 1, 547, 561, 668, 673, 676; 3R. 855

Post Office—Telegraph Clerks, 1857

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Kent, W.

Bank Holidays Act—Savings Banks Clerks, 601

Criminal Law—Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Res. 629

Defamation of Private Character, 2R. 1258

Education (Scotland), Comm. 337; cl. 67, 2003; cl. 68, Amendt. 2009, 2010

Treaty of Washington, Res. 1279

TAYLOR, Right Hon. Lt.-Colonel T. E., Dublin Co.

Ireland—Neill, Mrs., Murder of, at Rathgar, 1984

Taxation, Exemption from, 286

Irish Church Act Amendment, 287

Thames Embankment (Land) Bill

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter)

c. 2R. adjourned May 9

Read 2° * May 13 [Bill 82]

THYNNE, Lord H. F., Wiltshire, S.

Army—Autumn Manœuvres, Res. 803

Tithe Rent-charge (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Heron, Dr. Ball, Mr. Bagwell, Mr. Pim)

c. 2R. adjourned June 4 [Bill 70]

TOLLEMACHE, Major W. F., Cheshire, W.

Army—Militia Permanent Staff, 279

TORRENS, Mr. R. R., Cambridge Bo.

Middlesex Registration of Deeds, 1259

Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 669, 676

TORRENS, Mr. W. M., Finsbury

Colonies, The, Res. 921

India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 245

South Africa, Res. 810, 815

Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1613

TRACY, Hon. C. R. D. HANBURY-Montgomery, &c.

Navy—Navigation, System of, Res. 1375, 1401

Navy—Rule of the Road at Sea—Steering and Sailing Rules, Motion for a Select Committee, 381

Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation Bill

(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1° * May 31 [Bill 181]

Read 2° * June 3

Committee *; Report; read 3° June 12

Read 1° * (Earl Cowper) June 13 (No. 147)

Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Ordered; read 1° * May 3 [Bill 147]

Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Ordered; read 1° * May 3 [Bill 148]

Read 2° * May 9

Referred to Select Committee May 30, 897

Re-comm. *; Report June 7 [Bill 188]

Committee * (on re-comm.); Report June 10

Considered *; read 3° June 12

l. Read 1° * (Earl Cowper) June 13 (No. 145)

Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 4) Bill

(Mr. Arthur Peel, Mr. Chichester Fortescue)

c. Ordered * May 7

Read 1° * May 8 [Bill 155]

Read 2° * May 13

Referred to Select Committee May 30, 897

Re-comm. *; Report June 7 [Bill 189]

Committee * (on re-comm.); Report June 10

Considered *; read 3° June 12

l. Read 1° * (Earl Cowper) June 13 (No. 146)

Treaty of Washington

LORDS—

Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)—The Indirect Claims

Observations, Earl Granville; Reply, Earl Russell; debate thereon May 6, 267; Notice of Motion (Earl Russell) postponed

The Ministerial Statement, Observations, Earl Granville; short debate thereon May 10, 564; May 13, 632

The Correspondence

Observations, Earl Granville, Lord Cairns May 2, 73

The Supplemental Article

Question, The Earl of Derby; Answer, Earl Granville; debate thereon May 31, 898; Observations, Earl Granville; short debate thereon June 3, 989

Enlargement of Time, Statement, Earl Granville; debate thereon June 11, 1562

Communications of the High Commissioners—Professor Bernard's Lecture, Question, Observations, Lord Buckhurst; Reply, Earl Granville June 11, 1582

Order of Proceedings, Question, Observations, Lord Redesdale; Reply, Earl Granville June 14, 1730

Proceedings before the Arbitrators, Questions, Lord Cairns; Answers, Earl Granville June 17, 1799

Privilege, Question, Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Reply, Earl Granville short debate thereon June 4, 1093

Treaty of Washington—Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)—The Indirect Claims

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the Arbitrators appointed to meet at Geneva pursuant to the Treaty of Washington be suspended until the claims included in the Case submitted on behalf of the United States, and understood on the part of Her Majesty not to be within the province of the Arbitrators, have been withdrawn (Earl Russell) June 4, 1895; after long debate, Moved, "That the further debate on the said Motion be adjourned" (Lord Chancellor); after further short debate, on Question? Cont. 85, Not-Cont. 125; M. 40; resolved in the negative; Division List, Cont. and Not-Cont. 1190

Moved, "That the House do now adjourn" (Lord Kinnaird); Motion withdrawn; then the further debate upon the original Motion adjourned

Debate resumed June 6 1862; after further debate, Motion withdrawn

Treaty of Washington—Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give instructions that all proceedings on behalf of Her Majesty before the arbitrators appointed to meet at Geneva pursuant to the Treaty of Washington be suspended until an agreement in writing be come to between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, and such agreement be laid before the arbitrators at Geneva by the joint action of these two Governments, removing and putting an end to all demands on the part of the Government of the United States with regard to the claims included in the case submitted on behalf of the United States and understood on the part of Her Majesty not to be within the province of the arbitrators (The Lord Oranmore and Browne) June 11, 1884; resolved in the negative

COMMONS—

Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)—The Indirect Claims

Observations, Mr. Gladstone May 7, 371; Ministerial Statement, Mr. Gladstone; short debate thereon May 13, 654; Question, Mr. Percy Wyndham; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 6, 1276

Statement of Sir Stafford Northcote at Exeter, Questions, Mr. Bouverie; Answers, Sir Stafford Northcote May 27, 708

Resolution (Viscount Bury), Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, Viscount Bury June 6, 1279

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Viscount Bury); after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Communication of the High Commissioners, Questions, Mr. Horsman; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 14, 1736

Treaty of Washington—Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)—cont.

The Correspondence

Question, Observations, Mr. Disraeli; Reply, Mr. Gladstone May 2, 105; Questions, Mr. Otway, Mr. Bouverie; Answers, Mr. Gladstone May 10, 607

The Negotiations

Questions, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Osborne; Answers, Mr. Gladstone May 30, 842; Question, Colonel Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 31, 911; Notice (Mr. Bruce) June 10, 1561

The Supplemental Article

Observations, Mr. Disraeli; Reply, Mr. Gladstone May 27, 710; Observations, Questions, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Bouverie; Reply, Mr. Gladstone May 28, 783; Observations, Mr. Gladstone June 3, 1032

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Osborne); after debate, Motion withdrawn

Enlargement of Time, Statement (Mr. Gladstone) June 11, 1589

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Newdegate); after debate, Motion withdrawn

General Contracts of the Treaty—Proceedings before Tribunal of Arbitration (Geneva)

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Corrance) June 14, 1738; after short debate, Motion withdrawn; Questions, Mr. Bouverie, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 17, 1862

Professor Bernard's Lecture, Question, Mr. Disraeli; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 30, 841

Relations with the United States, Question, Mr. Osborne; Answer, Mr. Disraeli June 20, 1985

Parl. Papers (Commons)—

Draft of Article proposed by British Government ... (No. 8) [548]
Correspondence respecting Geneva Arbitration ... (No. 9) [566]

Treaty of Washington—Dominion of Canada

Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen May 13, 652; Questions, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Spencer Walpole, Mr. R. Torrens; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 20, 1987

Guaranteed Canadian Loan of £2,500,000, Question, Sir George Jenkinson; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 6, 284; Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen May 10, 603

Provisional "Use," Notice of Questions, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Baillie Cochrane June 14, 1735; Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen June 17, 1858

The San Juan Arbitration—Canadian Claims, Question, Mr. Corrance; Answer, Mr. Gladstone; debate thereon June 13, 1693

Parl. Paper—

Correspondence respecting Treaty of Washington ... [557]
[See title Canada, Dominion of] TREVELYAN, Mr. G. O., Hawick, &c.

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 64, Amendt.
1718, 1744; Amendt. 1749, 1750; cl. 67,
2008
Supply—Court of Chancery, 1875

Trusts of Benefices and Churches Bill [H.L.]
(Bishop of Carlisle)

l. Presented; read 1st * June 13 (No. 151)
Bill read 2nd June 18, 1906

Turnpike Acts Continuance
Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr.
Bruce May 30, 834

Ulster Tenant Right Bill
(Mr. Butt, Mr. Callan, Mr. Patrick Smyth)
c. Ordered; read 1st * May 2 [Bill 144]

Union of Benefices Act Amendment Bill
[H.L.] (Bishop of London)
l. Report of Select Committee * June 11 (No. 139)
Report * June 11 (No. 140)

Union Officers (Ireland) Superannuation Bill
(The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)
c. Ordered; read 1st * May 13 [Bill 166]
2R. adjourned * May 27

Unlawful Assemblies (Ireland) Act Repeal Bill
(Mr. Patrick Smyth, Sir Patrick O'Brien, Mr. Synan, Mr. Digby, Mr. Downing, Mr. M'Mahon, Mr. Maguire)
c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd"
May 2, 140
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (The Marquess of Hartington); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after long debate, Question put; A. 27, N. 145; M. 118; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Bill put off for six months

VANCE, Mr. J., Armagh City
Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Law Amendment, 2R. 1656
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1234

Victoria Park Bill
(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. William Henry Gladstone)
c. Ordered; read 1st * June 17 [Bill 201]

VIVIAN, Mr. H. Hussey, Glamorganshire
All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 823
Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. 493

WALKER, Major G. G., Dumfriesshire
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 60, 1372
Railways—Box Tunnel, Accident in the, 278

WALPOLE, Right Hon. Spencer, H., Cambridge University
Act of Uniformity Amendment, 3R. 1088
All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 828
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. 692
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1952
South Kensington Museum—Natural History Collections, 1690
Treaty of Washington, 1989

WALTER, Mr. J., Berkshire
Supply—Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 1891

WATERHOUSE, Major S., Pontefract
Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 1510
Criminal Law—Criminal Prosecutions, Costs of, 504

WATNEY, Mr. J., Surrey, E.
Treaty of Washington—Statement, 1608

WAYS AND MEANS
Resolution [May 3] reported, and agreed to;
Bill ordered May 6, 359
[See title Consolidated Fund]
Inland Revenue—The Income Tax—Tenant Farmers, Question, Mr. C. S. Read; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 10, 1513
Income Tax on Shootings, Question, Mr. Muntz; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 13, 652
Sugar—Drawback Convention (1864), Question, Mr. J. B. Smith; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 3, 1026
Terminable Annuities, 29 Vict. c. 5—Question, Mr. Sinclair Aytoun; Answer, Mr. Baxter June 6, 1274

WEDDERBURN, Sir D., Ayrshire, S.
Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 65, 1946;
cl. 67, Amendt. 2004; cl. 77, 2024
India—Bombay—Income Tax, 600
Scotland—Offences against Women and Children, 499

Weights and Measures (Metric System) Act (1864)
Question, Mr. J. B. Smith; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue June 17, 1859

WELBY, Mr. W. E., Lincolnshire, S.
Ordnance Survey—Lincolnshire, 1689;—The 25-inch Scale, 1986
Women, Employment of—Smith, Mary Ann, Case of, 1506

Wellington Monument, The
Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 3, To leave out from "That," and add "there be laid before this House, a Copy of further Correspondence relating to the completion of the Wellington Monument" (Mr. Goldsmid) v. 193; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

WEST, Mr. H. W., Ipswich

Public Prosecutors, Cost of, 1507
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1951
Supply—County Courts, Amendt. 1876, 1880
Court of Chancery, Amendt. 1869, 1873, 1875
Criminal Proceedings in Scotland, 1896
Law Charges, Amendt. 1552, 1867, 1868

WESTBURY, Lord

Treaty of Washington, 906, 995, 1095 ; Motion for an Address, 1157

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough

Ireland—Neill, Mrs., Murder of, at Rathgar, 1743, 1933
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 1229
Tichborne v. Lushington—Prosecution, &c. 1272

WHARTON, Mr. J. L., Durham

Criminal Prosecutions—Treasury Revision of Costs, 1685
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, Consid. Schedule 1, 666
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1964
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1251
Supply—Criminal Prosecutions, 1869
Law Charges, 1867

WHEELHOUSE, Mr. W. St. James, Leeds

Education—Ripon Grammar School, Motion for an Address, 444
Education (Scotland), Comm. 325 ; cl. 35, Amendt. 1357 ; cl. 68, 2010
Municipal Corporations (Election of Aldermen), Res. 403
Municipal Corporations (Wards), 779
Permissive Prohibitory Liquor, 2R. Amendt. 458
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1967
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1251
Supply—Law Charges, 1552, 1866
Metropolitan Police, 1882
Police Courts—London and Sheerness, 1881
Public Record Office, 1538
Wild Fowl Protection, 2R. 1653

WHITE, Hon. Colonel C. W., Tipperary Co.

Ireland—Clare, Lord Lieutenant of, Res. 435

WHITE, Mr. J., Brighton

Broadmoor Asylum—Criminal Lunatics, Maintenance of, 651
Customs and Inland Revenue, Comm. cl. 12, 1557

WHITWELL, Mr. J., Kendal

Army—Militia Camp, Appleby, 1850
Bastardy Laws Amendment, 2R. 1975
Court of Chancery (Funds), Comm. cl. 21, 696
Education—Certificated Teachers Pensions, Notice, 939, 948
Supply—Privy Council, 981
Works and Public Buildings, 1542

Wild Fowl Protection Bill

(Mr. Andrew Johnston, Colonel Tomlins, Mr. Brown)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
June 12, 1846

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to provide for the protection of all Wild Birds during the breeding season" (Mr. Auberon Herbert) v. ; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn ; main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 2^o

WILLIAMS, Mr. Watkin, Denbigh, &c.

All Saints Church, Cardiff, 2R. 826
India—Bombay, Old Bank of, Res. 242
Law Reform—Judicature Commission, 835
Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, 3R. 863

WINCHESTER, Bishop of

Baptismal Fees, 2R. 1663
Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, 172

WINGFIELD, Sir C. J., Gravesend

Africa—Dutch Guinea, Acquisition of, 287
Army—India—Horse Artillery, 1417
British Guiana—Emigration, 1990
India—Coolies, Recruiting of, 600
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1245

WINTERBOTHAM, Mr. H. S. P. (Under Secretary of State, Home Department), Stroud

Defamation of Private Character, 3R. 1256
Municipal Corporations (Wards), Consid. 779, 780
Public Prosecutors, Comm. 1964
Registration of Borough Voters, Comm. 1252
Supply—Local Government Board, 1537

Women, Employment of—Case of Mary Ann Smith

Question, Mr. Welby ; Answer, Mr. Bruce
June 10, 1506

Women's Disabilities Removal Bill

(Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Eastwick, Dr. Lyon Playfair)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
May 1, 1

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Bouverie) ; after debate, Question put, "That 'now,' &c. ; A. 143, N. 222 ; M. 79 ; words added ; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to ; Bill put off for six months
Division List, Ayes and Noes, 69

Working Men's Clubs—The Excise

Question, Sir Harcourt Johnstone ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 10, 1513

Workshop Regulation Act (1871)

Question, Mr. C. Dalrymple; Answer, Mr.
Bruce June 17, 1851

WYNDHAM, Hon. P. S., Cumberland, W.

Criminal Law—Murphy, Mr., Assault on the late, 286

Criminal Law — Release of the Whitehaven
Rioters, Res. 949

Education (Scotland), Comm. cl. 19, 1315

Law Officers of the Crown, 263

Supply—Criminal Prosecutions, 1868

Treaty of Washington, 1043, 1276 ;—Statement,
1612, 1614

YARMOUTH, Earl of, Antrim Co.

Army—Grenadier Guards, Band of, 1031, 1510, 1511

YORK, Archbishop of

Church Seats, Comm. cl. 2, 171

Intoxicating Liquor (Licensing), Comm. cl. 4,
568, 570, 571

YOUNG, Mr. A. W., Helston

Juries, 2R. 702

END OF VOLUME CCXI., AND THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1872.

